We do not remember to have met with a more wanton act of injustice than is disclosed by the cases of Bullock and Pearce. How Mr. Wentworth can, as a man and a Christian, reconcile it to his conscience thus to deal with his labourers, we will not inquire; and he perhaps has no fear of being served in the same way by his landlords for the free expression of his own opinions, because his mind is probably of so submissive a character never to have dared to think for itself. And what a service is this to lose? Bullock tells that Mr. Wentworth said, "it was the last 11. 8s. I should ever receive of him." That was a month's wages!!! 7s. a week, the regular Wiltshire wages. These are "protection" wages. Well may the Wiltshire labourers meet to petition against such "protection." And we gather another fact from the statement of Pearce, namely, that though wheat has risen 25s. a quarter, wages in Wiltshire have not risen; for poor Pearce has only earned at his recent "job" 6s. a-week. Now, though we do not know the particular farm occupied by Mr. Wentworth, we are well acquainted with Beckhampton and the surrounding district, and we do not hesitate to say that it is not half cultivated. If it were farmed as well, or nearly as well, as the average—not the best, farming of Norfolk—there would be no 6s. and 7s. a week wages for farm labourers; but there must be such an increased demand for labour as would double farm-wages at the least. Yet it is to "protect" and continue this system of half cultivation that the Corn Laws are to be continued. Until the Corn Laws are repealed, the condition of English agriculture and agricultural wages will be depressed and poverty-stricken. We cannot leave this matter without expressing a hope, that out of the many thousand intelligent, humane, and just employers of labour who read the LEAGUE, some one may be found who will put these poor men in the way of getting work. The gentleman from whom we received the statements says "the poor fellows would be glad to leave the neighbourhood, if they could get constant employment elsewhere; and it would produce a good moral effect, could this be done, on the conduct of other masters. I fear many of the labourers may now be deterred from attending any future meetings in the neighbourhood." Should any Free Traders be inclined to aid these victims of monopoly, or wish to make further inquiry about them, C. Day, Esq., of Marlborough, Wilts, will readily receive communications on their behalf.

GAME LAWS.—The following representation has been made to the Home Secretary, by a magistrate: "I. E. was convicted of night poaching (drawing nets over standing barley), on the 29th of August, 1844, under the 9th of Geo. IV., c. 69. Having been previously convicted, he came under the section of the Act which gives six months' imprisonment, and requires two sureties of 10*l.* each, besides his own, for his good behaviour for two years; in default, imprisonment for one year. After the expiration of the six months, unless the sureties are sooner found, the Secretary of State alone has the power of reducing this last imprisonment, by ordering the discharge of the prisoner on his own recognizances. Now, the cost of this 18 months' imprisonment is to the county 27*l.*; to the prisoner 1-28th part of his life of mainly labour, degradation, possibly bad health, certainly a vast amount of moral contamination. Our House of Correction, not being yet on the separate system, this prisoner would be in communication of — thieves, &c. &c.; for they are rarely sentenced to more than three months imprisonment. Among poachers it is generally the younger men who are taken, the instructors and leaders remaining in safety in the lanes, &c. This was so in I. E.'s case. The two old poachers, one of whom had been his instructor, let him remain in gaol for six months beyond his sentence, till the end of Aug., 1845, (within a few days of one year from his conviction.) During the summer they had no need of his services, but requiring them in September, they offered bail, and paid the fees for the recognizances. They would, no doubt, take him into their service to work out their debt. If convicted a third time of night poaching, this young man is subject to two years' imprisonment, or transportation for seven years. Being now fully instructed in the gaol school, he will find it far more advantageous, and not more dangerous, to engage in housebreaking. I respectfully submit that inquiry be made as to the number of men in the different gaols for want of sureties in the cases of poaching."

REVIEW.

The Potato Disease: a Letter to Sir Robert Peel, Bart. By a Naturalist. London. Baillière.

The subject of this pamphlet is one which now engages so largely and painfully the attention of the public that we cannot pass it over, though the writer has added little to the information which we already possessed on the subject. We agree with him that many of the scientific processes recommended to check the progress of the disease are worse than useless; they are too expensive for the poor; they require too much skill in manipulation for the ignorant. But we could have wished that the Naturalist had paid some attention to the history of the disease, for which valuable materials may be found in the report of the Commission of Patents in the United States, made to Congress in the beginning of this year. The Naturalist, addressing the Premier, says:

"It is not probable that, amid the many demands on your attention and thoughts, you can find time to sound all the depths of this question; and I have no faith in the sagacity and honesty of those to whose advice you must have recourse for directions in circumstances so full of peril. I have little doubt that, when the cry of exaggeration has been thoroughly disproved by the increase of the calamity, you will be told the mischief is a transient one, and that we may tide over the winter without much difficulty, or, at all events, with only a partial and temporary relaxation of the law till the return of the fine season of the year brings abundance with it again. It is to guard you against such deception, and show you this is no transitory misfortune, that I now take up my pen.

"If your counsellors tell you the truth, they must inform you that this malady in the potato began three or four years ago; that it has been gradually increasing in extent and malignancy; that it is not confined to any one country, or any particular climate; that it prevails equally in all soils and in all seasons; is quite as much known in light sands, in dry limestones, and in chalks, as in the heaviest clays and richest loams; that it is not more prevalent in wet summers than in dry, and has occasioned losses quite as great in Switzerland as in Scotland, in Holland as in France, in America as in Europe; yet, spite of these facts, which speak so plainly, we every day hear the malady attributed to the soil and to the season; to humidity and drought; to chalk, flint, and clay; to every source but the true one. It seems clear that there is a dread of the truth, and a great willingness to be deceived.

"It is quite certain that it is a malady inherent in the plant itself, and independent of external circumstances. Admitting this to be the case, you will naturally inquire how it happens that the same malady should affect the plants everywhere and in such a variety of circumstances?"

The American commissioners speak with much more precision:

"2. As to the time of its first appearance in this country, we find not less difficulty. The evil may have been partially known, but not have attracted much notice. The first distinct recognition in the public journals, so as to excite attention, was during the year 1843. It is said now, by one and another individual (as will be seen by reference to the papers in the appendix), to have been noticed, here and there, years ago. Very possibly, however, they may have mistaken something resembling it in its appearance as well as general results. It is likewise stated in a public journal, that the farmers of Nova Scotia have known it for years. We cannot decide on the truth of this assertion, nor whether or not it in all respects corresponds to certain evils affecting the potato crop in Great Britain and on the Continent, which it has been supposed entirely to resemble. As far as regards our own country, it seems to be comparatively (certainly it is so considered) as alarming an evil. The point of its original appearance is of some importance in enabling us to ascertain how far it may have been affected by meteorological phenomena, and, therefore, may be considered peculiar to the season; and thus merely temporary, or of a more permanent character. Further inquiry hereafter may elicit more ample information on this subject."

We find, from the Report, one striking resemblance between the American disease and the phase that the pestilence has assumed in Ireland. In both countries the presence of the disease has been first manifested at about the same period of the year:

"3. The particular period of the season in which the evil is first observed to operate is also another which it might be useful to determine. We have attended with some care to the comparison of the various accounts in reference to this point, and we cannot find any notice which extends forward further than to the month of August. In looking at the papers of July, as will be seen of our notices of the crops, we often find the crop of potatoes mentioned as promising; but in the course of a few weeks, first in the month of August, we notice the remark that the plant begins to exhibit signs of injury. We have noticed scarcely any of these intimations earlier than the latter half of August. They seem to be more frequent, however, in the month of September. It is quite probable that there has been considerable diversity in this respect, according to the climate and soil more or less adapted to forward the growth of the plant. As far as regards the evil to the potato while in the ground, the whole time of the development of the evil is limited, throughout the entire extent where it has prevailed, to three or four weeks, and probably still less. This fact is useful, as it may lead to means of prevention. It is true the cause may be hidden much further back; and this must be determined when the nature of the evil itself is fully understood, if it ever shall be."

With respect to the cause of the disease, four theories have been propounded, each of which has been supported by plausible arguments. The first is "the insect theory," which has found favour chiefly with the American Naturalists. They assert that a species of maggot, similar to the apple-worm, had worked its way into the stalks or vines, and had destroyed the albumen necessary to form the perfect tuber. This theory, however, fails to account for the destruction of those potatoes which had been dug up in a state of apparent soundness, but which have subsequently rotted in store. The insects indeed appear to be the effect rather than the cause of the injury, for worms are soon generated in decaying plants and vegetables, and there is no evidence of their having been discovered until the disease had made considerable progress.

The weight of evidence and of authority preponderates in favour of the fungus theory, which is thus ably stated in the report of the Irish commissioners:

"It is a very general opinion, and one entertained by men whose extensive knowledge entitles it to respect, that parasitical fungi, similar in their nature to those which produce mildew and dryrot, are the real cause of the malady. It is stated that one of these plants belonging to the genus botrytis, and similar to that which some years since produced great mischief among the silkworms of France and Italy, has attacked the potato crop. It is described as entering the potato plant by the breathing pores of its leaves, and then passing down through the interior of the stem into the tubers, in which its mycelium or spawn fixes itself, traversing the cellular mass, separating the cells themselves, causing alteration in their chemical condition, and thus producing decay. In other cases, where the spawn is not apparently distinguishable in diseased portions of potatoes, even by the most practised observers, it is suggested that the juices of the plant may be vitiated by the parasite which destroyed the leaves, and that particles of it too obscure to be distinguished by the eye may be circulating with the juices and producing disease by irritation. The presence of the parasite is not to be detected by the naked eye, unless it make its appearance on the outside of the potato in the form of mouldy tufts; but its spawn may be detected in the diseased portions by the microscope, whether any external indications of its presence can be perceived or not; hence it is inferred that it is produced exclusively from within. It is, however, within our knowledge that when apparently sound potatoes are pitted in places where the mouldiness of a diseased potato is able to appear, that mouldiness rapidly establishes itself on the sound potatoes at every point where their surface has been wounded or bruised; and that, under such circumstances, the disease is immediately extended through the entire mass.

"That the spawn of fungi is present in a large quantity in diseased potatoes is undoubted; the evidence of the best microscopical observers would be with us conclusive on that point, even if we had not verified the fact by personal observation. We also regard it as well ascertained, that these parasites spread rapidly in warm and damp situations, producing infinite mischief under such circumstances, and that their advance is only to be successfully resisted by dryness. But it does not appear to us that their being the original cause of the disease has been well established; if it were so, it is difficult to conceive why fields of potatoes placed very near each other should be differently affected, or why certain varieties of this plant should be much less injured than others—the Irish apple potato for instance, which appears to have suffered more extensively than others. We are also unable to reconcile with the theory of the potato disease being caused by parasitical fungi, the remarkable fact that in its present form it is certainly of modern origin. That it may have always existed is possible, though of this we have no proof; but at least there can be no doubt that it has only manifested itself to any considerable degree within the last few years. We cannot suppose the botrytis, which observers find to be the kind of fungus that attacks the potato, to be a recent creation. We must assume it to have been co-existent with the potato itself; and, therefore, we must conclude that some recent causes have come into operation favourable to its increase to the present alarming degree.

"Without pretending to decide what the cause really was, we may state that it seems to be connected with the cold, cloudy, ungenial weather which has characterised the present year over the north of Europe; conditions highly unsuited to the constitution of a plant which, like the potato, is a native of a warm, dry, sunny country, and insufficient for the ripening of the tubers. Without adverting to solitary cases, which require to be examined with more care than we have the means of giving to them, we may state, that amidst the mass of conflicting evidence which we have obtained, the following facts appear to be established:

"1. That potatoes planted early in the season are more healthy than those planted later.

"2. That the crop has suffered less in dry, elevated, sandy districts, where the influence of the season was mitigated by slowness of growth, or compensated for by the natural warmth of the soil.

"3. That the late varieties of potatoes are more diseased than early ones.

"4. That the present disease seems to be confined to the northern parts of Europe and North America, and to be unknown in the countries to the southward."

Thus the Irish commissioners combine the fungus theory with the atmospheric theory so far as to assert that certain conditions of the atmosphere have a decided influence on the growth and propagation of the fungus. The German and Belgian commissioners have arrived at nearly the same conclusion; but they attribute less influence to atmospheric causes than the gentlemen employed by our Government. The Continental and American reports are at variance on the question of climate. The European inquirers generally agree that the warm temperatures of southern countries tend to secure healthy crops; while the Americans assert that the ravages of the disease are very marked in the southern states, and that no part of the new world has escaped so well as Canada.

Excess of growth in the stalks causing weakness in the tubers, has been assigned as a cause by some American writers, but this theory has been so fully contradicted by European experience that we need not enter upon its examination.

The author of the pamphlet before us, and many eminent naturalists both in Europe and America, believe that there has been a natural deterioration of the plant itself. It is well known that in certain species of pears and other fruit, there is a tendency to wear themselves out by continued propagation, and they assert that this has been the case with the most common varieties of the potato. We may add that the reception of this theory does not exclude any of the others, for degenerate potatoes would by the mere fact of degeneracy become more liable to atmospheric influence, more inviting to destructive insects, and more favourable to the growth and propagation of pernicious fungi.

The questions which may be considered as undecided are of tremendous and fearful import. They are—Can means be found to check the progress of decay in the present crop?—Is the disease of such a nature as to menace the prospects of the next harvest?

We have before us an immense pile of letters, in answer to queries which we have sent to known correspondents in every part of the empire, and we find an almost unanimous opinion that though careful drying, the use of lime, and precautions for ventilation, have been useful as checks, they have nowhere been found perfect preventatives. We have ascertained that cargoes of potatoes sent to the London market, though in good condition when embarked, have been found so injured as not to be worth the freight when they reached their destination.

All our correspondents are alarmed at the anxiety to sell immediately evinced by the potato growers, which renders consumption more than naturally rapid at this period of the year, and therefore dangerously diminishes the stock on which the people will have to rely in the spring and summer. They aver that this consumption, even should the disease make no farther progress, has already made the supply disproportionate to the probable wants of the population.

The Irish commissioners dwell strongly on the necessity of using precautions to prevent any taint of the seed for the next crop. They manifestly believe that the spawn of the destructive fungus is widely spread; if, then, we should encounter a second failure next year, our present alarms will be renewed with double intensity. In fact, on potatoes we can no longer rely, and our only hope or chance of safety is the free admission of corn.

POSTSCRIPT.

LONDON, Saturday Morning, November 29, 1845.

We have again to omit much of our usual matter, to make room for some account of the numerous and important meetings which have been held in various parts of the country, for the purpose of calling the attention of the Government to the calamities with which the country is menaced by the deficient supply of food. While Holland, Belgium, Russia, and Turkey, have thrown open their ports, restrictions are maintained in England in the face of impending famine; and the semi-official organs of Government declare that had the ports been opened, there would have been no additions made to our stock. The utter falsehood of such an excuse for the do-nothing policy of the Premier, is incontrovertibly proved by the returns of provisions imported into Antwerp since the restrictions on the importation of grain have been removed by the Belgian Government. BETWEEN THE 1ST OF OCTOBER, AND THE 17TH OF NOVEMBER, 212 VESSELS HAVE ENTERED THE PORT OF ANTWERP, bringing corn, grain, potatoes, and other articles of food. We find from a very careful analysis of these returns, which has appeared in the Liverpool Times, that a large amount of these provisions has been obtained from the bonded warehouses of England, so that the Corn Laws have not only prevented us from obtaining any additional supplies, but have led to the export of the food collected in the country. We have already called attention to this alarming circumstance; we have shown that our prohibitory duties not only prevented corn from coming in, but actually sent away the supply which we had in our possession, and that this was taking place at a time when the insufficiency of our stock was admitted on all hands. There are now about a million quarters of grain which might be admitted for consumption by an Order of Council, a great part of which will undoubtedly be lost to the country, if the tyranny of the sliding-scale be much longer maintained. The Ministerial twin-journal indeed declares that, if in spring the deficiency of supply should be severely felt, it will be in the power of Parliament to open the ports. But every day of delay transfers the available grain to those countries where a provident Government has adopted measures for averting scarcity. In England it would seem to be the policy of the Government to invite famine, by persevering in a system which drives corn out of the country. We quote the returns of the Antwerp Custom-house for a single day:

"On the 24th September arrived the English vessel Monarch, from Hull, with 72 sacks of potatoes; the Norwegian vessel Patria, with 1875 tchetwerts of barley; the Austrian vessel Carlo, from Odessa, with 1356 tchetwerts of linseed; the Danish vessel Peter, from Poole, with 726 quarters of wheat; the Dutch vessel Glasina Theodora, from Marseilles, with 3100 hectolitres of wheat; the Danish vessel Ceres, from Hull, with a cargo of wheat; the Sicilian vessel Mogul, from Berdeanky, with 1567 tchetwerts of wheat; the Danish vessel Concordia, from London; with 1000 tons of barley; the Danish vessel Comet, from Samsoe, with 1200 tons of barley; the French vessel Elbe, from Havre, with 200 bags of rice."

This export of corn from England to Belgium adds another proof to the many that have been adduced, to show that the present prices of food are a very imperfect indication of the state of our supplies. Potatoes are sold at less than their natural price, because men are unwilling to keep a stock which a few weeks may convert into a heap of putridity. Our wheat is of such inferior quality that a large proportion of it cannot be ground unless mixed with old wheat; and hence the low price of this bad wheat keeps down the averages, and prevents the admission of good corn. But it is this prime wheat, the wheat that must be mixed with our inferior stuff to render it at all available for consumption, which the suicidal policy of the sliding scale is driving from England to the ports of Belgium and Holland. On looking to the Belgian returns, we find that corn has come to Antwerp from a great diversity of quarters; from Italy, from France, from America, from the Black Sea, from the Baltic, and as we have already said, from our own ports. There has been no derangement of the currency in consequence of these importations; trade being left to its natural course has spread itself so widely and equally, that the exchanges have balanced each other. The apprehensions of scarcity in the Netherlands have subsided, and the trade of the country has suffered no depression. It is melancholy to contemplate the contrast which our country presents; we have the official journals of the ministry conceding the possibility of our supply being short to the extent of a month's consumption, but telling us that no measures are to be taken to supply the deficiency until the last grain of our stock is consumed. We have good grain sent out of the country to keep up the price of inferior and bad stuff; we have the signs of an approaching crisis in the manufacturing districts continually increasing in their gloom and their intensity, and we have Cabinet Councils held with unusual frequency, and protracted to unusual length, without leading to the adoption of any practical measure which may alleviate present calamity, or avert future danger.

THE FUNDS.

	SAT. Nov. 25	MON. Nov. 24	TUES. Nov. 25	WED. Nov. 26	THUR. Nov. 27	FRI. Nov. 28
Bank Stock	205	204½	204½	203½	203	203
3 per Ct. Red. Ann.	96½	94½	94½	94	93½	93½
3 per Ct. Gov. Ann.	95½	96½	94½	95	94½	94½
3 per Ct. Red. Ann.	95½	96½	95½	95½	95	95½
Long An. Ex. 1860	101	101	101	10 9 16	10 9 16	10 9 16
Cons. for Acct.	95	95½	95½	95	95	95
Exc. Bills, pr. m.	26	25 8	26	25 7	26	26
Ind. Bds. an. 1000.	36	36	36	36	36	36
India Stock	264	264	264	261	261	261
Austrian	95½	95	95	95½	95	95
Belgian Bonds	82	80	80	80	80	80
Brazilian 5 per Ct.	16½	17	17	17	17	17
Chilian	86	86½	86 7	86	86	86
Columb. ex. Venez.	94	93½	93	92	92	93
Dutch 4 per Cent.	59½	59½	59	58½	58½	59
Dutch 2½ per Cent.	30	30	30	29 8	29	28½
Mexican	56 7	56 7	56 7	56 7	56 7	56 7
Peruvian	112	112	112	112½	112	112
Portug. conv.	28½	28½	28	28	28½	28½
Russian 5 per Cent.	38½	37½	37	37	37½	37½
Spanish 5 per Ct.
Do. 3 per Ct. ex. dv.

MARKETS.

CORN MARKET.

MONDAY, NOV. 24.—There is a good supply of English Wheat at market this morning; samples of best quality offered fully 1s. per q. advance since this day week; inferior sorts meet a slower demand at late rates. The supply of Barley is moderate, and sells more freely at the prices of last Monday. Since Friday about 10,000 qrs. more Oats are reported, making a total arrival during last week of 70,000 qrs., but at the reduction in price of fully 3s. per q. submitted to last Monday and Wednesday; a considerable side was made on Friday, and to day there is a good demand at 6d. to 1s. per q. advance; at these prices a great clearance has been effected. Beans and Peas are in better supply, and are each 1s. per q. lower.

BRITISH.

	Red 52 to 61	White 60 to 70
Wheat, Essex	51	62
Kent & Suffolk	51	62
Lincolnshire & Yorkshire	40	56
Scotch	41	56

Oats, Lincolnshire & Yorkshire Feed	25	27
Ditto	25	28
Scotch Feed	25	28
Lincolnshire	25	27
Ditto	25	28
Cork	25	27
Waterford, Youghal, & Cork Black	25	27
Sligo	25	27
Galway	25	27
Barley	25	27
Beans, Marazan	25	27
Now	25	27
Harrow	25	27
Small	25	27
Peas, White	25	27
Groy	25	27
Flour, Town made	25	27
Norfolk and Suffolk	25	27

FOREIGN.

	PRICE.	IN BOND.
Wheat, Dantzic, high mixed	60 to 68	46 52
Rostock	58	62 44 43
Stettin	57	62 43 46
Hamburgh	54	59 42 45
Odessa	48	52 40 42
Odessa Polish	52	58 40 43
Russian	50	59
Ditto	48	57
Spanish
Ditto
Australian	60	69
Barley, Grinding	27	30
Distilling	30	32
Oats, Archangel	27	28 23 24
Danish	27	28 23 24
Swedish	25	26 21 22
Stralsund
Dutch Feed	23	25 19 21
Brew	28	29 24 26
Polands	30	26 28
Beans, Egyptian	41	42 40 41
Peas, White	56
Ditto Boilers		none
Flour, Canada, fresh, per barrel of 196 lbs.	34	35
United States	32	35
Dantzic
Australian, per sack of 280 lbs.

Account of CORN, &c., arrived in the Port of London, from Nov. 17 to Nov. 22, 1845, both days inclusive.

	Wheat.	Barley.	Oats.	Beans.	Peas.
English	6927	8348	6761	1640	1354
Scotch			1122
Irish	330	386	47470
Foreign	21299	3181	15181	6262	1290

FRIDAY, NOV. 28.—Since Monday we have been moderately supplied with English Wheat. To-day the trade is not brisk, but Monday's prices are fully supported. In Bonded Wheat the transactions are limited. About 10,000 qrs. of English Barley have arrived during the week; there is little doing in this branch of the trade, but prices are not lower. We are fairly supplied with all descriptions of Oats this week. On Wednesday there was an extensive sale at an advance of 6d. to 1s. from Monday. To-day rather higher prices are asked, which checks the trade, but a good deal of business might be done at the prices of Monday. There is no alteration in Beans and Peas. The duty on Oats fell to 3s. yesterday.

	English.	Irish.	Foreign.
Wheat	3530		10970
Barley	10410	500	1390
Oats	8660	10190	4830

Flour, 6190 sacks.

LONDON AVERAGES for the Week ending Nov. 25, 1845.

	Qrs.	Price.	Qrs.	Price.
Wheat	5560	62s. 11d.	Rye	45 40s. 0d.
Barley	6909	36s. 9d.	Beans	1072 41s. 8d.
Oats	21026	27s. 2d.	Peas	1911 50s. 8d.

IMPERIAL AVERAGES, Weeks ending

	Wheat.	Barley.	Oats.	Rye.	Beans.	Peas.
18th Oct.	58	2.32	0.23	5.34	5.44	5.43
25th "	59	5.33	0.24	11.34	5.45	5.44
1st Nov.	60	1.34	0.26	2.33	2.45	3.43
8th "	59	7.35	1.25	2.35	7.45	1.44
15th "	58	6.35	0.26	3.38	2.44	5.45
22d "	57	11.34	1.25	5.37	1.43	4.45

Aggregate Average of the Six Weeks. Wheat, 58s. 11d.; Barley, 33s. 11d.; Oats, 25s. 3d.; Rye, 35s. 6d.; Beans, 44s. 8d.; Peas, 44s. 5d.

Duty. Wheat, 14s. 0d.; Barley, 5s. 0d.; Oats, 3s. 0d.; Rye, 7s. 6d.; Beans, 1s. 0d.; Peas, 1s. 0d.

Stock of Corn in Bond, Oct. 18, 1845.

Wheat. Barley. Oats. Rye. Beans. Peas. Flour.

In London, 207874 10219 48329 .. 3463 .. 43273

Unit. King. 543666 58479 103130 .. 6805 1656 241095

MEAT MARKET.

FRIDAY, NOV. 28.—The supply of Mutton was larger to-day, and the milder weather had considerable influence on the demand. Pork trade maintained its steadiness, notwithstanding the variation of the weather, the supply being limited. Boxes of fresh beef arrived from Hamburg, and were sold very well.

PER STONE OF 8 LBS. PER STONE OF 14 LBS.

Prime Beef	3s 6d to 3s 8d	3d. Mutton 3s 6d to 3s 8d
Middling do.	3s 0d to 3s 2d	Veal, from .. 4s 0d to 5s 0d
Plain, or inferior	2s 6d to 3s 0d	Small Pork .. 4s 0d to 5s 0d
Pork	2s 2d to 2s 10d	Large, or inferior
Prime Mutton	3s 10d to 4s 2d	rior Pork .. 3s 8d to 4s 2d

THE LONDON GAZETTE.

FRIDAY, NOV. 21.

BANKRUPTS.

J. BROWN, Hornsey-road, builder. [Mr. Follett, Sambrook-court, Basinghall-street.

C. BOWEN, Harp-lane, Tower-street, City, wine merchant [Mr. Green, Alderman.

G. PRATT and J. BODLE, Addison-road North, Notting-hill, builders. [Mr. Graham, Coleman-street.

J. HAMSHER, Vine-place, Tabernacle-square, Hoxton, Glove manufacturer. [Mr. Turquand, Old Jewry Chambers.

J. C. KENDALL, Islington, tavern-keeper. [Mr. Graham Coleman-street.

TUESDAY, NOV. 25.

BANKRUPTS.

J. WARREN, George-street, Hanover-square, surgeon dentist [Mr. Buchanan, Basinghall-street.

W. COOKE, White Lion Inn, Egham, Surrey, innkeeper. [Mr. Buchanan, Walbrook-buildings, City.

J. L. ROPER, Rochester, linendraper. [Messrs. Bedlam Houghton, and Co., Verulam-buildings, Gray's Inn.

J. WOODHAMS, High-street, Portland Town, plumber. [Mr. Chamberlayne, Great James-street, Bedford Row.

C. WADHAMS, Charlotte-street, Portland Place, New Road, carpenter. [Mr. Green, South Molton-street, Oxford-street.

G. LITTLE, Southampton Terrace, Camden Town, corn-chandler. [Mr. Hardman, Bowling-green-street, Kennington.

J. EVANS, High-street, Shoreditch, cheesemonger. [Mr. Johnson, Basinghall-street.

R. MOORE, Norwich, coal merchant. [Mr. Turquand, Old Jewry Chambers, London.

C. J. RUSSELL, Ludlow, Shropshire, scrivener. [Mr. Bittleston, Birmingham.

W. and W. LENDON, Exeter, carriers. [Mr. Hornaman, Exeter.

Printed and Published by Messrs. Richards' Printing Office, 10, Newgate Street, in the Parish of Whitechapel, in the City of London, by JOHN GAYNOR, printer, at Number 7, Ridgeway-place, Hampstead-road, in the County of Middlesex, at the Sign of the Number 4, Fairchild-place, Cheetham-hill road, in the parish of Manchester, in the County of Lancashire, and published at Number 67, Fleet street, in the parish of St. Dunstan-in the West, in the City of London, by ABRAHAM WATSON, Printer, of Number 67, Fleet-street aforesaid -- Saturday, November 20, 1841.

THE LEAGUE.

No. 115.—VOL. III.]

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 6, 1845.

[3d.

NOTICE TO THE PUBLIC.

LEAGUE FUND.

All Subscribers of £1 and upwards to the LEAGUE FUND will be entitled to, and receive, a copy weekly of this publication for twelve months from the date of the receipt of their subscription.

Subscribers of half-a-crown, and under £1, will have forwarded to them a copy of THE LEAGUE, containing an acknowledgment of their subscription; and it is requested that all subscribers will be kind enough to send their names and addresses to the offices of THE LEAGUE, Newall's-buildings, Manchester, or 67, Fleet-street, London.

N.B. As there is considerable risk in the transmission of gold and silver by post, parties wishing to forward small contributions to THE LEAGUE FUND are particularly requested to make their remittances by post-office orders.

The Council of the League would also suggest to their friends in the country the importance of transmitting their copies of THE LEAGUE newspaper, after perusal, to such parties (more especially farmers) as may be either hostile or indifferent to the question of Free Trade.

*By order of the Council,
JOSEPH HICKIN, Secretary.*

OBSERVE!

Samples of good Wheat were sold in Mark Lane on Friday at 70s. per quarter.

The duty on Foreign Wheat is 14s. per qr.

The national expenditure for bread is NOW at the rate of 20 millions a-year, or FOUR HUNDRED THOUSAND pounds weekly MORE than during the whole of last winter and spring.

AGAIN, THE COUNTIES!

A NEW REASON FOR QUALIFYING.

In urging our friends, last week, to set down no county as hopeless—to neglect no effort on the mere ground of the seeming impossibility, or improbability, of obtaining a Free Trade majority—we laid much stress on the fact, that in many and many a county there are allies ready waiting for us, willing and able to help us if we put ourselves in a position to help them—independent-minded men impatient of landlord domination, and prepared to embrace any reasonably hopeful opportunity for throwing it off. Our Free Trade minority—in those counties in which a minority is all that we can just now effect—may very probably, in not a few cases, turn out a majority when the day of election arrives.

Recent events have greatly added to the force of this consideration. The adhesion of Lord John Russell to our cause, viewed in connection with its natural and certain consequences, has placed us on better ground than ever for contesting counties with the monopolist oligarchy. It will everywhere raise up for us friends and allies, considerable in numbers, far more so in social and political influence. In every county in England, there are influential landlords and farmers, connected by political sympathies with Lord John Russell and the party which recognises his lordship as its leader, who have heretofore held aloof from our cause. Adverse as they have been alike to the sliding-scale and to the principles of total and immediate repeal—neither hearty monopolists nor thorough-going Free Traders—at the same time, too few in numbers to occupy an independent position, and assert for themselves a distinct political existence in the Parliamentary representation,—they have, in recent electoral struggles, allowed themselves to be mere passive spectators of a contest which they were unable practically to influence. They have counted for nothing in the great public conflicts of the age.

All this is now, we must presume, at an end. These half friends will now be whole friends. The adhesion of Lord John Russell and his party to our principles will give us at the next general election, whenever that may be, the co-operation of those who look to his lordship as their political chief. The reasons which have acted on his mind will act likewise on their minds. As they are with him in seeking the reform of other great and acknowledged abuses, they will also be with him and us in our war against “the blight of commerce and the bane of agriculture.” We may regard it as beyond all doubt, that that class of politicians known by the designation of “Whig” aristocracy and gentry, will very generally be found at the next election in the ranks of the Free Traders.

None of our readers will, we trust, for a moment misunderstand us in this unavoidable mention of political party names. In speaking of “Whigs,” and the Whig “party,” and of the alliance and co-operation which we may in future expect to receive from that party, we do not recede by a hair's breadth from our great “no-party” principle. We merely indicate a fact that may serve to stimulate and strengthen our own independent exertions. It is not that Free Traders are Whigs, or stand in any sort of political relation to Whigs, as such—but that, after the recent declarations of the Whig leader, there is every reason, speaking generally, to regard the Whigs as Free Traders. It is, of course, only as Free Traders that we know them. We do not join them—they have, by their leader (presumptively) joined us. They may retain, as they doubtless will, their own party organisation for party political objects; with all that we have nothing in the world to do. We simply take the fact as we find it—the most gratifying and encouraging fact—that the great body of the political friends and followers of Lord John Russell are now Free Traders, and may count as such in all those calculations and labours which have reference to the period of the next general election.

Here, then, is a new incentive to us to exert ourselves to win counties—for here is a new element of strength and means of success. We are now more than ever entitled to say, let no effort be neglected, for none will be lost. We have now allies in every county of England—let us put ourselves, in every county, in a condition to make the alliance fruitful of Free Trade victories. In the most monopolist-ridden of English counties, in counties where the Leaguers have done actually nothing, a nucleus of a Free Trade party already exists to our hands—a minority which it is for us to turn into a majority. Our work is already begun in counties in which we have never set a foot. It is for us to spend the precious interval between now and the 30th of January, in putting ourselves in a position to seize this and all other advantages that time and events may bring. In every county in England let us do our very utmost. Majorities—sure, sweeping, overwhelming majorities—where we can; where we cannot, minorities—for there is no saying what may not turn up to make our minorities majorities. The chapter of accidents will do much for us—if we do not trust it for anything. Whether it be much or little that is in our power, let us do ALL we can. The “much” can never be too much—the “little” may very possibly in not a few of the most unpromising of counties, turn out to be enough.

THE MOVEMENT.

The country is doing its duty. That “unequivocal expression of the public voice,” called for by the Free Trade member for the City of London, in the noble and manly address which identifies him in this great struggle with “us, the Queen's subjects,” is heard throughout the length and breadth of the land. The “excuse” for which, according to the generous, and perhaps just, suggestion of Lord John Russell, a vacillating Government “appears to be waiting,” is presented with a fulness and distinctness that savour less of “excuse” than of impeachment. “By petition, by address, and by remonstrance”—and, better still, by those silent preparations for next year's electoral registration, which, by investing petitioners, addressers, and remonstrants, with a prospective share in the Government of the empire, add immensely to the momentum of all other popular efforts—the nation is everywhere casting off all participation in that tremendous responsibility with which Sir Robert Peel has charged himself. From all parts of the country, and by all classes of the people except one, the judgment of the national mind is unmistakably pronounced on “a system which has been proved to be THE BLIGHT OF COMMERCE, THE BANE OF AGRICULTURE, THE SOURCE OF BITTER DIVISIONS AMONG CLASSES, THE CAUSE OF PENURY, FEVER, MORTALITY, AND CRIME, AMONG THE PEOPLE.”

We cannot here speak in any detail of the public meetings of the past few days. There is no keeping pace with them. Nor is it necessary to attempt it. These expressions of national feeling and opinion are, with variations of a merely local and circumstantial kind, of a substantial similarity—we might almost say, of a sameness—that renders it needless to notice them individually. The history of one is the history of all. Whether it be a “Conservative” town council memorial, as at Bolton, or a working-class open-air meeting, as at Glasgow, makes no difference. The premises and the conclusion, the data and the inference, the facts and the principles, are everywhere and always the same. Liverpool merchants, and Manchester operative cotton-spinners think the same thoughts, and speak the same language—entertain the same fear of coming calamity, and indicate the same means of deliverance and safety. From among the chimneys and smoke of the cotton and iron districts, and from beneath the shade of the cathedral towers of Gloucester and Bristol, the same demand goes forth, in the same tone of urgency. The country comprehends its peril, and has the strength and will to work out its own salvation.

The unanimity which the present movement evinces among classes whom monopolists have sought in by-gone years, and not altogether without success, to alienate from each other's sympathies, is a most cheering result and reward of our labours. We hear no more of a (real or pretended) working-class antagonism. We can now have public meetings—meetings that are public in the fullest sense of the word—meetings to which any man may come, and at which any man may speak; and there is no apprehension of riot or disturbance. Capital and labour perfectly understand one another—are clearly cognizant of their mutual relations and their common interests. There is an end of the old quarrel between profits and wages. It is understood on all hands—and, what is more, it is felt—that the profits of the capitalist and the wages of the labourers are, the one as much as the other, parts of the one great fund of industrial accumulation—that the proportion of the one to the other is not inverse, but direct—that both obey the same laws, and follow the same conditions that both rise and fall together. The anti-machinery delusion is exploded. The wages and food question is put, by experience and discussion, past all possibility of monopolist mystification and sophistication. The operation of the new Income Tax of FOUR HUNDRED THOUSAND POUNDS STERLING PER WEEK, in withdrawing custom from the shopkeeper, abridging the sales and profits of the manufacturer, and curtailing the wages of the operative, at the very moment that it diminishes their exchangeable value and power of purchase, is comprehended with a distinctness that almost dispenses with any further iteration of the familiar and threadbare truth. In the great controversy of industry against monopoly, and of hunger against artificial famine, the working men of Great Britain are with us, as heartily as we are with them.

Such an agitation as that which now stirs this country is a novelty in the history of popular movements. The world has seen nothing like it before. An agitation on the basis of the truths of economic science; an agitation to arrest the progress of national calamity, in its first stages, by removing its primary cause; an agitation whose objects and principles command the respect both of philosophy and of statesmanship;—this is really a new fact, as it is also one in the highest degree honourable to the people by whom it is exhibited. In the present attitude and temper of the national mind, we feel ourselves amply rewarded for our exertions in creating and consolidating a sound public opinion on economical questions. Our expositions of the national experience of the past seven years are now deliberately accepted by the public mind, as giving the true solution of the phenomena of national prosperity and distress; our prognostications of the future are authenticated to the popular judgment by the recollection of the past. The British nation is now cognizant, as no nation ever was before, of the facts and laws determining its own social state; knows the sad and terrible significance of rising prices in the food market; instantly, almost instinctively, puts the true interpretation on the first symptoms of revulsion and collapse; realises already, by anticipation, those calamities which have made Paisley, Stockport, and Bolton, words of awful import to monopolist statesmen, and the mere remembrance of which, in the midst of the heyday of a brief prosperity, drew from a happy and exulting Premier, a fervent and solemn deprecation of their recurrence. We have the true key, at last, to the anomalies and vicissitudes of our economical condition. We can never again suffer ignorantly. We are now both acutely sensitive and profoundly attentive and self-conscious. Step by step, point by point, as the workings of monopoly develop themselves, we watch and mark them—we assign each effect to its true cause—and we fix the responsibility of the whole on its real author. To a Minister knowing, as Sir Robert Peel does, the character and tendency of his own monopolist policy—and knowing that the people know it—the endurance of all this must be like being stretched on the rack.

In the present temper of the public mind, it seems almost a work of supererogation to urge the necessity of unrelaxed energy and determination. Yet we cannot satisfy ourselves without again and again entreating the people to remember that their fate is in their own hands. Every week, as it passes, serves to point anew the moral of Lord John Russell's address: "IF OUR END IS TO BE ACHIEVED, IT MUST BE GAINED BY THE UNEQUIVOCAL EXPRESSION OF THE PUBLIC VOICE." Cabinet Councils meet, and separate, and leave nothing to show. Meanwhile, time hurries on. One precious week after another is irrecoverably lost. Rivals are forestalling us in the markets of the world—taking away, under cover of the Peel tax, which shuts us out from the universal competition, even the bonded corn in our own warehouses. The food of millions of our poor is rotten, or rotting—how fast or how slowly seems still an open question with the authorities—or it is being consumed with perilous haste and waste. Winter is at the door. Short time and falling wages already invade the comforts, and menace the subsistence, the morality, and the peace of our lately so prosperous manufacturing districts. Now is the time for the country to help and save itself. There is no help nor salvation for it but in itself and its own energies. Now is the time for so strenuous and resolute, so loud and earnest—so intolerably loud and earnest—an expression of its will, as shall compel the Premier to fling from him all the Wellingtons, and Stanleys, and Richmonds, and Buckinghams, and acquit himself of individual and personal responsibilities by obedience to individual and personal convictions.

The above was written before the Times of Thursday morning had startled and delighted the world with the revelation, that Sir Robert Peel and his colleagues will begin the session of 1846 with introducing a Bill for the Total and Immediate Repeal of the Corn Laws. We leave it as it is. We have not a word to retract, correct, or alter. With the full impression of this most cheering announcement fresh on our mind, we can only say again, with tenfold emphasis, NOW IS THE TIME FOR ACTION;—Now, more than at any other moment since our work began. If, as would seem, our grand object really is within our grasp, seize it with strong and sure hand. If the wedge is fairly in, at last, DRIVE IT HOME. If Sir Robert Peel really is, after all, to be the Free Trade Minister, SUPPORT HIM—he will want all the support that a united and determined people can give him. If he really has made up his mind to avail himself of the "excuse" for doing right, make that excuse irresistibly and overwhelmingly complete. There is no knowing what may come yet, before Free Trade reaches the statute book. The faction is very strong, furiously angry, desperately unprincipled, and will most likely die hard. Be prepared for the very worst. TAKE NOTHING FOR GRANTED. No rest, no pause, no relaxation of effort, no lull of agitations, no hurraing—till the hour when the "Bill for repealing the Acts regulating the Importation for Foreign Grain," shall receive the assent of her Majesty, and take its place among the statutes of the realm.

THE MORALITY OF COMPROMISE.

Could we trust appearances, we might venture just now to drop a few of our old familiar topics, and in particular, we might regard the "compromise" question as very sufficiently and satisfactorily disposed of. But as we mean, in this matter, to trust to no appearance less authentic and decisive than that of an Act of the Imperial Parliament printed by her Majesty's printer, we cannot satisfy ourselves without bringing and keeping before the public eye the true character of those expedients by which trimming politicians and sham philanthropists would, if they could, spoil the settlement of a great question of national and human right, with some pitiful juste milieu between right and wrong.

When time-serving journalists and politicians talk, in the Ashley strain, of a "doom," or "destiny," of protection, which is to be qualified by what they call "terms"—of an "inevitable blow" of which they hope to "break the force"—what is it, in plain English, that they really mean? Simply, in plain English, that monopolists are to hit on some cunning and clever way of saving what they can of an enormous wrong, the whole of which, in its "integrity," the country pronounces utterly unbearable. Their language practically is—"We are found out, and must disgorge; we cannot keep quite all the plunder; let us drop a little—the less the better—and make a bargain to keep the rest, on the principle of 'no questions asked.' We cannot rob any longer on the large scale; let us try if a little moderate robbery will do. The good old practices of 'the road' are scarcely safe in these days of civilisation and new police, but there is always the resource of swindling and pocket-picking." Professing themselves the friends par excellence of the people, these men openly advocate expedients for tricking the people out of an elementary and palpable right; their high-flying protestations of a restless and exuberant philanthropy, all end in dexterous schemes for securing the perpetuity of an infamous wrong.

It is characteristic of such politicians, that they uniformly shirk the question of right and wrong altogether. They never deal with the matter on its merits. They do not pretend to have an opinion, one way or the other, as to the good or evil either of the system they are willing to surrender, or of that which they propose to substitute. They never tell us whether "protection" is a right thing, or a wrong thing. They do not say why, if protection be right, the Corn Law of 1842 is wrong—or why, if protection be wrong, their own vaguely-hinted "terms" would be right. We say, if the principle of restricting the people's supply of food be a sound principle, by all means keep up a Corn Law which so efficiently and successfully embodies it; if the principle be false and vicious, away with it, and with all its false and vicious progeny. The Corn Law is either a model of wise and just legislation, an admirable improvement on the laws of nature and Providence—or it is an execrable wrong; and we ask, which of these is it? And we say, that speakers of speeches, and writers of letters and newspaper articles that blink this question, and propose a system of legislation which is based absolutely on no principle or pretence of a principle whatever, are utterly undeserving of public respect or trust.

The people are coming to understand these pretenders. The plain popular sense of right and wrong scouts this mawkish and unprincipled nonsense of meeting "destiny" half-way with "terms," without a question asked as to whether the "destiny" be good or evil, or the "terms" just or unjust. No public man can talk of "submitting to destiny," without forfeiting the political confidence and respect of Englishmen. The common sense and morality of the people scorn the man who shuffles off his responsibilities on the stars. Destiny, if evil, is to be combated. Destiny, if beneficent, is not to be merely submitted to because it is destiny, but frankly accepted and actively co-operated with, because it is beneficent. We know of nothing more certain to disgust the English people, than the talk of politicians who, in a great national and human question, leave principle out of the case—put "destiny" for duty, and "inevitable course of events" in place of intelligence and rectitude—recommend "terms" without a thought or care for their equity—and would tax the poor man's bread, without the pretence of a reason, just for the convenience of the thing.

LETTERS ON THE CORN LAWS, No. LII.

TO E. S. CAYLEY, ESQ., M.P.

SIR,—I have been occupying myself, not very profitably perhaps, in picking out the facts, real or alleged, in your letter to Lord John Russell. They are not so thick as plums in a Christmas pudding, nor so pleasantly imbedded. But as you affect to "argue for being guided by the practical, cautious lessons of history," (not its rash and impracticable lessons,) "rather than by the visions, however ingenious—by the conjectures, however specious, of speculation and the closet," I was curious to see the effect of having "no speculation in those eyes," by which vision is repudiated, and of studying lessons of history elsewhere than in "the closet."

Fact the first makes known the secrets of men's hearts, and declares their thoughts and motives in a manner rather startling from such a votary of the practical and cautious:

"It is only because the landlords and farmers of England, as a body, are convinced that the Corn Laws are for the public benefit, that those laws have always received, and still continue to receive their unabated support. If they had thought them injurious to the permanent welfare of the people, I cannot doubt that they would have been as ready to repeal them as yourself."

"Unabated support!" Do you never read a newspaper? Not even the leading articles of the Morning Post, so often dolorous over support abated, and changed into acquiescence in the repeal of the Corn Laws, if not into downright hostility? Have you not yet heard of Lord Ashley's Letter, or Mr. Escott's speeches? One so ill-informed of external facts should have hesitated to assume the attribute of Omniscience, and prate of motives as things known. You affirm too much, in this assertion of the absolute disinterestedness and self-oblivious patriotism of landlords and farmers. Repeat it to them, and not a few will laugh in your face.

Fact the second:

"It is notorious that, with perhaps the exception of Canada and the United States, and possibly Spain and Italy, there is as great a deficiency of wheat in the rest of the world as in England, if not a greater deficiency; and this does not appear to be a casual occurrence."

Be it so; what follows? That we should keep out of the market until scarcity and competition have raised the price upon us, making us pay dearly for delay, and perhaps destroying our chance of supply altogether? It would be more "practical" and "cautious" to provide for ourselves in time. You counsel the certainty of waste in expenditure, and the probability of insufficiency of food. You know there is but little to be had, and would have us wait till that little shall be less. You would shun the foreign market like a pestilence, until the corn in it be scarcer and dearer; and when the sellers begin themselves to famish, then you would have us begin to bid and buy. For prudential care, anticipating the morrow, you would have a horde of hungry nations contending, like the Andover paupers, for the last bone with green grizzle on it. Timely application for an article that runs short, is the plainest lesson of common sense, let alone history.

Third fact :

"When, however, the dearth is general, we cannot be surprised that other countries and their rulers should prevent the exportation of corn to their neighbours, at a time when famine stares them in the face at home; nor need it astonish any one that France, Russia, and Naples, if I remember rightly (for I have the advantage of few or no documents to refer to), have all, on various occasions, taken the precaution of first supplying themselves in a time of scarcity—a precaution which the people of those, and I believe other countries, have on such occasions not unfrequently adopted in despite of their Governments, and forcibly prevented the exportation of food."

Of course the folly of France, Russia, and Naples, in "first supplying themselves in a time of scarcity" astonishes you; and you are naturally desirous that Great Britain should do nothing so preposterous. We are forewarned against the evil example. Incredible as it may seem, there is your letter advising us to wait quietly. Let the world help itself to its short commons, and we may come in at last for the nihility that remains. First, you would have us wait till the Governments of those countries refuse us; and, should they not, you still suggest that the people may forcibly prevent the exportation of the food we desire to buy. Great temptations to delay, are they not? "Do not buy food now; in a short time your neighbours will refuse to sell it, or popular violence will stop its transmission." Such is your advice coupled with this fact.

Fact the fourth :

"An immediate suspension of the import duties would produce, in all probability, an immediate letting out of bond of a million quarters of wheat; besides, before winter, causing another million quarters to be poured into the market, and thus possibly at once exhaust the foreign supply, to the great aggravation, if there be a scarcity (and if there be no scarcity, then there is still less necessity for the measure), of the deficiency before next harvest."

I will not stay to inquire whether more wheat can come out of bond than went into bond; let that pass. The peril which appals you is the possible addition of two million quarters of wheat to our present stock for consumption. This is your bugbear. It is the fearful "vision" of your closet speculation. Two million quarters! Less by half a million than we imported in 1841, and again in 1842. Only twice the average annual importation of the last thirty years, during which we have added seven million mouths to our numbers. Only one-fourth more than the importation of 1801, when (in Great Britain) we were only ten millions and a half instead of eighteen millions and a half. Awful must be your apprehension of our having too much to eat; and very "ingenious" are your "visions" of ruinous abundance just after assuring us that in other countries there is yet more scarcity, their governments meditating prohibitory duties, and their people ripe for anti-exportation riots.

Fact the fifth :

"Take any six weeks since harvest, when the reported scarcity (if no obstructive principle had been at work) would probably have produced a variation in prices from week to week of 5s. or 10s. per quarter, as reports vacillated of the prospects of supply, and what do you see?—scarcely a variation of 2d. a bushel; but, instead of it, a steady progression in price, approximating very gradually to that point where the duty virtually ceases, and free importation begins."

Yes, we do see "a steady progression in price." Good wheat has already passed "the point where the duty virtually ceases." The bad will scarcely get there. It approximates so "very gradually," that when it does, we may expect the straw to follow. And, together with this "steady progression in price," we also see the steady progression of privation and distress. When corn is up, crime is up. The sufferings of the manufacturing operatives, and the difficulties of their employers, have commenced, Winter is coming, and work is failing. Some of the petitioners for a Ten Hours' Bill seem likely to have it sooner than they wish. There are those to whom an untimely recollection may occur of your admonition not to be astonished that foreign peasants, in despite of their government, laid violent hands on cargoes of provision. You look complacently on the "steady progression of price;" it is the relentless march of misery, disease, and death.

Your next fact is largely mixed with fiction :

"Putting the present Corn Law for a moment aside, turn to the effects of four deficient harvests under a more stringent Corn Law, that of 1828, of which the present is only a modification, with diminished duties, turn to the diminished harvests of 1828, 1829, 1830, 1831, and see whether the anticipations of our insufficient supply—fourfold more likely under such repeated scarcity! to be fulfilled at that time than this—were then fulfilled. Rumour with her busy tongue—panic with its prostrate imbecility—were as rife then as now. And what was the result? In no four years in any period of English history, before or since, had we such large importations; a supply so commensurate with our wants, that those only who took a political interest in the question appear now to remember them; except, indeed, those poor farmers who cultivated what were then emphatically designated the wheat soils of England!—full a third of whom, in spite of the protective price afforded by the Corn Law, were so inadequately compensated for their deficient crops, that with this addition to the pressure of accumulated distress, from the great fall in prices subsequent to the Money Act of 1819, they sunk to the earth to rise no more; and had it not been for the protection thus afforded by those Corn Laws, the stoutest of those cultivators of the wheat soils of England must have been swept away from the face of the land. Thank God! we have still resolution enough to abide by the experience of the past, instead of the infatuation to run headlong into an unknown abyss of a new-fangled philosophy. If the higher duties of the Corn Law of 1828 did not, during four successive deficient harvests, prevent our obtaining a sufficient foreign supply, why should we so much dread the effects of a Corn Law, with lower duties, in preventing a foreign supply sufficient to meet the deficiency of only one year?"

As an incidental specimen of your accuracy, it may be mentioned that in the four subsequent years of 1839-42, the importation exceeded that of 1828-31 by a million quarters. But in neither case was the supply "commensurate with our wants." You seem to have a short memory for public distress; but you might have recollected the Protection Ministry being burned out of office. The calamities and consequent discontent of those years brought in the Whig Ministers and the Reform Bill. The Duke's Corn Law would not have outlived the change, had the question been half as well understood then as it is now. And yet with wheat averaging 66s. per qr., you say a third of the farmers were crushed "to rise no more." They had suffered "accumulated distress" from "the money law of 1819." Why, Spackman will tell you that from 1819 to 1827, inclusively, wheat had fetched on the average 60s. 8d. per quarter. From whatever cause the farmers suffered, high prices and protection could not save them. If you are clearheaded enough to be puzzled by the facts, perhaps Messrs. Morton and Trimmer may help you to a solution of the mystery. The moral to be deduced from what remains of truth in your statement is that what you call a deficiency of food for the people can scarcely occur under any circumstances whatever; you are content, for them, with what drives them to despair and madness; and think that wheat at only 66s. is very hard upon agriculture.

I should not, perhaps, reckon among your facts that the wheat crop "is yet believed to be little below the average of the last few years," since this belongs to "the almost invariable answers, with certain limitations," "so far as you have seen them," elicited by the circulation of ingenious queries. The public will appreciate your benevolence in adding that "the deficiency caused by the potato failure, will be in some measure compensated by the unusually large crops of oats, barley, and beans." We are obliged by your not including carrots and mangel wurzel. You might also have suggested sea-weed for Ireland, which the rough whistery weather will cast on shore abundantly. As you sagaciously observe, "to the Irish, open ports would not give the money to purchase corn."

Such are the facts on which you rely in your ludicrous endeavour to answer Lord John Russell. I have taken them without regard to the use you make of them. Your blundering sophistry in arguing, combined with your proved dishonesty in quotation, render you unworthy of admission into the arena of discussion. But although too deeply disgraced to be tolerated as a champion, you may yet be worth a little cross-examination as a witness.

While I am writing, the announcement of the Times that the victory of Humanity is won, peals on the ear like a signal to cease firing. But I cannot spare you. Had you merely advocated to the last those pernicious and accursed Corn Laws, or, by honest mistake, any other system of wicked and pernicious policy, it might have been so. Your offence is heavier. Misstated facts, distorted quotations, and endeavours to act on the public mind, or that of a class, by representations too discordant to cohere in the writer's own mind, are not to be forgotten though the Corn Laws be repealed. Until the employment of such means shall bring its rightful measure of discredit upon public men, there is no hope of restoring the identification of politics and patriotism; or of rendering political controversy truthful and honest, though it may be earnest and impassioned.

A NORWICH WEAVER BOY.

PUBLIC MEETINGS.

We need hardly direct attention to the account we have given of the great meetings at Liverpool, Edinburgh, Manchester, and many other large towns; but we must mention that when all our available space was occupied, we received at the last moment the reports of three most important meetings held at Leeds, Huddersfield, and Bradford. The mayor of Leeds presided over the meeting in that town; and it was addressed by Messrs. J. G. and J. Marshall, Mr. Hamer Stansfield, Mr. E. Baines, jun., Mr. Plint, and the Rev. J. Ely. Some discussion was raised by two persons named Brook and Shaw, to whom Mr. J. Lees replied; after which a memorial for opening the ports was unanimously adopted, and the mayor, Mr. Aldam, M.P., Mr. J. G. Marshall, and Mr. Hamer Stansfield, were appointed a deputation to lay it before the Premier.

Mr. J. G. Sutcliffe took the chair at the meeting in Huddersfield, which was addressed by Mr. Stansfield, M.P., Mr. Batley, Mr. Wright Mellor, Mr. Schwann, Mr. H. Edwards, Mr. Willans, and Mr. Heaps. The resolutions in favour of Free Trade, and a memorial for opening the ports, were unanimously adopted.

At Bradford, the chair was taken by Mr. J. G. Clayton; and the meeting was addressed by Messrs. Cobden, Rand, and Bright. We regret that previous arrangements render it impossible for us to give a report of the very remarkable speech delivered by Mr. Rand, the report of which in the Bradford Observer did not reach us until too late for this week's publication. That gentleman is a leader of the Conservative party in the West Riding; and he ably maintained the consistency of Free Trade principles with Conservative doctrines. As a Conservative, he tendered his thanks to the League for having maintained their great principle free from party taint; and said that the country owed that body a debt of gratitude which could never be repaid.

THE STUDY OF HANSARD.—There is, we believe, no book which a leading member of either House of Parliament is forced to study with more painful assiduity, and with less advantage to himself or the country, than that formidable record of their own sayings, Hansard's Debates. When some question perhaps of great urgency and importance presents itself for consideration, he dares not look at the fact itself, or the circumstances by which it is surrounded, till he has first hunted up in Hansard every word he has ever said upon that or any analogous subject. Time passes—circumstances vary—men disappear—the constitution itself is altered—storm succeeds to calm—clouds to sunshine—danger to security—all the elements of opinion are changed and changing around him—but opinion itself must be immutable; and Hansard's inexorable register is consulted as if it were the Book of Fate, by which the present and the future are to be determined with the same invariable certainty as the past:

"And enterprises of great pith and moment,
With this regard their currents turn awry,
And lose the name of action."

We are not blind to the value of Hansard as an armoury or argumenta ad hominem, so effective in a popular government; and still less so to the importance of a high and intelligent principle of consistency in a constitution which, like ours, must be worked by the machinery of party; but we distinguish between a real and a nominal consistency—between "the letter that killeth and the spirit that quickeneth." The nominal consistency that ties itself to a stake is about as useful and meritorious as the courageous cowardice of the gentleman in Solebay fight, who had himself tied to the mast in the most exposed situation to prevent himself from running below. Such a mistaken consistency obviously defeats itself. He who stands still when every one else is in motion, alters his relative position just as effectually as he who moves when others are at rest, and will speedily find himself in very different, or perhaps we might say very indifferent, company.—Quarterly Review.

OPENING OF THE PORTS.

EDINBURGH.

On Tuesday a public meeting of the inhabitants of Edinburgh, convened by the Lord Provost, in compliance with a requisition very numerous and influentially signed, was held in the Music-hall, for the purpose of praying her Majesty that the ports might be immediately and permanently opened for the importation of corn and other food. Long before the hour of meeting (one o'clock), the hall, the largest in Edinburgh, or perhaps in Scotland, was crammed in every corner by a most respectable assemblage of the citizens. There could not be fewer than 2500 persons present, and many hundreds went away from the doors unable to gain admission. It is beyond denial that a more influential and enthusiastic meeting has not been held in Edinburgh on any national question since the height of the Reform Bill agitation.

Among those on the platform we observed:—Lord Dalmeny, M.P.; Sir James Gibson Craig, Bart.; Sir Thomas Dick Lauder, Bart.; Sir Geo. M'Pherson Grant, of Ballindalloch; Sir Charles Napier, Bart., M.P.; T. B. Macaulay, Esq., M.P.; W. Gibson Craig, Esq., M.P.; Andrew Rutherford, Esq., M.P.; Thomas Maitland, Esq., of Dundrennan, M.P.; D. R. Ross, Esq., of Rosstrevor, M.P. for Belfast; Adam Black, Esq., Lord Provost of Edinburgh; James Lumsden, Esq., Lord Provost of Glasgow; Baillies Gray, Duncan, and Ritchie; Treasurer Thomson; Dean of Guild Thomson; Professor Napier; Wm. Murray, Esq., of Henderland; R. Thomson, Esq., advocate; Alex. Currie, Esq., advocate; R. Hunter, Esq., advocate; A. C. Dick, Esq., advocate; A. S. Logan, Esq., advocate; J. T. Gordon, Esq., advocate; Robt. Cadell, Esq., of Ratho; George Turnbull, Esq., of Abbey St. Bathans, W.S.; Walter Buchanan, Esq., Preses, and Alexander Graham, Esq., of Lancelfield, Vice-Preses of the Glasgow Anti-Corn-Law Association; James M'Laren, Esq., Master of the Merchant Company, Edinburgh; George Berry, Esq., Chairman of the Chamber of Commerce, Leith; John Wigham, Esq., President of the Anti-Corn-Law Association, Edinburgh; John Howison, Esq., Secretary, ditto; William Tait, Esq.; J. B. Gracie, Esq., W.S.; W. C. Aytton, Esq., of Glendovan; George Stone, Esq.; R. S. Grieve, Esq.; Andrew Millar, Esq.; Jas. Peddie, Esq., W.S.; Ralph Richardson, Esq.; G. W. Hope, Esq., farmer, Fenton Barns; the Rev. Dr. Henry Grey; Rev. Dr. William Peddie; Rev. Andrew Thomson; Rev. Andrew Elliot, of Ford; Dr. Beilby; Dr. MacLaggan; Dr. Smytman; Dr. Alexander, &c.

On the motion of Sir James Gibson-Craig, the Lord Provost was unanimously called to the chair.

The Lord Provost, on rising, was received with much applause. He said,—Before commencing the regular proceedings of the day, allow me to make some explanation regarding the present meeting. First, then, it may be asked why Edinburgh, which used to give the tone to other cities, has so long delayed on the present emergency. I may remind you that the Town Council, more than a month ago, petitioned her Majesty that the ports might be immediately and permanently opened for the admission of foreign grain free of duty; and such of you as think the reports of the proceedings of the Town Council worth looking at may have observed, that a fortnight ago a question was put to me why no public meeting had been called for this purpose. I then stated that I understood that a requisition was in course of signature, and that when I received it I would call the meeting. (Cheers.) From accidental circumstances, some delay took place in completing the requisition; but knowing that it was sure to appear, I immediately communicated with our excellent representative, Mr. Gibson-Craig, who at once said he would be happy to attend the meeting, and do what he could to promote its object. (Cheers.) I likewise wrote to Mr. Macaulay on the 20th of last month, who I am happy to see here, requesting his presence at the intended meeting, when he wrote me, that from the delicate state of his health, and other hindrances, he might not be able to come to Edinburgh; but, if he did not, he would send his views in a letter, which might be read to the meeting, as he was convinced that there was no safety but in complete free trade in articles of food. (Cheers.) I think it necessary to mention these facts, to show that this meeting was called from a conviction of the importance of the object, and independently of any other exciting cause. Before proceeding, I may likewise state that I have received, since I came into this room, a letter from one who is held in high estimation by all who know him—I refer to Dr. Chalmers. (Great cheering.) He writes as follows:—

“Morningside, Dec. 2, 1845.

“MY LORD,—I have just been honoured by the presentation of a platform ticket for the meeting of this day in the Music-hall. Had I been in the habit of attending public meetings, I should certainly have been present at the meeting of this day, and have lifted my feeble testimony in favour of its object. I hold it quite monstrous, that in the present fearful prospects of the country, the ports should remain shut for a single day against the admission of human food; and though I am not so sanguine as many of a great and permanent economic good to result from the abolition of the Corn Laws, yet on the ground that such a measure would remove a topic of agitation and conflict, and so tend to the restoration of a better understanding among the various classes of society, I should rejoice, not only if all restrictions were now taken off for the sake of the present emergency, but if from this time forward they were exclusively done away.—I have the honour to be, &c.

THOMAS CHALMERS.”

“The Right Hon. the Lord Provost of Edinburgh.”

(The reading of the letter was followed by great applause.) I may likewise state that I wrote to another in whose judgment and integrity the inhabitants of Edinburgh have the utmost reliance. I allude to Lord Dunfermline. (Cheers.) You testified your confidence in him on the first opportunity you had of electing your own representatives in Parliament, and during the period that he held that trust, your confidence in him continued unshaken. That relation between us has long ceased, but his anxiety for our welfare is unabated, and I know that your confidence in him remains undiminished. He could not conveniently attend, but has sent me the following letter, which, with your leave, I will now read:—

“Colinton, Dec. 1, 1845.

“DEAR LORD PROVOST,—My disinclination to attend public meetings is so well known to you and others, that I adhere to my purpose without any fear that my motives will be misconstrued by you, or by such of my old friends and former constituents as may have wished for my presence at the meeting over which you are to preside. If I had attended the meeting, I do not think that I should have had anything to retract or explain. The early tendency of my opinions has been sufficiently indicated by my votes against the Corn Bill in 1815, and by the vote which I gave in 1833, as one of the members for Edinburgh, when Mr. Hume tested the opinion of the first Reform Parliament, by proposing a fixed duty on corn. I should not, therefore, have rested my opinion on the present apprehension of scarcity but on a firm conviction that Free Trade in corn is essential to the prosperity of the country. I should rejoice to see sectarian differences in politics and in religion merged in a combined effort to support and enforce the truths which have been diffused, by those who have devoted themselves with unexampled zeal and ability to the exposure of the evils of the Corn Laws. The power of acting as umpire between the contending parties in the state, has, by the change in the law, been conferred on the constituencies, if they choose to exercise it; and an appeal is now made to the public at a most critical conjuncture, and on a vital question. The alternatives are either to repeal the Corn Laws, or to prepare for a most arduous and perilous conflict. Such an appeal ought to be answered with firmness and deliberation, casting aside all party and personal feelings, and looking only to the public welfare and to the national safety.—I am, &c.

“DUNFERMLINE.”

(Great cheering.) I can add nothing to the sound and liberal sentiments of this enlightened statesman. I have been honoured with the enviable advantage of his friendship and counsel, and have had occasion to know that such have long been his views, and that his anticipations always were that the principles of Free Trade must triumph. (Cheers.) I congratulate you, that in surveying the battle-field, we now see the ranks of monopoly broken; many of their troops have already turned their backs—defeat, disunion, and disorder, have filled the rest with consternation, while we are encouraged by the prospect of victory, and strengthened by daily accessions of new allies, and a phalanx of invincibles. (Cheers.) Such is the power of truth. At first it may be launched by an obscure individual—then the few who adopt it are stigmatised as enthusiasts, fanatics, and dreaming theorists; still its converts increase, its encounters become more keen, its struggles more frequent and severe, till its final triumph is achieved. (Cheers.) How many arguments which they considered incontrovertible were brought forward by the men of the sliding-scale, and how long were they allowed to pass current, true as holy writ, among a prejudiced multitude! (Cheers.) It was confidently affirmed that Free Trade in corn would leave us at the mercy of our enemies. Issue was joined upon the question, and it was proved that so far from our being exposed to the dangers and calamities of war by Free Trade, Free Trade was the strongest bond of security for the maintenance of peace, and the true source of good-fellowship and national prosperity. (Great cheering.) Another shadow of an argument was conjured up in the shape of the national debt, it being affirmed that the burden was chiefly borne by the land; but when light was brought to bear on the subject, it was found that the burden fell, not on the land but chiefly on the landless, who thus had the double infliction of a heavy national debt, and the unnatural enhancement of the price of provisions. Again, it was glibly asserted that a larger share of the national taxation was laid upon the agriculturists than on the other classes; but when challenged to the proof, it was demonstrated that, so far from this being the case, the Legislature had exempted them from their fair share, which consequently increased the proportion that fell upon the other classes. (Cheers.) Then it was attempted to excite the jealousies of the working classes, by insinuating that the object of the Free Traders, in procuring cheap food, was to lower the rate of wages. A reference to experience, however, has shown that in this country high wages are more frequently found in connection with cheap food, and low wages with dear food. (Cheers.) There is no doubt that the Corn Laws were framed with the view of benefiting the landlords and agriculturists, but the vigorous intellect and logical reasoning of Mr. Cobden have proved, beyond dispute, that even here they have failed of their object, that under their operation the agricultural labourer has been ground to the dust, the farmer has been reduced to a wretched vassalage, and the landlord himself has been a sufferer in the end. (Cheers.) The God of all the families of the earth, by the wise and beneficent arrangements of His providence, designed that the ties of universal brotherhood should be maintained and strengthened by the wants of each rendering them dependent on all; for this purpose He has given a variety of climate, a variety of products, and a diversity of seasons, that all should be bound together in the circle of mutual commerce. Legislators vainly imagined that they could devise a better arrangement, but when man attempts to improve on the plan of his Creator, his wisdom is folly, his power impotence, and the result misery. Thoroughly have the monopolists been foiled in the field of argument, all the refuges of lies have been swept away, defence after defence has been abandoned, they have sullenly retreated to their citadel, their guns have been silenced, their ammunition spent, and their surrender is near. In the words of the noble statesman whose letter has diffused joy and hope in the midst of gloom and apprehensions, “Let us then unite to put an end to a system which has been proved to be the blight of commerce, the bane of agriculture, the source of bitter divisions among classes, the cause of penury, fever, mortality, and crime among the people.” (Great cheering.) Now that Lords John Russell, and Morpeth, and Earl Grey, join heart and hand with Villiers and Cobden, and the host of Free Traders, who can doubt that victory is at hand? (Cheers.) I have only further to state, that the different resolutions will be moved by gentlemen who have ever been ready to join in every good work. (Cheers.)

Mr. WIGHAM, who was received with loud cheers, said:—My Lord Provost, Ladies and Gentlemen—We meet to-day in one point of view under gloomy prospects for the United Kingdom—for surely so great a failure in the potato crop is calculated to create intense anxiety for the subsistence of a large portion of the people, between this time and the next harvest. This prospect is still more disheartening from the existing Corn Laws, which tend, at all times, to produce scarcity and high prices, inasmuch as they prevent our freely obtaining supplies of food from countries which have it to spare. These laws have been considered by I dare say most of us as very oppressive, and I must have met many of you at meetings in this city during the last six years with a view to hasten their abolition. Although it has been so clear to a large proportion of the nation, there has been a great difference of opinion among statesmen in regard to the effects of these laws. It will be in the recollection of many of you that a correspondence took place between the Edinburgh Anti-Corn Law Association, and the representatives of the city on this subject, which was published in the newspapers, and which did not terminate in the most satisfactory manner as it regards one of these gentlemen, and I am inclined to allude to it now, not with any view afresh to open an old sore, but to suggest that it shall be closed and forgotten, and that for ever. (Hear, and cheers.) Mr. Wigham concluded by proposing the following motion:—“That in consequence of the alarming prospect of scarcity of food for the subsistence of the people of this country, a petition be presented to her Majesty, praying that her ministers be directed to give orders that the ports of the United Kingdom be immediately opened for the importation of foreign grain and provisions free of duty.”

Mr. WILLIAM GIBSON-CRAIG, M.P., rose amidst great cheering and said: My Lord Provost, I can assure you that I second this resolution with the most perfect cordiality. But, gentlemen, before proceeding to make any remarks upon the resolution itself, I must refer to a matter personal to myself, as some communication has been alluded to by my excellent friend who has just sat down, in which it was stated by him that the reply either of myself or of my honourable colleague did not give perfect satisfaction. I am so anxious to satisfy you that my course has been consistent, and that you should believe I am acting now from conscientious motives, that even at the risk of breaking up old sores for a moment, I beg very briefly and in few sentences to remind you of the opinions I have expressed on this important question, and of the course I have taken in Parliament upon it. (Cheers.) Gentlemen, when the Anti-Corn-Law Association was established in this city some years ago, I then declined to become a member, because at that moment my opinion was that the substitution of a low fixed duty for the existing law, would be the most beneficial arrangement for all the great interests of the country; but at the same time I stated that I should so infinitely prefer the abolition of all duty whatsoever to the existence of the sliding-scale, that I should vote upon every occasion for every motion which had for its object the repeal of the existing laws. (Loud cheers.) But, gentlemen, I reserved to myself the power of judging what were the circumstances under which any measure proposed should appear to me the most preferable arrangement. Under that reservation I have voted for several sessions past; I have voted for every motion, whether brought forward by Mr. Villiers or any other, for the total abolition of the Corn Laws. In reply to the last communication which was sent me from the Anti-Corn-Law League, I stated that I was aware of the progress of the question, that I was well aware the moment for compromise was passing away, and that if through the infatuation of the landed interest no arrangement were to be completed, the necessity of settling the question within a very short period was impressed so strongly upon my mind that I should abandon all idea of any compromise on the principle of a fixed duty. (Cries of hear, hear.) That is the progressive course which I have taken. The period I have alluded to has passed away; and the time is now come when I can cordially and entirely agree in the words of the noble lord the member for London, that it is no longer worth while contending for a fixed duty (hear);—nay, more, that the exigencies of the present period demand that the bold and decided course should be taken of opening the ports. (Cheers.) I believe one of the greatest crises that ever impended over this country is now at hand. I do not wish to magnify the evil, but God grant it may not come to us in all its horrors. I need not remind you of the loss of the potato crop. The evil is increasing, though the wheat crop certainly is not a failure. But no man can calculate on the quantity of grain required as a substitute for the immense quantity of food which has been destroyed. The pressure certainly is not yet felt, because the potatoes are not yet exhausted; and there is still full employment. But on the other hand, that employment and the high wages producing an extravagant consumption of produce cannot be reckoned upon; and already the high prices of food are beginning to affect the condition of the people, which may further be injured by a rise in the money market to an extent which is incalculable; and in the course of the ensuing season not only may we feel ourselves embarrassed by exorbitant prices for food, but too probably by inadequate subsistence for the people, and possibly by stagnation of trade. Is not this prospect enough to appal any man? The idea of famine and scarcity in a land such as this! Gentlemen, the evil does not rest even here. It is not possible to imagine that this state of things can last even for one year. The poorer classes another year may not have the means of obtaining seed for potatoes. Certainly the breadth planted will be much smaller in general; and there is no crop whatever on the scanty patches held by the poorer classes in England and Ireland, which can produce the same amount, even as this year. Then you will have millions of people to feed out of your supply; for another year's harvest may not be so good as this. We have again the prospect of a famine before us. What a spectacle is this for such a country! And shall it be that this country must go on trusting to accident for the support of its people, or are we not to do all in our power to enable them to procure the means of subsistence? (Loud cheers.) I can assure you—I am quite sure there is no man at this meeting who is actuated by a factious or party spirit—I can assure you that I have never swerved from the opinions I formerly maintained, even when adherence to them was attended with great unpopularity, and probably with the risk of no longer having the honour of being your representative. I therefore act only in consistency with my past professions and conduct, when I direct your earnest attention to the measures which the approach of a crisis seems to demand. No reasonable man at such a time as this, and in the present state of parties, would desire to see such a change in the Government as would only augment the difficulties which might attend the adoption of the measures rendered necessary by the exigencies of the country. I have given no factious opposition to the present Government. I have supported their measures where I have thought them right as firmly and unwaveringly as the measures of that Government whose views coincided with my own. But a crisis such as this demands from a Government foresight, energy, and decision; and all I would say is, that if the present Cabinet shall continue as it has hitherto, inactive spectators of the existing exigency, a storm must burst upon them from which they will have no refuge. The hon. gentleman then resumed his seat amidst loud and continued cheers.

Mr. MACAULAY was received with loud cheers, which continued for several minutes. As soon as it subsided he said: My Lord Provost and Gentlemen, you will well believe, I hope, that I am deeply sensible of the kindness with which you have received me; and I only beg that you will continue to extend that indulgence to me, if it should so happen that my voice should fail me in the attempt to address you. I have thought it my duty to be present here, though doubting whether I am equal to the exertion of addressing such a meeting, and though so situated that I can only pass a few hours among you. But I conceived that this was not an ordinary meeting, or an ordinary crisis. (Cheers.) I conceived that a great era in our commercial policy had arrived (hear, hear); and I thought that in such a conjuncture you had a right to a frank and full explanation from one who has the honour to represent you in Parliament. (Loud cheers.) With respect to the past, gentlemen, I have perhaps a little to explain; but certainly nothing to regret or retract. My opinions, from the moment when I entered public life, up to the present day, have never varied. I have always considered the principle of protection to agriculture as a vicious principle. I thought that vicious principle took, in the laws of 1815, of 1828, and of 1842, a peculiarly vicious form. But my opinion has never varied as to this, that the principle in itself was vicious. This I declared 12 years ago, when I stood for Leeds; then I declared it in 1839, when first I presented myself before you; and when, a few months later, Lord Melbourne invited me to become a member of his Government, I distinctly stated to him that, in office or out of office, I must vote for the total repeal of the Corn Laws. (Loud cheers.) In the year 1841, a very peculiar crisis had arrived. There seemed to be reason to hope that it might be possible to obtain a compromise, which would not indeed remove the evil, but which would very greatly mitigate it; and there were some circumstances in the financial state of the country which led us to hope that we might be able to obtain that support for the proposition of a moderate fixed duty, which could not possibly be obtained if we had proposed to have an entirely Free Trade. On that occasion her Majesty appealed to the people. I presented myself before you; and I disguised nothing. I said, "I am for Free Trade in corn; but I think that in existing circumstances to make a compromise would be desirable. I am a party to that compromise; and it is for you to-day to determine whether you will approve of my conduct or not." (Applause.) You approved of it, and sent me back to Parliament as a party to that compromise. I thought, then, that my duty was this—not to vote against the principles of Free Trade, but until Parliament should decide whether they would accept that compromise or not, I must act with my former colleagues, and support and propose that compromise in Parliament. I did so. During the first year I declined to vote for the extreme proposal of Free Trade, although I declared myself in favour of it. I refused, at the same time, to vote against it. But as soon as Parliament rejected the compromise—as soon as it decided in favour of Sir Robert Peel's sliding-scale—I conceived that all my former engagements were at an end, and from that time I regularly voted in favour of every proposition for the perfect freedom of trade in corn. There has been, I am well aware, since that time, some difference of opinion, not as to the end, but rather as to the means, between me and my constituents; but the difference between us was not, at last, as to the question whether I would or would not support the Free Trade in corn, but whether I would or would not act cordially against the present system, in concurrence with many eminent and patriotic men, who were still attempting to effect the compromise of 1841. Valuing most highly other support, but feeling the immense strength of the party of monopoly, my wish was—not conceding my own opinion, not even withholding my own vote when the question of a free trade in corn was considered—nevertheless, to act in the most cordial feelings of friendship, and in the strictest union with such men as Lord John Russell, Lord Howick, and Lord Morpeth, who still, from whatever cause, felt themselves bound to adhere to something like the compromise of 1841. That was the only difference between us. I will not argue the question now. It has been set at rest in the best possible way. It is not necessary now to inquire how I should act towards the party who are in favour of a moderate fixed duty. That party has disappeared. (Great cheering.) Time, and reflection, and discussion, and recent experience, have produced the effect which, it was natural to think, it would produce in capacious reasoners and patriotic minds. No intermediate shades are now left. The light is divided from the darkness. There stand two parties, ranged right against each other. There is the standard of monopoly, and here is the standard of Free Trade; and, as your representative, I pledge myself to be faithful to the standard of Free Trade. (Immense cheering.) I have been relieved, in some degree, of a difficulty which, I believe, I should have felt in addressing you, by the resolution which has been put into my hands. I should have felt that I was unnecessarily intruding on your attention if I were to dilate on the whole of this vast subject, and yet I believe I should have felt a difficulty in selecting any one part of it. But the gentlemen who have taken charge of the proceedings have requested me to move a resolution, which dwells particularly upon one most important part of the case, and to which, therefore, I will particularly invite your attention. The resolution which I have to move states emphatically that the existing Corn Laws press with especial severity on the humbler classes. I believe, that to clear up this point—to make this point fully understood—is one of the greatest services which at the present time can possibly be rendered to the cause of Free Trade. There was a time—a time which some of us can well remember—when men were not ashamed to defend the Corn Laws purely as an aristocratical system of legislation—when men were not ashamed to say that it was necessary to keep up the price of bread, in order to keep up the rents of the landed aristocracy. On these topics, whatever the feeling may be, the expression is no longer heard. No person for some time past has ever ventured in Parliament, or, as far as I know, in any public assemblage in this country, to allege that there ought to be a law to compel ten thousand men to buy food dear when it can be had cheap, in order that one man may build palaces and buy picture galleries. (Cheers.) This ground has been dropped, but another has been taken up, less atrocious and more philanthropic in seeming, though not a whit less absurd. What we are now constantly told in every discussion about the Corn Laws, is, that it is a capitalist question—that the capitalist wants to take a part of the income of the landlord, and to make it his own—that the capitalist wants to thrive by the reduction of the price of food—and that a reduction of the price of food would be a reduction in the wages of the people—that the lower you bring the price of the necessities of life, the lower you bring the condition of the working man, and that the whole clamour about Free Trade was a clamour raised by the mill-owners and the money-changers. This I take to be the real strength of the arguments of the present party who support the Corn Laws; and you know with what effect it has been produced. This has not been heard merely from the landed aristocracy. We have not heard it only from the lips of those who are interested in keeping up rents. We have heard it also from demagogues—from a mischievous class of men—who wish to keep up the Corn Laws merely that the Corn Laws may make the people miserable, and that their miseries may make the people riotous and disorderly. (Hear, hear.) You know well how constantly and repeatedly they have declared that this movement was a mere attempt of the mill-owners to grind the faces of the poor. I am not, I believe, incorrect in stating that, in this great and enlightened city, a meeting called against the Corn Laws, was put down and dispersed by an argument of that description. Now, for my part, whenever I hear one and the same cry set up by bigots who are opposed to all reform, and by demagogues who are bent on universal destruction, I am quite sure that some mischief is brewing. And this I believe to be, of all the cries that were ever set up, the most demonstrably unreasonable and absurd. In the first place, it should seem strange that the Conservative party—that persons who talk so much of the wisdom of their ancestors—should countenance an opinion as new, strange, and paradoxical as ever appeared from the beginning of the world down to the Corn Law contest of the nineteenth century, that it was misery to the labouring man to have cheap food. The doctrine, if true, is not at all events a self-evident one. It was no part of the wisdom of our ancestors—it is not one of those opinions which we find to have at once commanded the assent of all ages, of all peoples, and of all tongues. On the contrary, so far as my knowledge of the history of nations and of literature goes, if you begin with the most ancient works—I mean the Hebrew Scriptures—and come down to the Corn Laws of 1815, I should be much surprised if you were to find any evidence for this—that much of the happiness of the great body of the people depends on the dearthness of their food. One would think that some cogent argument would be brought forward to satisfy us of it. And what is the argument they bring forward? If there is any other argument than what I am going to state, I heartily wish any gentleman acquainted with that argument would rise up and state it. I know only one, and it is simply this—that there are some countries in the world where food is cheaper than in England, and where the people are more miserable than in England. Poland is a case to which they particularly refer. Whenever the question is asked, why should not we have corn as cheap as the people of Dantzic? The answer is, Do you want the English peasant to be reduced to the condition of the Polish peasant? For they seem to think, that as food is cheap, and the people miserable, on the banks of the Vistula, therefore, the cheapness of bread would make the condition of the people of this country as bad as that of the peasant on the banks of the Vistula. I have not the least intention of misrepresenting their argument; but if they have any other argument than this, I most solemnly declare that I do not know what it is, and that I never heard it. Why, this mode of reasoning on a political question is the strangest that was ever heard of; and see how easily it may be otherwise applied. The food in New York is cheaper than in England, while the wages of the labourers are higher; therefore, it follows demonstrably, according to this mode of reasoning, that the lower the price of food, the higher the wages will be. But, in truth, it is idle to look at the case, and to compare nations in this sort of way. It is not one single cause that makes either the prosperity or misery of nations. (Hear, hear.) None of us are idiots enough to say, for instance, that difference of religion, difference of Government, security of property, internal peace, or security against foreign invasion, has nothing whatever to do with the prosperity of nations; and that everything is to be resolved simply into the question of cheap bread. But these gentlemen take the most miserable country in the world; they take the case of unfortunate Poland—a country which had for ages, till the independence of their country was lost, the vilest of all Governments, mere anarchy above, mere weakness in the sovereign, and below a vast population in a state of absolute personal slavery. (Hear, hear.) Trade there had none, their capital was gone, and the whole of their commerce was in the hands of a few Jew pedlars; and then we come down to the time when the foreign invader pounced upon them, and when their country was partitioned, then re-partitioned; it was conquered and re-conquered; and it was utterly enslaved; and it is existing at the present moment under a Government of which I will not trust myself to speak, because I do not wish to say anything which it would be unbecoming an English public man to say regarding the proceedings of a foreign state. But they take this country—the most miserable and oppressed—they take a country in a condition of political slavery; and then they take another country, which for centuries, undoubtedly was the best governed of any country of Europe—a country where personal slavery has been unknown for ages—a country which has had the advantages of pure religion, a high state of morality, and an enormous capital—a country which is secured by sea against foreign invasion—a country which knows not what it is to see an enemy, for I believe the oldest man alive has never seen a foreign flag in this country, except as a trophy—(loud cheers)—and under these circumstances they parallel the two, and say that the inhabitant of Great Britain is better off than the serf of Poland; and what can this be owing to, but that the serf of Poland has cheap bread? (Laughter and applause.) Was there such a way of reasoning ever heard in the world? Is there a single blessing which, in this way, I could not prove to be the greatest curse, or a single curse which I could not prove to be a blessing? (Hear, hear.) Take lameness, for example. I could show you that lameness is a benefit; for is not many a lame man better off in the world than men with two legs? (Laughter.) In the same way I could prove blindness to be a benefit; for certainly we have all known many blind men whose condition on the whole was more enviable than the man who had two eyes. (Renewed laughter.) Absurd as this may appear, these men reason in this way. But the question is, would not the blind man be better off if he had two eyes? and whether the lame man would not be better off with his two legs? and whether the Englishman would not be better off if bread were as cheap in England as it is in Poland? (Applause.) I am glad to allow that the mass of the people of Great Britain are infinitely better off than the Poles; but I say they would be still better off if the bread were as cheap here as it is in Warsaw; and I say, that if the Poles had the same price to pay for their food as we sometimes have to pay, they would be a great deal more miserable; or rather, they would not be miserable long, for they would starve in millions, and perish. (Hear, hear.) The real way of deciding such a question is, by comparing the same community under a system of cheap bread and a system of dear bread; and this we have ample opportunity of doing. We have only to look over our history for the last ten years; and if that history do not teach us, we are past all teaching. Take the year 1835. Food was cheap then, and the capitalist prospered greatly; but was the labouring man in any degree more miserable than he is now? Is it not the fact that he was better employed, and that wages were higher? Well, then, we come to that change when, like Pharaoh's dream, the thin ears devoured the full ears; when the lean kine devoured the fat kine; when the years of famine devoured the years of plenty—we come to the time when food was dear. The condition of the capitalist in 1841 was bad. He suffered; but will any person tell me he was the only sufferer, or the chief sufferer? Do we remember what the condition of the labouring population was in 1841? Was not their condition such that philanthropic men were unwilling to enter a manufacturing town for fear of seeing the squalid nakedness of the masses? Was not their condition such that politicians who never in their lives were alarmists, trembled for the very foundations of civil society? The pressure came on heavier; the mills were at first put on short time; the mills then ceased to work at all; and the people were thrown out of employment, and they went to pledge the little property they had. First they pledged their little luxuries; then their comforts; then their necessities; then their hovels were stripped, until they were as bare of furniture as the hut of the Dog-Rib Indian; while every shop with its three golden balls was literally crammed from the cellar to the garret with the clothing and Bibles of the poor. Don't we remember what a formidable symptom of another kind was produced? I recollect the strong effect which was produced in London that day, when, for the first time, huge pieces of cannon were seen rolling northward, not to encounter a foreign enemy, but to our manufacturing towns. Well, you have had cheap bread since that time. The capitalist has profited by it, I know, as certainly he ought to do; but has the condition of the labouring been getting worse? Have they not, on the contrary, been getting better and better? Have we not seen their goods coming back from the pawnbrokers—have we not seen in their houses, in their clothes—have we not seen in their very looks in the street, a difference between a time of cheap food and a time of dear food? Take their innocent pleasures, or not merely innocent, but salutary—take their pleasures of intellect. There is your own intelligent and useful citizen, Mr. Robert Chambers. Ask him what sale his works had in the year 1841, as compared with the year 1845. I believe that there is no exaggeration when I say, that on a careful calculation, which I know to have been made, it appeared that, within 20 miles of Manchester, in one particular week in 1845, the sum issued in wages was a million and a half sterling greater than in the corresponding week of 1841. (Great applause.) There has been undoubtedly a great improvement, and all must have seen it with heartfelt satisfaction. No party has gained by this so much as her Majesty's present Government—and no party deserves so little to gain by it. They have gained by this, as a Government will always gain when the people are prosperous. But I am convinced it was an improvement they did not bring about—it was an improvement which their policy directly tended to prevent. This prosperity was the effect of the cheapness of an article which our rulers have attempted to make dear. Under the pretence of making this country independent of foreign supply, they have given us a system which, instead of making us independent, makes us dependent in the worst possible form. As the Lord Provost has justly said, there is a natural dependence between nations which we ought not to forget. Providence has given different productions to different nations, for the due interchange of commodities, and in that manner to establish a beneficial commerce. But not only are different productions given to different climates; even in the same climate there are stages of civilisation which are favourable to particular states of production. There is a state of society which is best fitted for raising raw material, and in which it would not be proper for men to turn their attention from the cultivation of corn fields to the manufacture of stockings; and there is another state in which industry and capital take other forms, and in which they are in a condition to supply vast extents of country with manufactured products. (Hear, hear.) The intercourse between these countries is the most natural and healthful mode of dependence which can be conceived. There is no injury in that dependence—there is no degradation in it. There is thus a mutual dependence, and it is exactly as important to one side as the other. Even if there were any injury in it, we could not escape it. We must be dependent on other countries for our supply of food. That question was decided when England ceased to be an exporting country, and the question that remains is, How are we to be dependent? The question was answered by the Lord Provost. Go to Lancashire, and see those immense successions of cities, many of them so great as to be equal in size to the capitals of some European kingdoms—go in and see the warehouses, with their stocks of goods, and look at that machinery, so wonderfully exact and exquisite. Look at those great nurseries of human beings all employed in producing articles adapted for giving comfort to the people on the banks of the Colombia river—to the population of the Cape of Good Hope, or to that of Java and Chili. And then, amidst all this condensation of population, and ferment of industry, you will inquire, how are all these people to be fed? But go to the banks of the Ohio, and there you will see a change of scene. There you will see a new species of industry equally extensive and equally flourishing. There you will see the desert everywhere receding before the advancing tide of civilisation: there you will see the pioneers of civilisation raising their log-huts, and speedily surrounded by corn fields that are capable of supporting whole provinces; while in every field the black trunks of the forest are standing. And you cannot but think of the concourse of population at home, when you see such forests, which must soon be covered with corn sufficient to support our own multitudes. Is not this, then, a natural and healthful dependence? Shall we not expect men will avail themselves of this beneficial arrangement?—And can it be doubted that, in seasons of scarcity, it would be highly desirable to see the manufacturing labourer of our own country breaking his fast on a good loaf of Ohio bread, while, on the other hand, the inhabitant of the log-houses of America would exchange a portion of his produce for a coat of Leeds woollen for his winter wear, and a light Manchester cotton dress for his summer wear—or a Sheffield knife, or a Birmingham spoon. In this state of matters, in steps an absurd legislation and says that, in order to put a stop to this system of healthful dependence, we will compel the people on this side of the Atlantic to submit to a stinted supply of food, while at the same time, we shall compel the people on the other side of the Atlantic—whom nature has intended to be your purveyors and customers—to be your rivals, and force them to turn manufacturers; and then, when they impose a tariff of their own, in order to keep themselves manufacturers, our legislators stand up in Parliament, and write dispatches from the Foreign Office, marvelling at their ignorance of the principles of Free Trade. (Laughter and cheers.) These, however, I believe, are the merits of her Majesty's present ministers, as respects the prosperity which the country has lately enjoyed. Good harvests have prevented bad Corn Laws from proving very bad. The Government has been saved in spite of these laws. (Cheers.) It has had a run of good luck; and those who have not observed them closely, have confounded that good luck with good laws. But good luck will not last for ever. (Cheers.) Providence will not send the rain and the sunshine just at the time and exactly in the quantity which will be necessary to save the reputation of short-sighted statesmen. I have reason to believe we are on the verge of very unprosperous times. I wish, however, to say nothing that can prejudice the minds of the public, or excite undue alarm. I observe that the defenders of the present Administration, such as they are, say there is no chance of any great rise in the price of grain, or in any other kinds of provisions; but that the Whigs and the Anti-Corn-Law League have been guilty of the vilest conduct in attempting to raise a panic. I, therefore, that I may secure myself against such imputations, shall use no language but what the Ministers themselves use. (Cheers.) I hold in my hand a letter from Sir Thomas Fremantle, Secretary to the Irish Government, desiring information in reference to the failure of the potato crop in that country. The view he gives of the prospects of the coming year in that part of the United Kingdom is worthy of attention. He says—"Her Majesty's Government, in seeking to learn the opinion of judges and well-informed persons in every part of Ireland regarding the possibility of the supply being sufficient for the maintenance of the people during the ensuing winter and spring, provided care be taken in preserving the stock, and economy used in its consumption." Now, observe in this letter it is not even suggested that there is a stock which, with care and economy, will last even throughout the winter and spring. Now, I ask you, when any Government can say this at a time when the duty on corn is 14s. (when that letter was written it was 17s.) is it necessary to say more about the merits of the present system? When that system was first brought before us, it was alleged to have that wonderful sliding faculty which would keep us from any risk of scarcity; but you see, just when it is required to fall it stands stiff. You have the Irish population crying famine, while the index of your Corn Law is pointed to plenty. It is possible that Sir Thomas Fremantle may be able to give some explanation of this in the House of Commons, but what that may be I confess I am at a loss to conceive. He proceeds to recommend certain measures for securing the crop, and thus they quietly leave the ports closed. But this brings me round again to my main argument. You see we are now again approaching a dear time—a time when food will be dear. Already, I believe, it is no exaggeration to say that the price which the labouring man pays for flour and oatmeal is half as much again as it was a few months ago. (Great cheering.) Now, here we can bring to the test the doctrines of those who say this is a capitalist's question, and one in which the labourer has no interest. The price of food has risen; are the wages of the labouring man rising? No, on the contrary, they are falling. In numerous districts the symptoms of coming distress have already begun to be observed. The manufacturers are working short time. Warned by the signs of the past year, they know well what is coming, and are looking forward with gloomy forebodings to the disappearance of the comforts which the working people have enjoyed, and the return of the distress of 1841. If this, then, does not make us wise, we are beyond all teaching. Twice in ten years we have seen the price of corn getting up, and twice the condition of the labouring classes has become so much the worse; twice in that period have we seen the price of food going down, and twice the condition of the labouring people rising. (Hear, hear, and applause.) If this calamity awaits us, however, there is at least one circumstance which affords some consolation. I am assured, that in the manufacturing districts the working-classes have come to understand this question; and there is now no danger that any person can persuade them that those who wish for cheap food wish to injure them; or, on the other hand, that those who wish for dear bread wish to raise their wages. We may now expect their co-operation to place the matter upon a proper footing. In some quarters we have to congratulate ourselves upon our union with those who are best fitted to lead us, as also on our union with a great population, whose support behind us will be of immense value. (Loud cheers.) A few years ago, when we had to discuss this question, the friends of Free Trade were divided amongst themselves, until a statesman of great reputation adopted the idea of compromising the matter by a fixed duty; and behind we were assailed by others who were disqualified by the efforts of designing men from forming a judgment upon the question. Now, I believe, there is a complete and harmonious union; and with the power of the aristocracy in our front, we shall have the best support of the labouring classes in our rear. So led, and so followed, we may look forward to the victory, if not in this, at all events in the next, Parliament. But how long soever it may be delayed, whether near or remote, I assure you, that while I enjoy your confidence, it shall be my constant endeavour, as respects this question, to prove myself your true representative. Mr. Macaulay concluded by proposing a resolution to the effect that the Corn Laws pressed with especial severity on the poorer classes. (The honourable member sat down amidst loud and protracted cheering.)

Mr. JAMES M'LAREN, Master of the Merchant Company, in seconding the motion, remarked that he would not detain the meeting, or in any way impair the effect of the very eloquent speech of the gentleman who had just addressed them. The impolicy of the Corn Laws had been clearly shown, and on this point he would simply advert to a circumstance which was stated in regard to the imports of the port of Antwerp. It appears that from the 1st of October to the 17th of November, 212 vessels had entered that port with corn, grain, potatoes, and other articles of food; and by a careful analysis of the returns, a large amount of these provisions had been obtained from the bonded warehouses of England. Could the impolicy of these laws be more strikingly exhibited? The reason why our merchants had availed themselves of that market was simply this, that owing to our laws they could not realise in this market so advantageously as at Antwerp. We were told by the Ministerial organs, that if scarcity did prevail, the ports could be opened in spring; then, indeed, this grain might possibly be brought back; but it would come back to meet the enhanced cost perhaps of some 20s. a quarter. The motion alluded to the severity of these laws on the humbler classes, and how they tended to aggravate poverty, crime, and immorality. He stated that, in proof of this, he would submit to the meeting some statistics showing the prevalence of emigration and commitments for crime in the United Kingdom. It would be seen that these increased with the dearness of grain. Mr. M'Laren then read a statement in proof of this:—

Year.	Price of Wheat.	Emigration Returns.	Commitments.
1838 ..	64s. 4d. ..	33,222 ..	23,094
1839 ..	70s. 6d. ..	62,207 ..	24,443
1840 ..	66s. 4d. ..	90,473 ..	27,187
1841 ..	64s. 5d. ..	118,592 ..	27,760
1842 ..	57s. 5d. ..	128,344 ..	31,309
1843 ..	50s. 1d. ..	57,212 ..	29,591
1844 ..	51s. 5d.	26,542

The meeting might not be able to carry these numbers in mind, he would therefore contrast two different periods. In 1834, the number of commitments was 22,400; wheat was then at 46s. per quarter. In 1835, the price fell to 39s. per quarter, and the number of commitments fell to 20,700. Again, contrast this year of 1835, when wheat was only 39s. per quarter, with 1841, when wheat rose to 64s. 5d. What was the number of commitments this year? why, just 27,760. In regard to statistics illustrative of the mortality attendant on high prices, he would state the mortality in nine districts in the county of Lancashire, in the years 1840, when wheat was 66s. 4d., and 1843, when wheat was 50s. 1d. In 1840, the mortality was 26,196; while in 1843, notwithstanding the increasing population of the country, but when the price was lower, the mortality was only 23,334, making a difference of 2862. Mr. M'Laren remarked that he was much gratified at hearing the statement of that venerable reformer, Lord Dunfermline, and which was echoed by the honourable gentleman, Mr. Gibson Craig, that this was not the cause of a party—it is the cause of the country—it is the cause of humanity—it is, he would speak it with reverence, in some respects the cause of God. When he found the all-merciful Creator, after he had made man, addressing him thus: "Behold I have given you every herb, bearing seed, which is upon the face of all the earth—to you it shall be for meat"—when he found such a grant, and that a class of men, either in their blind folly, presuming to improve the administration of the Most High—or in their daring rebellion fronting themselves in opposition to God, and contravening the laws of his gracious Providence, it was an act of justice to our fellow-countrymen—it was an act of benevolence to these infatuated men, to interpose and stop the continuance of a contest which can only terminate in their ruin and destruction. (Cheers.)

Mr. RUTHERFURD, M.P., said it was not without great hesitation that he ventured, on that occasion, to present himself to their attention; but he felt, at this same time, that he would not be justified in refusing to come forward at the present juncture, and to lend whatever assistance might be thought useful. He thought that no man of ordinary education and intelligence, but unquestionably no man who had been favoured by his countrymen by being placed in a situation of public trust and confidence, could say that he was not prepared to state what his sentiments were on such a question as this, at such an emergency as the present. (Cheers, and cries of hear, hear.) If Government did not put an end to this state of uncertainty—if Ministers did not speedily do their duty—as his friend Lord John Russell had said, it became then the Queen's subjects to do what they could to avert the approaching calamity. (Cheers.) They would carry their wishes and complaints as peaceably affected subjects to the foot of the Queen's throne, and ask her Majesty to do that which her Ministers delayed or refused to do. (Cheers.) Holding such views, he had much pleasure in moving that a memorial be sent to her Most Gracious Majesty. Mr. Rutherford concluded, amidst much cheering, by reading the memorial.

The Lord Provost announced that the petition would be seconded by the gallant Commodore; Sir Charles Napier.

Sir CHARLES NAPIER was received with several rounds of tremendous applause. He said—My Lord Provost, Ladies and Gentlemen—because till the present moment the ladies have been forgotten. (Cheers and laughter.) I have attended many public meetings; but I can safely say that I never in my life attended one with more pleasure and satisfaction, than this great meeting assembled in the capital of the land of my forefathers. (Cheers.) In this town I was bred and educated, and I now come back, happily, at a moment to assist the inhabitants of Edinburgh to use their best endeavours to force the Government to save the people from famine and starvation. (Great cheering.) If we apprehend dangers to England and to Scotland, what may we not apprehend in the case of Ireland, where three or four millions of people are almost entirely dependent on potatoes? (Hear, hear.) England and Scotland are luckily quiet; but let us look at the political position of Ireland, harassed by the fear of approaching famine. Independently of that, have we not other causes for fear? Have we not a dispute in hand with America?—do we know how it is to end? and if war be avoided, what may be the consequences?—and have we nothing to fear from other quarters? Is this a time, then, to keep the people of the United Kingdom—of England, Ireland, and Scotland—in a state of starvation? The closing of the ports of the Continent has been alluded to by my friend the member for Leith; but if this dispute comes to a serious point, may we not have the American ports closed against us also? (Hear, hear.) At such a moment I cannot understand how any Government, especially any Government composed of sensible men—(laughter)—because we must allow there are many men in our present Government who are so—(great laughter and cheers)—can be holding their Cabinet Councils—and I believe at the present moment they are holding their ninth meeting, to deliberate whether the people should have dear or cheap food. (Loud and continued cheers.) I have at various times been called on to pledge myself for total repeal of the Corn Laws; but until the present moment, though I have constantly voted for Mr. Villier's motion for repeal in preference to a sliding-scale, I have hitherto refrained from pledging myself unreservedly to total repeal. But the time has now come when all squabbling about fixed duties should entirely come to an end. (Loud and continued cheering.) Neither is it sufficient to open the ports for the present moment only; as Mr. Cobden truly says, we must put our backs against the door, and prevent its ever being shut again. (Great cheering.) My friend, the right hon. member for Edinburgh, showed most clearly that dear food does no good to the people; but what does it do for the farmer himself? The landlords in England tell their tenantry that it is a farmer's question. I have always looked on it as a landlord's question, and have always had a suspicion that all along the landlords have had in view more their own interests than those of the farmers or of the country. I have often wished that the landowners and farmers of England would come down to this country, and go over it as I have done, and see the full stack yards, much fuller than they have in England; let them see the draining tiles extended over such a breadth of land, and the system of draining everywhere producing its effects—let them come down and learn the art of farming, and that will be the best protection it is possible for them to get. (Cheers.) I should like to know, too, what advantage the merchant has by the Corn Laws? It takes a clever and good merchant to make money at any time; but how is it possible for mercantile men to prosper under the operation of such a system as the sliding-scale, I cannot conceive. Neither can I conceive why the merchants in all our seaport towns have not come forward against the system in a more determined tone than they have yet done. (Hear, hear, and cheers.) I will not detain you any longer. The arguments of my friends the members for Edinburgh and Leith, were so conclusive as to have rendered it almost presumption in me to say a single word. (The gallant Admiral sat down amid loud cheers.)

Sir GEORGE MACPHERSON GRANT moved a vote of thanks to the Lord Provost for calling and presiding over the meeting—which was cordially responded to.

The meeting, which had continued undiminished in numbers and enthusiasm to the close, then broke up.—Scotsman.

LIVERPOOL.

(Abridged from the Morning Chronicle.)

We this day present our readers with an abridged report of the proceedings of the great Free Trade meeting, which took place on Friday evening last, in the Amphitheatre, at Liverpool.

Previously to the refusal of the Tory mayor of the borough to convene a public meeting of the inhabitants, in pursuance of a requisition signed by nearly 6000 of the most respectable and influential amongst them, to consider the steps necessary to be taken to remedy the evils anticipated from the apprehended scarcity of food for the coming year, especially in Ireland, the excitement throughout Liverpool was general and intense; and the feeling in favour of an immediate opening of the ports, and of Free Trade in its most extensive sense, was daily gaining ground. If anything were wanted to enhance that excitement, or to render that feeling stronger and more prevalent, it was amply supplied by the ill-advised position taken upon the subject by a chief magistrate, who either wilfully evaded his duty, or who failed to appreciate the exact nature of the obligations which were devolved upon him, in regard to his fellow-townsmen, by the honourable and important office to which he had been called. The mayor having refused to call the meeting demanded by about 6000 requisitionists, several of the most influential merchants and traders of Liverpool, with William Brown, Esq., at their head, signed a requisition, calling together a public meeting of the inhabitants, to consider the present position of the country with regard to the great question of national subsistence. The meeting thus summoned under other auspices than those of the constituted authorities of the borough, took place on Friday evening, in the Amphitheatre. Seven o'clock was the hour appointed for the commencement of proceedings. By six o'clock, however, hundreds had already collected round the doors through which the public were to obtain admittance; and by the time these were thrown open, the main approaches to the Amphitheatre were almost impassable. At half-past six the doors were opened, and the vast house, which to that hour contained but about half-a-dozen individuals, who were busy upon the stage making preparations for the meeting, in less than 10 minutes afterwards was filled to an overflowing by an immense assemblage of human beings, who occupied the stage, the pit, the boxes (public and private), and all the galleries. Thousands who had anticipated, by many minutes, the hour of meeting, had afterwards to go away, after making many fruitless but persevering attempts to effect an entrance into an already over-crowded house. The rush into the Amphitheatre as soon as admittance was given was tremendous, the competition for seats was eager, and every portion of the house was simultaneously inundated. Every point from which it was possible to hear what was going on was occupied at once; hundreds of faces peering out from the scenery, and many persons clinging far above to the intricate machinery of the stage. Between 4000 and 5000 persons must have been present before the meeting was organised. The excitement which pervaded this vast mass of human beings was evidently intense, and their impatience for the commencement of proceedings was next to uncontrollable. One after another, as the well-known and influential advocates of unrestricted commerce took their seats upon the stage, they were greeted with loud and enthusiastic cheers; but when Mr. Brown, accompanied by several of those who had signed the requisition, in pursuance of which the meeting had been convened, made their appearance, the audience rose to a man, hats and handkerchiefs were waved from the galleries to the remotest recesses of the stage, and for nearly 10 minutes the most vehement and deafening cheers interrupted the organisation of the meeting. Following Mr. Brown came a large cohort of the principal merchants of Liverpool, the boxes being already occupied by many of the same class, and by numbers of professional men, and the great body of the meeting being composed of the tradesmen of the borough. When silence was at length restored,

R. E. HARVEY, Esq., stepped forward to the front of the stage and said: Gentlemen, you are aware that this meeting is called together to take into consideration the present alarming state of the country, in consequence of the failure of the wheat, and the almost total rottenness of the potato crop (hear, hear), and to discuss the propriety of meeting the evils which are but too likely to arise from this disastrous state of things, by an immediate opening of all our ports for the free and unrestricted admission of foreign grain (cheers), and with this view to adopt and transmit a memorial, either to the Queen or to her ministers, to take this step or such other steps as she or they may deem the most proper to save the country from the calamities which menace it. (Hear, hear.) The mayor having declined to preside over your meeting, it is necessary that we should now, in constituting it without him, seek for a chairman amongst those who are present, and I therefore beg leave to propose that our valued and zealous friend, Mr. Brown, be called to the chair. (Long and loud cheering.)

JAMES MELLOR, Esq., said that it gave him pleasure to second the motion which had just been made, to call Mr. Brown to the chair, whom he hoped they would, at the next election, have the pleasure of returning as the representative of South Lancashire. (Great cheering.)

The motion was carried by acclamation, and amid renewed bursts of the most vehement cheering, Mr. Brown took the chair.

In the immediate vicinity of the chair we noticed Thomas Thornely, Esq., M.P., W. Rathbone, Esq., Robert Ellison Harvey, Esq.; James Branker, Esq., Thomas Bolton, Esq., George Maxwell, Esq., Daniel Waterhouse, Esq., Sir Arnold Knight, Joseph King, Esq., James Molyneux, Esq., James Mellor, Esq., J. H. Macrea, Esq., David Wrigley, Esq., Richard Sheil, Esq., Lawrence Heyworth, Esq., John Holt, Esq., R. W. Ronald, Esq., Thomas Blackburn, Esq., Samuel Thornely, Esq., Daniel Mather, Esq., John Mather, Esq., — Romily, Esq., James Ryley, Esq., A. A. H. Wylie, Esq., W. Blain, Esq., R. V. Yates, Esq., Thomas Todd, Esq., Richard Rushton, Esq., Thomas Chalmer, Esq., Charles Holland, Esq., J. P. G. Smith, Esq., Thomas Bains, Esq., Vincent Higgins, Esq., Wm. Clare, Esq., Samuel Bulley, Esq., J. W. Molyneux, Esq., John Coward, Esq., John D. Thornely, Esq., C. J. Corbally, Esq., Wm. Preston, Esq., John T. Crook, Esq., Charles Robertson, Esq., Richard Johnson, Esq., John Priestley, Esq., Thomas Bulley, Esq., C. Rawlins, Esq., C. Rawlins, Jun., Esq., — Tomlinson, Esq., Wm. Walchew, Esq., James Stitt, Esq., John Finch, Jun., Esq., T. B. Robinson, Esq., James Jefferies, Esq., David McClelland, Esq., David Rowlands, Esq., Henry Danson, Esq., Thomas Urquhart, Esq., J. H. Green, Esq., Birkenhead, Charles Robertson, Esq., J. Irvine, Esq., Robert Mather, Esq., Joseph Heap, Esq., Victor Pontz, Esq., James Lewis, Esq., Christopher Rawdon, Esq., Joseph Mondel, Esq., E. Moss, Esq., Joseph Dawson, Esq., Henry Wood, Esq., James Crossfield, Esq., Nathaniel Reynier, Esq., William Porter, Esq., Wm. Duming, Esq., Thomas Harvey, Esq., James Harvey, Esq., George B. Lightfoot, Esq., James H. Smith, Esq., Edward Heath, Esq., James Perrin, Esq., Timothy Jevons, Esq., James Thomas, Esq., merchant, Norwich; J. Hicklin, Esq. (editor of the Chester Courant); George Coggill, Esq., of New York; Mr. James R. Jeffrey, Mr. Morrish; Thomas Brown Young, Esq., shipowner, Sunderland; Thomas Cooke, Esq., from America; — Temple, Esq., London; Captain Hudson; Captains Donald and Taylor, Aberdeen; Captain Thomas Gains, Sunderland; Captain Taylor, America; Drs. Cooper, Manifold, Jeffreys, Radley, Sunderland, Anderson, &c.

The CHAIRMAN rose amid renewed cheering, and spoke as follows: Fellow-townsmen, you have done me great honour in electing me to preside this evening over your deliberations. (Hear, hear.) In so doing, I do not anticipate that it will be necessary for me to exercise one of the more invidious duties of a chairman, that of calling any member of the meeting, or any speaker who may address it to order, as I am certain that you will all lend me your support in so conducting the proceedings, that every gentleman who is disposed to address you will be favoured with a patient and attentive hearing. (Loud cries of "hear, hear.") That you may the better appreciate the exact position in which your chief magistrate has chosen to place himself by his extraordinary conduct, it is proper that the meeting should be put in full possession of the respectful requisition which was presented to him, and the answer; and with a view to this, I deem it fitting that both these documents should be now read for your consideration. (Hear, hear, hear.) The mayor having declined to call us together, we at once determined to assemble independently of him, under the protection of the constitution, to express our sentiments fully and fairly, and to convey our desires at once to her Majesty's Government. (Cheers.)

Mr. I. B. COOK then read the requisition, signed by 5800 persons, and also the mayor's reply thereto. The reading of the latter was accompanied throughout with a perfect storm of hisses.

The CHAIRMAN then resumed: That the first requisition to the mayor, as well as the second to you, gentlemen, was signed, under no slight apprehension of alarm, I think we have abundant proof to show. (Hear, hear.) The first proof which I shall address to you, to show that our fears are well grounded, is the correspondence which lately took place between Lord Cloncurry and the Prime Minister. The Government were so sensible of the danger which threatened the country from famine, and the evils consequent upon it, that the minister assured his lordship that the whole subject was undergoing the most anxious consideration from her Majesty's Government. (Hear, hear.) The next witness which I shall bring before you is the Mark Lane Express, a paper which you all know to be the avowed organ of the British agricultural interest. By it we are informed, and the statement is reiterated from week to week, that many cargoes of potatoes have arrived in the Thames so far advanced in rotteness and decay that they had to be thrown overboard. (Hear, hear.) We are also led to believe by it that the accounts from all parts of the kingdom are by no means favourable to the preservation of the potato crop, for the sustenance throughout the winter of those who unfortunately have almost exclusively to rely for aliment on this species of food. (Hear, hear.) Every newspaper throughout the kingdom has, from time to time, reiterated similar accounts, and to say that we are not now in a state of distress, when we are paying 400,000*l.* a week more for provisions than we were paying this time last year, is a proposition to which few will be found ready to accede. (Hear, hear.) Permit me also to call your attention to the resolutions passed in Dublin, at a meeting at the Mansion House, over which Lord Cloncurry presided, and at which the Lord Mayor was present, in which my friend, Mr. Cook, will do me the favour of reading in my stead.

Mr. COOK then read the resolutions adopted at the meeting of the Mansion House committee, which, having already appeared in our columns, we need not here repeat.

The CHAIRMAN again resumed: The next point to which I beg leave to direct your attention is the rapid increase of the population of this country, an increase which, as a matter of course, renders the people daily more dependent for their subsistence upon foreign supplies. (Hear, hear.) As population advances in numbers, the demand for those supplies progressively increases. From the passing of the Corn Laws in 1828, down to the present time, our average annual import of wheat has been about 1,300,000 quarters. In 1842 and 1844, when alarm and anxiety did not prevail to the same extent as they do now, our imports taken out of bond for home consumption were pretty much the same in each year—about 8,200,000 quarters. But from the resources which we then possessed we are now, in a great measure, cut off; for those countries which then supplied us out of their abundance with the largest proportion of the food which we received are now our competitors in other markets, where they are collecting the surplus which exists for the supply of their own deficiencies. (Hear, hear.) I understand that, so far as can be ascertained, the exports last year from the Black Sea were 2,250,000 quarters; but in the year of our greatest distress, in 1842, they could only furnish us from that quarter, after supplying all their other customers, with about 211,000 quarters. (Hear, hear.) Since 1841 our supplies from Canada have been gradually falling off. We received thence, last year, 226,000 quarters; whereas up to the 20th of September in the present year, our receipts from Canada did not exceed 96,000 quarters, 170,000 quarters having been received by the same period last year. (Hear, hear.) And furthermore, the Government of Canada has recently issued a proclamation, admitting potatoes free of duty into Lower Canada, for there, unhappily, a deficiency of food for the coming year is as imminent as with ourselves. (Hear, hear.) The United States remain as the chief source of our dependence for the supply of food to meet our deficiencies. (Hear, hear.) I find that in 1841, when we stimulated them to send us supplies, they were able to spare us 570,000 quarters of wheat. In 1840, when the price of food was nearly the same, the only supply which they could afford to England was 425,000 quarters. The precise amount imported from the United States in 1842 I have not been able to ascertain, but I have reason to believe that it did not exceed the amount of their supply in 1840. Now, if you add together these different amounts of supply, which were received from these different sources at a time when we gave them high prices, but not so high as at present, you find that in the aggregate they only amount to a little more than a million of quarters to balance a deficiency of about three millions. (Hear, hear.) How far we may now be able to induce the Americans, by giving them a high price for their Indian corn to let their pigs, of which they have twenty-six millions, and which they now feed upon this grain, run wild in the woods, I know not; but this I do know, that if we could prevail upon them to give us their supplies of Indian corn, which they have in such abundance, this would go far to relieve our present and anticipated distresses. (Hear, hear.) The growth of Indian corn in America last year was fifty-three millions of quarters—a crop nearly five times the value to them of their whole cotton crop. (Hear, hear.) The growth of wheat in that country during the same period was comparatively small, amounting only to twelve millions of quarters; but I have reason to believe that their crop of Indian corn is this year equal to that of last year, and that their wheat crop is a very good one. (Hear, hear.) But to induce the American farmers of the interior to send the surplus products of their fields down to the seaboard for transshipment to this country, we must freely open the ports to them. (Hear, hear.) For if they remain liable to encounter a possibly decreasing price, and a consequently rising scale, when they reach this country with their produce, it will require more nerve than prudent men connected with commercial matters generally possess, to induce them to run such a hazard in transporting their grain to this side of the Atlantic. (Hear, hear.) Our agricultural population were certainly greatly mistaken in their estimate of the effects which the Canadian Corn Bill was likely to have upon their interests, for it appears that from the 11th of October, 1843, down to the 5th July, 1845, the whole amount of American wheat which has entered the Canadian ports for transshipment to England has not exceeded 44,440 quarters, too inconsiderable a quantity to be worthy a moment's serious consideration. I shall not at present trouble you with any further observations, but will now conclude by calling upon our esteemed and zealous friend, Mr. Thornely, to move the first resolution. (The chairman here resumed his seat amid reiterated bursts of the most vehement and protracted cheering.)

T. THORNELY, Esq., M.P. for Wolverhampton, presented himself at the front of the stage, amid loud cheers, and said:—Gentlemen, there are many of us here present who have all our lives been Free Traders. (Hear, hear.) As to the rest of this great assemblage, if they have not already adopted Free Trade opinions, I earnestly beg that they will direct their attention to the present alarming crisis in our affairs, when they will, I am sure, agree with those who have long entertained the opinion that there should be an immediate end put to all laws which prohibit the free and unrestricted importation of food into the United Kingdom. (Cheers.) I have recently made inquiries in some of our corn markets as to the price of grain, both in May last and in the present month of November. As the result of these inquiries, I found that wheat of the old crop in Ireland was in May last selling at the rate of 6*s.* 3*d.* for 70 lbs., whereas the price of the same wheat has now advanced to 9*s.* 3*d.* for the same quantity, thus showing a rise in price in that short space of time of no less than 50 per cent. (Hear, hear.) I found also that oats were selling last May at 3*s.* for 45 lbs., whereas the same quantity is now selling for 4*s.* 2*d.* (hear, hear); and that oatmeal which in May was selling for 24*s.* 6*d.* for 240 lbs. cannot now be had in the same quantity under 34*s.* (Hear, hear.) I found further that flour, which was selling at the former period for 34*s.* for 280 lbs. is now, for the same quantity, commanding no less than 51*s.* (Hear, hear, hear.) Now it pleased the Government and legislature, as you all well recollect, to impose, some time ago, an Income-tax of something like 3 per cent. upon all those whose incomes exceeded 150*l.* a year, when a great outcry was raised throughout the country, and numerous petitions were presented against the tax; but here is a tax, or what is equivalent to a tax, an advance on the price of food between May and November, which has abstracted from the pockets of the poor man not simply three per cent., but an enormous per centage of his limited earnings—and a tax which will render it an extremely difficult matter for the labouring classes of this country, of whom I can never speak without respect (hear, hear), to supply themselves with necessary sustenance in a period of suffering and deficiency like the present—a suffering and a deficiency which I believe in my conscience is likely to increase. (Hear.) Several of the great towns of the country, seeing what is before us, have come forward and addressed the Prime Minister upon the all-absorbing topic of the approaching famine. The people of Manchester were called together by their mayor with this object, and so were the people of Salford. (Hear and cheers.) The people of Birmingham, of Sheffield, of Leeds, and of other great towns have also adopted the course of addressing the Prime Minister upon the present prospects of the country. (Hear.) The metropolis is also alive to the emergency in which we are placed, and we find that London is about to assemble for the same purpose. (Hear, hear, hear.) In an emergency like the present, what should have been done? Why, as soon as it became apparent to Sir Robert Peel that a large proportion of the potato crop would be destroyed, and that there would be a serious deficiency in the yield of wheat, he should have called Parliament together, and stated to it his own convictions and those of his cabinet. He would then have had an excellent opportunity of retrieving his past errors, if he could only have divested himself of his prejudices in favour of sliding-scales, and stepped forward boldly and proclaimed that the time was come when the sliding-scale, which stunted the people in their food, should be for ever relinquished in this country. (Cheers.) It is quite true that the Queen, by the advice of her council, has the power to issue an order admitting foreign grain at a lower rate of duty than that demanded by the Act of Parliament. But, by proposing to set the law aside, even temporarily, such an order in council would be the strongest evidence which could, perhaps, be produced, that the law was utterly defective, and should be finally abolished. (Loud cheers.) The true way of preventing distress is to allow the ports to be opened, and thus afford to the merchants and the people an opportunity of securing that supply, which they would certainly do if left to themselves. (Loud cheers.) Before this meeting separates, you will, I understand, be called upon to agree to a memorial addressed to Sir Robert Peel, as First Lord of the Treasury, and expressive of your opinion as to the present state of the country with reference to the supply of food. You will state in your memorial that you entertain serious apprehensions of famine—and really, when I think of the condition of our fellow-subjects in Ireland, my heart bleeds within me at the idea of the misery which will inevitably be occasioned amongst a people whose only means of subsistence is dependent on the potato crop, which crop we are aware has altogether failed in Ireland this year. (Hear, hear.) I am, indeed, happy to perceive that great numbers of that most industrious and hard-working population find employment in our manufacturing and commercial towns in England at higher wages than they could obtain at home. I understand that there are no less than 50,000 natives of Ireland in Liverpool alone, and I sincerely rejoice that there is such a number here, for the Irish are a most industrious people, and eminently useful workmen at the docks, and, indeed, in labour generally. (Hear, hear.) It is a great advantage, and affords a most agreeable reflection, that the great towns in England open such resources to the Irish population. But that employment is not sufficient to avert the evils which now threaten Ireland, and which are of such a nature that they demand the utmost attention and care of ministers, who ought, without delay, to adopt every measure which can be calculated to avert them. (Hear, hear.) It is now, I believe, in our power, by a firm, an unqualified, and a conscientious expression of our opinions, which are embodied in the resolutions that will be proposed, to put an end, at once and for ever, to the abominable system of Corn Laws. I now beg to move—"That the alarming failure in the potato crop throughout the United Kingdom, confirmed in the case of Ireland by several reports from the commissioners specially appointed by her Majesty's Government to investigate the subject, and by other persons of unquestionable veracity, together with the injury done to the wheat crop, are calculated to excite the most serious apprehensions of impending famine." Mr. Thornely resumed his seat amidst loud plaudits.

LAWRENCE HEYWORTH, Esq., then came forward amidst loud applause, and said: Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, many years ago I had the pleasure with others of standing here to vindicate our opinion, that all restrictions on commerce ought to be abandoned. I rejoice that this evening I can come before you with a more certain prospect of our object being soon attained. (Hear, hear.) The signs of the times are such as leave no doubt on the mind of any one who being observant pleases to read them, that the doom of the Corn Laws is fixed. (Cheers.) Gentlemen, though this is really the case, I mention it not that we should relax our efforts for a moment—(hear, hear)—but that we should take courage, and being assured that our principles are founded on eternal truth, that we should resolutely demonstrate our conviction by the resolutions of this evening; that those principles are for ever fixed in our minds, and that we are determined to labour until we see them carried into effect. (Much cheering.) Gentlemen, we are on the point of being cast from a state of national prosperity consequent on plenty into the abyss of disastrous scarcity. We are threatened with all the horrors of famine. What does famine mean? The destruction of your wives, your children, and yourselves. (Hear, hear.) What though this famine is not just now at our threshold: have we not every reason to believe that it is not many months distant from us? The potato crop has failed. We know in England that it has failed. It has certainly failed in Ireland; and my own experience tells me that it has failed in this country. I had two crops of about four acres; and of two of those acres, two-thirds of the produce are rotten. If this is the case in my own instance, why may it not be in that of my neighbours? The concurrent reports from all quarters of the empire is a sufficient ground for asserting that the potato crop has failed. Now the Irish population, unhappily, is compelled to feed on potatoes. If those fail—if the cheapest provisions which they can use are not procurable—whence and how are they to procure those which come next in the order of cheapness? I look upon this deficiency of food as a most awful and fearful danger which is hanging over us. How shall we prevent it? Shall we subscribe individually; or shall the Government rifle the public treasury, to which rich and poor have contributed, and send money to Ireland, wherewith to buy potatoes, when there is none to buy? Will that be of any use to them? No. Money will not be of any use to them; they cannot eat money. We have not potatoes to send, nor can we spare any wheat or oats. The high prices of these indicate that we have no surplus quantity. On the contrary, you are filching from Ireland all the oatmeal which can be collected together; it is being brought to this country to supply our own wants. What, then, must be done in this emergency. When famine threatened the people of Israel of old, the question was asked, "Is there not corn in Egypt?" The answer was, "Get you down to that country and buy it." And now, when we are threatened with famine in this country, we ask, "Is there not corn in America?" (Great cheering.) There is; but your restrictive laws say that you shall not have it unless you pay a penalty of fifteen shillings per quarter for leave to import it. Gentlemen, it is said of Governments that they are paternal. Who has affixed this hindrance to your receiving corn from America? Your paternal Government. (Laughter and cries of Hear, hear.) The paternal Government, which is constituted to take care of your interests and your wants, and to see that you are fed. But how have they shown their paternal care, now that gaunt famine is staring you in the face? Is their conduct that of a father to his children? (Hear, hear.) If the child asks for bread, does the father give it a stone? No. But what does your Government do when you ask for bread? It gives you nothing at all. (Loud applause.) Is it not high time, friends, that this paternal

Government should have its understanding a little enlightened—that it should be made known to them that it is a stigma of folly upon themselves as well as heinous criminal to the poor of the land, to obstruct the importation of food that should supply the people? (Cheers.) If the people are obstructed in obtaining a supply of food, what is the consequence? Why, the high prices of food oblige the people to cease from purchasing those manifold articles produced in manufacturing districts. Goods accumulate, trade and manufactures stand still. Labourers and operatives are discharged; and earning no wages, they can neither purchase the articles of which they were the producers, nor even the products of the broad acres, for which the aristocracy seek by criminal means to obtain high prices. The aristocracy ought to be told, for they must learn the lesson, that restrictions on commerce not only prevent the labourers from obtaining food and the comforts of life, but that they cut off the very sources of all their own wealth. Some of them are beginning to perceive this. I am glad to learn from Lord J. Russell that he entertains these views; that he has given in his adhesion to Free Trade principles, and that he is beginning to see that no harm can come to the aristocracy from the circumstance of merchants and manufacturers becoming wealthy, and the labouring poor obtaining more of the necessities and comforts of life. This is certainly a wonderful discovery to make! I wish that Lord John Russell had found it out many years ago. (Cheers.) Still I am glad that he has found it out now, and I hope that his compatriots will soon discover the same grand secret. (Applause.) It behoves us, at the present time, to be very earnest and zealous in what we are doing; and we have every encouragement in the good work, not only from the general intelligence of the people, but from the information and knowledge on the subject of commercial freedom which is enlightening the minds of our aristocracy and legislature. Not only in England is a knowledge of the principles of Free Trade forcing itself on the understandings of the people, but the same result is taking place in other countries. I read recently, in that excellent paper, the Economist, a letter written by General McDuffie on the Tariff of the United States, in which he expressed sentiments that do honour to him as a man and a Christian. He expresses his abhorrence of all protective laws, and his view of the demands of the manufacturers of the United States in the following terms:—"A customs' duty of 20 per cent. on the articles coming into the country, gave a clear bonus to the home manufacturers of such articles, and robbed the whole of the rest of the community to that extent. And what, under the circumstances, do they modestly demand of the federal Government and of a Free Trade democratic administration? Simply that the bounty of 20 per cent., resulting from a revenue duty, be raised to 50 by a protecting duty, swelling their clear and real income, derived from the system of federal taxation, from 8000 to 23,000 dollars! This plain statement literally exhibits the character not only of the protective duties upon sugar and iron, but of the whole system of protective monopoly; and I am sure no honest patriot can think of the unjust, iniquitous, and audacious demand made by those bloated and heartless plunderers, without feeling his blood boil in his veins with the warmest indignation." These are strong expressions that the General makes use of, but, in my opinion, not at all stronger than are warranted by the circumstances. Gentlemen, the same spirit which animates him, ought to animate us. Of these sentiments, which come to us across the wide Atlantic from the far west, I should say that we hail them with responsive delight—we rejoice to see that we have accessions to our principles, not only in England, but in other countries. And I am sure that the day will soon be when the abolition of all protective duties will be consummated with a shout of victory from the inhabitants of the whole globe. (Cheers.) Gentlemen, I shall not detain you any longer. I hope that the resolutions which will be offered to your acceptance will be supported by you in a manner that will do credit to the great commercial town of Liverpool, and I shall conclude by seconding the motion which has been read. (Loud cheers.)

The CHAIRMAN said—Gentlemen, before I put this resolution, I will call on my friend, Mr. Baines, who has taken a great deal of trouble to collect information from the most authentic sources, as to the real state of the potato crop, to read to you a report which he has prepared, as the result of his inquiries on that subject.

Mr. BAINES then read an elaborate report on the state of the potato crop, which we greatly regret our limits compel us to omit.

W. RATHBONE, Esq., came forward amidst great cheering to propose the next resolution. "That we have now assembled for the purpose of expressing our strong convictions of the responsibility which rests upon her Majesty's confidential advisers if they do not take immediate steps to avert, as far as possible, the awful consequences of a deficient supply of the necessities of life." Mr. Chairman, this resolution does not go far enough for me. (Cheers.) It removes in some degree, at least by inference, the responsibility which rests upon her Majesty's advisers for not having taken, in the month of September, prompt steps to avert the calamity with which we are likely to be overwhelmed. (Applause.) Gentlemen, England is considered the most Christian, the most intelligent nation in the world. (Hear, hear, hear.) She has, however, been behind Belgium, she has been behind Holland, she has been behind most of the European nations in taking precautions to provide against the famine which threatens the country; and there is this disgraceful fact before us, that whilst we have been doing more than the Bible requires of us—that is, loving our neighbours better than ourselves, we have been taking the bonded wheat out of our granaries, we have been exporting the potatoes of our own soil to feed the starving people of the Continent; and whilst we have been doing all this, our Premier has been filling a barrow with soil. (Great laughter and cheers.) Our Premier, I am told, shrinks from the responsibility of starving his countrymen. I am glad to learn that he has some feelings. I rather doubted it. I am glad to hear that the demon of famine has haunted him in his midnight dreams, and that he is beginning to feel that Englishmen have their rights to maintain, and that statesmen have their duties to perform. (Cheers.) What a contrast to the conduct of the Premier do we find in the course taken by Lord John Russell and Lord Morpeth! Lord John Russell at one time told us that there was to be a finality to further progress; but he has now displayed the moral courage of coming forward to state that his opinions with respect to the importation of food have changed, and he has, by the course he has taken, proved that he is a worthy descendant of that ancestor whose blood was shed on the altar of liberty. (Cheers.) Lord John Russell, when convinced of the error of his opinions, avowed at once his conviction, and I honour him for it. It gives me additional confidence in the leader of the people—henceforward the leader of the League. (No, no, and cheers.) I am glad to find at the same time, and without any conference between these eminent statesmen, Lord Morpeth also came forward to express his conviction that the time was arrived when he feels it his duty to come forward as an advocate for the abolition of the Corn Laws. (Cheers.) That opinion was formed without any communication between these noblemen, a fact which we have on the authority of Lord Morpeth, and which I would not have believed on the authority of any other man in the kingdom, it appears so incomprehensible; but it shows the coincidence which occurs in great minds. Much time has been lost. The calamity cannot be averted. It is wicked—it is unchristian, to shut our eyes to the fact that nearly three millions of our countrymen—of our brethren in Ireland, will probably be under the most dire of all calamities—the calamity of starvation, before next year is out. (Hear, hear, hear.) You can, therefore, only proceed to mitigation—to a mitigation of the evil, not by doling out to them a pittance of generosity, but by giving them that justice which they, as our countrymen, have a right to demand. (Cheers.) Sink a nation down to a nation of paupers and they soon become corrupt, degraded, and they ultimately disappear from the face of the earth. But it is the duty of our rulers to enable every man, by freedom of trade, independently and honestly to support himself, to support his wife and family, and to say, "I thank no one but the Almighty God, who gave me arms, hands, and labour to work out my own salvation and that of my family." (Cheers.) I will not take up your time, because I know that a gentleman well qualified to explain what I have advocated, for I have only dealt with principles—I allude to my friend Mr. Wylie—will second the motion. That gentleman is a partner in the house of Lizardi and Co., which is perhaps better known throughout the world than most houses in Liverpool, and let me say, one possessing a host of information. For my deficiencies, of which I am fully conscious, he will make ample amends. I propose this motion for your hearty concurrence. Take it home to your families. Read it there, and see where the responsibility rests—whether upon those who have been the determined advocates of the right of the people to sell their productions in the dearest market, and to buy their food in the cheapest, or whether at the doors of those who have been short-sighted enough to promote their own interests by trampling on the interests of others? Mr. Rathbone concluded amidst loud applause from every part of the house.

The resolution was seconded by

A. H. WYLIE, Esq., who said, I should have been astonished at the laudatory terms in which Mr. Rathbone has introduced me to your notice, were it not that I knew that he was one of those good men of whom we have too few in this world—one of those who speak good of all, and who has not a bad word for any one. I came down to this meeting fully impressed with the belief that a serious calamity was hanging over a large portion of her Majesty's subjects, but until I heard Mr. Baines's statements—statements that cannot be controverted, I had no idea that the impending calamity was so fearful, or our danger so imminent. All other evils we can guard against. (Cheers.) The evils which follow in the train of an insufficient supply of food equally defy all law and reason. It has been decreed that man should earn his subsistence by the sweat of his brow; but we, by a vain attempt at legislation to fix the price of food, interfere with the Divine command, which also implies a promise—we add to the original curse, and we declare that man's labour shall not suffice for man's subsistence. (Loud cheers.) Houses and land constitute a property over which the law watches most jealously, but there is no jealous law for the poor man's inheritance—his labour and his industry—in fact, the law fetters them down in this country, where there is a concentrated skill which exists nowhere else, and a capital ever ready to give effect to that skill. But the honest artisan or wealthy capitalist is alike debared from bartering his labour or his produce for that which is the primary article of subsistence. (Hear, hear.) Corn stands out the great exception in our commerce. I appeal to the gentlemen around me, some of them largely connected with the United States, and through whose hands every import from thence has passed, save and except that article which is in the greatest abundance there, but the want of which threatens such serious consequences here. (Hear, hear.) It is for all such consequences that we hold her Majesty's ministers responsible. We hold them responsible for all the penny that follows high prices; for the pestilence that accompanies a scarcity of food; and, worse than all, for all the crime that starvation provokes. (Great applause.) I will not trespass upon your patience, nor picture to you the consequences if they refuse. The evil that threatens us is great, and the remedy we ask must be complete; and we ask her Majesty's Government to cast off the trammels of party, and for ourselves, and tens of hundreds not here, we promise to hold them harmless. Here we are all practical men; we feel the pulsations of trade long before the general body is affected; and we are, therefore, the more anxious to avert the calamities which we see approaching. The symptoms of those evils are clearly perceptible. We have heard of meetings in a neighbouring town to consider the necessity of shortening the hours of labour; that course, if adopted, means a reduction of wages, and with a high price of provisions our prosperity vanishes under such circumstances. I acknowledge that much grain will not come to this country under any circumstances, for I regret to say, such is our selfish policy, that we refuse to partake of the abundance of other nations, but we rob them in the time of scarcity for the supply of our own wants. At Ancona, in Italy, the people recently rose to prevent the exportation of corn, but corn will, nevertheless, come to this country, although it cannot be of service to the poor, if sold at speculators' prices. We are all aware that we must expect large demands on our private charity during the ensuing winter, but however willing we may be to meet those demands, we must recollect that charity is impotent when the people are starving. No, real charity is to enable men to earn their subsistence by their own labour, and if the ministers refuse to do so, then the responsibility rests on them alone. (Great cheers.)

The resolution was then put and carried.

Dr. BLACKBURN rose to propose the next resolution, and was received with long-continued applause. When it had subsided, he read the following resolution: "That we find from daily experience that in all the articles we obtain from foreign nations, and which are left to the natural operations of commerce, there is always procurable an abundant supply for the wants of the community; that we therefore believe that it is owing to the restrictions imposed by the corn and provision laws that there is not every year a store of foreign grain ample enough to dispel the well-founded alarm which is inseparable from a failure in our own harvests; that the operation of these laws is generally to impoverish the labouring classes, and to reduce them to the coarsest description of food on which existence can be supported; that we are firmly convinced that the failure of their only principal means of subsistence among that large and helpless portion of our fellow-subjects, unless in some degree remedied by the instant admission of all kinds of provisions duty free, will be productive of consequences too fearful to contemplate; that we therefore consider it the bounden duty of the Queen's responsible advisers to advise her Majesty immediately to summon the Parliament for the purpose of recommending the total and immediate abolition of a system which has been justly said to be 'the blight of commerce, the bane of agriculture, the source of bitter divisions among classes, and the cause of penury, fever, and crime among the people.'" He then said: This resolution contains a very important sentiment—one which we would do well to understand thoroughly in all its bearings, and with all its necessary limitations. It does not assert that our Corn Laws are the cause of a deficiency in the harvest, or that any other possible arrangement of law could prevent those casualties to which the crops of all countries are, in the very nature of things, and by the ordination of Providence, always exposed. Nor does it at all imply that a considerable failure in the produce of the soil is not a serious calamity in itself, calculated to entail great suffering on the humbler classes in whatever part of the world it may occur. (Hear.) I make these remarks, because I am not ignorant of the eagerness with which our opponents catch at any unguarded statements which may be advanced by the advocates of Free Trade. (Cheers.) It is part of their crooked policy to represent us as a sort of unreasoning fanatics, engrossed by one solitary idea, labouring under a monomania about Free Trade, which leads us to fancy that its adoption would banish misery and misfortune and want from the face of the earth. Such, however, is not our view. We do not forget that care and trouble are the lot of man, and that, with all his caution, and prudence, and foresight, he is compelled by experience often to adopt the language of one of Burns's beautiful little poems—

"The best laid schemes o' mice and men
Gang aft agley;
And leave us nought but grief and pain
For promised joy."

So far, indeed, are we from forming any such erroneous estimate of the state in which we are placed, as the fallen and guilty inhabitants of a world that lies under the frown of Heaven, in consequence of sin, that in that very fact we think there is found one of the strongest and most unanswerable arguments for a free commercial intercourse among all the nations of the earth. (Cheers.) Our condition as apostate creatures is necessarily one of sorrow and toil. "In the sweat of thy brow shalt thou eat bread all thy days," is the divine sentence pronounced upon us. That sentence comprehends all mankind, and renders the existence of a large portion of the human race one ceaseless struggle with hunger and destitution. In whatever stage of society you find man, this is one of his invariable characteristics. It applies generally to all kindreds of men scattered over the surface of the earth. Now, surely, when we regard ourselves as partakers in a common misery—as sharers in a general calamity—nothing can be more monstrous and suicidal than that laws should be enacted to forbid our helping one another in every way in our power—to sustain and lighten the burden which is our sad inheritance, by a free interchange, for our mutual advantage, of all things calculated to promote the public good. (Cheers.) I should like to hear any man give a reason why the owners of land in these realms should be allowed to say, either to the rich or the poor, "We grow corn, and you shall not be permitted to purchase any except from us, unless, indeed, the supply we can furnish is so scanty as to endanger a famine." Yet this is in truth the plain meaning of the Corn Laws. They stand in direct and glaring contrariety to the manifest design of the Almighty, as clearly indicated in the works of creation, and the dealings of Providence. He must be blind indeed who cannot see in the original frame of things, as they exist around us, the obvious display of a settled purpose to place the inhabitants of the earth in such relation to each other as should necessitate a free interchange for the general good. In answer to the inquiry—"How would freedom of trade tend to reduce to its minimum the evils of a deficient harvest?" I may be permitted to remark, that the more extended the surface on which you depend for your supplies, the greater is the probability of your securing an average quantity in successive years. Let us suppose, for example, that the heptarchy were restored, and that England were again divided into seven distinct Governments, each relying for support on the produce of its own soil; who does not see that the risk of distress from deficiency would be greatly increased. Even in our own country it is well known that some seasons are more favourable to the fertility of the island and some to another, but a free interchange rectifies at once, and almost imperceptibly, these slight and casual variations. So that in years of average fecundity, upon the whole, they attract little attention, and produce no general suffering. Now, extend this illustration to a Continent; let the Free Trade system prevail throughout the nations of Europe, and the risk of misery and starvation in any one of those nations would be greatly reduced. Rarely does it happen that the seasons are equally propitious or unpropitious in every part of the Continent. Rarely does it happen that the bounty of an indulgent Providence is not lavished on one or more of the regions it includes. But why should we be limited to a Continent? The earth had God given to the children of man, and the course that nature with a thousand voices directs us to as right, and generous, and wise, is to include within our range the whole world; to give to all and to receive from all, whenever, wherever, and whatever it may be for our mutual advantage to exchange. (Cheers.) A remarkable illustration of the benefits that must accrue to all parties from such a policy is presented to our notice in the well-ascertained fact, that a failure in the productiveness of the earth is never universal. Whenever comparative sterility is visited upon one zone or region, it is uniformly compensated for by exuberant fertility in another. This appears to be a general law, to which Mr. McCulloch asserts there is no recorded exception in the past history of mankind. Is it possible to contemplate this most striking and instructive fact, without being forced to the conclusion that famine, whenever it occurs, is not to be ascribed to any want of goodness and mercy on the part of Him who opens his hand and supplies the wants of every living thing, but is rather the result of human ignorance and folly, which impudently dares to thwart the beneficial laws which divine wisdom has ordained for the government of the world? My resolution denounces the Corn Laws as cruel and wicked. That they are cruel in their effects has been already most clearly proved. And will any man venture to say that they are not wicked? There are some advocates of those laws who are always talking about the Bible, and, indeed, seem disposed to add the monopoly of religion to their other monopolies. Now, I like to appeal to the Bible as well as they do. I believe it to be a storehouse of sound principles, from which we derive safe guidance in all the relations we sustain in life. Let me ask them, then, what they think of that solemn passage—"He that withholdeth corn, the people shall curse." To withhold corn means, I apprehend, to render it difficult for the poor to obtain by enhancing the price. If that be not the meaning, I acknowledge myself incapable of attaching any meaning to it at all. Well, then, what is the avowed object of the sliding-scale? Is it not to keep up the price of corn? To adopt the gentle and courtly phrase of Sir Robert Peel—to secure to the corn grower a remunerating price—that is, a price which the landowner considers to be remunerating, because it enables him to get a large rental for his land. And what is meant by protection, but securing the British corn grower against the competition of the foreign corn grower—lest the article should be too abundant and cheap. (Hear, hear.) The great national evil which the Corn Laws are intended to protect us from is, in plain terms—a cheap and abundant supply of food—certainly the oddest kind of national evil that ever was heard of. (Cheers and laughter.) And we are not left to conjecture upon the subject, but are plainly told so by the monopolists themselves. When the Duke of Richmond said, "We don't grow glass, but we do grow timber," when Sir Edward Knatchbull waxed lachrymose about marriage settlements and daughters' portions—and when Mr. Miles, the acknowledged leader of the landowners' party, stood up in his place in the House of Commons, and rated the Premier in good set terms, because divers articles, such as butter, cheese, and bacon, had been too cheap, imputing it to Sir Robert Peel as a crime and a violation of an implied compact that he had not kept up prices as was expected by his supporters, the real purpose of the Corn Laws comes out. The more knowing ones of the party talk in a different style, and wrap up their statements in a sort of misty verbiage intended to deceive and delude, but these simpletons blab (cheers) the secret—and, as Mr. Escott said the other day, they damage their own cause most effectually. And is it indeed come to this? Are the people of England, Scotland, and Ireland to bow down their necks any longer beneath this yoke? Are we still to go on, year after year—constantly on the very verge of famine—dependent on the changes of the most variable climate in the world—whether our condition is safe and prosperous, or miserable and full of danger? What is it that we ask? What is it that we are contending for? We do not ask the legislature to feed the people. We know full well that it is not within their province, and not within their power to do that. What we ask is simply this, and nothing more—that the people may not be prohibited by Act of Parliament from feeding themselves. That is what it's all about. Now surely this is not an unreasonable request. And wherefore is it refused? Why, for no earthly reason but that a mere handful of people, who happen to be owners of land, may get large rents and live in splendour. (Hear and cheers.) Allow me, in conclusion, to state with all frankness my decided and deliberate conviction, that the continuance for a longer time of this monstrous and ruinous system is mainly to be attributed to the criminal ignorance and apathy of the middle classes. (Hear, hear, and cheers.) The Reform Bill, with all its defects, has placed the ascendancy in this country in the hands of the middle classes if they would be only faithful to themselves. (Hear.) It is for them to put forth the might which slumbers in their keeping, and the system is doomed. (Cheers.) Let them arouse themselves to the discharge of the duty they owe to their country. Let them adopt the constitutional means of making their opinions tell on the composition of the Legislature. Let them spurn the unmanly cowardice which has hitherto kept tens of thousands of them silent and inactive. Let them now speak out—promptly—clearly—loudly—in a voice that cannot be mistaken. Let them, in tones that shall reverberate through the halls of legislation, and ascend up to the palaces of the empire, tell those haughty oligarchs, who by their Corn Laws and their Game Laws now trample down the people like mire in the streets, that we will be their slaves no longer. (Great cheering.) In this way, and in this way only, will the victory of truth, and righteousness, and benevolence be secured. In this way, and in this way only, will the grim and gory dragon of monopoly be hurled from his throne, amid the joyous hallelujahs of emancipated millions. —Mr. Blackburn resumed his seat amid tremendous cheers.

Mr. JAMES BRANCKER seconded the resolution.

RICHARD SHEIL, Esq., then rose. He said: Gentlemen, at this late hour of the evening, and after the many able and most eloquent addresses which have already been delivered to you upon this topic, I shall not trespass long upon your time. I have to propose to you a memorial, to be forwarded and presented to Sir Robert Peel, as First Minister of the Crown, and as that official channel through which addresses of this nature are brought before her Majesty; and this memorial being nearly, if not altogether, a continuation of the resolutions which you have just passed, it will be unnecessary for me to dwell upon its contents. You already know them, and have approved of them, and it is superfluous for me to do more than make one or two observations on a subject in which, perhaps, I may be supposed to feel a little more interest than any of those gentlemen who have already addressed you—I mean the condition of Ireland. (Hear, hear.) I allude to the famine with which the country is, and with which it has for some time past been threatened; and I wish to press its condition upon your attention. The dread of famine in Ireland is shared in by all except her Majesty's ministers. (Hear.) I ask how it happens at this time of day, in this month of November, that her Majesty's ministers are still waiting for information whether or not there really is want in Ireland, and whether the great mass of the people in that country are, or are not, in the state described? (Cheers and hear, hear.) I have been told again and again, I have been told so in this very town, and that recently, that there is food enough in the country—that there is no want of provisions! There is no likelihood of there being a want of food, unquestionably, among her Majesty's ministers (hear, hear)—there will be no want of food for most persons on this platform; I hope there will be no want for any one of us; but there will be a want of food for those of whom I have spoken. (Hear, hear.) Can that people, who have been admitted to be living on potatoes, because they cannot get anything better—can that people be placed in a position to purchase a better and dearer description of food when their means are proved to have been reduced to even a lower standard than before? The condition of the labourers of Ireland is worse than the condition of the labourers in any other country in the world. Lord Devon says, that they are lower than any other class in the world. We come here in great numbers; we are all anxious to relieve our fellow-creatures: desirous that iniquitous laws should be repealed, and that good laws should be made in their stead; and what we do so sincerely; but as for the value of all this, I will tell you the remark that I heard made by a late minister in answer to a deputation waiting on him to urge Free Trade measures, pointing out the distress which a neglect of Free Trade measures caused, and the inevitable arrival of a crisis, such as that in which we now ask—he said, after a while, "We don't deny the truth of what you say; we think Free Trade would be good; but, after all, gentlemen, after the long and fine speeches you have made, what do they come to? whom do you send to Parliament to assist us in passing these measures?" (Cheers and hear.) Now, it is all nonsense for us to come here, making fine speeches and fine declarations, and in cheering good sentiments—if we do not put our shoulders to the wheel, and have recourse to the only means by which we can make and carry out laws, which we all allow to be necessary. (Hear, hear.) I have only to say, in conclusion, that when you go home you must reflect on this, and on the advisableness of using those votes to more advantage than heretofore. (Much cheering.)

Mr. CROOKE then read the memorial.

The CHAIRMAN: I beg now to introduce the son of that distinguished philanthropist, Sir Samuel Romilly. (Cheers.) Mr. HENRY ROMILLY rose and said—After the admirable speech which you have heard from my friend Mr. Sheil, it is not my intention to trouble you at any length. I shall content myself, therefore, with seconding the resolution. I can only hope that the example set by you this evening will be followed by the people of all the great towns throughout England, for I am quite satisfied of this—that the ministers of the Crown will apply no remedy to the calamity with which we are threatened unless they are goaded to do it by a pressure from without. (Hear, hear, hear.) I trust that meetings will take place throughout the country, and that the tenour of them will be the same throughout. In that way alone, I am satisfied, Sir R. Peel may possibly take the steps which he ought to have taken two months ago, and open the ports to the admission of foreign corn. (Cheers.) It is perfectly clear that remedies have been talked of. This remedy has been suggested, and that remedy has been suggested; but it is perfectly clear to any man who has two grains of common sense, that the first remedy to be applied to a starving people is, to allow them to import corn and every description of food, from those neighbours who are willing and able to supply them. (Great cheering.)

The memorial was then agreed to. After which,

The CHAIRMAN congratulated the meeting on the unanimity which prevailed amongst them on this most important subject.

Mr. RATHBONE said that before they separated they would be addressed by Mr. Yates, a gentleman who had laid down 50,000*l.* for the purpose of forming parks for the recreation of the inhabitants of Liverpool.

R. V. YATES, Esq., who was loudly cheered, then said that they ought not to separate on that occasion without returning their warmest thanks to their able and respected friend who had presided over their meeting. (Hear, hear.) His excellent good sense and mercantile sagacity did not suffer him to look idly on in this critical state of affairs, and he looked forward to coming events, led on by his patriotism to endeavour to avert the evils which threatened Ireland, the country of which he was proud to be a native. (Cheers.) He (Mr. Yates) on his own part thanked him sincerely for coming forward as their leader; and he was sure the meeting would agree with the motion which he was about to propose, namely, "That their grateful thanks were due to Mr. Brown for coming forward to preside at their meeting." (Loud cheers.)

The motion was seconded by Mr. RAWDON, who put the question, and it was carried by acclamation.

Mr. BROWN returned thanks for the compliment which had been paid to him by his fellow-citizens, whose approbation of his conduct he so highly valued, and he begged to assure them that so long as the contest to procure for the people a better and more abundant supply of food was maintained they should never find him at his post.

The meeting then separated, after having given three cheers for Messrs. Cobden and Bright and the success of the principles of Free Trade.

MANCHESTER.

MEETING OF THE WORKING CLASSES.—A public meeting of the working-classes was held on Tuesday evening, in the Town Hall (the use of which was granted them by the mayor), for the purposes set forth in the following copy of the placards and advertisements convening the meeting:—

"FOOD OR FAMINE.—A public meeting of the working-classes will be held in the Town Hall, King-street, on Tuesday evening next, December 2, 1845, for the purpose of memorialising her Majesty's Government on the alarming condition of the country, and the absolute necessity of immediately opening the ports, to prevent the dreadful effects which scarcity of provisions will entail upon all classes of the community. The meeting will be addressed by Messrs. Abel Heywood, John Watts, F. Warren, J. Teer, E. Curran, and others. Chair to be taken at seven o'clock precisely."

Mr. Abel Heywood presided. Near him on the platform we observed Dr. John Watts, Messrs. Frederick Warren, John Teer, Edward Curran, Burton, Falvey, Wm. Shuttleworth, &c.

Mr. ABEL HEYWOOD, on taking the chair, said the meeting was for the purpose of giving the working-classes an opportunity to express their opinions—an opportunity, if they thought proper, to address Sir Robert Peel upon the question as stated in the advertisement—the question of "food or famine." It was a matter, therefore, to the working-classes the most important, because should a famine or a scarcity of provisions take place in this country the working-classes would be the first to feel it (hear, hear); and it was, in his opinion, a working-class question entirely. (Hear.) A question in which their dearest and best rights were involved—a question on which their future happiness and the happiness of their wives and families was dependent, and, therefore, it was a question entirely belonging to the working classes as a body. (Hear, hear.) Six weeks ago the four-pound loaf was 5*d.*; to-day the four-pound loaf was 8*d.* (Hear, hear.) This would make in a working man's family, at the end of the week, a material difference, even in the cost of bread. But bread was not the only article the price of which had been advanced within the last week or two. There was another article which the working classes were in the habit of consuming in large quantities, and that was the potato; a larger advance had taken place in this article than in wheat. The average price of potatoes per score at this time last year was from 5*d.* to 6*d.*; last Saturday the best sorts were selling in the market at 1*s.*, making a difference against the working classes of 6*d.* in the score pounds. (Hear, hear.) Now, if we estimated the number of working-class families in Manchester at 40,000, and each family as being composed of five individuals, the loss to each of those families would be from 2*s.* to 2*s.* 3*d.* per week. If, then, they had to expend this much more, in order to obtain the comforts and necessities of life, they must give up purchasing some other articles, and those would generally be manufactures. The coats which the working classes had worn for a long period they would continue to wear a little longer, and the consequence of this would be that we should have a smaller consumption of manufactured goods. Of course, then, less would have to be made, and consequently the people would have to be employed for a shorter time; thus the consequences of the advance in prices would be a reduction of wages. It would be absolutely impossible for the manufacturers of this town and neighbourhood to keep their mills going, except by reducing the hours of labour. Yesterday he (Mr. Heywood) called upon a manufacturer in Ancoats-street, who assured him that during the last six weeks they had only sold one week's production. Now, if that were generally the case in Manchester and this neighbourhood, the manufacturers would be compelled to throw their hands upon short time. What the consequence might be he should be sorry to describe in all their distress and horror. It was necessary they should address the Government in terms not to be mistaken—(cheers)—and, therefore, in the application they asked for nothing less than the free opening of our ports, to give the people a sufficient supply of food. (Cheers.)

Dr. JOHN WATTS, in moving the first resolution, said the abolition of all restrictions on commerce would tend ultimately, and almost immediately, to benefit those who cry out the loudest against them. (Cheers.) In a few years the question will be, "Why should this man eat while I have no food? I am willing to work, and he does not work." It was said, "If a man will not work, neither shall he eat." (Hear, hear.) Our question, however, was one of to-day; whether we are to live or to starve. There was not food enough in the country to supply the wants of the people till food could be grown again. A fortnight ago he saw a "soothing syrup" speech at an agricultural meeting, alleging that there was food enough in the country. But either there was not food enough in the country, or there had been a precious deal of corn jollying to make it sell at its present price. If there was not corn enough in the country, then the ports should be opened to bring it in, to make the price of food on an equality with the working men's wages. His wages were only equal to 5*d.* for a 4*lb.* loaf, and now he was called upon to give 8*d.* for the 4*lb.* loaf. (Hear.) A man was called on to give 9*s.* per load for potatoes. (Voices: "10*s.*" "12*s.*") He called on Conservatives to join the people's cry of "open the ports," for those who wished to conserve the peace of the country must know and feel that that could not be done in the midst of food riots. (Cheers.) To the Whigs and bit-by-bit Reformers he would say with their leader, Lord John Russell, "The time is now come; the people must be fed." (Cheers.) The time had come when Corn Law repeal should take place, and the Whigs would be likely to be bound by Lord John Russell in this matter, for he was a keen statesman; he knew when to catch the proper nick of time, and he had hit upon a very good time for the present movement. Some people designated it as a humbug, and thought it would not do good, but he conceived it to be the duty of every one to work with his whole energy in the cause—if he would not do it for a starving, or likely to be starving, people—yet to do so for the purpose of removing a stumbling block in the way of obtaining other measures. (Great cheering.) He concluded by proposing the following resolution:—

"That in the opinion of this meeting the great deficiency in the quantity and quality of the working man's staple food (potatoes and wheat) in the late harvest, will, unless prompt measures be taken by her Majesty's Government, bring utter ruin upon thousands of the inhabitants of Great Britain and Ireland, inasmuch as the increased and still increasing prices of provisions, instead of producing a corresponding rise in wages, is destroying trade, throwing workmen out of employment, and reducing the earnings of the employed."

Mr. GEO. JOHNSON seconded the motion, which passed unanimously, and with acclamation.

Mr. JOHN TEER came forward to move the second resolution, as follows:—

"That, as the best means to avert the dreadful calamity of famine, a memorial be presented to Sir Robert Peel, earnestly requesting her Majesty's Government to lose no time in removing all restrictions on the importation of food and provisions of all kinds."

(Great cheering.) They were called together to proclaim to the nations that the ports should be open, whoever might oppose it—(cheers)—and their decision that night, with those of other bodies in this and other towns, would make an impression on the mind of Sir Robert Peel which he trusted would be irresistible. (Hear.) The wealthy might endure through a temporary famine; but what had the workman treasured up against such a calamity? Public charity would be powerless as a child. If they refused food to the people, there was an end to all good government, and the people would be justified in taking the reins into their own hands. (Immense cheering.) It was said that the repeal of the Corn Laws would lower wages; but it had not been so in that country of cheap food, the United States. (Hear, hear.) If Government did not ere long repeal those laws, depend upon it the people would repeal them for them. (Cheers.) He did not suppose that opening the ports would do all that was wanted; but he would seek every object by constitutional, peaceable, and lawful means. (Cheers.) He wished to see the working people neither compelled to go into the workhouse, nor to submit to starvation. (Cheers.) He did not blame the government so much as the people themselves. If they expressed an enlightened public opinion emphatically, no Government could withstand it. (Cheers.) He trusted another meeting upon this subject would not be necessary, but that we should soon have the glorious intelligence that the Cabinet Council had ordered that the ports should be opened, and that Englishmen, who worked so hard, were going to be fed. (Great cheering.) He concluded by moving the resolution.

Mr. MICHAEL CONNAGHTON, on behalf of the body of operatives, with whom he was connected, as the representative of the coarse spinners and self-acting winders of Manchester, would second the motion. That body was determined never to relax in their exertions to prevent the recurrence of such a calamity as that of 1841—42.

Mr. FREDERICK WARREN moved the memorial mentioned in the preceding resolution. He said, if ever there was a time in the history of this great country when it beheld the inhabitants to be firm, cautious, wise, and determined, he believed that that time was the present. (Hear, hear.) With a teeming population and a scarcity of food for them; with an absolute dependence upon our own intercourse with other parts of the world, it becomes us to act like firm, wise, and determined men, in making the rulers of our destinies perfectly understand what we want, and that what we want we ought to have, and that what we ought to have we will have. (Applause.) He was glad to see the temper and spirit of the meeting. He thought that temper and spirit would awaken those who had hitherto slumbered, in consequence of the people's differences, to the great fact that the people of England were beginning to arouse themselves to a full sense of their own wants and rights, and what they ought to have. It had been suggested if Sir Robert Peel refused to do an act of common justice in accordance with the prayer of the memorial, that some attempt should be made to induce the members of the House of Commons to vote for the stoppage of the supplies. But he trusted that such an arrangement would be unnecessary; that such a spirit would be shown from one end of the land to the other by the people who have felt the operation of these laws, as should make Sir Robert Peel see that he has only two courses open—the destruction of that aristocracy who have so long kept their iron grasp upon the people, or that justice shall be rendered to the millions who have suffered in consequence of their mal-administration. It had been a favourite saying, that there was a point beyond which human endurance ought not to go; and, if those who were most interested in this great question took it up throughout the country as they did here to-night—if the working-classes would bestir themselves—they would let the Premier and all the rest of them understand that there was a point of suffering beyond which human endurance would not go. (Applause.) He had been shelterless and homeless, but he could have borne all this; but he could not bear the drying up and parching of his very veins, caused by hunger. This he had felt; and doubtless if he had had the power, he should have committed some depredation that would have consigned him to some gaol. (Hear.) Others in the meeting could say the same, and let not these things be kept back. Let them say, "We are all willing to work for bread—to toil almost incessantly for the comforts we have a right to enjoy; but we will not stand by and see our children starve." (Great applause.) We want Government to know that we feel we are approaching our state in 1841-42; and had we common justice, we should not experience this state of things; that we remember the outbreaks of that period, and the feeling that then existed in the minds of the working people against the upper classes; that we had a large addition of population, hundreds of thousands, since then; and that we were determined, without bloodshed—for we understood our business better than that now—to obtain what we ought to possess. (Applause.) We wish the Government to understand, that if the food of the people begins to spoil, and the prices of provisions continue to rise, with the consequent reduction of wages, loss of trade, and all the miseries connected with it, we saw no prospect of the people being milder, but rather more clamorous, or of their desisting to do things in time to come that had been done in time past, and that they may be goaded to such desperation as would make them sweep away the existing state of things, and take into their own hands the reins of Government, seeing that those who now hold them, know not, or care not, how to hold them justly.

Mr. JAMES GEORGE CLARKE said, that after the speeches of Mr. Warren and Dr. Watts, he would only say, that having stood aloof from the Corn Law party up to this moment, he was induced to come forward from having seen the names of men of the middle-classes connected with it, and his wife also wished him to come and tell the effects of high-priced food upon their own family. Thousands were placed in the same miserable condition. He received about 15s. a-week twelve months ago, upon which nine people had to live. Unable to pay the taxes of the house he lived in, he was summoned before the magistrates, and they told him he must go into a smaller house. He was compelled to do so, and, with that large family, the house was indecently crowded. With what he had to lay out for provisions and fire, &c., he had nothing to lay out in clothes, and notwithstanding industry and teetotalism he could not keep the children comfortable. On Saturday night, a short time ago, he found that his children's clothes were pledged, and had to send his own to the pawnbroker's to relieve them, in order that the children might be able to go to the Sunday school. (Hear, hear.) It was very unpleasant to know that, not only was he himself enslaved, but that he should be actually breeding a race of slaves; but there was a rising spirit in the youth of the country which would remove all the obnoxious and unjust restrictions. Another class of people opposed Sir R. Peel's opening of the ports, because it would interfere with their daughters' dowries; but if our children were to be denied education, and to be physically debilitated on that account, then banish the dowries and ladies too, for we would not give dowries out of the sweat and groans of the people. (Hear, and cheers.) He concluded by seconding the resolution.

The proceedings then terminated at ten o'clock.—Abridged from the Manchester Guardian of Wednesday

WARRINGTON.

A numerous meeting of the inhabitants of this borough was held in the large Concert-room of the Red Lion Hotel, Bridge-street, on Tuesday evening, for the purpose of taking into consideration the propriety of memorialising her Majesty's Government to open the ports for the free admission of grain.

The chair was occupied by Mr. William Alliard. Among the gentlemen on the platform were—J. Allen, Esq., N. Cook, Esq., J. G. McMinnies, Esq., J. Rylands, Esq., P. Cooke, Esq., G. Crossfield, Esq., J. Guest, Esq., R. Ainsworth, Esq., B. Mulenau, Esq., E. West, Esq., T. Squire, Esq., Wm. Gill, Esq., G. Artingstall, Esq., and many of the principal ratepayers and manufacturers of the town.

The CHAIRMAN, in opening the business of the meeting, said they had not met there as men of any party, but to promote the cause of Free Trade. He urged the meeting to preserve order, and fairly to hear all parties.

Mr. J. ALLEN moved the first resolution, which referred to the failure of the crops as a state of things demanding the immediate attention of her Majesty's Government. He would state that if ever there was a time and good reason why the Government should interfere on behalf of the people, both presented themselves at that moment. In seven months the price of provisions had risen 50 per cent. What would have cost a family 10s. a week then would cost them 15s. now; and he put it on good authority that the difference in the price of food, within the same period in England, was at least 400,000*l.* a week, or 20,000,000*l.* a year. After a few more observations, he concluded by proposing the resolution.

Mr. PETER RYLANDS seconded the resolution in a speech of some length, and contended that high prices in provisions were always accompanied by low wages and want of employment.

The meeting was subsequently addressed by Mr. E. Robinson, Mr. N. Cook, Mr. J. McMinnies, Mr. John Rylands, and one or two others.

The resolutions were all passed unanimously, and thanks having been voted to the chairman, the meeting separated about half-past 10 o'clock.

BURY.

On Thursday, the 27th ult., a very numerous meeting (in compliance with a requisition of 72 of the most influential ratepayers to the head constables) was held in the Sessions Room, near the New Market Place, Bury, to take into consideration the propriety of memorialising Her Majesty's Government in favour of the opening of the ports for the free admission of grain and all other kinds of provisions, to avert the calamities likely to arise from the scarcity of food, owing to the failure of the potato crop, and the defective quality of the wheat harvest. John Walker was unanimously appointed chairman, and the meeting was addressed by Edmund Grundy, Esq., of The Wild, John Grundy, Esq., magistrate, Rev. J. Nugent, Independent Minister, and Messrs. Matthew Fletcher, surgeon, John Parkinson, Lawrence Openshaw, &c. Resolutions in favour of the object for which the meeting was called were unanimously passed. A vote of thanks was given to the chairman, and the meeting separated about a quarter-past ten o'clock.

LEES.

A numerous and respectable public meeting, called by the principal inhabitants, was held on Wednesday evening, in a large and commodious school-room, at the populous village of Lees, near Oldham. Peter Seville, Esq., was called to the chair. Several resolutions, strongly condemnatory of the detestable Corn Laws were passed, and urging their immediate repeal, together with a memorial to Her Majesty's Government, calling on them to open the ports for the free admission of grain and other eatables, and that immediately. The speaking was of a soul-stirring character. The meeting was addressed by Messrs. W. Nicholson, James Greaves, John Andrew, William Halliwell, Joseph Shaw, Henry Atherton, &c.

NEWTON AND FALLSWORTH.

A public meeting of the inhabitants of Newton and Fallsworth, summoned by placard, was held in the Old School Room, Pool Lane, Fallsworth, on Wednesday evening, Henry Wamsley, Esq., of Fallsworth, in the chair. The following gentlemen were present, and took part in the proceedings: Messrs. Joseph Barratt, Jonathan and Andrew Kershaw, Thomas Chadderton, John Ashworth, Mellor, William Latham, T. Tetlow, R. Owen, W. Burton. Before the commencement of the business the room was completely filled. Resolutions were unanimously passed deploring the deficiency of the harvest and failure of the potato crop, and to avert the calamitous recurrence of 1838 to 1842, calling upon her Majesty's ministers to suspend the operation of the corn bill, and to take early measures for the abolition of all laws restricting the free importation of food. A memorial founded on the foregoing resolutions was agreed to and signed by the chairman on behalf of the meeting, and Mark Philips, Esq., and Thomas Milner Gibson, Esq., members for Manchester, were requested to present it to the Right Hon. Sir Robert Peel, Bart., first Lord of the Treasury.

KENDAL.

In compliance with a requisition, numerous and influentially signed by the inhabitants of Kendal, a public meeting was held on Wednesday night, convened by the mayor, in the Odd Fellows' Hall, for the purpose of taking into consideration the propriety of memorialising her Majesty in favour of opening the ports for the admission of grain and all other kinds of provisions, in order to avert the calamities which may arise from the scarcity likely to be caused by the failure of the potato crop. The room was crowded to excess in every part.

The MAYOR opened the proceedings by reading the requisition.

Alderman JOHN WHITWELL, on rising, was received with loud applause. He read the resolution as follows: "That the present alarming state of the potato crop in Great Britain and Ireland, and the prospect of scarcity and dearth of provisions, demand the prompt and efficient interference of her Majesty's ministers to prevent or mitigate the sufferings of the people."

The resolution, as were all the others, was carried unanimously.

A petition was forwarded for presentation to her Majesty, through the Right Hon. Sir James Graham, praying for an order for the free admission of all kinds of provisions into the ports of Great Britain and Ireland.

The proceedings were carried to the end with great spirit, and the several resolutions were supported by eloquent speeches.

LEEDS.

A large meeting of the inhabitants of Leeds was held in the court house on Wednesday, for the purpose of memorialising the Government to assemble Parliament together to consider the threatened destitution of the country, and to open the ports immediately, in order to meet the present necessities of the United Kingdom. The meeting had been called on a requisition presented to J. D. Luccock, Esq., the mayor, numerous signed by merchants, tradesmen, and operatives. The commodious court house was densely filled by all classes of the community. Nearly two thousand persons were present, all unanimous on the expediency of the measures to be considered, with the exception of a handful of Chartists, who, in the earlier part of the proceedings, offered a somewhat clamorous, but comparatively insignificant opposition. The mayor took the chair. The meeting was addressed by his worship, by J. G. Marshall, Esq., Hume Wansfield, Esq., the Rev. John Ely, Mr. Brooks, Mr. E. Baines, &c., at considerable length, and in eloquent and able speeches. All the resolutions were carried almost unanimously. The meeting lasted nearly five hours, and evinced the greatest interest in the humane and noble cause, to which the people of Leeds, in common with the bulk of the community, lend their earnest and hearty support. We regret that the pressure of other matters prevents us extending our report of this important meeting.

NOTTINGHAM.

A public meeting of the inhabitants of Nottingham took place on Monday, at eleven o'clock, in the Exchange Rooms, to memorialise the Government, in the present alarming state of affairs, to open the ports.

The room was crowded, and on the platform we observed Thomas Herbert, Esq., mayor, Rev. W. Mills, Rev. S. Jones, Rev. William Linwood, Rev. Joseph Gilbert, Rev. James Edwards, Rev. B. Carpenter, and Messrs. G. Gill, Felkin, Bean, Hill, Wilson, Rideout, Cripps, Cooper, Roberts, jun., J. Bradley, T. Knight, W. Enfield, Wm. Hollins (Pleasley Works), Ellis (Mansfield), Allen, Roper, Whitby, &c.

The MAYOR (Thomas Herbert, Esq.), on the motion of Mr. Bean, seconded by Mr. Felkin, was unanimously called to the chair, and expressed his hearty concurrence with the object for which the meeting had been convened. (Applause.) It was not only in reference to the present exigency arising from the failure of the potato crop, and a deficiency in the harvest that he wished the ports to be opened, but upon a general principle, and he hoped they would be opened, never to be closed again. (Applause.)

Mr. WHITBY moved the first resolution:—"That the deficiency of the harvest and the serious injury to the potato crops, have deservedly produced the utmost apprehension amongst all classes of the community, and that our circumstances require the instant free admission of corn and other articles of food into the ports of the United Kingdom."

With respect to the deficiency of the harvest it was allowed, even by the friends of monopoly, that the crop on the whole was not an average one. (Hear, hear.) Now an average crop was not sufficient for the kingdom. They must have, therefore, something more than an average crop to depend on. Now all he had to say was this, that last year bread was pretty reasonable, and all over England, with the single exception of Nottingham, which he regretted to say had not participated in the general amelioration, wages had risen. In conclusion, he remarked that he had great hopes of the success of their memorial. Their amiable Queen had been making her progresses up and down the country, and had seen the loyalty and devotion of the people, and when she heard of their grievances—if, indeed, they let her see the petition (a laugh), she would disregard the "Iron Duke," and the iron-hearted men, and say, "Let my people be fed." (Cheers.)

Mr. Alderman KNIGHT seconded the motion. He highly approved of the sentiments contained in the resolution, but he hoped the distress would not prove so great as had been anticipated. He had been in the country for the last several days, and he had made inquiries as to the extent of the potato disease, and he found in all places the crops were injured to a certain extent, and in many places parties have opened their stores, and had found their pits to contain only one mass of vegetable corruption, unfit food for either man or beast. (Hear, hear, hear.) With the second part of the resolution he also fully agreed, and had long been of opinion that to restrict human food and the necessities of life from entering into the country, was alike contrary to the laws of God and impolitic. (Hear.)

Mr. CRIPPS, merchant, in support of the motion, said it struck him that the question which brought them together lay in a small compass. The people of this great country have not got enough to eat, and yet the world produces enough. God in his kind providence has so ordered it, that if in one part of the world the harvest is deficient, compensation is made by superabundance in another part. The world produces from year to year a sufficient supply for man and beast, and yet the men of England have not enough to eat. Why is this? The resolution spoke about a deficient harvest, and about disease in the potato crop; but it is not because there is a deficient harvest, it is not because there is a disease in the potato crop, that an alarm is felt as to whether the people shall live or die; but it is because they had unwise, wicked, and cruel laws that stand in the way—that bar the people from having access to the superabundant food with which God has blessed the world. (Applause.) Whilst they were lamenting the deficiency of the supply of food arising from a bad harvest, he had been travelling, and if they had seen the abundance in that country where he had been, they would not have any occasion for alarm, if our laws did not stand in the way of their receiving it. He had been in the western parts of the United States of America, the Massachusetts, Ohio, Orleans, and Missouri. He went into no cottages where he found a superabundance of British manufactures for use, but he saw the very men who had a superabundance of bread corn, and wheat, and pork, what we want; these very men and their families are living destitute of the comforts which we manufacture in England. These people want crockery goods, clothing, bedding, stockings, and lace for their daughters. (Hear, hear.) Why is it that there is such a state of things that the people there want what we make, and they have what we require, and yet neither party can be supplied? Shall any man, or set of men, continue to say we shall not exchange? (Applause.) How long shall the happiness, the interests, and the welfare of this great country be subject to miserable party prejudice? If an argument was needed against the Corn Laws, he could tell them what influence it has directly and indirectly upon the people here and in other countries. He left England on the 9th of August last; the rain was pouring down in torrents, and great apprehensions were felt that the harvest would be a miserable failure. Immediately after his arrival in the United States, the influence this intelligence had upon the markets was to raise the price of wheat and flour, and the farmers thrashed all they could, expecting high prices would be obtained for their produce. In a fortnight afterwards another steam-boat arrived. I was then on the borders of Lake Erie, and the news reached them that there had been 10 days of fine weather in England, and there was a prospect that the harvest would be tolerably good. The farmers who had not brought their corn to market ceased their thrashings, prices were knocked down, and curses loud and deep were uttered against the sliding-scale. (Hear, hear, and applause.) Parties who had unfortunately made purchases, wore long faces, and the farmers, in a melancholy tone, cried out, "We shall have no market in England this year for our superabundant produce." Two or three weeks elapsed, and another steamer arrived, and brought the news that a great portion of the crops on the hills of Derbyshire and other parts of the country, could not be gathered, and the result was, that speculation was again at work, and as it was certain corn would be wanted, an advantage was taken to raise the price from 30 to 50 per cent., and as the canals and rivers were likely to be frozen, the freight was advanced 200 per cent.; so that a barrel of flour which should cost 2s., a demand of 6s. was made for conveying it here. (Hear, hear.) These were some effects of the sliding-scale. How long is the system to be perpetuated which compelled them to go to the highest market, and to pay the highest price for the necessities of life, which they might have at a low rate in exchange for manufactures? Away with such a system. (Applause.) They had the opportunity now; the people had only to speak in decided language, and no man, or set of men, could possibly withstand them. (Applause.) Speak temperately, but be firm, decided, and united, and those laws, which have long been condemned by the whole world, and are now ten thousand times more than ever condemned, will be for ever removed from the statute book. (Loud applause.)

Mr. THOMAS KERRY, a mechanic, moved the following amendment, which he was quite willing to have embodied in the resolution, if the other gentlemen chose.

"That we, the people of Nottingham, in public meeting assembled, do earnestly request that your Majesty's Government will be pleased to take into your serious consideration the practicability of making a law, to place the working classes on the waste and commonable lands, as a means of producing more food, and to find natural employment for the unwilling made idlers." (Cries of "It won't do, Tom—down, down.")

A Voice: I second it.

The Rev. W. LINWOOD opposed the amendment.

Mr. W. FELKIN, merchant, supported the amendment, for which eight hands were held up. On the original motion being put, it was carried with loud applause and clapping of hands.

Mr. THOMAS ROPER (a working man) felt proud in coming forward to move that an address be presented to our gracious and beloved Queen. In his speech he referred to his recollections concerning the state of trade before the Corn Laws were enacted; the remonstrances that were made, and in which he took part at the time they were under consideration; and the circumstances of the Corn Laws being passed at the mouth of the cannon. At that time the President of America (Jefferson) wished that corn and provisions should be sent to this country, and in Congress it was said, if the Corn Laws were passed the people of America would manufacture for themselves. They have become manufacturers, and our rivals. He would conclude by moving the address.

The Rev. J. EDWARDS, seconded the resolution. He sincerely rejoiced that similar meetings were being held throughout the length and breadth of the land. He thought that if anything could move the vis inertia, the stand-still, do-nothing policy of the Government, it was the holding of public meetings of their countrymen. (Hear, hear.) It was a fact the mind shuddered at the contemplation of, that during the last commercial distress persons died from famine. (Hear.) He was convinced of it. (Hear, hear.) This would in all probability occur again (hear, hear); and then he recommended that on the first case of death, a coroner's inquest should be holden, and the jury, if they were honest men and did their duty, would return a verdict of manslaughter against the Ministers whose pertinacity had occasioned all this suffering. (Loud cheers.)

The memorial was unanimously adopted; and the meeting soon afterwards broke up, after returning thanks to the chairman.

GATESHEAD.

In compliance with a requisition signed by a large number of the inhabitants of Gateshead, the Mayor appointed a public meeting to be held in the Town-hall at twelve o'clock on Monday last.

The meeting assembled at that hour, but the feeling being unanimous in favour of an adjournment to the evening, in order to allow the working classes an opportunity of recording their opinions, a motion to that effect was proposed and carried without discussion. The meeting accordingly took place in the evening, and Mr. John Robson moved that G. Crawshaw, Esq., take the chair, which was at once agreed to.

Mr. CRAWSHAW said that though he had taken no part in convening the meeting, he highly approved of its object. He must add, however, that the course which the requisitionists had adopted was not precisely that which he should have proposed. As a member of the Anti-Corn-Law League, he was accustomed mainly to rely on that body to obtain the repeal of the Corn Law; and, after all, he feared that the only effect of a memorial addressed to Sir Robert Peel would be to draw from the right hon. baronet a polite acknowledgment of its receipt. Before the regular business of the meeting was proceeded with, he wished to address a few words to them upon the very peculiar and critical position of the Corn Law question at the present moment. He could not help alluding, in the first place, to the recent accession of strength which the Free Trade party had received from the unqualified adhesion of Lord John Russell and Lord Morpeth. (Cheers.) It was hardly possible to overrate the value of those accessions. From the beginning, the Anti-Corn-Law League had always honestly said, "We go for the total and immediate repeal of the Corn Law, and will accept no compromise." On the other hand, the party having Lord J. Russell as their recognised leader, had a strong partiality for a fixed duty. This division of the Liberal party was a source of constant weakness and annoyance. Now, however, it had been removed by Lord J. Russell's manly declaration in favour of Free Trade. (Applause.) The Liberals of Gateshead had had sufficient evidence of the evils of disunion, but he trusted it would be known no longer, as he thought they might assume that not only the noble lord but all his party—all the members accustomed to vote with him in the House of Commons—would equally support him now that he had declared in favour of a total and immediate repeal of the Corn Law. He therefore pressed upon them the necessity of improving the present moment. Never was there so favourable a time. Let bygones be bygones. The Leaguers and the Whigs had quarrelled sufficiently. They were now united in principle. This general consolidation of the party might well be considered a triumph by the League, which had never for an instant forgotten the comprehensive demand with which it set out. (Cheers.) Another motive to immediate and decided action was the danger which was to be apprehended from the continuance of the Corn Law. Already the manufacturing districts of Lancashire felt a degree of depression; and when at Sheffield, the other day, Mr. Cobden told the iron manufacturers that the depression now felt in the cotton and woollen districts would reach them in six months. Mr. Cobden was a man of intelligence, and he told the people that if they did not feel distress now they would do so at the end of six months. He (Mr. Crawshaw) had no doubt it would be the same in Gateshead. Although wages were high, and they did not feel distress, yet if the evil was not removed every occupation must be reduced to the state of distress in which they were some years ago. He had received a circular from the League, asking him to qualify as a county voter. He had already qualified for North Durham, South Northumberland, the West Riding of Yorkshire, and Westmoreland; and if it was possible he would get more votes, even half a dozen, or perhaps a still greater number. (Loud cheers.) This much was certain, that if the inhabitants of large towns would combine in securing qualifications, in a few years they would make the counties dependant on the towns, and not the towns on the counties. Mr. Daniel Liddell held meetings every week, and he was there for the purpose of extending the influence of the League, and procuring qualifications for all who required them. He would advise every man who had money to spare to get a qualification, and so enable himself to fight the battle of Free Trade at the next election. (Cheers.) Let them work the registry, and they would have an Anti-Corn-Law administration at the next election. (Cheers.) Mr. C. concluding by stating that the adhesion of the noblemen mentioned was important in another light in addition to the union it produced. A rich old gentleman told him that the theory of the Anti-Corn-Law repealers might be very fine, but the circumstances were peculiar and complicated, but when he saw the adhesion of Lord John Russell and Lord Morpeth, quiet men and not violent, he said he was ready to join the movement himself. That was a very common feeling, and a great number of persons advanced in years when they saw such men join the movement, would then see that what the League wanted was only simple justice. (Great cheering.)

Mr. JOHN ROBSON, without comment, proposed the first resolution:

"That the partial failure of the corn harvest, the prevalence of disease or rot in the potato crop, and the laws for regulating the importation of corn, are threatening the people of these islands with scarcity and famine; and that the ports ought to be thrown open forthwith, and Parliament convened for the repeal of the laws which restrict the importation of corn."

Ald. REVELEY seconded the motion, stating that it needed no argument from him or any other gentleman in the room to convince every person of the necessity of a repeal of the Corn Law. The question came home to every man's fire-side, and 99 out of every 100 were so disgusted with it remaining on the statute-book, that they refused to attend a meeting. They would sooner take up arms than attend a meeting to beg and pray for its repeal.

The resolution was carried unanimously.

Mr. FAWCETT proposed the adoption of a memorial soliciting the opening of the ports, which was seconded by Mr. J. F. BRETT, and carried unanimously.

On the motion of Mr. FAWCETT, seconded by Alderman REVELEY, it was agreed that the memorial be signed by the Chairman on behalf of the meeting.

After a few observations from Messrs. Blagburn and Larkin, thanks were voted to the Chairman, and the meeting separated.

NORWICH.

On Wednesday evening a meeting of the citizens of Norwich, convened the mayor, was held in Saint Andrew's Hall for the purpose of taking into consideration the most effectual means of averting the threatened famine, and to memorialise Sir Robert Peel to advise her Majesty to open the ports and allow the importation of corn free of duty. Shortly before one o'clock, the chair was taken by John Betts, Esq., the mayor, at which time the spacious hall, capable of containing 3000 persons, was filled, principally by the working-classes.

The CHAIRMAN opened the business of the meeting by stating, that in consequence of the failure of the potato crop and the partial failure of the harvest, a requisition had been presented to him, and he had felt it his duty to call the present meeting.

Mr. TOLLER moved the first resolution, and after reading a letter from Sir William Foster, regretting his absence on account of indisposition, and expressing the pleasure he would have derived from moving the first resolution, said, he had hoped that her Majesty's Ministers would have informed themselves before now of the present state of the country. If they were ignorant of the condition of the large bulk of the people, they were unfitted to hold the reins of the Government, and in justice to the country, if they would not remedy the evil, they ought to allow men to take office who would. (Hear, hear.) It was a matter of deep regret that something had not been done before now to alleviate the coming evil. (Hear, hear.) It was the duty of the Minister not to allow corn, which was so much wanted in this country, to be carried out of the warehouses by foreign powers. (Hear, hear.) Mr. Toller concluded by moving the following resolution: "That this meeting consider that, owing to the present scarcity of food, and believing that there is a great deficiency in the harvest and a large failure of the potato crop, urge upon her Majesty's Ministers the adoption of the most prompt and vigorous measure for the importation of provisions from abroad;" which was seconded by the Rev. Mr. Brock in an eloquent speech, and carried unanimously.

T. O. SPRINGFIELD, Esq., in a brief address, moved the second resolution, to the effect "that the meeting wished to impress upon her Majesty's ministers, who were vested with the power and the solemn responsibility of preventing any national calamity, to open the ports of the three kingdoms without delay, for the importation of all articles of food, and thereby prevent an increase of pauperism, pestilence, and crime." (Hear, hear.)

The Rev. T. CLOWSE, a minister of the Established Church, seconded the resolution, which was carried unanimously.

Mr. R. CHAMBERLAIN moved, and Mr. PIGGOTT seconded, that a memorial, founded on the resolutions, be presented to Sir Robert Peel, praying him immediately to open the ports.

Mr. TILLET moved, and Mr. SELTZER seconded, the adoption of a petition to the House of Commons, praying for a repeal of the Corn Laws, which, as well as the memorial, was carried amid loud cheers.

Three cheers having been given to the mayor, and three for a repeal of the Corn Laws, the meeting separated.

LAMBETH.

A meeting of the inhabitants of Lambeth was held at the Vestry-hall, Church-street, on Tuesday last, to take into consideration the deficiency of the harvest and failure of the potato crop in many parts of the United Kingdom, particularly Ireland; and to come to such resolutions thereon as might be deemed expedient.

T. W. NIXON, Esq., churchwarden, took the chair, and opened the business by adverting to the present state of the country with respect to food, and the necessity for some energetic measures for the relief of the people.

Mr. SEWELL moved the first resolution:—

"That the meeting views with feelings of alarm the deficiency of the last harvest, and general failure of the potato crop in Great Britain and Ireland, and therefore deem it to be the imperative duty of her Majesty's Government to open the ports immediately for the admission of human food exempt from all duties."

C. EVANS, Esq., said he did not think the resolution went far enough. He thought, if ever men deserved censure it was her Majesty's ministers, and it was the duty of the people to petition her Majesty for their removal, in order that some more honest men might take their places. He intended to move a resolution of a stronger character, but he did not object to second the proposition then before the meeting.

Mr. FALL said it was necessary that a resolution should be adopted, calling on her Majesty to dismiss her present ministers. Why did not Sir Robert Peel do his duty? The country was suffering under the Corn Laws. Men were taking corn out of bond in this country, and carrying it to foreign ports, where it was admitted without payment of duties. He did not doubt but some of the same grain would be again imported for the use of the people at an enormous price, when the demand for food became more pressing. The government, instead of opening the ports, had sent some scientific men to Ireland, who had reported that the potatoes were diseased. Then, by way of remedy, the people were told to get a tub, and scrape and rasp the potatoes. At last they got Professor Buckland to look after the thing, and that learned person found out with great sagacity, that beetroot and turnips were good enough for the poor, instead of potatoes. If the professor had said to the government—"Be good enough to throw in a leg of mutton with the turnips," the people might have thanked him.

Mr. C. EVANS then moved—"That this meeting is of opinion that her Majesty's ministers have neglected their public duty in not opening the ports for the admission of corn; that they have thereby lost the confidence of the country, and that a memorial be presented to her Majesty, praying that she will dismiss her present advisers, and call to her councils men who are prepared to act on the economic principles admitted by all parties, and by allowing all kinds of food to be imported free of duty, promote the welfare of the country."

Mr. WILSON seconded the resolution. At the present time starvation was staring the people in the face, and Sir Robert Peel, for reasons best known to himself, refused to carry out his own proposition. He did hope her Majesty would dismiss her present ministers, and take men with more honesty of purpose.

A committee was nominated to draw up the memorial, and the meeting separated.

WESTMINSTER.

On Tuesday night a highly influential meeting of the electors of Westminster, members of the Westminster Reform Society, was held at Stannard's Hotel, Charles-street, Covent-garden, "to take into consideration what measures shall be adopted by the society under the apprehended scarcity of food." There were gentlemen present from all the parishes.

Mr. PROUT having been called to the chair, said it was within their recollection that for a number of years the society had been endeavouring, in co-operation with the country at large, to get rid of the Corn Laws. It must be manifest that they had made rapid progress, and to such an immense extent had the principle of the repeal of the Corn Laws been supported, that there must be scarcely any doubt in the mind of disinterested persons, that both in justice and equity no such law ought to be in existence. (Hear, hear.) They have, more especially for the last thirty years, been a decided incubus on the country, on its productive labour, and a detriment to its general prosperity. (Hear, hear.) During that period these laws have been the cause of a sum being taken from the people more than double the extent of the national debt. (Hear.) The prospect they had before them was appalling, for they will find in a few months that while famine will be raging in the sister kingdom, the people of this country will be brought to a state of starvation. (Hear.) He, therefore, supposed that they would feel it their duty to assist by all the means in their power to compel the Government to know their duty, by yielding to the voice of public opinion upon such a question as that which refers to the food of the people, and at once to open the ports. (Hear, hear.) He had no doubt but that by the united efforts of the country they would be able to free themselves from the effects of the obnoxious impost upon corn. (Applause.) He would leave the subject to the meeting, to decide what steps they would be disposed to take upon this important question.

Mr. AUSTIN moved the following resolution:—"That in consequence of the failure of the recent crops of corn and potatoes, a public meeting of the inhabitants of Westminster be convened, to memorialise her Majesty to direct the immediate opening of the ports for the admission of foreign corn free of duty, and to adopt such measures as the present crisis may seem to require."

Mr. DAWSON, of St. Paul's, Covent-garden, seconded the resolution, which was carried unanimously.

A committee of all the parishes was formed to carry out the object, it being left to them whether a requisition should be forwarded to the high bailiff.

Thanks were then voted to the chairman, and the meeting separated.

LEITH.

A public meeting, called by requisition, was held in Trinity House, Leith, on Monday afternoon. Provost Hutchison was called to the chair. He was supported by a great proportion of the magistrates and council—by several of the most influential inhabitants—and by the representative of the burgh, Andrew Rutherford, Esq.

The Provost stated that he had great pleasure in calling the meeting, and hoped that the expression of feeling which had been manifested so generally throughout the country would lead her Majesty's ministers to throw open the ports for the admission of foreign grain at this momentous crisis.

GEORGE BERRY, Esq., chairman of the Leith Chamber of Commerce, moved the first resolution, which was seconded by the Rev. Dr. Harper, of Leith, one of the professors of the United Secession Church, and carried unanimously.

A. RUTHERFORD, Esq., M.P., who was received with loud applause, proposed the following:—"That the existing Corn Laws are at all times productive of evil, but are peculiarly so in the present emergency of the country, by excluding the relief which could be obtained from abroad; and that the continued apathy of the Government, under present circumstances, is highly reprehensible and full of danger to the people." (Applause.) I take it that the fate of the existing Corn Laws is doomed; and I take it further to be clear that with the present Corn Law, the whole system of Corn Laws will fall. (Cheers.) The arguments for a free trade in corn are now happily triumphant; they are in themselves so clear, that all except interested parties, or parties who are still interested in the maintenance of a fixed duty, are convinced of their truth. There is some plausibility in the argument for a fixed duty—not, I think, a sound argument however—but for the sliding-scale, all our experience goes to show its inutility and disadvantage. I profess that all the consideration I have been able to give the subject has only satisfied me—and I believe satisfied all who are open to conviction—that it is absolutely and entirely untenable. (Great applause.) I am not going into a long discussion of the subject, but I will in the first place observe, that one object with us should be to induce people abroad to grow corn for our market as well as their own, not being the least afraid that any demand that we shall make with reference to the supply of our necessities, either as regards this or any other article, will make the community of Great Britain dependent on foreigners. (Cheers.) But now the sliding-scale puts an end to all foreign growth for our market, and for any market, excepting for the immediate prospect of supply. If there were no Corn Laws, foreign growers would grow to supply you according to the average extent of your demand. * * * Mr. Berry has told you very emphatically that various applications have been made to the Government from Chambers of Commerce—the parties best acquainted with the state of trade—calling on them to act in the matter. You have heard the kind of cold indifferent answers that were returned. Government seemed to rely on information of their own; but I do not admit that Government can command better information than the whole body of the people. Government may be guided by the reports of agents who may be extremely apt to carry to high quarters that kind of information which they know they are most desirous for; but are we to be told that there is no danger from scarcity, when we read the accounts in every newspaper from Ireland; and when we see what is taking place among ourselves? There is an alarm in the country—there is something approaching to a panic. This alarm, I am afraid, is too justly founded. It is impossible to deny that there is a reality in this apprehended scarcity; and yet, in these circumstances, we have Government still deliberating on the subject—having information, and yet not communicating it to the country; not even communicating the grounds on which they abstain from acting. If Government were not in a condition to act in reference to the information they had received, they ought to come forward and assure the country that there was no ground for the alarm—that the reports from the different parts of the empire were greatly exaggerated. What could be more satisfactory than this? If it would do nothing else, it would at least tend to put down the alarm, given as the statement would be on official responsibility. (Loud cheers.) But if they have not that information which enables them, as a Government, to stop the progress of the alarm, by telling the people that it is groundless—if they have not that information which might justly entitle them to abstain from acting—then let them act; or, if they will not act, and fear the responsibility of acting without Parliament, let them call your representatives together, and see what they in their wisdom and prudence may recommend. (Great applause.) My learned friend, Dr. Harper, as well as Mr. Berry, referred to the opportunity which had already been lost. Here we are now in December, and if the ports of the Baltic are not already shut, they will be shut. Supplies are also no longer to be had from various other quarters. You have lost the chance of repeated despatches to America, a country from which you might have expected the best supplies, and thus have prepared the markets of that country for sending corn to Britain. (Hear, hear.) Other countries are opening their ports. They have actually been drawing from the bonded warehouses of this country a part of that supply which the Ministry will not allow us to take; they have been carrying away corn landed on your shores, and which only required the Custom-house lock and key to be turned in order to allow it to be entered for your subsistence. (Cheers.) The ports of Holland had also been opened; and yet, with those examples before their eyes, the Government of this country persisted in retaining the Corn Laws. This is a fearful consideration in reference to the inaction and want of resolution in the Government. Unless they are prepared to say there is no ground for those fears which are harassing the country from one end to the other, Government are bound to take measures that will enable this country to turn its immense resources to the legitimate purpose: their wealth to purchase food to meet the present impending famine in the country. I venture to think that you will all accord in the sentiments I have propounded; and therefore without detaining you further, I beg leave to propose the resolutions entrusted to me. (Cheers.)

JAMES MILLER, Esq., seconded the resolution.

ROBERT PHILIP, Esq., seconded by ARCH. YOUNG, Esq., moved, "That a memorial be sent to her Majesty's Ministers, calling on them to give immediate directions for opening the ports."

The meeting, which was most unanimous, then broke up, after a vote of thanks to the chairman.

PAISLEY.

On Wednesday a meeting of the inhabitants of Paisley was held in the Old Low Church, "for the purpose of taking into consideration the present alarming state of the country, and to memorialise her Majesty's Ministers to open the ports for the free admission of food." The church was filled in every part. On the motion of Mr. Melvin, seconded by Councillor Millar, Provost Murray was unanimously called to the chair.

The CHAIRMAN said, the object for which they were met was sufficiently explained in the bills and circulars; and he hoped they were all impressed with its necessity and its importance. After reading a letter of apology for unavoidable absence from the Rev. Patrick Brewster, he called upon the mover of the first resolution, when

The Rev. Mr. FRANCE came forward amidst the plaudits of the meeting, and delivered an eloquent address. The resolution was to the effect, "That it is the opinion of the meeting, that the stagnations which from time to time take place in trade, arise from the operation of laws which prohibit the free importation of provisions into this country."

Baillie COATS seconded the resolution, and it was carried unanimously.

JOHN HENDERSON, Esq., moved the second resolution:—"That provisions had risen to such a height as to abridge the comforts of the poorer classes, and called for their immediate relief; and that to this end it was necessary that the ports should be opened." Mr. Henderson said it was unnecessary in such a meeting as this, in which almost every member of the audience was a purchaser, to inform them of the rise in the price of provisions. They all felt it, and felt it, too, seriously. He might mention the information which he got from one farmer in the neighbourhood, who had assured him that more than two-thirds of his potato crop was entirely useless; and in the present crowded state of the mills, he cannot even get them sold at 3s. 9d. per boll. He has at present 200 bolls, which are going to decay, and he is unable to do anything with them but just pack them up in straw, and preserve them in the best manner he can. Such a system of shutting out food from the inhabitants of a country was unknown to any other save this; and while they remained in this position the people ought to continue to use every lawful effort in their power to have the ports opened, and once opened to keep them open for ever, so that such a stigma on the British nation might be wiped off the statute book. (Cheers.) In the town of Paisley they had had abundant proof that high provisions entailed a scarcity of labour, while years of cheapness had set trade agoing. And not only was this the case here, but over the entire country.

Baillie HUTCHESON seconded the resolution, which was carried with acclamation.

The Rev. Mr. KENNEDY, of the Methodist church, said that the resolution entrusted to him was, "That the emergency in which the country is at present placed, calls for the immediate suspension of those laws which limit the supply of food, in order that the peace of the country may be preserved, and crime, the certain consequence of extreme misery, be averted;" which was seconded by Councillor MILLER, and unanimously agreed to.

The Rev. Mr. CAIRNS then moved the next resolution, to the effect that a memorial, founded on the resolutions already adopted, be drawn up and forwarded to her Majesty's Ministers.

Councillor McNAIR seconded the resolution, which was unanimously adopted.

The Rev. Dr. BAIRD proposed the next resolution, which being seconded by ANDREW NAIRN, Esq., passed unanimously.

The Rev. Mr. McDUGALL moved the adoption of a memorial founded on the resolutions, which was carried.

A vote of thanks was given to the chairman, and the meeting broke up.

CUPAR.

The Town Council met on Friday evening—Provost Nicol in the chair.

The Provost said that, in calling that meeting, he had thought it proper to bring the subject of the failure in the potato crop under their consideration. For his own part, he did not see much cause for alarm; and he did not think that, in this district, the failure had been so very extensive as in other parts of the country. All the crops, except the potatoes, had yielded a very fair return. It was, however, for gentlemen to express their sentiments.

Mr. THOMAS SMITH rose to move the adoption of an address to the Queen praying for the opening of the ports. No one could over estimate the importance of having the ports open at all times, but especially at the present juncture. The question had long been agitated, but they had now stronger grounds than ever for demanding a free and unrestricted commerce, and a cheap supply of food to the famished and starving. Instead of that, they saw that the people were forced to eat what the beasts only should subsist on. If there was a just and fair field for manufactures in the country, then they might expect some amelioration in the condition of the working classes; but till then they could do no good. It was quite manifest, and experience had testified to the truth of the fact, that the country was never in a state of prosperity when the wages of the working man were low; and it was true that their wages would continue below what they should be until the fetters were struck off from all branches of industry. He cordially moved the adoption of an address to her Majesty, praying for the immediate opening of the ports.

The Provost said he supposed it was unnecessary to ask whether it was carried unanimously. (A burst of applause testified that he was not wrong in his supposition.)

Mr. Smith, Treasurer Aitken, and Baillie Tullis were appointed a committee to draw up a memorial on the subject, to be forwarded for presentation to Sir James Graham.

ANNAN.

In this spirited little town, so much noted for its liberal views in politics, as well as in other matters, a public meeting of the magistrates, town council, and inhabitants at large, was convened and held on the 17th ult., for the purpose of memorialising her Majesty's ministers upon the propriety and necessity, in consequence of the strong ground for apprehension that the approaching season will, to the people of this country, be a season of unexampled famine and calamity, of immediately opening the ports of Great Britain for the admission of all kinds of provisions duty free. After suitable addresses from Provost Sawyer, the Rev. James Dobie, and other gentlemen, it was unanimously agreed to forward an address to Sir Robert Peel and the other members of her Majesty's ministry, suggesting to them, either by an order in Council or a vote of Parliament, called together for that purpose, the propriety of opening the ports for the purpose before mentioned, as a measure of the most ordinary prudence, at any rate, if not of the most absolute necessity.

DUNFERMLINE.

A requisition, numerously signed by the inhabitants, having been presented to Provost Ronaldson, requesting him on an early day to call a public meeting to consider the propriety of memorialising her Majesty's government to sanction the importation of all kinds of grain into this country free of duty: in compliance with the said requisition, a public meeting of the inhabitants, called by Provost Ronaldson, was held in the Independent Chapel on Friday last—George Birwell, Esq., late Provost of the burgh, in the chair. The meeting, which was numerously attended, was addressed by the Rev. Messrs. Young, Cuthbertson, McMichael, and McIntosh; Messrs. Dewar, Erskine, and Beveridge. Mr. Young said, that calamitous as the potato disease appeared to be, were it the cause of bringing about free trade in grain, it would be a blessing rather than a calamity, giving the poor classes, instead of the lowest species of food, the finest of wheat. A series of resolutions was unanimously agreed to, condemnatory of the policy of the present Corn Laws; also to memorialise her Majesty's government to sanction the importation of all kinds of grain into this country free of duty. The memorial was read by Professor McMichael, and unanimously agreed to.—Glasgow Argus.

KILBARCHAN.

Last Saturday, a public meeting of the inhabitants of Kilbarchan took place, for the purpose of memorialising Government to open the ports during the present emergency. Mr. James Erskine was called to the chair, and a memorial which was read to the meeting, by Mr. John Peterson, unanimously approved of, and agreed to be transmitted to the proper quarter, with as little delay as possible. It was a pleasing feature attending this meeting of the inhabitants of Kilbarchan, that even the Chartists, many of whom were present (and who formerly were opposed to the Free Trade policy), gave in their concurrence to the movement, considering that Free Trade in corn is a measure absolutely necessary at the present time.—Glasgow Saturday Post.

PLYMOUTH, TUESDAY.—A requisition, several yards in length, more numerously signed than any that has been got up in Plymouth for some years past, has been presented to B. Barham, Esq., the mayor, requesting him to convene, at the earliest opportunity, a meeting of the inhabitants, to take into consideration the propriety of addressing her Majesty upon the present alarming state of the country, owing to the deficiency in the supply of food. The requisition has been signed by men of all parties, and comprises a vast number of the moderate men who do not usually take part in political affairs. His worship has fixed upon Friday week for the meeting, which will be held either at the Guildhall, or, for the public accommodation, at the larger room at the Royal Hotel. Our hon. member, Lord Ebrington, has written a noble letter expressive of his warm concurrence in the objects of the meeting, and of his determination to be present on any day that may be fixed upon. T. Gill, Esq., our other representative, has expressed a similar intention, and the meeting will undoubtedly be one worthy of the important object for which it is convened.

KENDAL.—The following reply has been received from Sir James Graham, by Mr. John Gill, chairman of the meeting of the working classes held last week in the Town-hall, for the purpose of memorialising her Majesty to open the ports by an order in Council, for the admission of foreign grain and other provisions free of duty:—

"Whitehall, Nov. 27th, 1845.

"Sir,—I am directed by Secretary Sir James Graham, to inform you, that he has not failed to lay before the Queen the address of the working classes of Kendal, praying that the Ports may be opened for the admission of foreign grain and other provisions free of duty.

"I am, Sir, your obedient Servant,

"Mr. John Gill, Kendal. S. M. PHILLIPS."

BIRMINGHAM TOWN'S MEETING.—Not content with the demonstration which the Free Trade dinner afforded of the feeling of Birmingham on the Corn Laws, it will be seen from an advertisement in another column that a requisition to the Mayor to call a town's meeting on the subject is in course of signature, and will, doubtless, be most numerously and respectfully signed. But what is the town council about? Why is it that no member has given notice of a motion to memorialise the Government to open the ports? Almost every other town council in the kingdom has been moving in this matter, and we trust that it is not too late for Birmingham to follow where she ought to have led.—Birmingham Pilot.

PRESTON.

On Thursday noon a public meeting, convened by the Mayor of the Borough, in compliance with a requisition bearing about 700 signatures, was held in the Town Hall, Preston, for the purpose of memorialising Government for the immediate admission of foreign grain duty free. Among the gentlemen who were present we noticed the Revs. William Slate, T. Ashton, and J. Edwards; Mr. Alderman Haydock; W. Eccles, Esq., of Bamberbridge; W. Ainsworth, Esq.; S. T. Behrens, Esq., of Catterall; Joseph Bray, Esq.; R. Palmer and S. R. Grimshaw, Esqrs.; and Messrs. G. Smith, J. Hawkins, R. Threlfall, jun., F. Armstrong, Livesey, Ascroft, A. Leigh, Haslam, &c. &c.

The Town Clerk having read the requisition to the Mayor, and his worship's announcement calling the meeting, Mr. W. Ainsworth, seconded by Mr. Lawrence Spencer, moved that, in the absence of the Mayor, Mr. Alderman Haydock take the chair. Agreed to unanimously.

We regret that we can only give the most meagre announcement of this important meeting, as we only received the slips kindly forwarded to us from the Preston Guardian office just before going to press.

The CHAIRMAN opened the proceedings in a short speech; and then introduced the Rev. W. SLATE, who addressed the meeting in an earnest and impressive manner. He dwelt at considerable length upon the great injury inflicted upon the religious and moral habits of the people by privation and scarcity of food; and concluded by moving the first resolution.

MR. JOHN HAWKINS seconded the resolution in an excellent speech, and made some most important statements as to the serious failure of the potato crop in the immediate neighbourhood of Preston. The resolution was carried unanimously.

MR. LIVESLEY then proceeded to move the next resolution, in a long and able speech, of which we regret that we cannot give even a short abridgment.

MR. JAMES FRANKLAND seconded the motion, which, together with the memorial, was carried unanimously.

The CHAIRMAN, having signed the memorial on behalf of the meeting, vacated the chair, which was taken by the Rev. Wm. Slate.

MR. R. ASCROFT then moved, that the thanks of the meeting be given to Mr. Alderman Haydock for the very satisfactory manner in which he had presided.

MR. SWAIN seconded the motion, which was cordially agreed to.

MR. HAYDOCK, in returning thanks, said: I hope you will not find it necessary to hold another meeting for the same purpose. (Cheers.) The time seems to have arrived for a great change, and this change, I hope, will be for the happiness and benefit of the country. The meeting is now at an end.

The meeting then broke up, having lasted an hour and a half.

MARYLEBONE.

A special meeting of the Vestry of St. Marylebone took place on Thursday, for the purpose of taking into consideration the apprehended famine, and the propriety of memorialising the Queen, to use her prerogative in convening Parliament, and in throwing open the ports.

GEORGE DANIELL, Esq., churchwarden, was unanimously called to the chair, and read communications which had been received from the borough members, Sir B. Hall and Sir Charles Napier, regretting that circumstances prevented them attending the meeting.

JOHN BAGSHAW, Esq., proposed the first resolution, viz., "That the extensive failure of the crops imperatively demand that the most decisive and energetic measures should be taken, to insure a sufficient supply of food, and to guard the country from the dreadful evils which have ever followed in the train of scarcity, and which, in the present circumstances of the nation, would fall upon it with more than ordinary force."

JOSEPH HUME, Esq., M.P., in seconding the resolution, made a long and excellent speech. He strongly impressed upon the people the necessity of vigorous and united action—to stand firm by the broad principle of a perfectly free and unrestricted trade in food; and after warning ministers of their responsibility, and Sir Robert Peel personally, as the head and soul of the Administration, of the awful dangers that threatened the country, and the solemn duty thereby imposed upon him to avert whatever portion of the danger could be mitigated by legislative means, sat down amidst general cheers.

MR. W. W. WILLIAMS, M.P., had great pleasure in giving his support to this resolution, and he thought when it was considered that Marylebone had a population equal to one-half of the counties of the kingdom, and was superior in wealth to many others, that the opinions of the vestry, as the representatives of that wealth and population, would not be disregarded. (Hear.)

The resolution, on being put, was carried unanimously, amidst great applause.

MR. JOSEPH moved the second resolution, to the effect, "That a failure of the crops, at all times most disastrous, is most enormously aggravated by the laws which, under the false pretence of protecting the home grower and encouraging agriculture, prohibit the free importation of foreign corn, and thereby render the first necessary of life scarce and dear to a rapidly increasing and industrious population."

MR. JOHN WILLIAMS seconded this resolution.

This resolution having also been carried without a dissentient,

MR. SODEN moved, "That it is the bounden duty of her Majesty's responsible advisers to direct the ports to be immediately opened for the admission of articles of food from foreign ports free of duty, and to advise her Majesty to summon Parliament at the earliest opportunity in order at once and for ever to put an end to a system which has been proved to be the blight of commerce, the bane of agriculture, the source of bitter discussion amongst all classes, and the cause of penury, fever, mortality, and crime among the people."

The motion having been carried nem. con.,

MR. H. C. WILSON moved an address to the Queen founded on the resolutions.

LORD MONTFORT, amidst loud cheers, seconded the proposition.

The motion having been carried, Gen. EVANS and one or two other gentlemen addressed the meeting, and after thanks to the chairman, it separated.

FREEHOLDERS' BUILDING SOCIETY, MANCHESTER.—A meeting of the members of the above society was held on Wednesday evening last, when it was agreed to keep open the books for the taking up of new shares until January; after which, persons taking up new shares will have to pay arrears of subscriptions, as the second monthly payment will be made in February. Nearly 700 additional shares were taken up at the meeting, making a total of about 2900. Eighteen shares have already been sold for the purchasing of property, which will give the like number of votes. Seven working men came a distance of ten miles, each of whom purchased a share, having, as was understood, joined in a lot of property, which would give each of them a county vote. This is an example worthy of imitation. The directors feel confident that after the receipt of the second monthly subscription, in February, they will be in a situation to advance 2000*l.* per month for the purchasing of property. This, if disposed of in single shares, will create nearly 500 votes in the year 1846! Where will monopoly be when all our manufacturing districts follow this example? The advertisement of the society appears in our last page.

On Saturday the 15th inst., Messrs. Simpson, Thompson and Co., cotton spinners, &c., Manchester, gave the work-people in their employment at Crumpsall, an entertainment in celebration of the opening of their new mill. About 600 sat down to a substantial dinner of roast beef and plum pudding, which was provided by Mr. Handley, and was served up in excellent style. Mr. Thompson presided on the occasion, and after dinner delivered an opening address, in the course of which he briefly recapitulated the circumstances connected with the origin, progress, and completion of the new mill, and said he felt thankful to be able to state that during the whole course of its erection not a single accident of a serious nature had occurred to any of the workmen engaged upon it. He concluded by proposing, "success to the Clarence Mills," which sentiment was responded to with the greatest possible enthusiasm, the whole company rising and cheering for some time. Mr. Simpson then rose, and after acknowledging the good feeling manifested in the reception of the toast, proceeded to address the company at considerable length, and was followed by M. Ross, Esq., and other speakers. The company, which had increased to about 700, then adjourned to other rooms fitted up for the occasion, where various innocent amusements were carried on till half-past eleven, when the proceedings terminated. Refreshments were served during the evening, consisting of sandwiches, fruit, currant-bread and wine negus, and a universal feeling of gratification and enjoyment pervaded the whole proceedings. Davies's band was in attendance, and played a succession of popular airs. Concluding the whole with the national anthem, which was sung by the whole company.

CHORLEY.—REDUCTION OF WAGES.—Messrs. Smethurst, and Messrs. Wallbrook, cotton spinners, of this town, have given notice to their work-people in their respective mills, that it is their intention to reduce the wages of the weavers at the rate of one penny per cut, and the other hands in proportion, or run short time. The alternative, we believe, rests with the operatives; but, as yet, we have not heard what determination they have come to.

COUNTIES REGISTRATION MOVEMENT. COUNTY OF HERTS.

A meeting of Free Traders was held at the Bull Inn Hertford, on Wednesday the 26th instant, for the purpose of appointing a Committee to assist in attending to the Registration for the County, and more particularly for the Hertford Polling District. John Gripper, Esq., presided. The meeting was cordial and unanimous in its approval of the object for which it had been called. Mr. Bontems explained the plan of operation which the Anti-Corn Law League had followed in other counties, which gave great satisfaction to the meeting. C. H. Lattimore, Esq. of Wheathampstead, urged upon the meeting the importance of the object for which it had been assembled. Similar meetings are about to be held in all the principal towns of the county.

HACKNEY.

A meeting of the inhabitants of Hackney was held on Tuesday night at the Mermaid Tavern, for the purpose of advocating a total and speedy abolition of the Corn Laws. The Rev. Dr. Carlisle was called to the chair.

MR. MOORE having addressed the meeting, Mr. NEW moved the following resolution:—"That this meeting rejoices at the prospects which recent events have opened, of the speedy and entire abolition of the laws which impose restrictions on the importation of the articles of food; and would hereby express their earnest hope that the public will now express their opinion in favour of this measure, in terms so emphatic and unequivocal, as will induce the Government and legislature to abolish, by a legislative act, all laws which interfere with Free Trade between Great Britain and the nations of the world."

The resolution was seconded by Mr. CHARLES GREEN, and carried unanimously.

MR. DUNN moved, and Mr. J. JONES seconded a vote of thanks to Mr. Moore, and of congratulation to the council and members of the Anti-Corn-Law League, on the triumphant position in which their cause now stands.

Thanks were voted to the chairman, and the meeting, which was a crowded one, separated.

WAKEFIELD.

A meeting of the friends of Free Trade, which was attended by Messrs. Cobden and Bright, and the object of which was the furtherance of the West Riding registration, was held at Wakefield, in the saloon of the Corn Exchange, on Thursday evening last.

Notwithstanding that the first announcement of this meeting was only issued on the previous day, a vast number of persons assembled. Both Mr. Cobden and Mr. Bright had a most enthusiastic reception, and the whole of the proceedings passed off with great spirit and perfect unanimity.

MR. THOMAS HAIGH was unanimously called to the chair, and briefly introduced the subject on which the meeting had assembled.

MR. CARTER moved the following resolution, in a brief but pertinent speech:—"That the signal success which has crowned our efforts during the past year, in adding Free Trade voters to the West Riding registry, encourages us to make renewed and increased exertions, in order that the return of two Free Traders to Parliament at the next election may be rendered absolutely certain." (Cheers.)

MR. W. P. BRADSHAW, of Woodthorp, briefly seconded the resolution.

MESSRS. COBDEN and BRIGHT then addressed the meeting in able and eloquent speeches, after which the Chairman put the resolution, which was carried unanimously.

JAMES MICKLETHWAITE, Esq., briefly addressed the meeting, and concluded by proposing the appointment of a committee to carry on the qualification movement in the town and neighbourhood of Wakefield.

This was seconded by JAMES BOSTON, Esq., and unanimously adopted.

MR. T. PLINT then addressed the meeting, and gave some statistical details as to the number of new county votes placed on the register by the Free Traders.

Thanks were then voted to Messrs. Cobden, Bright, and the Chairman, and the meeting separated.

MACCLESFIELD.

A public meeting of the friends of Free Trade was held last Tuesday evening, in Lord Street Sunday School, when Mr. Prentice, of the Manchester Times, and Mr. T. Falvey, attended as a deputation from the League, for the purpose of explaining their views and intentions with respect to the present state of the country, and especially with regard to the advancement of the qualification and registration questions. The proceedings commenced about half-past seven, when the large room was well filled, and, ultimately, there was about a thousand persons present, among whom there were a considerable number of manufacturers and other employers, though the bulk of the meeting was composed of the working classes.

MR. RICHARD HINE having been called to the chair, said he was glad to perceive indications that a change was at hand, and he hoped he should live to see the day when the bread of the people would be untaxed, and free as the wind that blows, and the rain that descends. He had a great desire that the aristocracy should stand well with the people, and that, instead of leaning on a law which gave them artificially high prices, they should endeavour to increase the amount of produce by improved cultivation, and thus lend a helping hand to all around them. (Cheers.) The Chairman concluded with some reference to the increase of the constituency by the purchase of property for qualifications. He wished they could turn the scale in favour of Free Trade. Not that he wished that men should be made the tool of any party, contrary to their own convictions of what was just and right; and as for intimidation or coercion, he would never countenance it. He would never be concerned in advising any individual to vote contrary to what he might suppose to be his interest. He could not give him bread if he lost his employment by following his advice, and, therefore he wished to leave every man to his own convictions. (Cheers.)

A letter from E. D. Davenport, Esq., was read, expressing his regret at his inability to attend the meeting.

The CHAIRMAN introduced Mr. Prentice, as the editor of the Manchester Times, a paper which he had long taken, and which he read with great pleasure.

MR. PRENTICE and Mr. Falvey addressed the meeting in eloquent speeches, and impressed upon the meeting the necessity of attending to the registration, and increasing their strength on the register, in order to wrest the representation of the Northern Division of Cheshire from the monopolists.

MR. SAMUEL JESPER said he would take the liberty of mentioning his own case, in illustration of what could be done in the way of obtaining qualifications at a small expence. He, along with two others, had purchased a small property in this county, for 80*l.*, which had given them three votes, and, in addition, they were receiving from 7½ to 8 per cent. interest for their money. (Cheers.)

A vote of thanks having been proposed to the deputation, Mr. Prentice said, in reply, that the most gratifying return they could receive was to see them acting on the advice which had been given in regard to the increase of qualifications.

MR. FALVEY proposed a vote of thanks to the trustees, for the use of the school.

MR. JESPER cordially seconded the motion.

A vote of thanks having been passed to the Chairman, and suitably acknowledged, the meeting broke up about half-past ten o'clock.

GLOUCESTER.

On Monday evening, one of the most numerous, enthusiastic, and orderly meetings that was ever held in the city of Gloucester, took place in the Shire-hall, to meet Mr. Cobden and Mr. Bright, and to adopt resolutions relative to the course to be adopted to bring about a total repeal of the corn and provision laws. The hall, which will accommodate 2000 persons, was densely filled; and the capacious orchestra appropriated to the ladies, presented an attractive appearance. A small platform was erected for the use of the speakers, and many of our most spirited and influential merchants and shippers were present.

On the platform we observed, J. W. Hughes, Esq.; the Mayor of Gloucester, Alderman Washbourne; T. M. Sturge, Esq.; Samuel Bowly, Esq.; A. H. Carter, Esq., barrister; Caleb Trotter, Esq., &c., &c.

Messrs Cobden and Bright on entering the hall were received with the most rapturous cheering.

The MAYOR (Mr. Hughes) was unanimously voted to the chair.

Letters were read from Captain M. F. F. Berkeley and Mr. Phillpotts, the members for the city, excusing their absence from the meeting on the ground of having pre-engage-ments, but at the same time expressing their desire to co-operate with their constituents and others in order to obtain the repeal of the Corn Laws.

MR. BOWLEY proposed the first resolution. He said, he moved the resolution with great pleasure, because he considered taxes upon food to be the worst of all taxes. (Hear, hear.) They were taxes which pressed most heavily upon those who were the least able to pay them. On examining his household expenses he found that they amounted to only one-fortieth part of his expenditure, while the hard-working people of this country paid one half or more of their small pittance in the shape of such taxation. So that they were, in fact, taxes upon the poor to fill the pockets of the rich. (Cheers.)

MR. T. M. STURGE in seconding the resolution, declared it to be his opinion that the present system of averages not only prevented the people from obtaining a proper supply of corn, but that it was also injurious to the farmers themselves.

MR. COBDEN and Mr. BRIGHT then addressed the dense assembly at great length, urging upon the Free Traders the paramount necessity of securing the representation of West Gloucestershire by the qualification of new 40*s.* freeholders. The speeches were received with great enthusiasm, but it is utterly impossible from the overwhelming pressure of reports of similar meetings throughout the country, that we can give even extracts from these telling addresses. At the conclusion of Mr. Bright's speech the resolution was put and carried amidst loud and long-continued cheering.

MR. CALEB TROTTER then moved the following resolution:—

"That this meeting has heard with the greatest satisfaction the declaration of Lord John Russell, and Lord Morpeth, in favour of the total abolition of the Corn Laws, which is a most decisive proof of the progress of Free Trade opinions, and affords great encouragement to endeavour to return two Free Trade members for this division of the county at the next election."

In the course of his address Mr. Trotter, who is connected with the Forest of Dean, mentioned that he had succeeded in placing 150 freeholders on the registration in that district. (Cheers.)

The resolution was seconded by Alderman WASHBOURNE, and carried with acclamation.

MR. J. P. HEINE then moved the thanks of the meeting to Mr. Phillpotts and Captain Berkeley, R.N., the two city members, for their consistent support of Mr. Villiers's motions, and the principles of Free Trade, and soliciting them to continue their exertions till the cause should completely triumph.

LIEUT. FRANCILLON, R.N., seconded the resolution, which was carried with acclamation.

The next resolution, which conferred a vote of thanks on Mr. Cobden and Mr. Bright, drew forth bursts of cheering.

MR. COBDEN returned thanks, and concluded by moving the thanks of the meeting to the mayor, which was suitably acknowledged, when the vast assemblage separated.

STROUD.

The inhabitants of the manufacturing borough of Stroud, and the surrounding districts, assembled on Wednesday evening, at the large Subscription Room, to bear a part in the all-engrossing agitation against the Corn and Provision Laws, and to give a hearty welcome to Mr. Cobden and Mr. Bright. The room was filled in every part, and when it is mentioned that a charge was made for admission, and that not fewer than 1600 persons were present, an idea may be formed of the degree of interest which the object of the meeting had excited. The body of the room was chiefly, if not entirely, occupied by persons engaged in the operative department of the cloth manufacture; the side galleries were filled with females, many of them employed at the mills, all neatly attired; and the east gallery was allotted to those who paid the highest price, embracing most of the employers, with their ladies, and a number of clergymen. Amongst the speakers were Mr. Cobden, M.P., Mr. Bright, M.P., Mr. Parsons, the Rev. — Newman, and Mr. J. C. Symons. Resolutions calling for the repeal of the Corn Laws were passed with unanimity and enthusiasm.

DISTRESS OF THE CALICO PRINTERS.—A correspondent desires to draw public attention to the deplorable distress of the calico printers in the neighbourhood of Chorley. Those lately employed at the Cross Hall printworks, he informs us, have been eight or nine weeks out of work, nor are they likely to have any for some time. "Many families," he adds, "are completely starving for want of food, and in many cases are compelled to beg their bread."

GREAT LEAGUE MEETING IN COVENT-GARDEN THEATRE.—The COUNCIL of the NATIONAL ANTI-CORN-LAW LEAGUE beg to announce that the AGGREGATE MEETINGS of the LEAGUE, in the Theatre Royal, Covent Garden, will re-commence on WEDNESDAY EVENING NEXT, the 17th of December. George Wilson, Esq., in the Chair. Richard Cobden, Esq., M.P., John Bright, Esq., M.P., and W. J. Fox, Esq., will address the meeting.

QUALIFY! QUALIFY! QUALIFY!

THE Friends of FREE TRADE residing in the Northern or Midland Counties, desirous of purchasing Freeholds in any of the undermentioned Counties, are requested to apply to the Secretary of the League, Newall's Buildings Manchester.

North Lancashire	North Derbyshire
South Lancashire	South Derbyshire
North Cheshire	North Durham
West Riding of York	East Cumberland
South Stafford	West Cumberland
North Stafford	South Northumberland
South Cheshire

Each applicant is requested to give his name and residence at full length. By Order of the Council, JOSEPH HICKIN, Secretary.

QUALIFY! QUALIFY! QUALIFY!

FREE TRADERS desirous of purchasing Freeholds for Middlesex, East Surrey, West Kent, South Essex, East Sussex, and South Hants, are requested to send their applications, with name and address in full, to the League Offices, 67, Fleet-street, London.

By Order of the Council, JOSEPH HICKIN, Secretary.

FREEHOLD QUALIFICATIONS FOR HERTS.

FREE TRADERS desirous of purchasing Freeholds in Hertfordshire are requested to send their applications to The League Offices, 67, Fleet-street, or to Mr. J. F. Bontems, Herts Registration Office, Hertford.

CORN LAWS.—Third Edition, Now ready, price 2s.,

AN ATTEMPT TO ESTIMATE THE EFFECTS of PROTECTING DUTIES on the PROFITS of AGRICULTURE, by JOHN MORTON, F.G.S., Author of "The Nature and Property of Soils," &c.; and JOSHUA TRIMMER, F.G.S., Author of "Practical Geology and Mineralogy," &c. Also The Nature and Property of Soils, and Repts and Profits of Agriculture, by J. Morton. 10s. 4th Edition. James Ridgway, Piccadilly, and all booksellers.

CONTRIBUTIONS TO THE LEAGUE FUND.

Subscriptions received during the week ending Wednesday, Dec. 3, 1845.

N.B.—As the Subscription List is made up from Wednesday to Wednesday, contributions received on Thursdays and Fridays are not published in the LEAGUE of the Saturday immediately succeeding, but are included in the list of the week following.

Leatham, Mrs. Heath, near Wakefield	..	25	0	0
*Criswick and Leard, 6, New Compton-street, Soho	..	2	2	0
*Flanders, Wm., 2, Upper Woburn-pl., Tavistock-square	..	2	2	0
*Hoyland, Hanson, Wood-street, City	..	2	0	0
*Lloyd, Captain	..	1	1	0
*Allender, Geo., 6, Judd-place East, St. Pancras	..	1	1	0
*Hall, T. S., 17, Surrey-place, Old Kent Road	..	1	1	0
*Fitzpatrick, Daniel, 1, Gilbert-buildings, Lambeth	..	1	1	0
*Wright, Henry, 12, Great Turnstile, Holborn	..	1	1	0
*Mars, Wm., 22, Grange Walk, Bermondsey	..	1	1	0
*"Live and Let Live"	..	1	1	0
*Fenillade, G. R., Colonnade Hotel, Haymarket	..	1	1	0
*Deavin, R., St. Thomas's-place, Old Kent Road	..	1	1	0
*Norris, James, 207, Upper Thames-street	..	1	1	0
*Jones and Gausson, 47, Eastcheap	..	1	1	0
*Barlin, J. N., 15, Bayswater-terrace	..	1	1	0
*Homan, Francis, Stoke Newington	..	1	1	0
*Brettle, Miss, 4, Goldsmith-street, Cheapside	..	1	1	0
*Colman, John, 172, Regent-street	..	1	1	0
*Ingles, Wm., 75, St. Paul's Churchyard	..	1	1	0
*Keighley, James, 5, Foster-lane, City	..	1	1	0
*Pickering, J., Thames place, Limehouse Hole	..	1	1	0
*Shirley, John, M.D., Lanark	..	1	1	0
*Willis, J. W., 42, Rankellor-street, Edinburgh	..	1	1	0
*Paul, Wm. W., Grammar School House, Wigan	..	1	1	0
*Southall, Edward Pritchard, Leominster	..	1	1	0
*Norris, Edmund, Sutton, near Abingdon	..	1	1	0
*Wakeman, Geo., Thame, Oxon	..	1	1	0
*Dodgson, Jonathan, 127, Mill-street, Liverpool	..	1	1	0
*Collinson, Thomas, Fountain-street, Halifax	..	1	1	0
*Dickinson, Thos. S., 7, Cookridge-street, Leeds	..	1	1	0
*Abell, Martin, 34, High-street, Worcester	..	1	1	0
*Ashworth, B., Fold's Cottage, Bolton	..	1	1	0
*Atory, Mark, 212, Gilesgate, Durham	..	1	1	0
*Green, G. W., Surveyor, Darlaston, near Birmingham	..	1	1	0
*Richardby, James, Horton Road, Bradford, Yorkshire	..	1	1	0
*Shaw, Elias, Newcastle-under-Lyne	..	1	1	0
*Harrison, John, 15, Upper Green, ditto	..	1	1	0
*Squire, James, New Invention, near Willenhall	..	1	1	0
*Drinkwater, Wm., Deale-street, Salford	..	1	1	0
*Richardson, John, jun., Tanner, Cockermouth	..	1	1	0
*"A Cambridge Correspondent"	..	1	1	0
*Barnes, Nathaniel, Nottingham	..	1	1	0
*Briggs, Edward, Ashford Road, Maidstone	..	1	1	0
*Sharpe, W. jun., Swadincote, Ashby-de-la-Zouch	..	1	1	0
*Wickoff, Henry, New York, U.S.	..	1	1	0
*Gibbons, R. W., Calne, Wilts	..	1	1	0
*Moore, H. W., Caldecote, near Rockingham	..	1	1	0
*Jackson, J. and Co., merchants, Lyons, France	..	1	1	0
*Still, Robert, Liverpool	..	1	1	0
*Warwick, Charles, 16, Highbury-place, Islington	..	1	1	0
*Bulchin, James, Newington-road	..	1	1	0
*Rawlings, James, 2, Nassau-street, Marylebone	..	1	1	0
*Watts, Henry, 118, Bunhill-row	..	1	1	0
*Mewkill, William, 18, Great Maze Pond, Borough	..	1	1	0
*Edmunds, Geo., 19, St. Swinburn's-lane	..	1	1	0
*Juer, Henry, 413, Strand	..	1	1	0
*Jones, Stephen, Talbot-court, Gracechurch-street	..	1	1	0
*Dyke, Wm., 21, Grafton-street, London University	..	1	1	0
*Nettleton, Joshua, 4, Sloane-square, Chelsea	..	1	1	0
*Spearman, Thos., 20, Wilderness-street, Bermondsey	..	1	1	0
*Tarpole, John, 101, Old-street, St. Luke's	..	1	1	0
*Davies, H. P., Palace Wharf, Lambeth	..	1	1	0
*McCraight, Richard, 94, Goswell-street	..	1	1	0
*Baxter, John, 16, Norfolk-street, Middlesex Hospital	..	1	1	0
*Beale, S., 17, Rutland-street, Commercial-road East	..	1	1	0
*Taylor, Robert, 27, Brunswick Parade, Islington	..	1	1	0
*Rowney, George, jun., 51, Rathbone-place	..	1	1	0
*Russell, J., 54, Wood-street, City	..	1	1	0
*Smith, Thomas, ditto	..	1	1	0
*Wilkins, E., 57, St. John-street	..	1	1	0
*Bellingham and Son, 126, ditto	..	1	1	0
*Lea, Charles, Beauvoir Wharf, Kingsland	..	1	1	0
*Goulden, John, 12, Smith-street, Northampton-square	..	1	1	0
*Laker, Wm., 170, Fleet-street	..	1	1	0
*Terry, J. and Son, 5, Broad-street-hill	..	1	1	0
*Shillito, W. H., Langbourne Chambers, Fenchurch-st.	..	1	1	0
*Rooke, Messrs., Son, and Burgo, Hoxton	..	1	1	0
*Stokes, E., 170, Strand	..	1	1	0

*Ogden, H., M.D., Dunning-street	..	1	1	0
*Patterson, Thomas, Bridge-street	..	1	1	0
*Adamson, Thomas, near Smyrna Chapel	..	1	1	0
*Wilson, H.	..	1	1	0
*Wilson, John, Frederick-street	..	1	1	0
*French, Robert, ditto	..	1	1	0
*French, William, Tatham-street	..	1	1	0
*Mouncey, John, Fawcett-street	..	1	1	0
*Peacock, John, Murton-street	..	1	1	0
*Bowmaker, Edward, Cornhill-street	..	1	1	0
*Kerr and Wilson, manufacturers, Causeyside	..	1	1	0
*Harrow, McIntyre, and Co., printers, Colnelie	..	1	1	0
*Connal, John, baker, High-street	..	1	1	0
*Fulton, J. & W., bleachers, Glenfield	..	1	1	0
*Phillips, Wm., merchant, Forbes-st.	..	1	1	0
*Scott, Adam, manufacturer, Causeyside	..	1	1	0
*Coats, J. and P., thread manufacturers	..	1	1	0
*Coats, James, ditto	..	1	1	0
*Brown & Polson, bleachers, Thursraig	..	1	1	0
*Leckie, Archibald, dyer	..	1	1	0
*Walker, Alexander, baker, Town Head	..	1	1	0
*Wilson, Robert, town clerk	..	1	1	0
*Kerr, P. & Son, thread manufacturer, New-street	..	1	1	0
*Arthur, James, draper, High-street	..	1	1	0
*Millar, James, ditto ditto	..	1	1	0
*Kerr, Robert, Whitehaugh	..	1	1	0
*Ritchie, David, grocer	..	1	1	0
*Robertson, Thomas, Foxbar	..	1	1	0
*Houston, Geo., manufacturer, 115, Causeyside	..	1	1	0
*Taylor, Thomas, jun., ditto	..	1	1	0
Moss, Emanuel, 15, Lemon-street, Goodman's Fields	..	0	10	0
Eliza C.	..	0	5	0
Ayres, Wm., 13, Globe-road, Bethnal-green	..	0	5	0
Rowls, Wm., 33, Clifton-street, Finsbury	..	0	5	0
Woolmer, John, 73, Aldersgate-street	..	0	5	0
Harrell, Henry, 7, High-street, Whitechapel	..	0	5	0
Bouron, Wm., 94, Tottenham-court-road	..	0	2	6
Wilkinson, John, 4, East-street, Finsbury Market	..	0	2	6
Hull, John, 53, Bartholomew Close	..	0	2	6
Talbot, W. H., 71, Fore-street, Limehouse	..	0	2	6
"One of the Establishment"	..	0	2	6
Hart, James, 15, Haven-street, Whitechapel-road	..	0	3	0
"One of the Establishment"	..	0	2	6
Ditto	..	0	2	6
Hart, Wm., 6, New-sq., North-st., Whitechapel-road	..	0	2	6
Mahon, John, 5, North-street, Limehouse Fields	..	0	2	6
Jefferson, John, 12, Jerusalem-court, St. John's-square, Clerkenwell	..	0	2	6
Harper, James, 49, Singleton-street, Hoxton	..	0	2	6
Ratcliff, James	..	0	2	6
Small Sums	..	0	9	0
Contributions of the Workmen in the employ of Messrs. Jeffrey, Wise, and Co. Kent and Essex Yard, Whitechapel, per Wm. Mewkill	..	3	19	0
*Hanford, C. E., Woolas Hill, near Pershore, Worcester-shire	..	5	0	0
Osborne, the Hon. G. Godolphin, Skepleton House, Blandford, Dorset	..	2	2	0
*Bake, Thomas, 186, Oxford-road, Manchester	..	2	2	0
*Mills, David, Ardwick-place	..	1	1	0
*Rome, John, 39, Thomas-street	..	1	1	0
*Cunningham, W. A., 59, Mosley-street	..	1	1	0
*Baines, T. M., 112, Lloyd-street, Greenheys	..	1	1	0
*Golland, Smith, 23, George-street	..	1	1	0
*Johnson, T. F. & Crowther, 104, Market-st.	..	1	1	0
*Standing, Josh., Livesey-street	..	1	1	0
*Johnson, N. S., Cateaton-street	..	1	1	0
*Ladd, Chas. P., 1, Windsor-ter., Kingstown, Ireland	..	1	1	0
*Bangham, Thomas, Tenbury, Worcester	..	1	1	0
*Green, Geo., ditto	..	1	1	0
*Sheffield, Charles, Ratcliff, near Huddersfield	..	1	1	0
*Williamson, John, draper, Yorkshire-st., Rochdale	..	1	1	0
*Adamson, Geo., grocer, Cheetham-street, ditto	..	1	1	0
*Bastwood, Peter, Royal Hotel, Liverpool	..	1	1	0
*Johnson, William, Wigan	..	1	1	0
*Collison, Thomas, ditto	..	1	1	0
*Fairclough, James, Rodney-st., ditto	..	1	1	0
*Morris, E., Haigh Foundry, ditto	..	1	1	0
*Frost, Thomas, ditto ditto	..	1	1	0
*Harker, Thos., Market-place, Prescott	..	1	1	0
*Austin, Thomas, 45, Oxford-road, Manchester	..	1	1	0
*Binns, James, 162, Great Ancoats-st.	..	1	1	0
*McGill, Francis, Edward-st., Hanover-st.	..	1	1	0
*Brooklehurst, Charles, 2, Edge-street, ditto	..	1	1	0
*Wilkinson, T., London-road, ditto	..	1	1	0
*Bowker, Wm., 300, Deansgate, ditto	..	1	1	0
*Evans, Edward, 148, ditto	..	0	10	0
*O'Byler, Dr. C., 79, Mount Pleasant	..	1	1	0
*Mellor, Jas., 16, Exchange-alley north	..	1	1	0
*Allinson, John, 94, St. James's-street	..	1	1	0
*Hutton, John, Grafton-street	..	1	1	0
*Houlgrave, R. J. A., Box H 133, Post-office	..	1	1	0
*Houlgrave, Peter, ditto	..	1	1	0
*B.	..	1	1	0
*Poley, Thomas, 108, London-road	..	1	1	0
*Boul, Peter, 6, Clare-terrace, Edge-hill	..	1	1	0
*Waring, Thomas, 18, Stanhope-street	..	1	1	0

SUBSCRIPTIONS TO THE BAZAAR.

Balance of Sale at the Bazaar, per Mrs. Hall .. 2 0 0
Nantwich Subscription to the Bazaar, per Philip Barker 1 14 6
* Those names marked with an asterisk are renewed subscriptions.

POSTSCRIPT.

LONDON, Saturday Morning, December 6, 1845.

The announcement made by the Times is to some extent confirmed by the kind of contradiction it has received from the Standard-Herald; they merely express their own disbelief; but they at the same time avow that they have no authority whatever for a denial. The equivocating pretence that such authority could not be obtained without asking a Cabinet Minister to violate his oath of official secrecy is a patent subterfuge; the obligation to hide what has been done does not include silence respecting what has not been done; and when we consider the immense importance of the intelligence to the commercial interests of the country, we cannot believe that a Minister, who rests so much of his fame on his financial measures, would have allowed 24 hours to pass without contradicting a statement which, if false, would produce a most dangerous derangement of all the trading and monetary transactions of the empire. The beginning of the end is at hand; but we must not hide from ourselves that this is the most critical moment of our fortunes, that it behoves us to be more watchful and more vigilant than at any previous crisis of our agitation. It will require our utmost watchfulness and our utmost work to obtain our rights in their integrity, and to prevent the great objects for which we have so long laboured from being tainted by any sacrifice to corrupt expediency. The Times declares:

"An announcement of such immeasurable importance, and to the larger portion of the community so unspeakably gratifying, almost precludes the possibility of comment. No pen can keep pace with the reflections which must spontaneously crowd upon every thoughtful and sensitive mind. They who have long desired this change, and have long traced its manifold bearings on the welfare and happiness of the world, will in one moment see the realisation of that fair prospect, and will hardly endure to be informed of what they already behold."

But the friends of Free Trade must not be satisfied with indulging in such prospective visions; the end is not yet; and we must not forget the homely proverb:

"There may be a slip
Twixt the cup and the lip."

Our cotemporary goes on to say—

"It is understood that until Parliament meets nothing is to be done. For the Legislature will be reserved the responsibility and the glory of opening the ports. We presume that none will quarrel with this brief appearance of delay, now that the resolution of the Cabinet is known. The moral certainty of an early opening will be equivalent in its operation to an immediate Order in Council. It is enough for the merchant and the capitalist to know that by the end of January at the latest, the produce of all countries will enter the British market on an absolute equality with our own, excepting only those disadvantages which Nature itself has made, and which man cannot entirely remove. Any unnecessary appearance of haste would only create alarm, and might thus defeat, for a time at least, the very object of the measure. Happily there is no occasion for haste, even if haste were not almost certain to interfere with speed."

Though nothing may be done by ministers between this time and the assembling of Parliament, much ought to be done and much must be done by the people. It is in the unguarded moments of expected triumph that cool and cunning men are able to employ those artifices which render victory itself little better than defeat. The work has been done by the people. The Times says—

"It is an unfortunate circumstance that so good a deed should literally go a-begging for an author. The nation has done it, but who is the instrument? It is in Sir ROBERT PEEL'S hand, but is it his property? Nor have the Whigs much more claim to it. They only proposed to give up the Corn Laws when it was evident the peril of the experiment would be the inheritance of their successors."

"Shall we, again, call the League the true hero of the crisis—the real SIMON PURE of Free Trade? Truth compels us to answer in the affirmative; but the idea is still somewhat distasteful, and human nature itself will cavil at a patriotism, the virtues of which were so closely allied with its interests."

We are too sensible of the magnitude of the concession to notice the paltry cavil by which it is qualified; the virtues of Free Trade are identified with the interests of the entire nation, and the League has become a powerful agency merely by giving such evidence of this truth as to win the general assent of the nation. The question of instrumentality is not worth a moment's consideration; every one must feel that it is the people's cause which has been brought to the verge of a triumphant issue by the people's own exertions, and that it is only by the people that success can be ensured and completed. Ministerial professions must not throw the nation off its guard; we may give credit to the Premier for sincerity, in his new faith and for ability to carry it into practice; but we must not carry confidence to an excess, and treat him as a plenipotentiary empowered to make terms between the people and the monopolists. The nation has not gone to him—it is he that has come to the nation; we receive him with thanks and welcome, but we lost if we stop to inquire by whom it is to be accomplished. Whatever names may be written on the bill when it is introduced to the House, the authorship properly belongs to the people; and it is their duty, as well as their interest, to see that it is not falsified by the craft of the nominal editors.

We have alluded to the equivocating denial of the Standard-Herald; we cannot refuse to our readers the pleasure of reading the crushing reply of the Times:

"The surprise excited by the announcement in The Times of yesterday, on the subject of the Corn Laws, has been nowhere so intensely felt as in the offices of the "twin journals," which have been for some time under the delusion that they are the organs of the Government. It has been the monomania of these two melancholy prints to imagine that they possessed the confidence of the Treasury, and they have been babbling about the Corn Laws to the very last, under the erroneous impression that they would be the first to be apprised of any important resolution of the Cabinet. It was only yesterday that the morning half of these precious Gemini indulged in a dreary drivel to prove that the Corn Laws were "no failure," and that therefore the Premier ought not to be expected to abandon them. The aged gossip was not aware that the question on which she was exhausting her garrulity had been already virtually settled. Having been amused at the blundering ignorance of the Mrs. Gamp of the press, we looked with some curiosity to what she would say in the character of Mrs. Harris. The effect produced upon that female nobody is quite astounding. She 'don't believe a word of it,' for she has heard nothing about it from Mrs. Gamp, who is the only authority for the opinions of Mrs. Harris.

"There is something very ridiculous in the position of these two journals, which, after doing all they could to win the favour of the Government, are not permitted even to have the credit of being the first to publish its intentions. The fact is, that the Cabinet naturally shrinks from the ridicule to which it would be exposed by accepting the inefficient services which the venerable twins are capable of affording it. Humbly and obsequiously have they been grinding their organs under the windows of Downing-street, ready to play any tune that might be most pleasing to the Premier, but he has turned a deaf ear to their strains, and not even allowed his underlings an opportunity of throwing out an occasional morsel by way of encouragement. In vain have they looked imploringly up towards the garrets, or entreatingly down towards the kitchen; not even the congenial flunkies have been allowed to show compassion to these miserable mendicants. The vigilance of the master, or the fidelity of the servants, has baffled the efforts of the persevering pair. They have not succeeded in getting hold even of a scrap of truth that they could turn to profit.

"The reason is obvious. The repeal of the Corn Laws is a thing for statesmen to do, and not for old women to mander about."

The following announcement appears in the Standard of last night; we insert it with its original emphatic capitals. It will be seen that a loophole is still open for doubt. The Cabinet may not have come to a decision, but the opinions of its members may have been so far ascertained as to render it tolerably certain what the decision will be. We make no comment upon the intelligence; the cause of the people is safe in the people's hands.

"We are now, we rejoice to say, in a condition to give the most positive and direct contradiction to the statement of a proposed repeal of the Corn Laws, which appeared in yesterday's Times. The statement, it may be remembered, embraced three propositions—

"First, that Parliament is to meet in the first week in January.

"Second, that ministers have resolved upon a repeal of the Corn Laws.

"Third, that the projected repeal is to be announced in the opening Speech.

"EVERY ONE OF THESE THREE PROPOSITIONS IS FALSE.

"Parliament WILL NOT MEET IN THE FIRST WEEK OF JANUARY, or much, if at all, before the usual time of meeting. "THE CABINET HAS COME TO NO DECISION WHATSOEVER UPON THE SUBJECT OF THE CORN LAWS.

"It must be unnecessary to add, in the third place, that a resolution not formed can hardly have a place provided in the Queen's Speech. What follows, as our readers will perceive, was written before we had the perfect certainty that we now have, of the utter falsehood of the Times' statement. Upon what we have written above, we stake the character of this journal."

REGISTRATION MOVEMENT IN MIDDLESEX AND THE SURROUNDING COUNTIES.—Mr. Moore has this week addressed most enthusiastic and crowded meetings in all the localities announced in our last publication. Meetings will be held in the course of next week, according to the subjoined:

Monday, Dec. 7, Albion Hall, London Wall, at half-past Seven o'clock.

Tuesday, Dec. 8, British School Room, Kingsland, at half-past Seven o'clock.

Wednesday, Dec. 9, Brentford, British School Room, at half-past Seven o'clock.

Thursday, Dec. 10, Hammersmith, Albion Hall, at half-past Seven o'clock.

Friday, Dec. 11, Lower Tooting, Rising Sun, Assembly Rooms, at Seven o'clock.

RENTS.—The estate of East Barns, in Haddingtonshire, measuring 504 acres was lately purchased by Mr. Mitchell James, for £3,500. It was expected to yield a rent of £2,000, or at most £1,000; but though the repeal of the Corn Laws is now looked forward to as certain by the farmers, so little alarm does it excite, that the land was let yesterday for £2,500, thus yielding the proprietor 4½ per cent. on the purchase money.—Scotsman.

THE NORTH ROAD.—Within the last week, 500 coach-horses worked on the Great North Road have been sold, in consequence of a further opening of the Northern and Eastern Railway.

A NEW CITY.—The following animated description of one of the last wonders of our day, the new city now rising at Birkenhead, is from the pen of a noble diplomatist and will be read with interest: I have made a very agreeable trip to Birkenhead, which is a place rising, as if by enchantment, out of the desert, and bidding fair to rival, if not eclipse, the glories of Liverpool. Seven years ago there were not three houses on that side of the Mersey,—there are now about 20,000 inhabitants; and on the spot where within that time Sir W. Stanley's hounds killed a fox in the open field, now stands a square larger than Belgrave-square, every house of which is occupied. At Liverpool there are now ten acres of docks, the charges for which are enormous; at Birkenhead there will be 47 acres, with rates two-thirds lower, which will gradually diminish until (supposing trade to continue prosperous) they will almost disappear, and the docks become the property of the public at the end of thirty years. It would have been worth the trouble of the journey to make acquaintance with the projector and soul of this gigantic enterprise, a certain Mr. Jackson. With his desire to create a great commercial emporium proceeds, pari passu, that of improving and elevating the condition of the labouring classes there, and before his docks are even excavated he is building houses for 300 families of workpeople, each of which is to have three rooms and necessary conveniences to be free of all taxes, and plentifully supplied with water and gas, for 2s. 6d. a week for each family. These houses adjoin the warehouses and docks, where the people are to be employed, and thence is to run a railroad to the sea, and every man liking to bathe will be conveyed there for a penny. There are to be washhouses, where a woman will be able wash the linen of her family for 2d.; and 180 acres have been devoted to a park, which Paxton has laid out, and nothing at Chatsworth can be more beautiful. At least 20,000 people were congregated there last Sunday, all decently dressed orderly, and enjoying themselves. Chapels and churches and schools for every sect and denomination abound. Jackson says he is sure he shall create as vigorous a public opinion against the public house as is to be found in the highest classes.—Times.

THE FUNDS.

	SAT. Nov. 29	MON. Dec. 1	TUES. Dec. 2	WED. Dec. 3	THUR. Dec. 4	FRI. Dec. 5
Bank Stock	203½	203½	203½	203½	203½	203½
3 per Ct. Red. Ann.	93½	93½	93½	93½	93½	93½
3 per Ct. Con. Ann.	94½	94½	94½	94½	94½	94½
3 per Ct. Red. Ann.	95½	95½	95½	95½	95½	95½
Long. An. Ex. 1860	10½	10½	10½	10½	10½	10½
Cons. for Acct.	95½	95½	95½	95½	95½	95½
Exc. Bills, pm.	19	21	18.20	14	13	..
Ind. Bds. un. 1000.	33	38
India Stock	261	261½	262	262
Austrian
Belgian Bonds	..	95½	..	95½
Brazilian 5 per Ct.	..	79	79
Chilian	96
Columb. ex. Venez.	..	16
Danish	..	86½	87	86
Dutch 4 per Cent.	91	92½	91½	92½	93	93½
Dutch 2½ per Cent.	58	59	59½	59½	59½	59½
Mexican	29½	31	30½	30½	30½	30½
Peruvian
Portug. conv.	58
Russian 5 per Cent.	..	112½
Spanish 5 per Ct.	27½	..	27.8	27.8
Do. 3 per Ct. ex. dv.	36½	..	37½	..	38	37.8

MARKETS.

CORN MARKET.

MONDAY, DEC. 1.—During the past week the arrivals of Wheat have been moderate, and of Barley and Oats considerable, the latter principally from Ireland. In addition to this, there is no great quantity of Wheat and Barley, but there are several cargoes of Irish Oats fresh up to this morning's market. There is not much animation in the Wheat trade; for superfine samples last Monday's prices are obtained, but for inferior descriptions barely as much money can be made; the condition of the new Wheat is tolerably dry. Bonded Wheat being difficult of disposal, holders are warehousing in expectation of a lower duty. Barley meets a dull sale for all descriptions; very fine Chevalier fetches 1s. less than this day week, and on other qualities the decline is greater. Beans and Peas are 1s. lower. The Oat trade partakes of the dullness in the Corn trade generally; the offers are for the most part 1s. under the prices made last Monday; and where ships are coming on demurrage, and for ill-conditioned Oats, of which the last arrival principally consists, the reduction is submitted to. For other sorts 6d. decline was taken, and towards the close of market a fair sale was effected.

S. H. LUCAS.

BRITISH.		Per Imperial Quarter.
Wheat, Essex,	Red 52 to 64	White 60 to 70
Kent, & Suffolk	51 62	56 66
Lincolnshire & Yorkshire	49 56	56 64
Scotch
Oats, Lincolnshire & Yorkshire Feed	25 27	..
Ditto	Polands	New 26 28
Scotch Feed	26 28	Potato 29 30
Limerick	25 27
Ditto	Fine New 27 29	Old Fine none
Cork
Waterford, Youghal, & Cork Black	23 25	..
Sligo	24 26	..
Galway	24 25	..
Barley	32 39
Beans, Mazagan	New 38 40	Old 43 45
Harrow	40 44	..	48 50
Small	42 46	..	50 53
Peas, White	Boilers	60 61
Grey	40. 41	Maple	42 44
Flour, Town-made	per sack of 280 lbs.	..	48 50
Norfolk and Suffolk	46 50

FOREIGN.

		FREE. IN BOND.
Wheat, Dantzic, high mixed	50 to 68	46 52
Rostock	58	62 44 48
Stettin	57	62 43 46
Hamburg	54	59 42 45
Odesa	48	52 40 42
Odesa Polish	52	58 40 43
Russian	soft	50 59
Ditto	hard	48 57
Spanish
Ditto	White
Australian	60 69
Barley, Grinding	27 30
Distilling	30 32
Oats, Archangel	27 28	24 25
Danish	27 28	24 22
Swedish	25 26	22 23
Stralsund
Dutch Feed	23 25	20 22
Brew	29 35	26 32
Polands	30 32	28 32
Beans, Egyptian	41 42	40 41
Peas, White
Ditto Boilers	none

Flour, Canada, fresh, per barrel of 196 lbs.	34	35
United States	32	35
Dantzic
Australian, per sack of 280 lbs.
Account of CORN, &c., arrived in the Port of London, from Nov. 24 to Nov. 29, 1845, both days inclusive.
	Wheat.	Barley.	Oats.	Beans.	Peas.
English.....	4511	10691	6083	1509	2999
Scotch.....	274	3647	2501	..	92
Irish.....		504	26508
Foreign.....	14541	2462	5774	1753	4653
Flour, 8154 sacks; 2819 barrels.

FRIDAY, DEC. 5.—The announcement contained in the leading article of the Times of yesterday, together with the additional remarks of this morning with respect to the intention of Ministers to bring forward measures for an immediate repeal of the Corn Laws, have had the effect of completely stopping business, except to a very limited extent, with buyers who are absolutely compelled to purchase. Such business as is transacted is at about late rates; but generally offers are so low, that factors refuse to sell. The only alteration in the duties yesterday was a decline of 1s. on Barley.

S. H. LUCAS.

Account of CORN, &c., arrived in the Port of London, from the 28th of November to the 5th of December, both inclusive.
	English.	Irish.	Foreign.
Wheat	2510	..	3190
Barley	2660	200	..
Oats	820	9710	2500
Flour, 2790 sacks.

LONDON AVERAGES for the Week ending Dec. 2, 1845.

Wheat	Barley	Oats	Rye	Beans	Peas	Flour
Qrs.	Price.	Qrs.	Price.	Qrs.	Price.	Qrs.
Wheat	8599 63s. 2d.	Rye	34 39s. 2d.
Barley	6701 35s. 4d.	Beans	1378 41s. 11d.
Oats	24966 26s. 3d.	Peas	1443 48s. 6d.

IMPERIAL AVERAGES, Weeks ending

	Wheat.	Barley.	Oats.	Rye.	Beans.	Peas.
	s. d.	s. d.	s. d.	s. d.	s. d.	s. d.
25th Oct.	59	5. 33	0. 24	11. 34	5. 45	5. 44
1st Nov.	60	1. 34	3. 26	2. 33	2. 45	3. 43
8th "	59	7. 35	1. 25	2. 35	7. 45	1. 44
15th "	58	6. 35	0. 26	3. 38	2. 44	5. 45
22d "	57	11. 34	1. 25	5. 37	1. 43	4. 45
29th "	58	2. 33	2. 26	0. 35	4. 41	9. 45
Aggregate Average of the Six Weeks. Wheat, 58s. 11d.; Barley
34s. 1d.; Oats, 25s. 6d.; Rye, 35s. 8d.; Beans, 44s. 3d.
Peas, 44s. 11d.

MEAT MARKET.

The favourable change of weather rather improved the trade. The demand was good; but advanced prices were given very reluctantly.—Some carcasses of Wether Mutton were received from Holland; the quality was highly promising, and they met ready and good sale, being in good condition.

PER STONE OF 8 LBS. BY THE CARCASE.

Prime Beef..	3s	4d to 3s	8d	Middl.Mutton	3s	4d to 3s	8d
Middling do.	3s	2d to 3s	4d	Veal, from ..	4s	0d to 4s	8d
Plain, or infe-				Small Pork ..	4s	8d to 5s	4d
rior Beef... 2s	4d to 2s	10d		Large, or infe-
Prime Mutton	4s	0d to 4s	4d	rior Pork ..	3s	6d to 3s	10d

THE LONDON GAZETTE.

FRIDAY, Nov. 28.

BANKRUPTS.

L. LONG and A. B. SMITH, Charthouse Square, boarding-housekeeper. [Messrs. Hindmarsh and Son, Jewin Street, Cripplegate.

T. M. FORRESTER, Gresham Street, City, woollen factor. [Messrs. Soles and Turner, Aldermanbury.

A. PALMER, Feltwell, Norfolk, druggist. [Messrs. Isaacson and Martyr, Norfolk Street, Strand.

H. ROBINSON, Copthall Chamber, Copthall Court, City, sharebroker. [Mr. Spiller, Camomile Street.

G. BOND, Epsom, licensed victualler. [Mr. Pile, Castle Street, Holborn.

V. ELLIS, Wisbech St. Peter's, Cambridge, bootmaker. [Messrs. Flagdale and Co., Essex Street, Strand.

M. COOKE, Denton, Manchester, builder. [Mr. Brooks, Ashton-under-Lyne.

G. ATKINS, Liverpool, brewer. [Messrs. Bridger and Blake, London Wall.

T. and G. SNAITH, Bishop Auckland, Durham, ironmongers. [Messrs. Crosby and Compton, Church Court, Old Jewry.

DIVIDENDS.

Dec. 19, H. D. Walker, Eaton Socon, Bedfordshire, innkeeper.—W. Poynter, Upper Holloway, warehouseman.—E. Knyvet, Great Stanmore, teacher of music.—M. Allen, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden.—J. Peters, Godstone, innkeeper.—J. A. Hensman, Margate, bill broker.—W. Richardson, King Street, Covent Garden.—E. May, Aldgate High Street, draper.—Dec. 10, J. Ashbarry, Holm Lane, Herefordshire.—Dec. 22, W. Jackson, Charlotte Street, Fitzroy Square, paperhanger.—C. Webb, Oxford, apothecary.—Dec. 23, E. M. Laughlin, Long Lane, Bermondsey.—W. R. Watts, Bath, chemist.—E. Barry, Bristol, victualler.—J. Haigh, Hogley, Yorkshire, clothier.—Dec. 30, W. Lowe, Bristol, turner.—Jan. 9, W. Turner, Manchester, cabinet maker.

CERTIFICATES.

Dec. 19, W. Mossman, Clark's Place, Islington, stationer.—J. Burrell, Thetford, Norfolk, ironfounder.—J. R. Leary, Mark Lane, wine merchant.—T. Sanderson, Liverpool, coal merchant.—T. Forsyth, Dinsdale Spa, Durham, hotel keeper.

SCOTCH SEQUESTRATIONS.

W. Trellis Nimmo, Glasgow, gas manufacturer.—S. Fraser, Esq., Foyers—William Meikleham, Glasgow, writer.—J. McKenzie, Irvine, innkeeper.—W. Johnston, Castlehill, Muiravonside, farmer.

TUESDAY, Dec. 2.

BANKRUPTS.

J. CLARK, Crescent, Minorities, merchant. [Messrs. Marten and Co., Mincing Lane.

S. PHILLIPS, Kingston-upon-Hull, hatter. [Messrs. Capes and Stewart, Gray's Inn.

W. G. TAYLOR and E. GUY, Liverpool, hosiers. [Mr. Reed, Friday Street, Cheapside.

B. BALDWIN, Liverpool, warehouseman. [Messrs. Mardon and Pritchard, Christchurch Chambers, Newgate Street.

J. BROMILLY, Bolton-le-Moors, Lancashire, manufacturer. [Mr. Sutton, Manchester.

E. REDWOOD, jun., Windmill Street, Lambeth. [Mr. Long, King Street, Cheapside.

J. MAYLARD, Fetter Lane, grocer. [Mr. Johnson, Walcot Square, Lambeth.

DIVIDENDS.

Dec. 23, J. T. Maund, Birmingham, laceman.—E. M. Marks, Mortimer Street, Cavendish Square, upholsterer.—T. W. Wells, Devonshire Street, Portland Place, merchant.—A. Bower, Manchester, banker.—J. Schofield, Greenacre's Moor, Lancashire.—J. Sugden, Huddersfield, cloth manufacturer.—H. Warburton, Manchester, Joiner.—Sir R. Graham, Bart., and Co, Manchester, merchants.

CERTIFICATES.

Dec. 23, J. Giles, Headless Brass, Worcestershire, publican.—R. Buckler, Portsea, grocer.—J. C. Kemp, Liverpool, merchant.—M. Murphy, Shrewsbury, haberdasher.

SCOTCH SEQUESTRATIONS.

A. Fraser, Inverness, grocer.—D. Young, Dunkeld, merchant.—J. C. Banks, Edinburgh, ironmonger.—T. Trunch, Edinburgh, wood merchant.

Price One Shilling; by post, One and Sixpence.
WHAT TO EAT, DRINK, AND AVOID. Addressed to the Nervous and Dyspeptic. By R. J. CUNNINGHAM, M.D., Member of the Royal College of Surgeons, &c. Sherwood, 23, Paternoster-row, and all Booksellers, or direct from the Author, 21, Arundel-street, Strand.

AMERICAN NOTES.—DR. DICKSON'S LECTURES on the Chrono-Thermal System of Medicine, with an Introduction and Notes by H. H. CUNNINGHAM, M.D., of New York. Price 2s. 6d. "The day is not distant when the Chrono-Thermal System will be universally received. The bones of Samuel Dickson may first be mouldering in the dust, and his spirit rest with God who gave it, but truth will at last triumph, and posterity will render to his memory the merit which is his due."—New York Independent.
 Simpkin & Co., Stationers-court; J. Oliver, Pall-mall. 13 Copies for 12s.

NEW CHRISTMAS BOOK BY MR. DICKENS.
 In December will be published, price 5s., small 8vo.,
THE CRICKET ON THE HEARTH.
 A FAIRY TALE OF HOME.
 By CHARLES DICKENS.

The Illustrations by Clarkson Stanfield, Esq., U.A.: Daniel Maclise, Esq., R.A.: John Leech, Esq.; and Richard Doyle, Esq.

Also, by the same Author, in prose. Being a Ghost Story of Christmas. Sixth Edition. Price Five Shillings.

THE CHIMES. A Goblin Story of some Hells that Rang an Old Year Out and a New Year In. Twelfth Edition. Price 7s. 6d. By Charles Kingsley, London: Printed and Published for the Author, by Bradbury and Evans, 90, Fleet-street, and Whitefriars.

NEW MORNING PAPER. to be commenced Early in the New Year.—THE DAILY NEWS. MORNING NEWSPAPER OF LONDON. By JOHN THORNTON, PROPRIETOR.

The leading features of the Paper may be briefly stated:—for the following heads:—
 Its CITY NEWS and COMMERCIAL INTELLIGENCE, collected from the highest sources, will be scrupulously impartial, and always strictly correct.
 Its FOREIGN and BUSINESS INFORMATION on every topic connected with RAILWAYS, whether in actual operation, in progress, or projected, will be found to be complete.

An extensive system of FOREIGN CORRESPONDENCE in all parts of the world has been, for some time, in the course of organisation.
 Its PARLIAMENTARY REPORTS, its LAW REPORTS, and every other item of such matter, will be furnished by Gentlemen of the highest qualifications.

Among the writers of its LEADING ARTICLES, its CRITICISMS on BOOKS, the DRAMA, MUSIC, and the FINE ARTS, are some of the most distinguished names of this time.

The LITERARY DEPARTMENT OF THE DAILY NEWS will be under the direction of MR. CHARLES DICKENS.

The Counting-house, and Office for Advertisements intended for insertion in THE DAILY NEWS, will be at No. 90, FLEET STREET, LONDON; to which place any communications for the Editor should be addressed, until the Publishing Offices in WHITEFRIARS shall be completed.

THE CORN AND PROVISION TRADES.—The deficiency of the harvest, the failure of the Potato Crop, and the consequent serious effects upon commercial and monetary affairs, excite great apprehension. Under such circumstances, correct information as to the produce of the harvest, the extent of the failure of the potato crop, the state of the markets, the stock of grain on hand, on the continent of Europe, and in the United States, is of the highest importance. No trouble or expense is spared to furnish such information, which is brought down to the latest moment of going to press, in the MARK LANE EXPRESS, which has shewn for many years the authority in the Corn and Provision Trade of England and in foreign countries. Published every Monday in time for post, and may be had by order of all Booksellers, Newsmen, &c. Office, 24, Norfolk Street, Strand. Price 12s. 6d. per annum.

THE TENANT FARMERS' ADVOCATE.—It is abundantly manifest that the position of the Agricultural Interest as a class is undergoing and must undergo a great change. In such change the relative position of "LANDLORD AND TENANT" will form the most important feature, and the establishment of a sound system of "Tenants' Rights" will be a cardinal point for "Tenant Farmers." For fourteen years THE MARK LANE EXPRESS and AGRICULTURAL JOURNAL has been the zealous and uncompromising advocate of the Tenant's Rights, and the conviction that the interests of the Tenant are vitally involved in the question, the columns of this journal will be continuously devoted to its discussion and elucidation. Published every Monday in time for post. May be had by order of all Booksellers and Newsmen. Office, 24, Norfolk Street, Strand. London. Price 12s. 6d. per annum.

TO MINISTERS OF THE GOSPEL, SUNDAY SCHOOL TEACHERS, AND OTHERS.
 Reverend Sirs and Gentlemen,—On Saturday, November 1st, I commenced publishing in Weekly Penny Numbers, the most splendid edition ever printed of "MATTHEW HENRY'S COMMENTARY," complete. 35 subjects, as I have before said, is to be supplied to Commentaries to the poor man as well as to the rich, and through your help and your recommendations, ten of thousands will avail themselves of this glorious opportunity to possess one of the most valuable and useful of books. Numerous benevolent individuals must be known amongst you who will gladly pay their shilling a week to circulate amongst the deserving poor twelve copies of a valuable Commentary.

That eminent and learned man, the Rev. Thomas Chalmers, D.D., says, in a letter to me respecting this Commentary and my general plan, "I approve highly of the object of your publication and wish it all success," and the Hon. and Rev. Baptist W. Noel also observes, "I heartily wish your work success."

Magazines of all denominations have universally come forward in praise of my scheme. It is impossible to extract the opinions expressed by their eminent editors. I will, therefore, content myself with quoting the "Christian Witness" of October, 1845. When speaking of the "Domestic Bible," published by me, it says:—"All the chief religious periodicals of the time, without exception, concert, or collusion, employed the most superlative expression that language admits, in praise of this work. Mr. Arnold is personally unknown to us," &c. &c.; and again, the "Christian Examiner," in October, 1845, says (perhaps with too much zeal in speaking my praise):—"We regard him as a benefactor of his race, and are sure we are that his labours as a publisher will command the admiration of the virtuous and wise."

Reverend Sirs and Gentlemen,—I rest myself entirely on your sympathy to spread these works. This perusal of the matter contained in the three-penny editions, and, moreover, it will be illustrated on the plan of the "Domestic Bible," with scenes and customs, and not with fanciful pictures; and again, it will be a reprint of the folio edition, and not a "cut and carved" edition, to suit the fancies and whims of the publisher's vanity. I remain, Reverend Sirs and Gentlemen, your faithful servant,
 THOMAS ARNOLD.

Part I., containing the four first Numbers, price 4d., will be ready on Dec. 1st.

P.S.—Sunday School Teachers, with their Minister's recommendations, appointed agents for the sale of my publications.
 Paternoster Row, London, 1845.

WILLIAM BROWN, Esq.—MR. AGNEW has the pleasure to inform the Subscribers to the Series of Portraits of the National Anti-Corn-Law League, that Mr. Du Val has just finished a PORTRAIT OF WILLIAM BROWN, Esq., which will be immediately engraved. The artist who will have a copy will please to forward their names to Mr. Agnew, Repository of Arts, Manchester; or his sole agent, Mr. Black, at the League Rooms, Market street; and Messrs. Ackermann and Co., Strand, London.

Autograph Proofs £1 10 6 each.
 India Proofs 1 1 0
 Lettered ditto 0 10 6
 Prints 0 10 6

Mr. Agnew has no connection with any other portrait of Mr. Brown, nor has any one any authority to canvass for him.

Several other portraits of Leaguers are in a forward state. As soon as the series is complete, an Historical Account of the National Anti-Corn-Law League, with a memoir of the individuals whose portraits have been engraved, will be printed.

The following portraits are now finished:—
 Richard Cobden, Esq., M.P. John Bright, Esq., M.P.
 Robert Peel, Esq., M.P. George Wilson, Esq.
 Milner Gibson, Esq., M.P. Brotherton, Esq., M.P.
 Hon. C. Villiers, M.P. Dr. Bowring, M.P.
 John Brooks, Esq. William Rawson, Esq.
 Henry Ashworth, Esq. Colonel Thompson.
 Sir Thomas Potter.

STANDARD TRAVELLING STATIONERY WAREHOUSE.—STATIONERY, Travelling Writing desks, Envelopes and Dressing-cases, Portfolios, and Blotting-books, Inkstands, Gold and Silver Ever-pointed Pencils, Cases, Pearl and Ivory Tablets, &c.; Bibles and Prayers, in plain and elegant bindings. Name-plate engraved for 2s. 6d.; 100 best cards, 2s. 6d.; superfine letter-paper, from 8s. the ream; note-paper, from 3s. the ream; with every article in stationery of the best quality and lowest prices.
 At LOMBARD ST., No. 443, Strand, facing Catherine-street. Envelopes, 6d., 10d., and 1s. the 100.

WRITING INK.
WHITAKERS' FRENCH JET WRITING INK.

This splendid freely-flowing Ink is adapted for either steel or quill-pens, and will be found the most desirable for all offices, and for all climates, with every article in stationery of the best quality and lowest prices.
 At LOMBARD ST., No. 443, Strand, facing Catherine-street. Envelopes, 6d., 10d., and 1s. the 100.

STOOPING OF THE SHOULDERS AND CONTRACTION OF THE CHEST are entirely prevented, and gently and effectually removed in Youth and Ladies and Gentlemen, by the occasional use of the Improved Elastic Chest Expander, which, by its gentle and steady pressure, gradually and uniformly expands the chest, and thus prevents the chest from stooping, and the shoulders from contracting, and the chest from becoming contracted, and the shoulders from stooping. Sent per post, by Mr. A. JENSON, Sole Manufacturer and Proprietor, 40, Tavistock-street, Covent Garden, London, or full particulars on receiving a postage stamp.

THE OXFORD AND SALISBURY DIRECT RAILWAY.

Chairman—Thomas Downes, Esq.
 Engineer-in-Chief—Samuel Charles Bress, Esq.
 Solicitors—Messrs. Elmslie and Preston, 47, Moorgate-street.

The Committee of Management have the pleasure to announce that the proper notices have been published in the London Gazette and provincial newspapers, and that the plans, sections, and books of reference have been deposited in the Parliamentary offices and with the Clerks of the Peace in the several counties through which the line is proposed to pass. The Committee are further desirous to state that testimonials in favour of the line have been most numerous signed by the landowners, tradesmen, farmers, and inhabitants of every town throughout the county proposed to be traversed; and that the engineer of the Company assures them that the construction of the intended railway will be completed at very much less expense than he originally contemplated.

By Order of the Board.
 Moorgate Chambers, Moorgate-street, Dec. 1, 1845. Z. HUBBARD, Sec.

VOTE FOR KENT.
KENT—LONG LEASEHOLD, at a Nominal Rent of 3s. a year, and Vote for the County—TO BE SOLD, with immediate possession, a comfortable and compact Cottage, in good repair, with coach-house, two-stall stable, and every requisite for a small and respectable private family. The house stands in about an acre of garden ground, and about 18 miles from town, and the surrounding land is most beautiful. Price 400 guineas, part of which may remain on mortgage if the purchaser wish. Apply to Messrs. Finch and Shephard, solicitors, 21, Old Jewry, London.

VOTES FOR WEST KENT.
TO BE SOLD, EIGHT NEW FREEHOLD BRICK-BUILT COTTAGES (hand-tax redeemed, in the town of Cranbrook (3½ miles from the Staplehurst station on the South-Eastern Railway) for 75 guineas each, paying about 7½ per cent. Also other freehold House and Cottage Property to be sold in small lots, equally remunerative, affording qualifications for at least 12 voters. For further particulars, inquire of Mr. Charles Ranger, druggist, Cranbrook, or Messrs. Willis and Co., solicitors, Cranbrook.

FREEHOLDERS' BUILDING SOCIETY, Manchester. Shares, £50. Subscription, 10s. per Month.

John Brooks, Esq., President. Alderman Ekanah Armitage.
 Alderman William Harvey. W. Rawson, Esq.
 Alderman Charles J. S. Walker. W. Evans, Esq.

BANKERS—Messrs. Cunliffe, Brooks, & Co., Market-street.

SECRETARY—Mr. William Jackson Kelghley, 9, Princess-street, Manchester.

The object of this Society is to assist the middle and industrious classes to obtain Freehold Dwelling-houses of their own, and more especially to create a spirit of independence in the latter, and to induce habits of economy in all who have a surplus of income beyond providing for their current requirements.

2880 Shares have now been taken up. It is evident this Society will be very large, so as not only to afford a good profit to those who have savings to invest, but to enable them to secure a wish to borrow money. From the present amount of Shares the Trustees will have to receive £140 every Calendar month, which according to the constitution of the Society has to be lent out to members of the Society on real or leasehold security, so that not only may small Shareholders be at once accommodated, but those circumstances render it desirable may take up £2000 or £3000 at once.

By another adjournment of the first meeting of the Society to the 7th of January, 1846, other members have an opportunity of entering by paying the first month's subscription only—namely, 10s. on each Share.

A Sale of Shares will take place on the 16th day of January, 1846.

Persons wishing to take up Shares will do well to make early application, as the above will be the last adjournment, after which the back subscriptions will be required.

The peculiar feature in this undertaking is the facility afforded to Building Members to obtain the County Franchise in the first year; as, on all purchased Shares for building with, the monthly subscription may be reduced to 2s. 6d., thus leaving a surplus of rent beyond the encumbrance on mortgage sufficient to give a qualification.

Applications for Shares may be made to the Secretary, Mr. W. J. Kelghley, 9, Princess-street; Mr. John Hewitt, Solicitor, 47, King-street; Mr. W. Burton, Oldham st.; Mr. A. Burgess, printer, Victoria Arcade; and Mr. R. Owen, 8, Moreton-street, Strangeways, Manchester; where Rules, price 6d. and Prospectuses may be had.

H. R. H. THE PRINCE OF WALES, by gracious permission of her Majesty, from a picture by Winterhalter, at Windsor Castle. The House of Brunswick at one view. George I., George II., George III., George IV., William IV., Queen Charlotte, Queen Caroline, Princess Charlotte, the Duke of York, the Duke of Clarence, and the Duke of Kent, &c. The Robes of George IV. restored. The British Orders of the Garter, Bath, Thistle, and St. Patrick. The National Group. Mr. Cobden and Bishop of Exeter. "This is one of the best exhibitions in the metropolis."—The Times. Open from Eleven to Ten. Admission, 1s.; Napoleon's Room, 6d. Madame Tussaud's and Sons, Bazaar, Baker-street.

GENTLEMEN'S WINTER DRESS.

BURCH and LUCAS, 22, King William Street, London Bridge, opposite the Statue of William IV. Waterproof Overcoats, of the newest designs and best materials, kept ready, and made to order in the most improved style, at the lowest prices for Cash. The workmanship of every garment may be relied on being well and elegantly finished, the whole being made under the immediate superintendence of the Proprietors, who, being tailors, are able to answer for its superiority over the work generally sold, and which is entirely excluded from this Establishment.

An extensive and fashionable assortment of Dress and Great Coats, Summer Overcoats, Cloaks, Waistcoats, and Trousers, kept ready made.

32, King William Street, London Bridge.

LUXURY IN SHAVING.
JOHN GOSNELL and CO.'S AMBROSIAL SHAVING CREAM (Patronised by Prince Albert). This inimitable Cream possesses all the good qualities of the Finest Naples Soap, without the disagreeable smell usually attendant on that article, and in its state, it is a very healthy appearance, produces a creamy lather, which will not dry on the face, and emits in use the delightful flavour of the almond.

In Pots, price 2s. 6d., 3s. 6d., &c.

Perfumers to her Majesty, 112, Three King Court, Lombard-street, London. Manufacturers of Combs and Brushes of the best quality, and on the most approved principles.

BRUSHES—NEW INVENTIONS.

THE TRIPLE HAIR BRUSH. One stroke of this is equal to the effect of one penetrating, five small-tooth combs, and one cut comb, to be had in four sizes, No. 7, 6s. 6d., No. 8, 7s. 6d., No. 9, 8s. 6d., No. 10, 11s. 6d.

THE DOUBLE ANTI-PRESSURE NAIL BRUSH, which does not divide the quick from the nail, no pressure being required, and thoroughly cleans and polishes the nails in a tenth part of the time of any other method. Price, in Bone, No. 1, 2s. 2s. 6d. No. 3, 3s. 6d. No. 4, 4s. 6d. and of all sizes, and in Ivory.

THE NEW TOOTH-PICK BRUSH, which entirely enters between the interstices of the closest teeth; marks, full size brushes, No. 1, hard. No. 2, less hard. No. 3, middling. No. 4, soft. The Narrower Brushes, No. 5, hard. No. 6, less hard. No. 7, middling. No. 8, soft, at 1s. each, or 10s. per dozen in Bone, and 2s. each, or 21s. per dozen in Ivory, the Hair warranted never to come out.

THE MEDIUM SHAVING BRUSH, between the usual Badger Hair and Bristle Brush, being a selection of the strongest Hair only from the Badger Skin, in a variety of sizes, both in Bone and Ivory.

The above articles are the Inventions of HOSKINS and SONS, 119 and 120, Bishopsgate-street, London, and being protected, any one imitating them will be proceeded against.

CAUTION.—All persons advertising Succedaneum for stopping decayed teeth, fraudulently attempt to imitate Mr. Clarke's original Succedaneum, and if any Succedaneum than Mr. Clarke's be purchased, it will be discovered useless. Mr. Clarke can say, without the slightest exaggeration, that he has sold 3000 bottles of Succedaneum within 16 months; and 2800 individuals have been able to use it successfully; and most of the other purchasers have been able to Mr. Clarke, at his residence, Lower Grosvenor-street, London, to have their teeth stopped, without any further charge than the original cost of the Succedaneum, price 3s. Sold wholesale to all the chemists in town and country, and none in genuine unless had through Messrs. Barclay and Sons, Medical and Medicines Warehouse, 65, Abchurch-lane; or Messrs. Edwards and Son, 67, St. Paul's Church-yard; or Messrs. G. & C. Oxford-street; or Messrs. 139, Upper Thames-street, London; and other respectable wholesale Medicine Warehouses; or Mr. Clarke can send it by post to any part of the United Kingdom, on receiving a Post-office Order.

FOR STOPPING DECAYED TEETH, however large the cavity.—Patronised by Her Majesty the Queen Dowager, her Royal Highness the Duchess of Gloucester, his Grace the Duke of Wellington, and the principal Nobility.—MR. CLARKE'S SUCCEDANEUM, for stopping decayed teeth, is far superior to anything ever used before, as it is placed in the tooth without any pressure or pain, becomes as hard as the enamel immediately after application, and remains firm in the tooth for years, and only requiring extraction in unusual cases, but also making it again useful for mastication. All persons can use Mr. CLARKE'S SUCCEDANEUM themselves with ease, as full directions are enclosed. Price 6s., and sold by all respectable Medicine Vendors in town and country; and can be sent by post, on receiving a Post-office Order. Prepared only by Mr. CLARKE, Surgeon, 61, Grosvenor-street, Golden-square, removed from 63, Harley-street, Cavendish-square. LOSS OF TEETH.—MR. CLARKE still continues to supply the loss of teeth, from one to a complete set, upon his beautiful system of Self-adhesion, which has procured him such universal recognition in all the thousands of testimonials, and in the numerous testimonials of the Medical Profession, as being the most ingenious system of supplying artificial teeth hitherto invented. They are so contrived as to adapt themselves over the most tender gums, or remaining in the mouth, and thus saving the least pain, and the least danger, and the extraction quite unnecessary, and in order that his system may be within the reach of the most economical, he will continue the same moderate charges. Mr. CLARKE, Surgeon-Dentist, No. 61, Grosvenor-street, Golden-square, London. At home from eleven till four.

NUMBER ONE, ST. PAUL'S CHURCHYARD.

As new goodness is not helped by praise, nor injured by reproach, so the BLACK TEA, at 4s. 6d. per lb., sold by D. KIN and COMPANY, owes its popularity solely to its intrinsic excellence.

Orders from the country forwarded Carriage Free.

THE EIDER DOWN QUILT is the warmest, the lightest, and the most elegant, covering; it is adapted for either the bed, the couch, or the carriage. Also Gorse Down Quilts at half the price. Eider Down. List of prices sent free on application to HEAL and SON, Bedding Manufacturers, 190, opposite the Chapel, Tottenham-court-road.

CHRISTMAS PRESENTS.

LOTT'S NINTH ANNUAL GRAND DISTRIBUTION of Christmas Presents. Rich Cakes, Ornamented, &c. 1233 Prizes in 5000 Shares. One Shilling each. The Drawing commences at 2 o'clock on Monday, Dec. 15th, at Brunswick House, 11, Bridge-street, Lambeth. The Prizes are all of the best quality, with artistic decorations, and worthy of public inspection.

CAUTION.—W. BERDOE feels it due, both to the Public and himself, to state, that certain parties are dishonestly attaching his name, address, and label, to garments intended to pass as his; also to a professedly waterproof composition, neither of which are made by him; and to state that the parties travelling for the purpose, is, it is proved, producing both in London and the provinces, a great deal of business. Many have bought largely, under the idea of being "Sole Agents" for their respective towns. Berdoe's well known and really Waterproof OVEIT-COATS, &c., are made, and sold in London, only at 69, Cornhill (north side), where they are always to be seen, and inspected. It is Berdoe and Burton, 39, Oxford-street (corner of Newman-street). Established in Wells-street, 1820.

IVORY-HANDLED TABLE KNIVES, 10s. per dozen; Ivory-handled table knives, with high shoulders, 10s. per dozen, if to balance, is per dozen extra; dessert, 8s.; carvers, 3s. 6d. per pair, white bone table knives, 6s. per dozen; dessert, 4s.; carvers, 2s. per pair; black horn table knives, 6s. per dozen; dessert, 4s.; carvers, 2s. 6d.; table steels, 1s. each. Table knives, with handles of the celebrated substitute for silver, only by R. and B. (which cannot be distinguished from sterling silver except by the per dozen, 12s. 6d. per pair; carvers, 18s. carvers, per pair, 6s. 6d. All marked "RIPPOON and HURTON," and warranted.

Rippon and Burton's Stock of General Furnishing Ironmongery is literally the largest in the world. They regret they cannot employ any language which can convey an adequate impression of its variety and extent; they therefore invite visitors to call and inspect it.—Rippon and Burton, 39, Oxford-street (corner of Newman-street). Established in Wells-street, 1820.

PATENT PORTABLE SUSPENSION STOVES.

MORE THAN FOUR THOUSAND of these STOVES were sold during the last winter. They have the most unqualified recommendation of the first medical practitioners of the day; because, while they yield a most genial heat, they prevent any noxious gases from the atmosphere, and ventilate the apartment they warm. They are manufactured in various sizes, for chambers, libraries, and conservatories, from 18s. and upwards; and are also made with two, three, and four pipes, for churches, chapels, or halls, according to the dimensions of the building.

GEORGE and JOHN DEANE, opening to the Monument, 46, King William-street, London-bridge.

JONES'S £4. 4s. SILVER LEVER WATCHES

warranted not to vary more than half a minute per week, are selling at the Monument, 46, King William-street, opposite Somerset-house. They combine the truth of a mathematical instrument with the elegance of an ornament of taste. On receipt of a Post-office order for 1s. above the price, a Watch will be sent free to any part of the kingdom. Read Jones's "Sketch of Watch Work," sent free for a 2d. stamp.

THE most agreeable APERIENT is WATER, its operation being instantaneous, and without the slightest uneasiness; consequently, it is found to be a remedy preferable to every other for indigestion, costiveness, bile, &c. But those who desire to relieve effectually the stomach, and to restore its natural phlegm, and to resort to it without difficulty, must apply 4s. with Dr. Scott's Aperient Vase, which even invalids and ladies may use easily. Sold only by W. Price, 369, Strand, the third house from Exeter Hall. Also SONTIER'S, variable in power, so that a deaf person may magnify voices to whatever pitch enables him to hear best. Descriptions sent post free on receipt of two letter stamps.

ROWLAND'S MACASSAR OIL, for inducing an exuberant growth of hair, and for imparting a permanent gloss, and a tendency to curl, remains unrivalled. Weakness, premature greyness, relapsing baldness, or hair falling out, being entirely prevented by this "invaluable" oil. Being universally preferred, its consequent great demand excites the cupid of unprincipled Shopkeepers, who vend the most spurious trash as "Macassar Oil." It is, therefore, imperative on Purchasers to see that the words are engraved in two lines on the Vase, and on the back of the Wrapper nearly 1500 times, containing 25.02s. half-penny. Price 3s. 6d., 7s., family bottles (equal to 4 small), 10s. 6d., and double that size, 21s. per bottle. Sold by the Proprietors at 20, Hatton-garden, London, and by Chemists and Perfumers.

ROWLAND'S MACASSAR OIL

ANOTHER HIT AT THE CATTLE SHOW.

Two gentlemen, a day or two ago, Chatted together at the Cattle Show.

"What do you think," said one, "of what you've seen?"

"Dye think the animals are fat or lean?"

"To be frank, from all that you have noticed here, That prize has improved the present state of the prize?"

"Well," said the other, "I have noticed all, Nor am I disappointed with a stall."

The Cattle Show of Eighteen Forty-Five Is very good, and things appear to thrive.

But, still, the prizes did not please my mind So much as prizes of a different kind.

I went to MOSES' Mart the other day— And didn't I behold a fine display?

MOSES and SON'S superior prize attire Is such as every body must admire.

I went to see them with my own free will, Being attracted by a posting bill.

And though I only went to use my eye, Very soon my vision felt inclined to buy.

For in each price of MOSES I could find Economy and excellence combin'd.

Really, 'quoth he, "you ought to visit there; Ditto, I suppose we take a cab from Portman-square."

This was enough; the other on agreed, And off they set at tolerable speed.

Nor did they once regret what they had done, In honouring E. MOSES and his SON.

LIST OF PRICES.

READY MADE.

Beaver Tails £ 8 0

Cheshamfield or Coddingtons 0 6 0

Drury's, Athol's, Pembroke, and every description of winter coats 1 5 0

Drury's, Athol's, Pembroke, and every description of winter coats 1 5 0

Drury's, Athol's, Pembroke, and every description of winter coats 1 5 0

Drury's, Athol's, Pembroke, and every description of winter coats 1 5 0

Drury's, Athol's, Pembroke, and every description of winter coats 1 5 0

Drury's, Athol's, Pembroke, and every description of winter coats 1 5 0

Drury's, Athol's, Pembroke, and every description of winter coats 1 5 0

Drury's, Athol's, Pembroke, and every description of winter coats 1 5 0

Drury's, Athol's, Pembroke, and every description of winter coats 1 5 0

Drury's, Athol's, Pembroke, and every description of winter coats 1 5 0

Drury's, Athol's, Pembroke, and every description of winter coats 1 5 0

Drury's, Athol's, Pembroke, and every description of winter coats 1 5 0

Drury's, Athol's, Pembroke, and every description of winter coats 1 5 0

Drury's, Athol's, Pembroke, and every description of winter coats 1 5 0

Drury's, Athol's, Pembroke, and every description of winter coats 1 5 0

Drury's, Athol's, Pembroke, and every description of winter coats 1 5 0

Drury's, Athol's, Pembroke, and every description of winter coats 1 5 0

Drury's, Athol's, Pembroke, and every description of winter coats 1 5 0

Drury's, Athol's, Pembroke, and every description of winter coats 1 5 0

Drury's, Athol's, Pembroke, and every description of winter coats 1 5 0

Drury's, Athol's, Pembroke, and every description of winter coats 1 5 0

Drury's, Athol's, Pembroke, and every description of winter coats

THE LEAGUE.

No. 116.—VOL. III.]

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 13, 1845.

[3d.

NOTICE TO THE PUBLIC.

LEAGUE FUND.

All Subscribers of £1 and upwards to the LEAGUE FUND will be entitled to, and receive, a copy weekly of this publication for twelve months from the date of the receipt of their subscription.

Subscribers of half-a-crown, and under £1, will have forwarded to them a copy of THE LEAGUE, containing an acknowledgment of their subscription; and it is requested that all subscribers will be kind enough to send their names and addresses to the offices of THE LEAGUE, Newall's-buildings, Manchester, or 87, Fleet-street, London.

N.B. As there is considerable risk in the transmission of gold and silver by post, parties wishing to forward small contributions to THE LEAGUE FUND are particularly requested to make their remittances by post-office orders.

The Council of the League would also suggest to their friends in the country the importance of transmitting their copies of THE LEAGUE newspaper, after perusal, to such parties (more especially farmers) as may be either hostile or indifferent to the question of Free Trade.

By order of the Council,

JOSEPH HICKIN, Secretary.

MINISTERIAL CRISIS.

The Morning Herald of Thursday announced the resignation of Sir Robert Peel and the whole Cabinet. These resignations were accepted by her Majesty. Lord John Russell was immediately summoned by her Majesty to Osborne House. He went down to Southampton by an early train on Thursday, and returned to town by the midday train, on Friday. Nothing authentic has transpired as to the constitution of the new Ministry.

WHATEVER HAPPENS, QUALIFY! QUALIFY! QUALIFY!

At no period since the commencement of the County Qualification movement, have we written the above familiar words with a more intent and earnest solicitude that their import should be thoroughly understood, and universally acted upon, than at this present moment. As we come perceptibly nearer and nearer to the last crisis of our struggle—as every week, every day, visibly hastens the approach of the hour when the question will be palpably and formally that which it always has been virtually, one between the country and the oligarchy—we are increasingly anxious that it should find the people in the highest possible state of readiness for instant and decisive action.

The events of the past week have added tenfold weight and force to our great argument, that the people, and the people only—that is, the ELECTORS, who, in the eyes of politicians, are the people—can repeal the Corn Law. Again and again we say, no Minister can “give” us Free Trade. The statesman does not live who, in this matter, can be anything more than the executive agent and organ of the popular will, as expressed at the polling booths or on the registration list. If any one thought otherwise a week ago, he knows better now. Many persons had fancied that Sir Robert Peel could, of his own will, give Free Trade. It was imagined, that, with his extraordinarily complete ascendancy over a large, powerful, and obedient party—with an autocratic domination in the Cabinet and the Legislature, such as few British Ministers have ever wielded,—Sir Robert Peel might, under favour of the support tendered him by his political opponents, carry the repeal of the Corn Law with perfect certainty and tolerable facility. It was thought by some of us, that he had but to say “The thing must and shall be done”— and the thing would be done, as a matter of course. All a mistake. It turns out that Sir Robert Peel can do nothing of the kind. He has tried and failed. Sir Robert Peel has said “The thing must and shall be done”—and the consequence is, Sir Robert Peel is no longer a Minister of the Crown. Even he cannot beard landlordism with impunity; and if he cannot, no one can. Nobody has ever dreamed that there was a second man among living English statesmen, with powers and resources adequate to this stupendous task. Free Trade by mere fiat of a Minister is now seen to be a flat impossibility. The first Minister who has attempted it—the only Minister who, from his peculiar political position and relations, possibly could have attempted, with the slightest chance of success, to carry the country easily through this great legislative revolution—has broken down at the very outset of the enterprise. In becoming a Free Trader, he ceases to be a Minister. The power which made him has unmade him. There is now no one between the country and the oligarchy—the question is left altogether in the people's hands.

That is to say—as we have repeatedly urged on our readers, and now urge again more emphatically than ever—the question is left in the hands of those who, in the view of politicians and party leaders, and according to the constitution of the country, are the people—the LEGALLY QUALIFIED AND REGISTERED VOTERS. No power on earth can decide this contest but the power of votes—the legal power of votes actually given at the polling-booth, or the moral power of votes duly registered, and ready to be given, when called for. It is this power, and only this, that can put and keep any Minister in a position to propose and carry the abolition of the landlords' Corn Law. It is this power, and only this, that can depose the Richmonds and Buckinghams from their oligarchical throne, and wrench the sceptre from the hands of the bread-taxers. This is the only power they fear. It is not Sir Robert Peel and Lord John Russell that they live in awe of, but the 40s. freeholders. Their ravings the other day at their grand Protection Society meeting, show how they feel the reality and potency of our qualification movement. They find themselves losing the political monopoly, which is the sole prop and cement of their food monopoly. This is where they are hurt—and their cry of pain and passion is a signal to hit again, and hit hard.

We rejoice to be able to report that the work, thus far, is going on admirably well. The seven meetings within 10 days which Mr. Cobden and Mr. Bright have lately attended in different parts of the country, for the express purpose of stimulating and organising this county qualification movement, give cheering evidence of the intelligence and determination with which the matter is taken up by the Free Traders in not a few of our most important counties. In addition to all that had been previously done, since the last registration, in North Lancashire and the West Riding (where the Free Traders are qualifying by thousands), crowded and enthusiastic meetings have been held at Gloucester, Stroud, Bath, Bristol, Wootton-under-Edge, Nottingham, and Derby, which have resulted in the establishment of an active and efficient organisation for creating a Free Trade landed interest in the several counties belonging to those towns.

We trust, however, that all this is to be regarded only as the small beginning of that which will be done, before the 30th of January next shall close this year's qualification campaign. Whatever happens, we must go on with the work of WINNING COUNTIES. Nothing possibly can happen to supersede its necessity, or lessen its urgency. We are the more anxious to impress this distinctly on our readers, as it is possible that the prospect of an early general election—which, of course, will be taken on the registration of 1845—may appear, to some, to diminish the importance of endeavouring to obtain titles to votes, which will not be then available. Let no such consideration operate for a moment to induce a relaxation of effort. There could not be a graver practical error. Qualifications taken out now will tell in and upon the next House of Commons, even though the votes to which such qualifications confer a title should have no actual share in its election. The moral effect and impression of those electoral triumphs of which we are already assured, under the recent registration, will be amazingly enhanced if it be known that they are but an inconsiderable fraction of those which another appeal to the constituencies, a few months later, would produce—that there is yet a vast reserve fund of organised voting powers behind, which one more registration will develop into full activity. The Free Trade members for South Lancashire and the West Riding will stand in a far more authoritative and commanding position, if it be distinctly understood that there are more coming—that they are the representatives of a NEW POWER which, instead of having exhausted itself in the effort necessary to achieve a few brilliant successes, is still GROWING, still striking deeper root and shooting out lustrier branches. The importance of three, four, or half a dozen counties, actually won under the registration of 1845, will be immensely increased by the fact that a dozen or a score more are virtually won by qualifications which only need the formal ratification of the revising barrister. In no case whatever let the efforts of our friends be suspended or relaxed for an instant, merely because an election is likely to take place before those efforts can meet with their full and visible reward.

And who can tell what contingencies may arise after the next appeal to the constituencies? What if the House of Lords throw out the Bill for the total and immediate repeal of the Corn Law? What if a second general election should become necessary before all is settled? We only mention these things as possibilities; but the country must be prepared for ALL possibilities. There is no knowing what may happen before Free Trade reaches its destination in the statute-book. We only know that the faction is very strong, very angry, and daringly reckless and unscrupulous. They give us public warning that they are ripe for any madness. Their leader tells us, in their name, that they “look still to the hereditary peerage of England.” We must not expect to see this question carried without a tremendous struggle. We must arm ourselves with all the strength we can, present and prospective. Our only chance of an early and complete victory lies in making such an overwhelming demonstration of voting power, ready for whatever contingency may arise, as shall scare and paralyse the monopolists, and embolden the Free Trade Minister to resort unhesitatingly to ANY measures requisite for putting a prompt end to a system which threatens, as its death-hour approaches, to be, more than ever, “the blight of commerce, the bane of agriculture, the source of bitter divisions among classes, THE CAUSE OF PENURY, FEVER, MORTALITY, AND CRIME AMONG THE PEOPLE.”

With a full confidence in the energy, activity, and persevering steadiness of our countrymen, we commit this great issue to their hands. Whatever happens—let who may be “in,” or “out”—let there not be an instant's wavering of purpose, relaxation of effort, or loss of time. England and humanity have need now, not of eloquent talkers or enthusiastic and delighted listeners, but of EARNEST DOERS.

UNION OF THE MIDDLE AND WORKING CLASSES.

The excellent address of the Executive Committee of the Complete Suffrage Union to the working classes of Great Britain and Ireland, which we print in another column, will be read with lively satisfaction by all earnest Free Traders. We value it, not only as announcing the adhesion to our ranks of a gentleman of wide, public, and social influence, whose honesty and disinterestedness in any cause to which he devotes himself are above all question, but likewise as affording another proof, in addition to those which have of late so rapidly multiplied upon us, that the working classes of this country perfectly understand how deeply they are interested in the struggle against monopoly, and are fully determined to bear their part in it.

This is a most cheering feature—it is the most cheering feature—in the recent history of our agitation. Everywhere the working classes are with us, heart and hand. That, as Mr. Sturge says, "It is certain that the working classes, above all others, will benefit by the destruction of the monopoly of food," is now the conviction of thousands and thousands of those who, in the earlier years of the Free Trade movement, were indifferent or hostile. The signs of this altered state of feeling and opinion, with which, for some weeks past, our columns have abounded, yield a gratifying confirmation of the faith which we have always felt, and on which we have steadily acted, in the intelligence of the working men of Great Britain, and in the power of experience and discussion to win their eventual adhesion to the cause of just and sound principles. Everywhere they participate in the public meetings through which the national voice is now so powerfully expressing itself, and form the majority of those crowded and enthusiastic gatherings which strike terror into the ranks of monopoly, and turn the trembling balance of Ministerial policy. In some instances—as at Manchester, Glasgow, Preston, Lancaster and Kendal—working men have had meetings of their own, and conducted them in a way which amply attests their intelligence of their rights, and their determination to assert them. In others—as at Bolton and Gateshead—working men have moved and carried adjournments of public meetings to the evening, that they might the better be able to join their voice with that of the middle classes in denouncing the common wrongs of both. At the meeting of the inhabitants of Southwark, when certain of the old monopolist fallacies unexpectedly made their appearance once more above ground, they were promptly consigned, by working-class speakers, to the place whence they were taken. And among the most perspicuous and impressive memorials to the Premier for the opening of the ports, was that which appeared in our columns three weeks ago, from the Operative Cotton Spinners of Lancashire, Yorkshire, Cheshire, and Derbyshire.

Everywhere, without a single exception, so far as we recollect, have the working-men of England joined us in this crisis of our struggle. They have learned by experience. They remember past years of distress and privation. They have traced effects to their causes; and they know that like effects will again follow, now and always, from like causes. They see through, and laugh to scorn, the despicable "wages" mystification with which monopolists have sought to bamboozle them. That hoax will not do again. They understand, once for all, that capital and labour have common rights, common interests, and common wrongs; that profits and wages are not antagonistic elements, but simply different portions of the one great fund of industrial accumulation—both subjected to the same natural laws, and dependent on the same conditions for their increase or diminution; and that the capitalist and the labourer alike—the worker by head, and the worker by hand—are, after all, members of one and the same community of industrial producers.

This union of classes would, of itself—even apart from those peculiar circumstances of the present season which have so powerfully and unexpectedly accelerated the action of the public mind, and shaken the nerves of a Protectionist Ministry—be decisive of the early and complete success of our struggle. United, the middle and working classes must ever govern this country. As they make and keep the country, so do they, in the last resort, rule it. Never did they unite yet in a common course of national policy, without forcing that policy on the adoption of the Government. Nothing but their disunion can ever give even a temporary chance of ascendancy to any power, or combination of powers, adverse to their common rights and interests. It was the supineness of the middle classes that allowed of the enactment of the Corn Law of 1815—it has been, through a delusion of the working classes, that we are now in the eighth year of an Anti-Corn-Law agitation. The monopolists perfectly well understand this, and have accordingly, in former years, resorted to the most unscrupulous frauds and falsehoods to effect and perpetuate that disunion by which alone monopoly can subsist. All this is now for ever at an end. The trick is found out, and can never be tried again with the shadow of a chance of success. The working men of England have brought their sturdy will, and plain vigorous common-sense into the field against a bread-taxing oligarchy, and the fate of the Corn Law is as certain, and as near, as was the fate of Gatton and Old Sarum this time 14 years ago.

On every ground we rejoice in this union and fellowship of all the industrious classes in one common cause. It would have been a pity that the repeal of the Corn Law should have been carried without the aid of those who, "above all others, will benefit by the destruction of the monopoly of food." The victory would have lost half its moral and social value if achieved without their co-operation. We rejoice to triumph with and by them, and not merely for them. They would have been perfectly welcome to their natural and inevitable share of the fruits of our labours; but we like to see them take a share of the battle, too. It is their question, and we are delighted to see them adopt it as such. The working-men of England ought not to owe to the middle class, or to any other class, their fruition of the first of working-men's rights—the right to earn and eat.

The beneficial effects of this union of all ranks and orders of the industrial community, in the assertion and realisation of a common industrial right, will survive the attainment of its immediate object. Long after the Corn Law shall have ceased to exist, the moral results of a popular movement, which has brought together classes heretofore divided, will continue their benign operation. Men who have once worked together, and fought together, side by side—who have suffered under a common oppression, united in a common effort for self-deliverance, and won a common victory—are thenceforth linked by ties not lightly to be sundered. In the present union of the middle and working-classes of Great Britain—rather, of the different sections of the one class or community of British working-men—we have a tolerably sure pledge that class feelings, imaginary class interests, and sectional jealousies will not again resume their baneful influence.

TO THE WORKING CLASSES OF GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND.

FRIENDS AND FELLOW-COUNTRYMEN.—We are associated for the purpose of aiding you to obtain, by peaceable and Christian means an equal share in the choice of those who make the laws you are bound to obey; and though the right to civil, religious, and commercial freedom is based upon the same great principles, we have acted on the conviction that civil liberty should be first secured, inasmuch as religious and commercial freedom, obtained without it, would stand upon a precarious and uncertain foundation. Yet we deem it our duty at the present time to recommend a temporary deviation from this course.

By a dispensation of Providence, multitudes, especially in Ireland, are deprived of a large proportion of the food on which they chiefly depend for subsistence, and an obligation has thus been thrown upon every class to do all in its power to encourage a prompt and liberal import of provisions. This circumstance has also greatly increased the probability of a final and complete repeal of the Corn and Provision Laws, as many who were previously uninfluenced by the most cogent arguments are now, from the fear of the near approach of famine, ready to support such a measure.

Even if it were correct that the Anti-Corn-Law agitation has been a mere struggle between the manufacturing and landed aristocracy, it is certain that the working classes, above all others, will benefit by the destruction of the monopoly of food. And we are persuaded that among these benefits they may calculate upon one which has not hitherto had its full share of consideration—namely, the healing influence which this measure of justice will exercise in bringing many whose judgment is now blinded by their supposed interest in the existence of the Corn Laws, to see clearly the monstrous injustice of the present state of our representation, and to aid in the extinction of a system which gives to property and not to man, the elective franchise. It should never be forgotten that in former times some of the noblest sacrifices on behalf of the rights of the people have been made by those who derived their sole revenue from the soil of England.

Such a result we should not anticipate from any mere modification of the Corn Laws, and it rests with you to come forward and see that no compromise be made, and to give your support to nothing short of their entire repeal.

In offering our advice at the present crisis, we act on our individual responsibility, and while we respectfully but earnestly appeal to you not to stand by indifferent spectators of the exertions now making for the overthrow of the monopoly in food, we would as strongly urge you not to relax from any legitimate effort, until you have obtained those civil and political rights to which you are alike entitled by Christian equity and by the British Constitution. We are persuaded that a conviction of the injustice of withholding these rights is rapidly though silently progressing amongst those who have the power to grant them, and that this conviction will be accelerated by giving your unanimous and cordial support to measures for averting a great and impending national calamity, and for the complete removal of an iniquitous and disgraceful system, which, while it has long tarnished the character of this country, has at the same time inflicted an incalculable amount of suffering upon an oppressed but industrious people.

Signed, on behalf of the acting members of the Executive Committee of the Complete Suffrage Union.

JOSEPH STURGE, Chairman.

Birmingham, 12th month (December) 4th, 1845.

RETROSPECT OF THE CORN LAWS.

The enactment of a law to raise the price of food for the purpose of sustaining high rents, will render the year 1815 a more marked period in history even than the battle of Waterloo. This law was based on certain resolutions proposed in the House of Commons by Mr. F. Robinson, (now Earl of Ripon) on the 17th of February, 1815. In reading the speech with which the resolutions were introduced, it is rather curious to find that the precedent of restrictions on the wool trade was the argument on which the mover principally relied, because that very trade now forms the most striking instance which analogy can afford of the inutility of restrictive laws to protective interests, and their detriment to all other classes. Among the opponents of the proposed law, we find Sir Robert Peel, the father of the present Premier, and we shall extract a portion of one of his speeches:

"He was anxious to correct a mistake which seemed to prevail in the House, that the interests of the landowner and manufacturer were conflicting and incompatible. They were in the view of enlightened policy the same, and the success or ruin of the one was the success or ruin of the other; inasmuch as the country generally had been enriched by the sale of our manufactures, the landholders had received their share of wealth and advantages. It had been the wise policy of former Governments to keep the price of the chief article of subsistence as low as possible. Upon this principle Mr. Pitt had acted with success, but the system now was about to be changed. It was undoubtedly true that the rent of land would be diminished by the unlimited importation of corn; but if the resolutions upon the table passed in their present shape, the manufactures of the towns would be destroyed, and the land must consequently be depreciated. Corn might be grown, but paupers would be the only customers for it. It was in truth impossible to separate the two interests. The value of land in some places had within memory increased three-fold, the owners had derived their benefit from the political state of things, and now they must suffer the depreciation produced by an alteration in that political state. With respect to our manufacturers it was allowed that during the war our triumphant situation on the sea had enabled us to force a trade without rivals; but now we were open to competition it would be madness in us to throw fresh obstacles in the way of those who had so many to contend against. In his opinion it might be fairly argued that the manufacturer had been the great benefactor of the landed interest. He did not say that his design was to serve the landowner. That had been the effect of the flourishing state of our manufactures, and in the difficulties now to be encountered the landowner ought to participate. By the measures now upon the table, the wise system pursued for years was about to be subverted, and the labourers prevented from putting the real wealth of the country into that marketable shape, by which this country had been hitherto made the envy of surrounding nations."

Subsequently he declared that "the more the measure became known, the more generally it was execrated and condemned." The feelings of the public on the subject were indeed sufficiently proved by the fact that the petition against the measure, from the city of London, received 40,571 signatures in less than ten hours; and that the civic petition to the Lords was signed by more than 80,000 persons. When, however, it became manifest that the patrons of famine-prices were resolved to pass a law to create artificial scarcity, the greatest excitement prevailed in the metropolis. On the evening of the 6th of March, crowds collected round the avenues of the House of Commons to deprecate the taxation of their bread. Those who were known to be favourable to raising a revenue for landlords by taxing the food of the labourers were hooted; and those who, like Mr. Baring (now Lord Ashburton), were opposed to the plunder of the industrious for the benefit of the idle, received some applause. The carriages of a few members were stopped to ascertain how they intended to vote; and this was made the pretext for ordering out a military force, which acted so violently, that Mr. Lambton (the late Lord Durham) was nearly trampled down by a troop of horse. He rushed into the House of Commons, and interrupted the debate to protest against the unconstitutional display of an armed force to overawe the deliberations of Parliament. It was with some difficulty that the excitement within doors was calmed; but outside, notwithstanding the presence of the military, it continued to increase in violence. Several of the houses of the leading bread taxers were attacked; but wherever the inmates exhibited forbearance, very little damage was done. Lord Ellenborough came forward, and remonstrated with the multitude; and they were so pleased with his deportment, that he was loudly cheered.

Far different was the scene at the house of Mr. F. Robinson (now Lord Ripon), the original propounder of the bread tax; fire-arms were discharged from his parlour-windows, which proved fatal to two innocent persons, Mr. E. Vyse, a midshipman, and Mrs. Watson. It was consistent that a law to produce starvation should be baptized in blood. Wilful murder by the musket was a proper preliminary to wilful murder by famine. This is not our language; it is the verdict of the coroner's juries in both cases. The coroner's inquest on Mr. Vyse found "Wilful murder against some person or persons firing shot from and out of fire-arms from Mr. Robinson's windows;" that on Jane Watson returned a verdict of "Wilful murder against Mr. Robinson's butler and three soldiers." In Mr. Wilberforce's Life we find a letter to his son, giving a very graphic description of his situation; when in the hope of winning some votes on the Slavery question he gave his support to the iniquitous Corn Law.

"Were you to enter the dining-room at family prayer time, without having received some explanation of our appearance, you would probably think that we were expecting a visit from the ex-emperor and his friends at Kensington Gore, and had prepared a military force to repel his assault. For you would see four soldiers and a sergeant, together with another stranger (a peace-officer), who, as far as bodily strength would go, would play his part as well as any of them. The fact is that we had reason to apprehend some mischief for our house, in consequence of the part which I had judged it my duty to take on the Corn Bill; and, as your mother, &c., was advised to evacuate the place, I preferred the expedient which had been adopted by Mr. Bankes, and several other of my friends, that of having four or five soldiers in my house—the very knowledge of their being there rendering an attack improbable. But it was a curious instance of the rapid circulation of intelligence, that at Covent-garden market, early on Saturday morning, John Sharman, who sells garden-stuff, being there to purchase for the supply of his shop, was hooted after with, 'So your old master has spoken for the Corn Bill (I had only spoken the night before), but his house shall pay for it.' All, however, is hitherto quiet, and I trust will continue so."

It is well worth while to notice the precipitation with which the Corn Law was hurried through Parliament; it was first broached in the House of Commons on the 17th of February; it was passed in the House of Lords on the 20th of March. In the interval, the City of London prayed to be heard by counsel against a measure so pregnant with danger to the trade and commerce of the country; but this reasonable request was rejected with something like contumely. It must be added, that the ensuing harvest, which was unusually abundant, pacified the public mind by producing a great and rapid fall in the price of grain; and at the same time that the agricultural classes, who had trusted to the law to sustain prices, were doomed to endure the most bitter disappointment.

We shall return again to this period of our history, and show that the circumstances under which the Corn Laws originated furnish abundant reasons for their repeal.

SCARCITY AND WAGES.

In 1842, the great cry of the monopolists was, that cheap bread must necessarily lead to low wages. Events quickly refuted the fallacy, for in 1843 the price of bread fell, and the rate of wages was immediately raised in all the manufacturing districts; and now, in 1845, as bread has risen, the amount of employment has decreased, and the rate of wages has been proportionally diminished. The twin luminaries that reflect the light of the Cabinet, the Standard and the Herald admit the fact, and recommend the manufacturers to diminish their production. Now, it is curious that the authors of this precious advice do not pretend to know that a diminution of production is identical with a diminution of employment and a decrease in the amount of wages; their advice to the manufacturers in plain English is, employ fewer hands, put those whom you do employ on short time, and thus save the amount of wages which you now expend on production, not likely to afford you remuneration. We can scarcely imagine men so ignorant as not to perceive that this is the obvious meaning and purport of their clamour about gluts and over-production. It is, however, worth while to enquire by what process the supposed "glut" could be effected; a glut is the result of supply exceeding demand, not the result of supply exceeding actual want. If the number of buyers be artificially diminished while supply continues in the same ratio, there must of course be an apparent glut, and we are prepared to show that this is the sole cause of the "over-production" which is so laboriously urged on us by the Herald and the Standard. The "glut" has arisen from cessation of demand; the real point of enquiry is fairly stated in the Times:

"What is the present price of corn, and what are its bearings on the actual prosperity of the nation? We will take our figures from the speakers at the Liverpool meeting. On the authority of Mr. THORNELEY, who had instituted inquiries for the purpose, we are told that Irish wheat of the old crop was at 6s. 3d. per 70lb. in May last, and is now at 9s. 3d.; oats were at 8s. per 45lb. in May, and are now at 4s. 2d.; oatmeal at 24s. 6d. per 240lb. then, 34s. now; flour at 34s. per 280lb. then, and 51s. now. According to these quotations, the "staff of life" is now half as dear again as it was last May. The operative and labourer have to give half as much again for their bread, their flour, or their porridge, as they did only seven months since; and if they were then obliged to take half their weekly receipts to the baker's shop, on the same wages they are obliged to take three-quarters now, and have consequently only half as much to spare for all the other necessities of existence, including clothes, fuel, and rent. If it be suggested that their wages are probably somewhat advanced, we all know that they are not advanced in proportion, and in the case of those branches of industry which depend on the foreign market, wages cannot be advanced at all without accumulating difficulties, which will one day involve all the parties concerned in a common calamity."

The same fact has been stated by Mr. Brown in another form; "we are now paying more for provisions by 400,000*l.* per week than we did at this time last year," consequently this sum is subtracted from the demand for manufactured goods, and therefore from the source out of which wages are to be paid. But this is not all; there are stores of corn in America which would be exchanged for our manufactures were not import prohibited by our restrictive laws. While the demand in the home market is lessened by 400,000*l.*, the Corn Laws cut off a foreign demand of at least the same amount; that is, they prevent an expenditure of more than 800,000*l.* weekly on the employment of the working-classes. It is no wonder that the Herald and Standard should discover "a glut," when such a sum is abstracted from effective demand.

The Herald admits the glut in manufactures, but denies the scarcity of food; we assert that the two facts are identical. The Times justly remarks,

"Scarcity is a comparative term. Bread may be scarce, more scarce, very scarce, intolerably scarce. It has always been scarce to the millions who cannot get it, and are obliged to satisfy their hunger with a coarser and more precarious food. It is by comparison scarce to the Englishman who got enough for himself and his family last year, but is obliged to stint them now. It is a penny a gallon scarcer, when it is a penny a gallon dearer. It is scarce by comparison with the means to procure it, and the commodities with which it may be exchanged. Compared with gold, wheat is as scarce now at 70s. a quarter, as it was at 90s. during the war. Compared with the price of clothing—that is, with those commodities which the Manchester operative has to offer in exchange for food—wheat is very much scarcer and dearer than it was in any year of the war. This scarcity is not a mere apprehension, not a bugbear, not an abstraction, but a practical, a domestic, and a personal fact. It comes home to the feelings of a labourer with a force and reality which no reasoning or eloquence can impart. He knows the scarcity because he feels it. He has less to eat. He has, therefore, no occasion to summon a Cabinet Council to canvass the question of impending scarcity. Seeing what a sober and sad reality scarcity is to millions of our fellow-subjects, we can regard it as nothing less than impious for statesmen to remove their eyes from the fact, and make it only a question of the future. Let them scoff at a panic if they please, but the hardest heart must learn to reverence the presence of actual want. The first thing for the Cabinet to consider is, how to deal with the existing amount of scarcity, which cannot be denied."

The gentlemen of the Ashton deputation placed in the hands of the Premier returns, furnished by the operatives themselves, of the increased expenditure of their families consequent on the advance in the price of food; it averages 8*d.* per head per week for each member of the family. This is subtracted from wages by the Corn Law as effectively as if the employer had made a reduction to the same amount, with the additional evil that, in stead of being held as a fund to provide future employment, it is unproductively consumed and virtually annihilated. While, therefore, scarcity and the danger of famine are admitted, we are throwing away, or rather utterly destroying every week a fund sufficient for the maintenance of four millions of persons in comparative comfort; and a still larger number, if the amount had been devoted to remunerative production, yielding fair profit on capital.

We have often demonstrated that wages must fall when provisions become scarce; facts have borne decisive evidence to the truth of our reasonings. Never did trade receive so severe and sudden a check as that which has been experienced within the last few weeks; the demand for labour has fallen in the same proportion as the demand for goods, and the demand for goods has sunk with the ability of consumers to purchase manufactures when their resources are exhausted by the high price of food. The price of labour has fallen as that of bread has risen, and the distressed operatives exclaim with Hood,—

"O God! that bread should be so dear,
And flesh and blood so cheap!"

PUBLIC MEETINGS.

We again find it perfectly impossible to keep pace with the progress of the national demonstration against monopoly. Our columns this week, crowded as they are with reports of public meetings held in every part of the country, afford but imperfect and fragmentary specimens of that "unequivocal expression of the public voice," which is now thundering forth the death-doom of the landlords' bread tax. In addition to those which we have been able to report, wholly or in part, are very many others, no less important and influential, which we must content ourselves with merely naming. At Doncaster, on Wednesday, and at Exeter, on Thursday, public town's-meetings assembled to petition her Majesty, or memorialise ministers, to take prompt and decisive measures for affording a sufficient supply of food to the people. At the last-named meeting, Mr. Divett, who has hitherto supported a fixed duty, announced his conviction "that the time for compromise has passed." Sir John Duckworth had "business of much importance," and was unable to attend. We are not disposed to cavil at the honourable member's apology; his constituents will probably recognise its validity, and take the earliest opportunity of relieving the busy baronet of all public demands on his invaluable time. At Derby, a crowded, enthusiastic, and most successful meeting (the seventh within ten days) was held on Tuesday, and attended by Mr. Cobden and Mr. Bright, with the object of organising a Free Trade qualification movement in that populous district.

Perhaps the most important and gratifying demonstrations of the week have been those of the metropolis, and its boroughs, parishes, and suburbs. On Thursday, a special meeting of the Common Council of the City of London, held in the Guildhall under the presidency of the Lord Mayor, resolved, almost unanimously, on an address to her Majesty, attributing the present "great anxiety and distress," and "danger of famine" immediately consequent on the potato failure, "to erroneous legislation, which, by excluding the importation of food and restricting commerce, shuts out from the people the bounty and goodness of God." In the borough of Southwark, and the districts or parishes of St. Pancras, Farringdon Without, St. Luke's, the Liberty of the Rolls, St. Martin's in the Fields, and Clerkenwell, public meetings have been held within the last day or two; all numerously attended, and all hearty, unanimous, and enthusiastic in their denunciation of monopoly. The metropolis is nobly doing its duty. The old difficulty of moving London is a difficulty no longer. This gigantic mass of human intelligence, energy, and will, is thoroughly aroused to action.

Our friends at a distance may be scarcely aware of the important and influential character of those district or suburban demonstrations, which are this week enumerated in our columns. The true value of these metropolitan expressions of opinion will be understood when we state that the meeting of this evening will be the seventeenth held within a period of no more than three weeks; that the average attendance at each may be stated at not less than one thousand; that hundreds seeking admittance have been necessarily excluded from want of room; that they are not League meetings, but spontaneous expressions of the popular feeling and opinion of the localities in which they are held; and that they are, in no way whatever, party meetings, but are freely attended by men of all shades of political sentiment, Whig, Tory, and Radical. The old spirit of 1815 is again in full life and activity—with the difference only, that it seeks those wiser, safer, and immeasurably more efficient modes of utterance and action, taught by the eventful years of national experience that have intervened. London hates monopoly as heartily as in the days when hired spies went about sounding the probabilities of popular endurance, and fixed bayonets lined the avenues to the halls of legislation where landlords enacted their sordid and cruel famine law. The only difference is, that London and the empire have now found "a more excellent way" of resisting oligarchical oppression, and have learned the use and mastery of weapons against which all the agencies of fraud and force are alike impotent.

GREAT FREE TRADE DEMONSTRATION.

MANCHESTER.

A great and interesting meeting of the Anti-Corn-Law League was held in the Free Trade Hall, Manchester, on Wednesday night, when Mr. Thomas Milner Gibson and Mr. W. J. Fox were present by invitation to deliver addresses, and Mr. Cobden and Mr. Bright also attended. The greatest excitement prevailed for several days previously, on the part of the public, to get tickets of admission, and many persons came a distance of 20 or 30 miles to be present. When the usual supply of tickets was exhausted, every gentleman known to be connected with the Council was applied to for the exertion of his personal interest on behalf of applicants; and many gentlemen we know in this position denied themselves the gratification of being present, and gave up their own tickets. Under these circumstances, it is scarcely necessary to say that the Hall was crammed; the doors, in fact, had to be closed against the multitudes who besieged them nearly 10 minutes before the time announced for the proceedings to commence.

At 25 minutes after 7 o'clock, the Chairman, George Wilson, Esq., took his place on the platform, accompanied by Richard Cobden, Esq., M.P.; John Bright, Esq., M.P.; T. M. Gibson, Esq., M.P.; Jos. Brotherton, Esq., M.P.; W. J. Fox, Esq., and other gentlemen; and amongst upwards of 500 other persons of respectability and influence on the platform, we observed the Mayor of Salford, General Briggs, Alderman Walker, Mr. W. R. Callender, the President of the Chamber of Commerce (Mr. Bazley), Mr. W. Rawson, Mr. H. Rawson, Mr. Edward Grundy, of Park Hills, Bury; Mr. D. Ainsworth, Mr. W. Bickham, Mr. S. Lees, Mr. S. P. Robinson, Mr. W. Evans, Mr. Alderman Potter, Mr. T. B. Potter, Mr. Alderman Lockett, Mr. Thomas Bright, Mr. J. T. Crook, (Liverpool), Mr. J. B. Smith, Mr. S. Matley, Mr. Samuel Nicholls, Mr. B. Syddall, Mr. George Sale, of Atherton; Mr. O. S. Leavitt, of Louisville, U. S.; Mr. G. C. Crook, of New York; Mr. R. P. Livingston, Mr. Alderman Bird, Mr. Chadwick, Rev. Dr. Massie, and Mr. J. A. Royle.

The minutes of the last meeting having been read and confirmed,

The CHAIRMAN rose amidst great cheering, and when it had subsided, said: Ladies and gentlemen—in the course of an uphill agitation for seven years, we have frequently met here at periods of great excitement and encouragement, as well as during some of considerable doubt and anxiety. But I think you will agree with me, that often as we have met here with high hopes of ultimate success, it has never been our pleasure to assemble together when such bright prospects stood before us as now present themselves in the closing struggle now about to take place to decide the fate of these monopolies. (Hear, hear, and cheers.) Our position is materially changed. We no longer see the question of the total repeal of the Corn Laws regarded as one which can be postponed. Parties in office, and parties out of office—monopolists, as well as others, are fast coming to the conclusion that this question cannot be postponed much longer without great peril to the community. (Cheers.) It is no part of our duty—it is unnecessary to repeat here what has been stated a thousand times before, that the League fights under no party banner for party victories—(hear, hear). We rejoice to see any accession of strength, from whatever quarter it may present itself; we rejoice to seek any alliance which can promote the unconditional repeal of the Corn Laws from any party who may present themselves with that view—(hear, hear); but I think you will agree with me, that the events which have recently occurred in reference to the change of opinion on the part of the noble lord, the member for the city of London, Lord John Russell,—(loud cheers)—and the public accession to our ranks of that distinguished nobleman who lately represented the West Riding of Yorkshire, are events not likely to be passed over in a meeting of the Anti-Corn-Law League. (Great cheers.) If ever party—if ever question required less of ancestral honours on the part of those who lead it, it is this; if ever question was better presented by our leaders than another, it is this. (Hear, hear.) No one can afford better than the League to put aside such alliances as these; but in stepping forward and writing that noble, and manly, and patriotic address to the electors of the City of London which Lord John Russell has done—in extending the right hand of fellowship from the electors of London—the representatives of London to the representatives of the commercial districts,—in shaking hands with them on this question, he has linked himself with a cause which will reflect more lasting honour on his name and character than any one with which it may have been his pride and privilege to have been connected. (Cheers.) If report also be true, we may expect alliances in other quarters than those to which I have referred. The Times says—and who shall deny it—(hear, hear), the Times says that these Corn Laws are destined to have no longer an existence; and that not to Mr. Villiers and others shall be delegated the pleasing task of putting them to death, but to Sir Robert Peel. (Cheers and laughter.) And he is to put them out of their misery at one single stroke. (Hear, hear.) Now the Standard and Herald deny that such is the case. I am not aware that these papers are regarded as the best authorities in this district; but if it be true, and I hope it is true—if Sir Robert Peel chooses at the eleventh hour to shake off the trammels of faction, and stand before his fellow countrymen with the charter of their industrial freedom in his hands, then no man will be hailed as a greater patriot in the meetings of the League than Sir Robert Peel. (Loud cheers.) If he will draw a bill for total repeal, the League will endorse it. (Hear, hear, from Mr. Cobden, and cheers.) But if, on the other hand, it is his intention to patch up the present measure, to continue a rag of monopoly—to continue either sliding-scale or fixed duty, or any duty at all, then he will be deceiving himself—he will be deceiving others. If he thinks, by any partial measure, that he can put an end to this agitation, he is deceiving himself. No more than he did in 1842 will he be able in 1846 to put an end to this movement, or prevent the reappraising of the last remnant of monopoly, that it may be scattered to the winds. (Cheers.) Our business, however, in this state of uncertainty, is not with the Cabinet, but with the country. (Hear, hear, and cheers.) And I rejoice to think, that if the monopolists have been perusing the reports of the meetings which have been held within the last three weeks, considerable light must have been thrown upon that quarter. There never yet, in the history of past agitations in this country, has been a period like it; it is not that Liverpool and Birmingham, and Bath, and Bristol, and Edinburgh have had their meetings—but look at the map of the country; take out the leading towns throughout it, and you will find, with but few exceptions, that every large town, or town of any importance, has had its meeting; some have had two; and at none of these meetings have the resolutions been otherwise than unanimous in favour of this question. From one end of the kingdom to the other the cry has been ringing in the ears of her Majesty's ministers, "Open the ports, and let the corn in free!" (Cheers.) Coincident with these meetings, our friends, Messrs. Cobden and Bright, have been conducting the attacks of the League upon the counties. (Cheers.) I have, in my pocket, a list of the meetings these patriotic gentlemen have attended since we last assembled together in this Hall, and I will read it—Halifax, Huddersfield, Birmingham, Blackburn, Burnley, Leeds, Sheffield, Preston, Wakefield, Gloucester, Stroud, Bristol, Bath, Nottingham, Derby, and Wootton-under-Edge—in all, 16 meetings. (Loud cheers.) In addition to these meetings, more than 60 have been held in reference to the opening of the ports, and 17 in the metropolitan boroughs, attended by Mr. R. R. Moore, and others. We never should have advised this second attack upon the counties, unless, by past experience, we had felt justified in the policy of it; and in order that you may judge of the success of that policy, I shall detain you four or five minutes longer than you may know the results of our registration movements in the revision courts last October. The first county to which I shall refer, is one over which the monopolists have sung their songs in triumph, as having defeated the League therein—North Warwickshire. Owing to casualties over which we can have no control, certain unfavourable results in some portions of the county attended the efforts of the League. All that can be said is, that the monopolists have had a narrow escape. (Hear.) Our clear gain in that county on the registration is 100 votes, or two per cent. upon the whole number of voters. (Hear, hear.) We then threw a shell into Buckinghamshire. In that county we have obtained a gain of 328 votes, which is equal to $\frac{5}{8}$ per cent. upon the entire register. (Hear, hear.) We next proceeded to East Gloucester. We have had a gain in claims there of 22 votes; in objections, of 249; making a total of 271, or equal to 3 per cent. The monopolist majority was only 70; and if no change in parties has taken place, the county is redeemed, and we have a majority of 201. (Cheers.) The next county is East Somersetshire. We have had a gain in claims of 216, or two per cent. on the whole register; and in objections, of 358, or four per cent.—the total gain being 574, or five per cent. One of the representatives is Col. Gore Langton, a thorough repealer, and we hope next election to place another by his side. (Loud cheers.) We next come to South Cheshire. Our gain in claims was 220, or $\frac{3}{4}$ per cent.; on objections 177, or $\frac{2}{3}$ per cent.; the total gain being 397, or $\frac{5}{8}$ per cent. The monopolist majority in 1841 was 609; so that they are still in a majority, but which I trust will be wiped out before the end of this year. (Cheers.) The next county is East Surrey. Our gain is 186 in claims, or $\frac{3}{4}$ per cent.; in objections 367, or 6 per cent.; the total gain being 553, or 9 per cent. on the old constituency. (Cheers.) The next is North Staffordshire. Our gain in claims is 242, or $\frac{2}{3}$ per cent.; in objections 700, or 7 per cent.; the total gain being 942, or $\frac{9}{10}$ per cent. The next is South Staffordshire. The gain in claims is 494, or $\frac{6}{10}$ per cent.; the gain on objections is 442, or 5 per cent.; the total gain being 936, or 11 per cent. The monopolist majority at the last contest was 133; the majority for Free Trade at the present time is 803. (Loud cheers.) We next come to North Cheshire. The gain in claims in North Cheshire is 550, or $\frac{8}{10}$ per cent.; the gain on objections is 349, or $\frac{5}{8}$ per cent.; the total gain 899, or 900 within one, being 14 per cent. of the entire constituency. The monopolist majority in 1841 was 446; and up to the end of 1844 it had increased a little; but our gain this year leaves us in a good majority. (Cheers.) We next come to Middlesex, like South Lancashire, occupied our attention last year. We gained in 1843 and 1844 466, or $\frac{3}{4}$ per cent.; this year we have gained 651 on claims, or $\frac{5}{8}$ per cent.; and on objections 869, or $\frac{6}{10}$ per cent.; the total gain being 1520 in this year, and 1986 in the two years, or 15 per cent. The monopolist majority was 202, so that the present Free Trade majority is 1784. (Loud cheers.) We next come to the West Riding of Yorkshire. Nothing can show more clearly the improved tactics of the League over those of former attempts to purge this register than this table. The gain from 1841 to 1844, inclusive, was only 263; but the gain this year in claims has been 2120, or $\frac{6}{10}$ per cent. upon the whole register; and on objections, of 22, making a total of 2405, or $\frac{7}{10}$ per cent. Mr. Wortley's majority in 1841 was 1134. The present Free Trade majority is 1271. (Great cheering.) We next come to North Lancashire and South Lancashire. To North Lancashire we have given attention for three years. In 1843, the gain was 957; in 1844, it was 533; this year we have gained 777, or $\frac{7}{10}$ per cent. in claims, and 715, or 7 per cent., on objections, making a total of 1492, or, added to the gain of the previous years, 2982—2984 per cent. (Cheers.) Of course, in the absence of any contest for North Lancashire, we are not in a position to say that it is won; but if the qualification movement go on in the same spirit this year as it did last, North Lancashire may be won by the 1st of January. (Hear, hear.) We next come to South Lancashire. Our gain in claims, in 1844, was 1295, or $\frac{7}{10}$ per cent.; in objections, 456, or $\frac{2}{3}$ per cent. In the present year our gain has been 1831, being 1680 by claims, and 251 by objections. Total gain in this, the model county, 3682. From this deduct Mr. Entwistle's majority of 598, which leaves at present a Free Trade majority of 3084. (Enthusiastic cheers.) Now, as this is the county in which we reside, I shall give you the gain in each polling district. In the Ashton district, the gain is 84; in Bury, 67; Liverpool, 457; Oldham, 86; Ormskirk, 73; Rochdale, 37; St. Helen's, 70; Wigan, 62; and Manchester, 1160. (Cheers.) The monopolists have had a gain in the Bolton district of 123, which, it ought to be explained, has arisen from this circumstance, that last year the monopolist objections broke down. In Newton, the monopolists gained 31, in Stockport 11; leaving us altogether a net gain of 1931. Now, gentlemen, the Free Trade majority in the counties I have mentioned amounts to 16,446 votes, and it is equal to the aggregate majorities of the monopolists in 33 counties and divisions of counties: that is, if the same efforts had been directed to purge the register in 33 counties with the same success to these I have referred to, 65 seats would have been added to the Free Traders. The gross constituencies of the counties we have worked is 143,731; and they are greater in amount than those of 32 counties and divisions, which return 70 members to Parliament. (Cheers.) The total county constituency of England is 445,630; the numbers of those attacked are 143,731; so that we have dealt with nearly one-third of the entire county constituency of England. (Cheers.) These, then, are the labours which have occupied our attention during the last year; and I am persuaded that it is but a mere beginning. I believe it. The same effort—a corresponding effort made in the various counties to that which has been made in South Lancashire—would clear off the entire of the monopolists from the representation of the remaining counties of England within the year. These are the results. We might have attacked the other counties first; but it was not till we had secured here, the seats of the great centre of manufacturing industry, that we could present ourselves before any constituency at a distance to ask their co-operation in favour of those efforts. (Great cheering.) I will now call upon one of your excellent representatives, Mr. Thomas Milner Gibson, to address the meeting. (Mr. Wilson resumed the chair amidst great and long-continued cheering.)

Mr. T. M. Gibson, M.P., was received with much applause. He said, It has perhaps not very frequently, yet occasionally, fallen to my lot to address assemblies in the Free Trade Hall; but never have I witnessed so splendid and imposing an assemblage as is collected within these walls this evening. (Hear.) Forgive me if I say, standing here upon this platform, and gazing upon this vast mass of human beings, this vast mass of intelligence, that I cannot do so without feelings of awe and astonishment. It was, indeed, a great prize that the reformers of olden times won from their rulers, when they achieved those victories of freedom of discussion, and liberty of the press; for here you are in virtue of those rights which Englishmen enjoy, of freely proclaiming the grievances under which they labour; here you are assembled within the walls of this spacious hall, once more to proclaim your continued sense of the injustice of the Corn Law monopoly, (applause,) and your determination never to cease your efforts until the total and unconditional repeal of that monopoly is accomplished. (Cheers.) Here you are, not seeking for privileges, favours, or exclusive advantages, but for the most simple and obvious of all human rights, the right to enjoy the fruits of your own industry. (Cheers.) What a remarkable spectacle it is, what a subject for reflection—that a body of persons to whom England is more indebted for her greatness than to any other—those who have been the inventors of her manufactures and the promoters of her extensive commerce, should be compelled, at great inconvenience, to assemble in this multitudinous meeting, to denounce the oppressions of those who live a pleasing, idle life, and whose incomes result entirely from the enterprise and industry of this vast district! (Cheers.) For what has enabled our landed gentry to enjoy the luxuries they possess? Nothing but the skill, enterprise, and diligence, of these districts. (Cheers.) Poland and Russia have fertile lands; there are broad acres in many parts of the world; but their possessors do not revel in the luxury of the owners of the broad acres of England, simply because, in those countries they have not such a body of intelligence, enterprise, and industry, the type of which we now see collected within these walls. (Cheers.) Perhaps we now meet under circumstances most auspicious; for undoubtedly there are signs and symptoms of an early accomplishment of our wishes. Unquestionably, no public movement has ever made such rapid advances as the movement for the repeal of the Corn Laws, and none has been led with greater intelligence than this movement by your excellent friends, Mr. Cobden and Mr. Bright. (Loud applause.) Though there are auspicious signs and symptoms of our approaching success, yet let us not forget that there are also threatenings of a depression in trade, of scarcity, of high prices, and of all those evils which have resulted from the same causes in times gone by. Let us not be led astray from steady, unwearied exertions by those auspicious symptoms which we collect from the newspaper press; let us not be diverted in the smallest degree from the direct course, but act as if these reports had never had any existence; that will be the only sure path to success. No great boon was ever given willingly by the rulers to the people; all great advances in civilization and freedom, like that we now seek, have been wrested from the unwilling hands of the rulers by the people themselves; and it is your exertions only that can gain this cause. (Applause.) Party politicians will not win it for you; they are seeking their own objects. They will grant repeal if they believe you are in earnest; but if they see you diverted from your endeavours by passing reports, and by speculations on party manoeuvres, depend on it they will take advantage of your digression, and you will not be in so good a position as you now are. But undoubtedly, there is great reason to suppose that the Government has mooted the total repeal of these laws. (Hear.) I find that very steady persons,—not credulous men, who will believe anything,—have come to the conclusion that Sir R. Peel has made up his mind to stand or fall by the repeal of the Corn Laws. (Loud applause.) That does not surprise me; having listened to his speeches in Parliament for some time past, I have observed a gradual approach to Free Trade. He became, some time since, what my hon. friend Mr. Cobden has called a Free Trader in the abstract, but the idea was that he would not become a Free Trader in practice. He was represented as being like one of those high-actioned horses that you see in the streets of London, that give you the idea of great speed, but which, with a sort of high cab action, in reality make no advance whatever. (Laughter.) He was represented as giving a sort of word of command to advance, but without gaining ground. (Hear, hear.) I did not attach much credit to those representations, because I had invariably observed that he never gave any assurance in the House to the Protection Societies, or to county members, that he would maintain the Corn Laws. I have more than once warned the county members in the House, in the presence of Sir Robert Peel, not to practise on the credulity of tenant farmers, by representing that the Corn Laws would be maintained. I have told them that whatever they might say in their market ordinaries and Conservative booths, Sir Robert had given no assurance whatever that he would maintain the Corn Laws; and that therefore they ought not to mislead their occupying farmers, and give rise to expectations and hopes which must end in disappointment. But for party purposes they would do it, and the day of retribution is now at hand. (Loud cheers.) How they will be able to explain themselves to their unfortunate tenants, who sent them to Parliament to maintain protection to agriculture, I am quite at a loss to conjecture; but I should very much regret if the Government of this great commercial country was to be decided by what country gentlemen and farmers may happen to have said in their Conservative booths, and at their market ordinaries, on the subject of political consistency, or what may be necessary for the benefit of the landed interest. (Hear.) Because some foolish persons have said that they supported Sir Robert Peel for the purpose of maintaining protection, is he therefore bound to neglect what he conceives the circumstances of the country require, and to sacrifice all the best interests of his fellow-countrymen to the foolish and absurd notions of these rustics? (Cheers.) These things have been gradually coming upon us within the last three months. First, the country gentlemen; but I will not say the country gentlemen or the landed proprietors, for among them are some of our most intelligent supporters—(Cheers)—the monopolists were first made uneasy by the Potato Commission sent to Ireland to inquire whether there was likely to be a scarcity among the people. (Cheers.) The food of the people was a delicate subject; it had a dash of philosophy and political economy about it, which the thorough-paced monopolists did not at all relish, and it gave rise to considerable uneasiness. Then came the rumour about the opening of the ports. To my knowledge, many of the landed gentry were favourable to a temporary opening of the ports, thinking that the law itself would be placed in jeopardy, and that a temporary suspension might serve us for a permanency. (Cheers.) Therefore not much was said on the question of opening the ports. Then came Lord John Russell's letter, and what did they say? "Capital (said they); this is very good indeed; this is the very thing we have been all long desiring. Lord John Russell has declared himself; now our great man must speak out." The Times informs us this great man is going to speak out, but in a tone which they did not anticipate. (Cheers.) Nothing can exceed the dismay which prevails in London, whence I have come to-day, amongst a certain class of politicians; the Conservative Club in St. James's-street is like bedlam. (Loud Cheers.) They know not whom to believe, or whom to trust,—when it has come to this, that a Parliament returned in 1841, for the express purpose of maintaining protection to agriculture, should be the persons to grant, not a fixed duty, or an alteration of the law, but absolutely a total and immediate repeal. (Cheers.) It strikes them as scarcely possible, but still there are those who believe it; and I am persuaded that nothing but the strongest exertions of the people will enable Sir Robert Peel, or any other minister, to carry through this question with success. (Cheers.) The landed interest will make a great struggle; they will yield the Corn Law, if at all, with a sullen reluctance; as Mr. Cobden has said, "they will die hard." It will require all the skill and all the Parliamentary ability of Sir Robert Peel, as well as of the Whig leader, to manage the question in the House of Commons, but for myself, and my brother Free Traders, I can say that we shall be most happy to convoy the measure in safety, as far as in us lies, through the House, let whosoever bring it forward, provided it be an honest measure, and such a one as you are struggling for. (Cheers.) When it arrives in the other House, much will depend on the estimate which noble lords and the right reverend bench may form of the determination of the people. (Hear.) They will not be guided by the merits of the question, but by the consideration, whether its refusal will risk those courtly privileges and advantages which the constitution has hitherto afforded them. If they find that Manchester, Leeds, Birmingham, Liverpool, and all the great towns of the north, are determined to have commercial freedom, to "buy in the cheapest, and sell in the dearest market," and to enjoy the fruit of their own industry, without recognising the claim of others to a portion thereof—then their lordships will yield the question. (Cheers.) It was expected that, ere this, we should have some lordly thunderings as to the supposed intentions of ministers; it was said in London, yesterday, that the Duke of Richmond would deliver a very violent speech at Steyning, and that when the Central Society for the Protection of Agriculture, met at 17, Old Bond Street, it would shake society to its very centre. (Hear.) These meetings have taken place; we have had the ducal thunders; but after all it is of a very harmless character. It is the sort of thunder that you have with summer lightning; to use a somewhat vulgar expression, "they draw it extremely mild." (Laughter.) The Duke of Richmond says that if the ministers are so perfidious as to propose the repeal of the Corn Laws, he must look to hereditary wisdom, to the hereditary peerage, as his only safety. In 1839, I remember, his Grace said that if the Corn Laws were repealed, he would depart from England for ever, would leave his native soil, and wander remote and unfriended over the world (laughter)—that England would not be worth living in, if there were no laws to promote scarcity and dearth. However, it is not so bad with him now; he is for looking to "hereditary wisdom." Had he stuck to his determination to leave his native land, it would have been time now for packing up. (Laughter.) I for one am exceedingly glad that he did not take flight and leave the country, for his speeches have been of infinite service to the Anti-Corn-Law League; I know of no specimens of "hereditary wisdom" to which we are so much indebted as those of his grace the Duke of Richmond. (Cheers.) But another illustrious Duke has been distinguishing himself at those late meetings—the hereditary Earl Marshal of England, the Duke of Norfolk; he has found it necessary to make a speech on the apprehended scarcity, and the means of supplying the labouring classes with food. It was at the Steyning Agricultural Festival at which, we were informed, the Duke of Richmond was to deliver himself with so much violence; but his grace of Norfolk was the Chairman, and he confined his remarks to that tone which has been lately taken by certain philosophers who have been endeavouring to find out by chemical analysis, and various interesting modes of investigation, the minimum of food on which a human being can exist. (Hear.) But the Duke of Norfolk, the Earl Marshal of England, and the first of her Majesty's privy councillors, with the exception perhaps of the two archbishops, and the King of Hanover,—a man of fair, average intellect, and above the average in good nature,—made a speech, to which I will now call your attention, as showing the peculiar state of rustic innocence and pastoral simplicity in which these gentlemen are involved. It is from the Times of this day:—

"The Chairman said there was one toast they must not forget to drink before they parted, and that was the health of the industrious labourers, to whom they were so much indebted. Might he add, that in consequence of the badness of the potatoes, they should pay more attention to them this year than ordinarily. (Hear, hear.) There was one thing—the last time he mentioned it, he found that a portion of the press perverted what he said, and turned it into ridicule. That mattered little to him, because if he could add one comfort to any poor man he should be happy to do so. (Cheers.) It was suggested in a letter by a lady, the other day—a thing which certainly was very warm and comfortable to the stomachs of the people, if it could be had cheap. He endeavoured, the other day when he was in London, to buy it. He went to several places to inquire, and he bought a pound or two of it. But there was some difficulty attached to it, rather than otherwise. They had not been accustomed to it, and might not like the taste. He liked it, however, himself. In India it was to the people what potatoes were in Ireland. He meant curry powder. (Laughter.) It might be smiled at at first, but was a very warming thing for potatoes and things of that description. Now, if gentlemen would try it, as he had done, mere y taking a pinch and putting it into hot water—he did not mean to say that would make a soup—a very good one; but when a man came home and took this, and had nothing better, it would make him warm at his stomach, and he could go to bed better and more comfortable. But if any gentleman there would try it, he would find that what was stated was true. He did not say that that could be given in great quantities, but among potatoes, with a little bacon, or any little thing of that kind they might happen to have, it was a pickle—the same as people took potatoes to eat to cold meat. Well, then, their food might not be so good, but one pinch of this would make it exceedingly palatable. He meant to try it himself with his labourers, and see if he could get them to eat it, and he was quite sure that it would add greatly to the comforts of the poor. He threw that out hoping it might do good. He might be ridiculed hereafter for what he was saying, but as he had said before, he did not care one rap. (Cheers and laughter.) He called it to their notice, and drunk their health with every respect and esteem, and he trusted they would do all that they could for the poor labourers."

As the old saying is,—“The London Tavern is open to all;” but where is the money to come from to buy this curry-powder? (Hear.) How absurd is this! It shews either a remarkable ignorance of present times and the present feelings, or a sad lack of sympathy, for these men to be talking of curry-powder, of starch, of gluten, and all those things by which human life may be possibly be supported, when we are threatened with a serious scarcity, and when we might alleviate that scarcity, and lessen the suffering by such a simple operation as letting in foreign corn. (Cheers.) Why, his grace the Duke of Richmond drops into a sort of Free-Trade, in spite of himself; for he says, if potatoes failed so very considerably, he understands there is a very large crop at Lisbon, and why not send there for some? (Hear, and cheers.) If you are to send to Lisbon for potatoes, why not open the ports to wheat and grain from all the world? (Cheers.) Really, to think that it should be necessary to enter into long and difficult arguments to prove that abundance is a blessing and that scarcity is a curse! But so bewildered have men's minds become with all this twaddle about protection, that they seem almost to doubt whether abundance is really a blessing. Protection is a soft and amiable phrase; it implies shelter to the defenceless, and the weak against the strong; but it is in reality the strong and the powerful appropriating to themselves the property of the weak and defenceless; it means the legislature departing from its true functions, by preventing one man and one class from encroaching on the rights of another, and authorising by the Corn Laws the plunder of the community for the benefit of a class. (Cheers.) I hope when the question is brought forward that the aristocracy will meet it as a necessity; for otherwise they will only be prolonging a contest in which ultimately they must be vanquished, and from which they can only retreat with disgrace. (Cheers.) It is most extraordinary that the aristocracy should not yield this righteous demand out of grateful recollection of past times. Who enabled them to wrest the privileges they now enjoy from former monarchs? Had they not been supported by the vast body of the people, they never could have extorted Magna Charta from King John. (Applause.) Let them, then, as they were assisted by the people in times gone by, now yield to the people those advantages which they have themselves obtained (hear.) They cannot, like the nobility of Russia, claim a property in the labouring class; what right then have they to dictate the conditions on which your calicoes shall be exchanged for the food of the Continent? If they supply none of the capital, ingenuity, or industry by which manufactures are produced, how can they substantiate a claim to control and regulate the conditions on which those manufactures shall be exchanged in the markets of the world, or to share in the profits derived therefrom? If you submit to this, and will not strike off the yoke now that it is in your power, you deserve to have it imposed on your shoulders. Vain and futile are the efforts of Members of Parliament in the House of Commons, vain indeed will be the most strenuous exertions of your representatives, unless they are backed by the untiring exertions of those without the walls of that house. (Cheers.) They regard us no more than the idle wind if it were not that we speak the sentiments of a large, determined, and influential body. That is what will alarm the maintainers of these monopolies; and therefore, however you may complain of members of Parliament, however you may regret that this step or the other is not taken in the House, depend upon it these things are of little moment. If they believe that a revolution has taken place in the minds of the people, and that they are set on the repeal of the Corn Laws, then the aristocracy will yield the question without the necessity of long debates and long speeches. Therefore, I say once more, now is the time when your sincerity and determination will be brought to the test. You must arm us with power to demand the settlement of this righteous cause, and to demand it in a voice that cannot be mistaken. (Cheers.) You must show the legislature that a revolution has taken place in the national mind on this question. I believe that amongst all parties there is a great change of opinion; I believe that an era in history is approaching which may be classed with the revolution; I believe that the discussion and the thought which this question has excited in different parts of the country have produced that revolution in the national mind which is the precursor of a revolution to be sanctioned by the Legislature. (Applause.) And how gratifying that we have been able to accomplish this great change in England, with an entire freedom from all violence! Nothing but the force of reason and plain hard intellect will have accomplished this great triumph. (Applause.) What an example to the rest of Europe! There, liberty, though frequently sought, has never been obtained, because there has been no moral preparation, because the changes that were asked for by a few have not been adopted by the minds of the many. But, in our case, I believe the day is approaching when there will scarcely be found a man who will not be ashamed of having supported this odious and unrighteous monopoly. (Applause.) For, whatever may be said about the church, tithes, rent-charges, and the income of the clergy, I will not believe it until I see it, that our clergy will come forward and support the Corn Law for increasing and maintaining their own incomes. (Applause.) Could they possibly reconcile such a course with the sacred writings that they teach? Whatever a few of the clergy may think of this question—and I dare say there are some that think deeply—depend upon it the archbishops, bishops, and clergy, will preserve a discreet silence. (Applause.) I will say, before I sit down, as I am addressing those whom I have the honour to represent in Parliament,—an honour that I have never deserved,—when I consider the immense importance of this great manufacturing district, I do feel that there is a heavy and serious responsibility cast upon my shoulders, in representing it in Parliament. (Hear.) All I can say is this; as I promised when I first had the honour of presenting myself in this town, to co-operate cordially and earnestly with the leaders of this Free Trade movement, so will I continue to do to the last. (Applause.) I trust that when the last struggle comes on this great question I shall not be found wanting; that I shall not be tempted to deviate from the straight path by any proposals of compromise; but, as I stand here in the presence of this great community, I pledge myself to co-operate cordially, earnestly, and sincerely, to the utmost of my ability, with your known and tried friends, Mr. Cobden and Mr. Bright. (Loud applause.) And I believe that in doing so, whatever effect their conduct may produce upon party warfare, and however much it may also conduce to the honour and glory of themselves, which will be well deserved—(hear, hear)—I believe that they are promoting a course which tends to the happiness and prosperity of all classes of her Majesty's subjects. (Loud applause.)

Mr. W. J. Fox then rose, and was loudly cheered. He said—These stupendous meetings were altogether unprecedented in history; but they are not more unprecedented than the condition of the country which has called them forth and demands their repetition. We are, indeed, in a position not only peculiar, but absolutely singular. The pressure of coming scarcity is upon us; and yet, as a nation, we turn back food from our shores that has been purchased, stored, paid for, and was there awaiting our own consumption, and in readiness for the approaching season of exigency. Such conduct in an individual would be utter insanity; it would be so in a nation, if the nation and its government were thoroughly identical—if there were not a contrariety of interest, feeling, and purpose, real or supposed, betwixt the great masses of the people, and the classes that for a time have got possession of legislative power. They have enforced upon the country this absurdity; they have stained the national character; they are making, at this moment, our apparent conduct as a people as preposterous as that of the Frenchman in the well-known story of his failing grammar: his misplaced “will” and “shall.”—I will be drowned—nobody shall help me; and so they make the nation say, by its practical condition,—“We will be starved, and nobody shall feed us.” (Cheers and laughter.) And not only is the position of the country a curious one in the incongruities thus enforced upon its conduct, but also in the darkness in which we are kept, from day to day, as to the extent of the calamity, and the means which her Majesty's advisers, or the people's rulers, have to propose for the mitigation of that calamity. Her Majesty herself is said to have learned something of the intentions of her own servants from an opposition journal, which in a day or two is contradicted by a ministerial journal, leaving us only in the midst of perplexity and bewilderment, and that on the most important of all topics—the very means of existence for a great people through a trying period. (Cheers.) There is scarcely an object so remote, or a transaction so trifling,—nothing in the material world, or beyond the bounds of this world of ours,—nothing so peculiar and individual but what we can get more authentic information about it, than we can about our own supplies of provisions for the coming months. (Hear.) We have authentic information by my Lord Rosse's great telescope, of the number of stars that compose certain clusters hitherto regarded as nebulae. We have accurate information by Dr. Backland's scientific researches, of the saurians and megatheria of by-gone ages. We know what the fossil lizards, 40 feet long, used to feed upon in their time, many millions of years ago, but we know not what we ourselves are to feed upon next month. (Cheers.) Every fashionable arrival at Brighton, every dinner-party in May Fair, finds its place in accurate and authoritative statement; and even,—thanks to the diligence, and the far-sightedness, and the communicativeness of the gentleman who writes the Court Circular, we know less about the food on which the people shall feed in the month of February, than we know about the royal baby that will be born in the month of April. (Laughter.) The perplexity extends through all ranks of society, from the lowest to the highest. Not only is the willing mechanic and the poor labourer in this dense ignorance, but a royal duke tells the world, not that he knows anything of the scarcity; he does not come near that point,—not that he knows anything of the panic or alarm of that scarcity; he does not prove the matter so far as that,—but he “has heard something of a report of a panic of a scarcity,” and he has private information that that report is not altogether to be credited. (Hear.) These confessions of ignorance are ill-adapted to excite the confidence of the ignorant mass of the community in those who are raised to eminence by office or by rank. They may stand idle, but time moves on, and whatever of good or evil time has in reserve for us. (Cries of hear, hear.) The inexorable course of events is before us; and too much of bitter experience in past years has taught us what to think of the events that are on their way. Sir Robert Peel has said he will never forget Paisley; we will not forget it either. We take warning by the recollection of those years; and, being forewarned, by the exertion of whatever peaceful energy the people may have, will be forearmed, as well as forewarned, against the circumstances of the coming period. (Cheers.) And it seems we are to have a conflict for that very simple and obvious remedy which the necessities of the time dictate. Individual despotism has never hesitated as to its course; it at once says—“Let food come in from whatever quarter it may.” Other countries, not under despotism, but more assimilated with our own, have also set the example. Belgium threw open its ports at once, and from day to day, came arrivals of grain, from a great variety of countries, very many indeed from this country,—exhibiting the extraordinary spectacle of the foreign grain which we had in our own possession leaving our shores, much of it in foreign vessels, steering to a foreign port, to feed the subjects of a foreign country; and then we call all this the protection of native industry. (Cheers.) Why are not those, whose business it is to advise, up and doing? If they delay, it is for us to urge them on; and as to the hostility that is threatened, why, let monopoly, if it will, as it boasts, nail its colours to the mast; the only result will be, that the colours will go down with the mast and the vessel altogether. (Cheers.) And I would admonish them, too, to take some heed to the language they use. The honourable gentleman who just addressed you, adverted to that very unedifying god-son of mine—“the coroneted fishmonger.” I gave him “his name, and he answers to it; I have given him much good counsel,” and I wish he would attend to that also. He learns his catechism, I am afraid, much as did the tax-gatherer's boy. “My child, what is your duty to your neighbour?” Thinking of his father's avocation, the boy says:—“To surcharge him as often as you can.” (Laughter.) In this mode does he exercise his duties; and in the course of the hostility he now announces, he has dared to brand with opprobrium the patriotic conduct of perhaps the most patriotic nobleman in this country. He accuses Lord Morpeth of giving his money to an association, meaning the League, for the purpose of creating fictitious votes, and libelling in the newspapers those who differ from him in opinion. (Hear, hear.) And yet, he says withal, that of the integrity, the honourableness, and the sincerity of that noble Lord's character there can be no doubt. From which what we gather is this, that in the Duke of Richmond's opinion, a very sincere, a very honourable, and a very upright man may, nevertheless, be a party to the creation of fictitious votes, and to the libelling in newspapers of those who differ from him in opinion. (Cheers.) It was not for a man, who, himself, for a considerable period of his life, if not now, was a pensioner on the public; for one whose naïve confession will not be forgotten when discriminating between timber and glass,—"We grow timber, but we do not grow glass,"—(Cheers)—a man who had amused even the House of Lords by his "tariff" lamentations, who confessed virtually that he had been pocketing 2000*l.* a year for his salmon more than it was worth; a Parliamentary created price, of which he grieved over the loss,—a man who quarters the younger branches of his family upon the public purse, instead of his own property,—It was not, I say, for such a man as this, to dare to raise his tongue against the purity or the consistency of Lord Morpeth; nor is he in a condition, with his own name appended to pamphlets, convicted of grossly falsifying quotations from works of authority, to talk of the falsehood or the libellousness of the press. (Cheers.) The League, I believe, has never libelled His Grace of Richmond; but it differs from him in opinion, according to his own dainty phraseology in this matter. The League is of opinion that wealthy proprietors have no business to abuse their legislative powers to private advantage. It differs from him in opinion and thinks that the wealthy man's hand ought not to be in the poor man's pocket, nor the wealthy man's knife to be slicing off a third from the poor man's loaf. I trust, however, the machinery is at work which will silence the Duke of Richmond. If matters go on as is conjectured in many quarters, he may about the time of the meeting of Parliament receive one of those pithy laconic notes, with the style of which the public have been pretty well familiarised from the specimens which have got into the papers, running something in this way: "Field-Marshal the Duke of Wellington desires the Duke of Richmond to be quiet. (Laughter.) Field-Marshal the Duke of Wellington is obliged either to part with the Corn Laws, or to part with Sir Robert Peel. Field-Marshal the Duke of Wellington cannot govern the country without Sir Robert Peel; let the Corn Laws be abolished." (Cheers.) An interesting correspondence of this kind will no doubt beam light into the convictions of many of that venerable House, and help us over what otherwise might have been insurmountable difficulties. (Cheers.) But, however that may be, we look not to this or that leader—to this or that House, even; the country looks to you, who are marching in its van in this great advance—you, men of Manchester, who have hitherto braved the foe, and led on the struggle. Your grip is now firm upon the neck of the serpent: hold it there. (Cheers.) Hold it there; hold it hard; and however the venomous creature may writhe and wriggle, if you do persevere and keep as you are, with the same tenacity of purpose, at length its convulsions will be over, and the country delivered for ever from the poison and the sting of that mighty reptile. (Loud cheers.) Of all the impertinent advices which the present time has brought forth, I think the most so is one that is reiterated in sundry monopolist journals—that if there be a scarcity, we should still be submissive and content. (Hear, hear.) We are told (and this is the statement of the Protection Society themselves) that the crop is an average crop; they say nothing of quality; but they report that as to quantity. Now take their own statement—say that the wheat is up to the average of the harvest: do the people keep down to an average? Does not every year increase their numbers? Have we not been told, by authority, of 360,000 or 380,000 additions every year to the mouths that are to be fed? What is to become of these 380,000 if our supplies of food are to be kept down to the average of past years? and is it to be matter of conjecture that we have as much food now as we had when we were so many hundred thousands fewer in number? The people grow, and the supplies must grow, too; that agency must be employed which is capable of sustaining them. (Cheers.) Providence puts this power into our hands. I had almost said it was impious to tell the people they must submit to scarcity—go without food, or get what modicum they can at an exorbitant and monopoly price, and call all they are enduring a dispensation of Providence! (Hear, hear.) Why, Providence makes ports, stretches the bold curve of the bay, and rolls in the billows, so that they may bear in safety vessels bringing supplies of necessities and luxuries. Providence makes ports, Providence does not close ports. (Cheers.) It was Providence that grew the very corn, the foreign corn that had arrived in this country, that was in our possession; Providence placed it within our reach: the Corn Laws turn it back, and fly in the face of Providence. (Hear, hear.) Providence endows the banks of the Mississippi and the Missouri with their abundant fertility, capable of becoming the granaries of Europe, and of supplying the wants of our industrial myriads, who provide for the cultivators there the clothing which they need. Providence never sends universal scarcity; there is no such thing on record in all history; where one portion of the world fails in its crops, another succeeds, and there is a general superabundance. Providence gives for all; and the lesson from its conduct is, that all should feel their common interest, and administer to each other's common wants. (Hear.) Providence is accountable for none of these things. Providence lays no rate; Providence takes no tax; and Providence tares no butter. (Great applause and laughter.) Wicked, we might say blasphemous, teachers are they who would transfer their own iniquitous doings to the divine government, representing that as not less oppressive and tyrannical than themselves. Why, if it were as they tell us, if Providence indeed willed that a class should gain profits by a nation's sufferings, the only moral would be that of the tempter of old—to curse God and die. (Applause.) Such is the tendency of their teaching in the holy name, which they abuse, and in despite of the instructions of a book everywhere replete with admonitions, that we should relieve the poor and the needy, that "he who withholdeth corn the people shall curse him," and which, in the various illustrations of the connection of seemingly small events with great, gives us a better notion of Providence under present circumstances than all their teachers exhibit. It shows us the momentary interruption of our own supply tending to the prompt abolition of an enormous iniquity that parts us from the rest of the world; it shows us, in the failure of a crop of the lowest vegetable used for human food, the occasion of the destruction of the mightiest monopoly that ever plundered humanity and revelled in the occasion of its sufferings; and, as it tells the tale of old, how the shepherd boy, with his sling, and with a smooth stone from the brook, brought down the Philistine giant, so it shows us now the more profane giant of monopoly laid prostrate by the blow of a rotten potato. (Applause and laughter.) If our condition is not rightly represented as an afflictive dispensation of Providence, to which we have nothing to do but submit unmurmuringly, so neither can it be fairly ascribed to the progress of manufactures, to the commercial system by which, in fact, the country has been aggrandised. This has been a favourite topic with monopolist advocates; they have spoken of our over-grown establishments for producing goods. They once ventured to suggest that the greater portion of London, Manchester, and Liverpool, might as well be razed to the ground, and the inhabitants distributed over the country, in parishes, on small allotments, each with a squire and a parson to take care of them. (Applause.) They are frequently reminding us that commerce is "more unfaithful than the southern gale," that she "may shift to other shores her sail." Now, what does all this mean? There may have been ages in history when the operations of commerce appeared to change their localities capriciously; but what was the commerce of ancient times? Merely the interchange of natural products. It is only in modern history that commerce has sprung up; it is one of the last results of civilization, and amongst the grandest. It has sprung up, not in consequence of caprices, but of wants; not for the interchange of merely natural products, but for the communication of art, and capital, and industry throughout the world; uniting the nations by the peculiar abilities of different people to contribute different results to the great common sum of good. It is a system that in its very nature implies advance; and I see no reason to imagine that any number of years which our figures can express will find it arrived at a point beyond which there is no progress. Commerce grows like the oak; it may seem a mere sapling which the passing breeze may level with the ground, but its roots strike this way and that, as if instinctively in search of their proper nutriment; its leaves unfold themselves to the air, to imbibe from it the nourishment it affords; and year after year adds to the rings that circle it, and denote its age, and show the steadiness and equality of its growth. As it strikes deep into the earth, so it extends high up into the air, it spreads abroad a grateful shade and shelter, and the birds of heaven sing among its branches. (Applause.) Commerce flows like the river; it may be confined for a time, when it is yet but small and feeble, by rocky barriers, but it goes on deepening, and widening, and fertilizing its banks on either side, and towns and cities arise upon its shores, and it bears upon its bosom the wealth of provinces, carrying it on with it to meet the ocean, where they are to find nature's broad highway to every region of the globe. (Applause.) And such is the growth, and such the natural flowing of the commercial power and principle. Why, at this very moment, when articles of cotton clothing seem to be among the prime necessities of life to so many civilized nations, of the 900 millions of the earth's inhabitants, not above 120 millions are provided with them. There are 7 to 1 that need your cotton manufacturers spread all over the surface of the earth, and all of them able to contribute or to do something or other from their regions, which, in return for what you furnish, shall enlarge your wealth, shall add to your enjoyments, shall provide for your multitudes, shall stimulate your arts and industry, and aggrandize the British name by linking it with the world's advancement, and the comfort and progress of its inhabitants. (Loud cheers.) See, how it advances with us, even here, in this little isle of ours, now intersected, or about to be intersected from end to end, and across its breadth, with those lines of locomotion that annihilate time and space. Throughout the land the barrier of distance is thrown down, and the galvanic telegraph lends its instantaneous communication. The spirit of commerce does all this. It seizes the elementary powers; it harnesses them; it makes their mighty energies minister to the production of human good, and the gratification of human wishes. It bridges the mighty ocean; it extends from our own country to all Europe; it is at work everywhere. This system of more rapid communication—and with it, eventually, however prejudices may obstruct—of free interchange, is extending throughout the whole length and breadth of Europe. Railroads will run ere long, transversing the course of every mighty stream; as the rivers flow in one direction, the iron lines will be laid down in another, until, throughout all the nations of Europe, there are the means of a rapid transit wherever their waters flow, or by whatever name they are called, from the Ebro to the Rhine, from the Rhine to the Danube, from the Danube to the Vistula, from the Vistula to the Volga. All along with these mighty natural arteries of Europe will the iron muscles be laid down, aiding and co-operating with the energy of the human frame, and augmenting the strength of all these nations for their mutual good, their mutual enjoyment. And not Europe merely; the New World and the Old are thus linked together; and even the ancient nation, so long secluded, whose inhabitants learnt their wisdom from Confucius, and who have kept aloof for ages from others, they are become one with us; the barriers of space and time, the barriers of superstition and prejudice, all are destined to succumb before the growing spirit of commerce. It puts its belt around the globe; and it is itself as firm and solid as that globe—a portion, too, of mighty nature—a part of the great providential scheme that formed worlds, and suns, and systems, and rolls them along in their harmonious motions. (Loud cheers.) The power that governs our country suffices not at the present moment to save it from the prospect of calamity; but this is owing to the accident, to the unnatural and preposterous circumstance, that those who enrich the country are not those who have a decisive voice in ruling the country. (Cheers.) A class interposes, and for a time throws doubt and suspicion even on the workings of Nature and of Providence. It is a momentary obscurity; and the League may warn the monopolists in the words of Gray's bard to the tyrant of his country,—

"Fond, impious man, think'st thou yon gloomy cloud,

Rais'd by thy breath, has quenched the orb of day?

To-morrow he repairs his golden flood,

And warns the nations with redoubled ray."

And such will be the gladdening sunlight of Free Trade, and its joy-giving force, after this temporary obscurity. (Cheers.) Other counsellors of the public say, "We have got through times of alarm before, and therefore let us hope we may get through again." We have got through them before; but how? In 1825, 26, and 27, the last three years of the former Corn Law, in every one of those years the Government was obliged to let foreign corn in bond out at a reduced and almost nominal duty; they also asked and obtained the power of admitting half a million quarters of foreign corn in 1828. In April of that year they declared (as some ministers and legislators have of late declared), that they had no such purpose,—the Cabinet had come to no decision on the Corn Laws; and on the 1st of May afterwards they came down to the House with their opposition, to throw open the warehouses, and to allow of that extent of importation. We got through in those years; but how? How in a later period? We got through with multiplied bankruptcies, with increased committals for crime, with want extending through the streets of our towns, with incendiary fires blazing all over the rural districts. (Hear.) We got through, but we did so at a fearful expense of privation and suffering, of disease, and of mortality. (Hear.) In the name of heaven, let us try to get through better the next time. (Cheers.) And there is something to encourage the hope; the question is better understood now than it was then; the ways of getting through which were then submitted to, will not now be endured. (Cheers.) In 1815 there was a sort of instinctive blind outbreak against the passing of these Corn Laws; there were riots; blood was shed in the streets; the people struggled, like blind Samson, and like blind Samson were sent back to toil in their prison-houses for the benefit of their taskmasters. (Cheers.) But the lancet of knowledge has couched blind Samson's eyes. (Cheering.) The physical power of the many, and the moral power, are now in unison, in an alliance that cannot be broken. There is wisdom to direct the guidance of that strength; and thus put forth, where is the power that shall stand before it? It is coming; we know it is coming; be you but firm, unrelaxing, unbending, in every exertion, every legal and peaceful exertion, that may promote this good cause. New allies are announced every day. Mr. Labouchere, in this morning's Times, adds his name to the converts from a fixed duty. (Applause.) They are all coming in; but it is somewhat misnamed to call this leading. Much has been made of Lord John Russell's name as the Liberal leader, because 20 years' consideration has led him to the point which the intelligence of the country had arrived at so long before. (Loud cheering.) We welcome him gladly. I believe he has come amongst us because the cry was so loud and strong. Being made a little louder and a little stronger, it may bring us another Liberal leader, in the person of Sir Robert Peel (cheers); and raise it to its loudest pitch, and we may have that great Liberal leader, the Duke of Wellington, in our ranks. (Applause, and loud laughter.) While we remember all this, let us never forget who they are that have done this, and who in the day of triumph should wear the laurels. There has been at times a practice of dealing with works of art, that I think ought not to be tolerated; that is, transforming their persons. Julius Cæsar is said to have been so pleased with the statue of Alexander the Great, by Aristippus, that he ordered the head to be taken off, and his own countenance to be put on its shoulders. (Laughter.) And I myself once lived in a cathedral town where there was a statue of St. Paul over the great western entrance of the church. The men at work in the repairs knocked St. Paul's head off; the dean and chapter, being too stingy to employ a sculptor, went to some old stone-mason's shop in the town, where they found a judge's head, with a long wig on; and there St. Paul stands, to this day, with a judge's wig and curls on his head! (Loud laughter.) Now, as preposterous a transformation as this would it be, when, in a coming time,—I hope in the new houses of Parliament,—the statues shall be erected to the founders of Free Trade, if on those statues should be placed the heads of Russell, Peel, and Wellington, instead of those of Cobden, Bright, and Villiers. (Cheers.) Great as may be the political advantage, the advantage in Parliamentary tactics, of these eminent names, that is all we can plead for them. The work has been done—the chariot of Free Trade has been driven within sight of the goal; and Russell, Peel, and Wellington, at best, are only yoked to it to drag it along the few remaining paces to its final destination. (Cheers.) It is an honour for them that they do that; and I hope they will put their shoulders to the yoke kindly, and not let it be a moment longer on the country than is absolutely necessary. (Cheers.) But trust them not. Lord John Russell may not have the power, the Duke of Wellington may not have the will, and Sir Robert Peel having played the monopolists a slippery trick one way, may play the Free Traders a slippery trick another way. (Cheers.) Trust in yourselves, under the guidance of that power which ever smiles propitiously on the true, the just, and the right. (Cheers.) There is a piece of advice which was given some time ago, with no very charitable intent, perhaps, to the Orangemen of Ireland: "Trust in Providence, and keep your powder dry." We don't use gunpowder. Our weapon is of a very different, and a much more potent description. Bayonets cannot pierce it—balls cannot level it. Opinion is a power which no form of physical force, multitudinous or military, can eventually prevail against. (Cheers.) But means must be employed; and I say to you, as was said to the Orangemen—Trust in Providence, and keep your names upon the registration. (Cheers, and laughter.) Trust in Providence, and multiply your 40s. freeholds; trust in Providence, and win cities and counties, and show Parliament and the world your unalterable determination that the shackles of trade and industry shall be knocked off for ever." (Cheers.) In that confidence you cannot be disappointed; the time is coming, it is clearly coming. "Powder dry!" No; our cause is not like a canon—it is more like a steam-engine. (Cheers.) It is preparing for its journey; the hour of starting is come; the bell rings, and it rings the death-knell of monopoly. (Cheers.) There is a steady hand (pointing to the Chairman) to steer the engine. (Cheers.) There are active stokers to keep up a bright fire (pointing to Messrs. Cobden and Bright.) (Cheers.) On it then moves. Out of the way calves and pigs! (laughter)—out of the way, or you're veal and pork in no time! (Great laughter.) Booted squires and sportsmen, clear the line, or down you go, horse and rider, in spite of all your game laws! (Cheers and laughter.) Such a train as that would dash through a house if it stood in the way, though it should be a house as old, and as strong for its age, as the House of Lords itself. (Great applause.) On it goes, brightened in the sun, careless of the storm, all good spirits in heaven and earth in sympathy with its progress; nor shall it rest until it reach its final destination, until we are home, in the people's home,—a home made happy by freedom, peace, plenty, and progress. (The speaker then sat down amidst the most vehement cheering.)

At the conclusion of Mr. Fox's eloquent address, there were loud calls for Mr. Cobden; and

The CHAIRMAN rose and said, Mr. Cobden will address the meeting. (Great cheering.)

Mr. COBDEN presented himself, and his appearance in front of the platform was the signal for renewed cheering. He said, Mr. Chairman, and Gentlemen,—After these splendid orations I think I should only mar the effect of our meeting by delaying you for a single moment longer. We meet here, I think, a larger meeting than I have ever had the pleasure of witnessing before, and I am sorry to say that many hundreds are outside storming the doors. We have had an invitation to go outside and address an Anti-Corn-Law Lecture to them in the street. (Cheers and laughter.) And, gentlemen, it is the same wherever we go. Within the last nine days my honourable friend, Mr. Bright, and I have addressed seven meetings. We have been in the cathedral city of Bath, and the mountains of Derbyshire. We have been in Gloucestershire. Wherever we have gone there is the same unanimous feeling that we find amongst our tall chimneys in Lancashire. (Cheers.) Every where the only complaint is, there is no place large enough to receive the Free Traders. Now, gentlemen, I felt some apprehension when I first heard the intention of Government lest we should sink into apathy in consequence of the hope—the fallacious hope—that somebody else was going to do our work. But I am happy to say that this morning's papers relieve me from all anxiety, for I see that His Grace the Duke of Richmond has met, along with 50 or 60 other gentlemen, at No. 17, Old Bond-street, and there they have thrown down the gauntlet, and declared that they will fight till the death for monopoly. (Laughter and cheers.) Now I find some relief in this. They are small in numbers, to be sure (laughter), humble in pretensions of every kind for a contest like this. (Hear, and laughter.) But still we have a foe left in the field, and while that is the case I am not afraid of the courage of Englishmen. (Laughter.) The Duke of Richmond leads not the hosts, but the handful of monopolists that still follow his banner. By reputation I know something of the Duke of Richmond. I was born within seven miles of him in Sussex. We were boys together almost; he is an amiable, respectable man in private life; a man that acquits himself in that decent, respectable sort of a way that you would expect a man to do to whom you gave 30s. a-week. (Cheers and laughter.) He is just an amiable, respectable man; but as a senator, as a statesman, I would find a thousand men in this room, with fustian jackets, that if you put a coronet on their heads would be able to take a far more comprehensive view of what is good for the nation. (Cheers.) Why, gentlemen, these men, the protectionist nobles and landlords, they do not know what the condition of the country is, at their own doors. I have always said that the worst enemy to the agriculturists was the aristocratical order. The danger lies at their own doors, and they don't know it. We had a meeting in an agricultural district, and we had a farmer present. He made a few hasty remarks, and then he threw himself into a chair; he said he durst not trust himself, for if he was to state what the feelings of the tenant farmers were he should be liable to be accused of entertaining feelings similar to those entertained at the time of the French revolution. (Hear, hear.) I ask these men who talk of fighting the question to call a meeting in any county, and give but a week's fair notice, and I will engage that the meeting shall be against them. They met, the other day, in Steyning, in Sussex. Now I would undertake to go to this place, the headquarters of these Dukes, almost within a stone's throw of both of them, and I would call a public meeting by public advertisement, and I would engage to pass a resolution in that village condemnatory of these laws—condemnatory of protection—denouncing it as being a fraud to the farmer and an injury to the working classes. They are in a nice predicament to meet us, are not they? (Cheers and laughter.) If my friend Mr. Bright and I were to go into the agricultural districts, and it was found out that we were coming, and the weather was fine, we should have a tail like a comet after us. I wish the fine weather to come. We must meet and show these bread taxers the unanimity of the people of this country by holding an open air meeting on Kersal Moor, a hundred thousand strong. (Cheers.) I want to see the hosts pouring in from Bury, Bolton, Rochdale, Oldham, Ashton, and Stockport; I want to see the male population of this country poured out; then let the Duke of Richmond come and take his place on the grand stand and witness that. (Cheers.) I say they are impervious to the signs of the times; they do not know a brick-wall till their heads knock against it. (Cheers and laughter.) They yield to nothing but fear; they don't want courage and don't see fear till it is brought home to them. The people are unanimous everywhere on this question. They told me at Nottingham that they had not had a unanimous meeting for a long time owing to the division of parties; but all parties are unanimous on this question. There is only one thing I want to see. The great metropolis is not easily moved; but the reason is, it is so gigantic in its proportions that it takes such a time to gather up its huge limbs; but London meets in the Guildhall next Monday, and I intend to claim my right as an elector to be there with them. (Cheers.) He trusted to see London join Yorkshire and Lancashire in this movement, and the question was settled. With reference to their late meetings in the south, they were purely business meetings—the promotion of the qualification scheme. The discovery of this scheme was like the discovery of a jewel in a casket. They did not know their power till it was found. And he had no doubt the aristocracy, if it went on, would feel that power; they would soon find themselves as powerless as the feather carried along in a strong north-wester. (Loud cheers.)

Mr. JOHN BRIGHT, M.P., was next loudly called for, and appeared amidst much cheering. He said: Although we have felt extremely pleased in beholding the respectability, and the enthusiasm, and the determination by which many meetings which we have recently attended have been distinguished, yet I confess there is no platform within the limits of this island that I would so soon stand upon as that of this Free Trade Hall. For in this town has been the cradle of the League; and from this town has gone forth a voice which has caused the awakening of the intelligence and the resolution which now distinguish the inhabitants of almost every town in the kingdom. (Cheers.) And it was well that the people of this, the greatest city of our manufacturing industry, should speak out first and loudest, and should lead in this great contest for the freedom of the industry of the great commercial and trading nations. And I am convinced, beyond all power to change the sentiments which I feel, that the triumph we have been looking for is not far off. (Loud cheers.) We have had powerful accessions to our ranks; and I would be the last man to say that we have not gained enormously by the adhesion of Lord Morpeth and Lord John Russell to the cause. Rely upon it that there have been thousands of willing and influential persons who have not dared to come out for so great and sudden a change, until they were assured by the countenance and support of men of high character and great integrity, in whom they have been accustomed almost to place implicit confidence. I am glad, however, it is so. But the monopolists are buckling themselves up for some fight. The Morning

Post has a long article in very large type, telling of the extraordinary things they were to do. And the Standard, true to its old principles, true to its anti-national character, is doing its very utmost to rouse the passions of the disappointed class to resist the calls which the almost universal people of England is making upon the Government, that these accursed Corn Laws should be abolished. We see how wicked is this law in its operation. You are recommended by the Duke of Norfolk to feed upon warm water and curry-powder, and as if this was not absurd enough, you are recommended by Dr. Buckland to try mangel-wurzel. (Laughter.) The gentlemen who have spoken before, have noticed these foolish propositions. I will only say that if we are to go on, and to win, we must work harder when the contest is coming to a close, than we did at first even; we must have before long two kinds of demonstrations, from which the monopolists may learn something. We must have a meeting, at which a large number of men will put down their names for large sums of money, by which they shall guarantee to the whole people of England, that whatever fund can be judiciously and honestly applied, shall not be wanting to the furtherance and completion of our great undertaking. (Cheers.) We have the best means of knowing that such a meeting, to be held within the next fortnight, would strike much terror into the monopolist camp, and enable her Majesty's Government to do much to decide this measure; and when, in addition, we have the hundred thousand people together Mr. Cobden spoke of, then you may rely upon it the men opposed to you will have to do, as bad men always do before men united and determined,—they will yield when they find that their system must fall. (Cheers.)

Mr. JOSEPH BROTHERTON, M.P. addressed the meeting for a few minutes, and a vote of thanks having been given to the gentlemen who had taken part in the proceedings, the vast assembly broke up.

OPENING OF THE PORTS.

SHEFFIELD.

A highly respectable and crowded public meeting was held on Thursday, the 4th inst., in the Town Hall, Sheffield, convened by the mayor, in compliance with a requisition signed by a considerable number of the most respectable inhabitants and tradesmen of the town. We have been favoured with an excellent report, occupying eight columns in the Sheffield and Rotherham Independent, but we are unable to make any adequate room for even the most concise abridgment of the very able speeches that were made on the occasion. The speakers were the Mayor, Mr. Alderman Dunn, Mr. William Fisher, the Rev. T. Smith, Mr. Wm. Smith, Mr. Henry Atkin, Mr. Otley, Mr. Alderman Turton, Mr. Wm. Thompson, Mr. Wm. Jackson, and Mr. Warder. A series of resolutions were unanimously adopted, and a memorial agreed to, which was signed by the mayor on behalf of the meeting.

DERBY.

A meeting of the Town Council of the borough was held on Monday the 8th inst., for the purpose of considering a proposition to memorialize Government on the subject of taking measures for the admission of foreign corn and provisions duty free, and for the permanent abolition of the Corn Laws. There was a full attendance—his worship the mayor (W. Eaton Mousely, Esq.), in the chair.

His worship [stated that he had convened the meeting in accordance with a requisition signed by a majority of the Council, and he called upon the town clerk to read the same.]

Mr. Alderman STRUTT (M.P. for the borough) then rose amidst cheers. He said he had been requested to propose the memorial which the Council had been called together to consider. He did not think it would be necessary for him to trespass at any length on their time on this occasion, as they were already, as well as the inhabitants of Derby generally, well acquainted with the subject of the Corn Laws. There was no subject upon which the great majority of the Council and the inhabitants of the town were more agreed than on this. (Hear, hear.) He recollected attending a large meeting, about twenty years ago, which was held in Derby, for the purpose of petitioning Parliament against those laws. The great majority of the population were agreed then on the subject; and, notwithstanding the various modifications the Corn Laws had since that time undergone, they were still opposed to them, and had continued from time to time, through public meetings and through their representatives, to express their condemnation of those laws. (Hear, hear.) He would not, therefore, go into the general question of Corn Laws, but would say a few words on their application to the present state of the country. Mr. Strutt then proceeded to describe the prospects of the country from the almost universal failure in some degree of the potato crop, and concluded as follows:—Under these circumstances he said he did think it incumbent upon that Council to express the strong sense they feel of the awful responsibility which rests upon the Government, and to implore them that no means be spared for averting the calamity with which the country was threatened. (Cheers.) Whatever steps the Government might ultimately take, they ought not, in his opinion, to be of a temporary character—not simply the opening of the ports, but the entire abolition of those laws which were the origin of the evil, which raised prices artificially, restricted the supply of food, and impeded all the commerce of the country. (Cheers.) With respect to the existence of those laws, he entertained no doubt whatever that they could not be of long existence. (Cheers.) He believed that those laws were doomed. Reason and justice were against them. (Renewed cheers.) There never was a period in the history of this country when there was such a weight of authority in favour of any measure, and when there was a greater determination on the part of the people to get rid of a great wrong, than there was upon this question of Corn Law repeal. (Cheers.) One great party in the state was firmly united for the overthrow of protection, and the head and the leader of the other had admitted to the fullest extent the justice of the principle of Free Trade. The only question with them was as to the time and the manner of its adoption. (Hear, hear.) He trusted the present opportunity would be seized by the country generally to urge on the measure. On it depended our amicable relations with that great country across the Atlantic—for if this opportunity were suffered to pass by unimproved, the peace of the two countries might be broken, and perhaps the peace of the world. (Hear, hear.) They should not wait until Government and Parliament were driven to carry repeal into effect by commercial distress in this country and famine and distress in Ireland. Now was the time to avert the dangers with which they were threatened; and he trusted they would avoid the dangers of longer delay. (Cheers.) Mr. Strutt concluded by moving the memorial, and resumed his seat amidst loud cheers.

Mr. W. EVANS, M.P., then rose and said, that since he came to the hall he had been requested to second the motion which Mr. Strutt had just so ably proposed. The reasons which Mr. Strutt urged in support of the proposition were so explicit and so satisfactory, that it was quite unnecessary for him (Mr. Evans) to occupy the time of the council by entering upon the important question which they were called together to consider in detail.

He had never been able to discover what benefit the Corn Laws were to this country. (Cheers.) That they impeded trade, occasioned distress and suffering to the people, and kept good corn out of the country at a time like the present, when it was urgently wanted to grind with our unsound corn, he was well persuaded. (Cheers.) The time was now come when no man who looked abroad, and saw what was the real state of the country, ought to hesitate one moment in using every exertion in his power towards accomplishing the complete abolition of those injurious laws. (Much applause.) To suspend them for a brief period only would be merely to effect a temporary good, to be followed, in all probability, by bad consequences. Foreign countries would look upon us with jealous feelings if we merely opened our ports at a time when famine threatened us, and the moment our turn was served we then shut them out again by re-imposing absurd restrictions. (Hear, hear.) But he thought that would be a matter not easy of accomplishment. He would like to see the Corn Laws immediately suspended; and that done, he was confident it would not be in the power of any Government to re-enact them. (Loud cheers.) No measure, in his opinion, would effect so much positive good, with so little possible evil, as a total repeal of the Corn Laws; which would cement the bonds of peace, propitiate friendly relations with foreign countries, extend commerce, and thus benefit the people. (Hear, hear.) * * * Mr. Evans concluded by seconding the adoption of the memorial, and resumed his seat amidst much applause.

His worship then put the memorial, which was carried unanimously, amidst great applause.

Mr. Alderman GAMBLE moved that the mayor be requested to sign the memorial on behalf of the council; that the corporation seal be affixed to the same; and that the mayor be requested to forward it to Sir Robert Peel.

Mr. Alderman JOHNSON seconded the motion in a brief speech, in support of a total repeal of the Corn Laws, which he said were totally indefensible. He was glad to find all parties becoming unanimous on the question. (Hear, hear.) The motion was carried unanimously.

Mr. MADELEY proposed a vote of thanks to the mayor, for the courtesy with which he received the requisition, and his ready compliance with its request, and for his impartial conduct in the chair. (Much applause.) This conduct was an earnest of what the town might expect from his worship, should it be found necessary to call a public meeting. (Applause.)

Mr. Alderman PEET had great pleasure in seconding the motion. As one of the deputation that waited upon the mayor, he could bear testimony to the great courtesy shown by his worship. (Applause.)

The vote carried was by acclamation.

His WORSHIP thanked the council for this expression of their kindness, and stated that the expression of opinion by memorial or petition was the birthright of Englishmen, and he would be sorry at any time to delay the one or impede the other. (Applause.)

The council then broke up.

DUDLEY.

On Monday night a town's meeting was held at Dudley for the purpose of taking into consideration the alarming state of the country, in consequence of the deficiency in the potato crop, and to address her Majesty as to the expediency of opening the ports. A requisition, numerous signed, had been presented to the mayor, Dr. Fisher; his worship, however, declined to call the meeting. In these circumstances the town's people assembled in the Lancasterian school, and appointed Mr. Thomas Leicester chairman.

The CHAIRMAN having briefly explained the objects of the meeting, the Rev. J. PALMER, Unitarian minister, rose, and in a long speech advocated the necessity of union and action amongst the middle and lower classes, in order to bring about a speedy repeal of the Corn Laws. He (Mr. Palmer) would like to see the man who had the hardihood to stand up and defend the Corn Laws on the ground that they benefited the nation at large; the monopolists had not a man who could screw up his courage to the sticking point. No, thanks to the exertions of the League, all their fallacies about protection had been scattered before the winds of heaven. (Cheers.) The reverend gentleman concluded a long and earnest speech by calling on the meeting to strengthen the hands of the League by passing resolutions condemnatory of the existing Corn Laws.

CHARLES TWAMLEY, Esq., said the working-classes are now better off than they had been for years; but they are not going to get off scot free. The time is coming when they will and must feel it. Even at the present time flour was 2s. 8d. per bushel dearer than it was last May; at that time it was 7s. 4d. per bushel, whereas now it is 10s., so that for the consumption of the town of Dudley alone there is a weekly expenditure for flour of upwards of 500l. more than there was some months ago. (Hear.) We, who are in want of wheat, are actually sending it out of the country to Belgium; and this, with the fact that various branches of trade (amongst others the cotton and silk) are considerably depressed. It was quite true that the iron trade was tolerably good; but could it be supposed that it would remain so, whilst all other branches of industry were suffering? In these circumstances, it behoved all parties to exert themselves to put an end to the present system. Mr. Twamley next read some statistical accounts, to show that the protective system was anything but advantageous to the farmer; and concluded by observing, that Sir Robert Peel and the Duke of Wellington were the most likely men in the State to repeal the Corn Laws. (Cheers.)

Several other gentlemen addressed the meeting, and resolutions were passed, praying the Queen to summon Parliament as soon as possible, for the purpose of devising means to remedy the evils to which the country is exposed in consequence of the deficiency in the corn crop, and the rottenness amongst the potatoes; deprecating also the sliding scale, and urging the necessity of an immediate repeal of the Corn Laws. After this the meeting broke up.

COVENTRY.

MEETING OF THE TOWN COUNCIL.—At a special meeting of the town council, held on Tuesday, the 3rd inst., a memorial to Sir Robert Peel was proposed, urging him to issue an Order in Council for opening the ports at this juncture, describing the evils now pressing upon the community in consequence of the high price of flour, the potato disease, &c., and stating that great scarcity was already experienced in this city and neighbourhood, and that disease and death to many would be the result.

Alderman ELD rose and said, he entered his protest against the council taking up any such party or political subject; he had protested against such a course under the Melbourne Ministry—that protest he now renewed.

A warm discussion now ensued. Mr. WILMOT made rather a long speech upon what he termed the agricultural interest, and the protective system.

Mr. BUCKNEY showed the fallacy of Mr. Wilmot's reasoning, remarking that commercial freedom would cause a greater demand for labour, and thus increase wages. Mr. Wilmot had chosen America for an illustration, and it was the country above all others that would least serve his purpose; for it was a notorious fact, that in America bread was cheap, and labour was proportionably high. The inefficiency of the sliding scale had been tested, for every year about harvest time there was a great rise in the price of flour, and the greater part of the wheat imported was brought in about that time.

Mr. WHITTEM and Mr. BRAY showed the advantages of Free Trade, and the cramping of commerce which resulted from its restriction. Mr. Bray also urged the necessity of the ports being open at this time, because of the scarcity now felt in consequence of the potato disease.

After further discussion, Mr. BRAY proposed that a memorial be adopted.

Another discussion followed respecting the wording of the memorial, some thinking the words "scarcity," "disease and death," much too strong.

Mr. COPE thought there had not been much scarcity at present; for though the potatoes were bad, and the crop of wheat was not so heavy as could be desired, yet there had been plenty of peas, beans, and almost every other kind of vegetables. He thought the terms too strong.

Mr. BUCKNEY said it appeared to him that the council was shutting its eyes to the real condition of the working class; they had now to pay 2s. 6d. per stone for flour, when a few months ago it was but 1s. 10d.; in addition to this, but few good potatoes could be obtained, and other articles had increased in price, while there had been no increase in wages, and a great diminution of employment. Therefore great scarcity must be felt somewhere.

Mr. H. BROWETT referred to the depression of trade which was now experienced. Instead of receiving orders for goods, orders were being received to countermand what was about being sent off. Manufacturers were reducing their stock of goods, because they expected the scarcity which now prevailed, and which threatened still further calamity, would lessen the consumption.

At length the words "disease and death" were expunged, and the word "scarcity" retained.

The memorial was then adopted, and the corporate seal affixed to it.

The council broke up after more than two hours' sitting.

GREAT YARMOUTH.

A requisition, numerously signed by merchants, ship-owners, and tradesmen of this borough, was on Wednesday last presented to the Mayor, S. T. Palmer, Esq., requesting him to call a public meeting, to consider the course which the inhabitants should take with reference to the inadequate supply of wheat available for the consumption of the people; and his worship immediately appointed Thursday evening, at 7 o'clock, for a public meeting on the question. At the time appointed, the Town Hall was filled, and the Mayor took the chair and opened the business of the meeting in a short speech. Mr. Tolver, the town clerk, having read the requisition,

GEORGE DANBY PALMER, Esq., moved the first resolution. During the time Mr. Palmer was addressing the meeting, the hand-bill, from the office of the Norfolk News, containing an extract from The Times paper, stating the intention of the Government to repeal the Corn Law, was handed in, and having been read, created a considerable sensation. Mr. Palmer moved the following resolution:

"That this meeting views with feelings of alarm the deficiency of the late harvest, and the general failure of the potato crop, both in this country and in Ireland, and deems it the duty of her Majesty's ministers immediately to open our ports for the admission of every description of food, duty free."

This was seconded by Mr. THOMAS HAMMOND, and passed unanimously.

Mr. W. N. BURROUGHS moved the next resolution in an eloquent and impressive speech, which was warmly applauded. The unequivocal feeling of the meeting fully proved that the people of Yarmouth were alive to the importance of this great question. The following is the resolution:

"That a memorial founded on the foregoing resolution be signed by the Chairman on behalf of the meeting, and forwarded to the First Lord of the Treasury, Sir Robert Peel."

It was seconded by Mr. W. A. BURTON, and was passed unanimously.

Mr. J. BAYLEY next moved the adoption of the memorial: Mr. D. A. GOURLAY seconded the motion, which was carried unanimously.

The memorial was signed by the Mayor on behalf of the meeting.

The meeting was one of the largest and most unanimous ever known in this place.

A vote of thanks being moved to the Mayor by PHILIP PULYN, Esq., and unanimously accorded, the meeting broke up.

CHORLEY.

On Monday a public meeting, called on a requisition to Mr. James Whitfield, chief constable of Chorley, was held in the Wesleyan Chapel, Chorley. The meeting was called to take place in the Town Hall, but was so large that an adjournment had to take place.

Mr. WHITFIELD having taken the chair,

R. SMEDHURST, Esq., moved a resolution to the effect, that the deficient harvest, and failure in the potato crops, imperatively require the consideration of the government.

Seconded by E. MORRIS, Esq.

Mr. LAWRENCE, a working man, supported this resolution. It was the duty of the landlords, in making laws, to raise the price of food to a certain figure, to take care that the working man should have an equivalent return for his labour, and that they had not done. Who suffered first from an unnatural price of corn? Not the landlords; for the wealthy can always obtain enough for their own wants—but the poor labouring man. And they know it now; experience has taught them that an enhanced price of corn does not enhance the value of their labour.

The motion was unanimously agreed to.

Mr. R. ANYON moved the next resolution, that the prosperity of all classes depends mainly on a low price of food. Mr. Anyon went into a statistical argument to show that flour, the staff of life, has now risen 25 per cent., and meal 74 per cent. in value, and then described the depressing effects that must ensue from such a misfortune in every department of trade.

Rev. Mr. O'HANLON, in seconding the motion, demonstrated the fallacy so long prevalent in this country, that a high price of food is invariably and necessarily attended by high wages.

The motion was carried.

THOMAS WATTS, Esq., a landed proprietor, moved a resolution to the effect, that it is the duty of Government to open the ports for the free admission of all kinds of food, and that immediately, by means of an Order in Council. If the often repeated assertion, that a repeal of the Corn Laws must be disastrous to the landlords, be true, he would be among the sufferers. But he never believed that such a thing would occur. He denied, however, that the proprietors pocketed money through the operation of the Corn Laws. Though this meeting was meant only to memorialise for opening the ports, that was only a preparatory step to getting rid of the Corn Laws altogether.

Rev. Mr. CLARK seconded the motion in a humorous and excellent speech. The meeting had heard of young ladies being encased in tight stays in order to support them in their various visits; these young ladies fell ill, and became ready to faint, until the medical man was called in, and administered relief by freeing them of their stays. Well, our adored lady Britannia was in this case now: the Corn Laws are her tight stays; she is ready to faint; and if the high authorities would not step in to act the part of a medical man, the meeting would do a good old lady's part—help to uncase herself. Then would Britannia be able to stand upright, and walk alone. (Cheers.) The resolution was then carried unanimously.

JAMES WALLWORK, Esq., then moved the adoption of a memorial, in accordance with the foregoing resolutions.

Mr. HODGKINSON seconded the motion, which was agreed to with cheers.

After a vote of thanks to the chairman, the meeting separated.

CARLISLE.

The usual monthly meeting of the town council of this ancient borough was held on Tuesday last, the mayor (James Steel, Esq.) presiding. There was a full attendance of councillors. As soon as the local business had been concluded:

Mr. Alderman DIXON said: Mr. Mayor, constituted as our corporation is by royal charter, and representing, as we do, a large commercial community, it is incumbent upon us—indeed I should conceive we should be neglecting our duty if we were not to do so—in cases of great local and public difficulty to communicate with the Crown, and state what may come under our knowledge, and of which the Crown may not be so cognizant as ourselves. The present circumstances of the country are deeply interesting, nay deeply embarrassing, as appears from the repeated consultations of her Majesty's Cabinet; and I am sorry to say, from my own knowledge, that there are serious grounds for such deliberations. The difficulties under which we labour, as well as those which are approaching, are exceedingly serious. It is known to you all that there has been a deficiency in the wheat crop. From communications I have had from gentlemen acquainted with the results of the harvest in this locality, I learn that the crop, although good in bulk, is in quality inferior and deficient. The consequence is, that there is a demand for a superior kind of wheat, which cannot be obtained at home to the extent required; and we are prevented using foreign wheat, which would be useful for mixing with our own, its use being prohibited by existing laws. We have very high prices for certain kinds of wheat coincident with very low prices—the averages consequently do not rise to the pivot at which grain in bond becomes admissible at a low duty—and hence foreign grain is prohibited. (Hear.)

Add to this, it is notorious that the potato crop has failed to a considerable extent. You will have seen the accounts published from various places; and I fear that they are too true. Speaking from my own knowledge, I can state that the potatoes are affected to a very considerable extent. The crop was abundant, more than an average, but on examination they were found to be affected with the disease. I came in contact only yesterday with one of those poor men who are allowed to plant potatoes free of rent: he told me he had put by three cart loads, and on taking them up, at the end of eight weeks, he found that two-thirds of them were entirely destroyed, and that 20 pigs belonging to a farmer in the neighbourhood were hardly able to keep pace with those destroyed. (Hear, hear, hear.) The general impression is, that the potatoes will not keep, and that the seed will not be forthcoming. These are facts that have come under my observation in my own neighbourhood; and I think it is right, connected as I am with the commercial world, to name what has come under my own cognizance. Already, in consequence of these things, the price of provisions has risen 30, 40, and 50 per cent., and a serious stagnation of commerce has taken place, such as to make it a subject of deep regret to those engaged in the employment of the people, because they have invariably found, and they now find, that when the price of food rises the demand for goods ceases, because people having more money to spend in food, have not so much to spend in clothing. The embarrassments in Lancashire and other places are very considerable, at present, on this account: and it appears to me to be an awful responsibility for any body of men whatever to prohibit the importation of food from other countries under such circumstances. (Hear, hear.)

I should say, rather than put any let or hindrance on it, every facility should be given for the introduction of food from all parts of the world. (Hear, hear.) It is a matter of congratulation that wheat may be obtained, to a considerable extent, from America, where, fortunately, there is a surplus. It is a lamentable fact, however, on the other hand, that there is a deficiency in Continental countries, whose Governments have, in many instances, opened the ports, and are receiving, even from England, corn which we ought to be consuming at home. These, gentlemen, are facts for the serious consideration of every man, but especially of the Government; and I trust God may so order their minds as to induce them to do away with all restrictions on the produce of the earth, and hindrance to its importation into this country. This cannot be done too early, for too much time has been lost already, and the emergency is pressing. It is quite in the way of our duty to lay before the Crown the circumstances in which we are placed; indeed we should be neglecting our duty by remaining silent. I should be sorry to take any of you by surprise, but that, indeed, is scarcely possible, as much of what I have stated must have been known to you for some time, and I apprehend there will be but one opinion on the subject. I shall, however, give the usual notice; and will on Monday next move the adoption of the memorial.

Not a dissentient voice was raised against the memorial, which, it is expected, will be passed unanimously at the next meeting of the council.

Mr. Dixon is the head of the firm of Messrs. Peter Dixon and Sons, on whom are dependent for employment about 10,000 persons.

GREENOCK.

On Saturday, a meeting of the inhabitants of Greenock was held in the Sheriff Court Hall, on requisition of the Provost, to take into consideration the expediency of adopting a memorial to her Majesty's ministers in favour of the immediate and permanent opening of the ports to the admission of grain and other articles of food from foreign countries, duty free.

On motion of ALEXANDER STUART, Esq., the younger, of Belreux, the Provost was called to the chair by acclamation.

JOHN K. GRAY, Esq., Town Clerk, at the request of the Provost, read the requisition calling the meeting.

The Provost said it was unnecessary for him to say much in stating the object of the meeting. The words of the requisition calling it were perfectly plain and explicit, stating that the object was to get rid of the Corn Laws immediately and permanently. It was astonishing what progress the principles of Free Trade had made among all classes within the last few years. The Whigs themselves had abandoned the fixed duty, and had declared themselves hostile to all duties whatever upon the articles of food of every description. Nay, if all was true that was said, the men in power were prepared to go quite as far, and were prepared to sacrifice the Corn Laws, the sliding scale, and every other thing about them. Whether that report was true or not, one thing was certain, and that was that their ultimate success was indisputable. He concluded by calling upon his friend, Mr. Baine, to move the first resolution.

The meeting was addressed in long and able speeches by Walter Baine, Esq., M.P., for Greenock, Robert Steele, Bailie Macfie, Duncan Ferguson, Esq., Councillor M'Ilvain, and Councillor Hunter. After the resolution had been unanimously passed, the Provost introduced the late representative of the borough (Mr. Wallace) to the meeting, who spoke for a considerable time, and urged the continuance of vigorous efforts, as the circumstances of the country justified the firm belief that with a last united and determined expression of public opinion the Corn Laws must inevitably fall. The report of this meeting occupies several columns in the Greenock Advertiser.

DUNDEE.

In consequence of a highly-respectable requisition to the Provost, numerously subscribed, a public meeting of the inhabitants was held in the Thistle Hall, Union-street, on Wednesday afternoon, the 3d inst., for the purpose of memorialising her Majesty's Government immediately to open the ports for the free admission of provisions of all descriptions, and to assemble Parliament without delay, to concert measures for the immediate and complete repeal of the laws restricting the free importation of corn and provisions. We noticed on the platform, the Right Honourable Lord Kinnaird; W. F. L. Carnegie, Esq., of Kinnlethmont; George Duncan, Esq., M.P. for the burgh; Provost Brown; Bailies Anderson, Sturrock, Moyes, and Hean; David Baxter, Esq.; Edward Baxter, Esq.; Thomas Neish, Esq.; J. G. Baxter, Esq.; Alexander Balfour, Esq.; John Peter, Esq.; Alexander Easson, Esq.; Alexander Low, Esq.; William Nairn, Esq.; Logiealmond; Dr. Gray, and others. Dean of Guild Thoms, and a great number of gentlemen connected with the public bodies of the town, were in the body of the Hall; which was filled to excess; the meeting being composed of the greater part of our leading merchants and manufacturers connected with our staple trade, shopkeepers, and a fair representation of the working classes.

Provost Brown, on taking the chair, was received with great applause. He had great pleasure in complying with the requisition, for he approved of its object. With respect to the failure of the potato crop, it was evident that great distress would prevail amongst the working classes during the ensuing winter and the early part of summer. But, if such a calamity were to overtake them, it would be attended with the alleviation that it would no doubt enable them to get rid of the obnoxious Corn Law. Their views were therefore brighter than ever. They had recently, too, had the accession of two leaders of a great political party—Lord John Russell and Lord Morpeth—(cheers) and he had no doubt but the accession of these noblemen would be the means of enabling them soon to attain their object. He was sure the meeting would agree to return their acknowledgments to Lord Kinnaird and Mr. Carnegie for their attendance. (Great cheering.) Both were deeply interested in agriculture, and yet they both lent their assistance to do away with the Corn Law. (Cheers.) Lord Kinnaird and Mr. Carnegie were not like certain dukes and lords—they afforded a fine contrast to the Dukes of Richmond and Buckingham, who exerted themselves to keep up laws for the benefit of their own order, at the expense of the people. There was another nobleman to whom the cause was also much indebted—Lord Duncan—(cheers)—who, in consequence of a previous engagement, was prevented from being present. A letter had also been received from a worthy neighbour, Sir John Ogilvy, who had been prevented from attending by previous engagements. He concluded by calling upon Lord Kinnaird to move the first resolution.

LORD KINNAIRD, on presenting himself, was received with great applause. He had often felt himself called upon, both in Parliament and at public meetings, to express his opinion on the baneful effects of the Corn Laws on all classes of the community. His was not an opinion of yesterday; and he could not express his conviction better than in the words of Lord John Russell: "They were a blight to commerce, and a bane to agriculture." (Cheers.) It was now 19 years since he came into possession of his property, and ever since he had paid great attention to agriculture, so he could speak with certainty. He considered these laws to be a great drawback to improvements in agriculture, on account of uncertainty of prices for the produce of the land. (Cheers.) Tenants were generally of the same opinion privately, but they did not like to go against their landlords. Apart from his own tenantry he had consulted with others, and on one occasion he had discovered that a tenant under a Corn Law landlord had actually written and published letters anonymously against them. (Cheers.) He had attended many meetings on the subject, but he had never felt such gratification as on the present occasion. He hoped their object would be soon realised—much sooner than they expected. (Cheers.) He did not expect that the great leaders of the Whig party would have come forward so openly and manfully. (Cheers.) As a proof that the subject had not been studied by our legislators, his Lordship referred to a conversation he had had with the late lamented Lord Holland, who had expressed his belief that the Corn Law was quite right, declaring to him at the same time that he had never studied political economy, which had formed no part of the education of the aristocracy in his younger days; and he was therefore unable to discuss the subject with him. But, thanks to the Anti-Corn Law League, the science of political economy was now rendered as plain as A B C. What the Duke of Richmond and others had denounced as wild theories, were now found to be practical facts, and he would defy any statesman to govern the country without practically adopting such principles. With respect to the Corn Law, Lord John Russell had, he understood, been making inquiries, and now they witnessed the good result. (Hear.) As to Lord Morpeth, no one stood higher as an intellectual and straightforward politician. It was somewhat remarkable that the letters of these two noblemen had been written on the same day—a fact which augured well for the speedy success of their cause. (Cheers.) Although the Corn Law had now received its death-blow, yet they must all deplore the immediate cause of it. Since the appearance of the disease in potatoes he had turned his attention to the subject, but regretted to find that chemists could give no explanation of it. His impression was, that not one-third of the late crop of potatoes would be sound at the end of three months. Parties were pushing their stocks forward to market. Prices would therefore soon rise; but would they then get corn to supply the deficiency? Already potatoes to the value of 80,000*l.* had been shipped at Perth, besides cargoes from Newburgh and other ports of the Tay, and his belief was that in the course of a month not a good potato could be had. The deficiency of the crop in Fife and the Lothians was known to be great; and under all the circumstances, unless Government were forced—and they were formed of squeezable material—no relief could be obtained. (Cheers.) It was dreadful to think of the consequences to the labouring population if the Government should refuse redress within a few short weeks. (Cheers.) It was fortunate, however, that the League stood in a position such as he believed would soon enable them to carry the question; but they must be supported. The country owed a debt of gratitude to Cobden, Bright, and Wilson for the valuable time they had devoted to the good cause. (Great cheering.) It was understood that the iron duke, who had formerly declared that no reform in the burgh representation was necessary, was the only obstacle to Sir Robert Peel moving in the Corn Law question; but they should exclaim with Bright, "We won't bear it any longer." (Cheers.) His Lordship concluded by moving the following resolution:—

"That this meeting, looking forward with great alarm to the consequences which will inevitably result from the general failure of the potato crop and deficiency in the harvest throughout the United Kingdom, regard it as the imperative duty of her Majesty's Ministers to take special measures for the prevention of starvation and its concomitants—misery and crime."

His Lordship resumed his seat amidst loud cheering. W. F. L. CARRNAGY, Esq., of Kinblethmont, rose amidst great cheering, and said he had much pleasure in seconding the motion which had been so ably proposed by Lord Kinnaird. He concurred entirely in his Lordship's sentiments; and it would be superfluous in him to say much, after the eloquent, clear, and succinct speech just delivered by his Lordship. (Cheers.) There was not one individual amongst them, he believed, that did not concur in all that had been said. He stood in the same position as his Lordship, both as a landowner and a farmer, and it would be a serious thing to him if a repeal of the Corn Law were to injure landlords and tenants. He had long been persuaded that a repeal would be beneficial to both these classes as well as to other interests. (Cheers.) He could not under such circumstances accept compliments from the Provost for attending the meeting, for he had merely come there to advocate his own interest. (Cheers.) He recollected having attended an Anti-Corn Law meeting in London some years ago, when, even in that extensive city, the number did not exceed a fiftieth part of those present; but see what large meetings are held now. It had always been his opinion that the Corn Law as an injury to the landlord as to the farmer. (Cheers.) ad Lord Holland studied political economy he would have rived at the same result. He would congratulate the setting on the near acquisition of their object, for he considered that the Corn Law was the greatest mistake—the greatest national blunder that had ever been committed. (Cheers.) He believed that the disease amongst the potatoes was exaggerated; but let them only carry their object—the potatoes might rot as they pleased. They could then and the murrain amongst the potatoes as if it were amongst the cabbages, for the former was not proper food for the people, and should never be depended upon again. (Cheers.)

r. NAIN said—When we, who have all along advocated the Corn Law repeal, almost driven out of temper by the obstinacy of our opponents, have dared to say a word against the humanity, we have had applied to us every name but that of gentlemen. But I must now ask our defamers whether the shameful indifference of our rulers to the lives and even lives of our fellow-subjects, does not more than justify all that ever we said. We never ask anything from them, nor are we asking anything now, except that to which the Author of our being has given us an inalienable right. In man's changed circumstances he was that in the sweat of his brow he should eat his bread, and any one who knows human nature can see mercy mixed with the sentence; but our rulers have sucked out the mercy and casting humanity to the winds, they insultingly tell you must toil, you must sweat, but ye shall not eat. Were we asking a favour at their hand we would perhaps have right to complain, even although, like one of their supporters, they told us they would do what they would with their own; but we only ask them not to do what they like with ours—let them take all their own—we don't envy them of it—let them cease from taking ours. The document we are forward to her Majesty's Government is called a Memorandum, and so verily it is. It is a Memorial of the utter recklessness, of the despicable meanness, and cruel selfishness of men who set themselves up as the pink and paragon of society. Noble lords and honourable gentlemen, enriched by the sobs of the poor and needy,—enabled by blackening the fame of their patriotic forefathers, and honoured by trampling under foot all that is truly great and generous among men. We must vote and get others to vote for good and true men—genuine Free Traders. When the first election comes, and it will soon come, the trying question to all candidates for a seat in Parliament must be, Are you a Free Trader, and will you do all that an honest man can to destroy all monopolies? This is the only power before which the strongholds of Monopoly will fall; and the sooner they are down the better for Britain, the better for Europe, and the better for the world at large. (Cheers.)

Lord KINNAIRD's motion was then carried amidst great cheering.

Mr. DAVID BAXTER, in an able and eloquent address, proposed the following resolution.

"That the present circumstances in which this country is placed, especially demand the opening of the ports for the importation of foreign grain and provisions, and the final repeal of those laws which prevent the free circulation of the produce of the earth, and better the commerce of an industrious people."

Councillor EASSON then rose to second the adoption of Mr. Baxter's motion. He said the object of the Corn and Provision Laws was to compel the people to draw their supplies of food from a certain class, within certain bounds, till prices reached such a limit as to entail a heavy tax on the consumer. Such laws were unjust, and they were warranted in protesting against them and using every legitimate means in their power to get them abolished. (Cheers.) The League had taken a grasp of the principle to which he had alluded, and hence the present enlightenment of the community. (Cheers.) In whatever circumstances the people might be placed, let them never lose sight of this principle—to buy in the cheapest markets and sell in the dearest: laws to the contrary should not be tolerated in a free country. (Cheers.) The Anti-Corn Law League, through good report and bad report, had long shown what would be the result of a bad harvest and its effects on trade, as well as the impolicy and injustice of the laws complained of, amid such contemptuous epithets as he would be ashamed to repeat. These predictions had been fully verified, and the time was drawing near when they would attain their object. On taking a retrospect view of the question, they would clearly see the difficulties the League had had to encounter, and the great revolution that had taken place in public opinion, with its attendant effects. Some of the stoutest advocates of restrictions have given up their former principles altogether. Such conversions showed the great power of a body acting on principle instead of expediency,—all showing that the time was not far distant when they would get rid of these obnoxious laws altogether. (Cheers.)

Dr. GRAY then presented himself, and was received with his accustomed welcome. He said the country had arrived at a great and important crisis, and, whether that crisis should prove advantageous or otherwise, depended upon the Government. The serious misunderstanding which at present existed between Great Britain and the United States with regard to the Oregon territory, called loudly upon all the friends of peace and civilization to come forward manfully and proclaim aloud, that now was the time for the abrogation of all restrictions on trade—(cheers)—in order that the terrible storm which was brewing in the distant West might be averted, and all the horrors of war and desolation prevented. The extraordinary activity which was at present exhibited in our naval dockyards was significant of the future intentions of the Government. It was their bounden duty therefore to step in and point them out the way by which peace and civilization might not only be preserved, but also extended and ramified to the most distant nations of the earth; and the best plan which could be adopted for such a benevolent and philanthropic purpose was in the removal of all restrictions upon trade. (Cheers.) The repeal of the Corn Laws would be the signal for the amicable settlement of the dispute between this country and the United States, with respect to the territory beyond the Rocky Mountains, as the whole farmers of the Union would rise as one man and compel their Government to make concessions to Britain, in order that new markets might be opened for their agricultural productions, and which would render them rich, prosperous, and happy. (Cheers.)

The motion was then put and carried unanimously.

The Provost then introduced a gentleman for whom he had the highest respect—Mr. Duncan, Member for the Burgh.

Mr. DUNCAN was received with great cheering. He said the Premier had explained, in his bearing, the whole mystery of the Corn Law in a single sentence—Buy in the cheapest markets and sell in the dearest. What did the present meeting seek? Merely to reduce Sir Robert's theory to practice, yet he now denied it. They were not met to ask any favour at the hands of Government, but to demand their just rights as British subjects. (Hear, hear, and cheers.) If they knew the constitution of the House of Commons as well as he did, they would find that it was not there the battle would be fought with success, but out of doors. Without attending to that, Peel, backed by his monopolists in the House of Commons, would render all their memorials and petitions of less value than the paper upon which they were written. (Cheers.) There was the sugar monopoly, the corn monopoly, and another interest which the Minister had secured to himself—the railway monopoly. (Cries of hear, hear.) They had no idea of the influence of the railway interest, and Sir Robert had now become identified with it by becoming a railway maker himself. If they trusted their wishes and hopes to the present House of Commons they would trust to a bottomless vessel of which he would not like to be an under-writer. (A laugh.) They must continue the pressure from without, and demand their right to barter their goods for the produce of other countries. (Cheers.) There seemed to be a fatality about the actions of our Government in not allowing a supply of fruit to be brought in for the use of the inhabitants of this country. Look at what foreign Powers had done in a similar emergency—in Belgium, for example. Their ports have been thrown open, and no fewer than two hundred and twelve vessels loaded with provisions, had, within the last six weeks, discharged cargoes at Antwerp alone,—a number of these carrying off food from our own shores. Within that time seven or eight Cabinet Councils had been held to consider whether the ports should be opened or not. [Dr. Gray—"They were not all about the Corn Laws, but something about the far-distant West." Great laughter.] Whatever they might have done had not transpired, but, with famine staring the people in the face, they should have done something for relief. To attain their object, the people themselves must move and do their duty, if the Ministers refused to do theirs. (Cheers.) In his opinion, every town, village, and hamlet, should meet and petition; and, by placing these petitions in Sir Robert Peel's hands, he would be made aware of the opinion of the country respecting the conduct of Government. In the event of a general election, the course the electors ought to pursue should be to look out for men who would vote right irrespective of making fine speeches; for he could assure them that there was at present a host behind the Treasury benches ever ready to vote that black is white when required to do so. (Laughter.) They were aware that there was to be a new House for the accommodation of the Commons, but to make all right the people would require to return a new set of members. If God spared him, he would again vote on the question as he had hitherto done. The present Parliament had told them that they could not pass an Act to regulate wages; at the same time they had passed a law to regulate the price of food, thereby inflicting a great injustice on the people. Such a state of things could not last much longer. (Cheers.) Lord John Russell had not gone out with them previous to the last division in the House, and he had never heard that Peel had given in to a fixed duty. Lord John now says that the bread tax is unjust, and he gives it up. Perhaps Sir Robert, who had pertinaciously stuck to his sliding scale, might also be induced to throw it overboard. (Cheers.) Mr. Duncan concluded by reading the following resolution, and sat down amidst cheers.

"That this meeting, therefore, earnestly impress upon her Majesty's Ministers the necessity of immediately suspending the operation of the Corn Laws, and of calling Parliament together at an early day, in order to submit to it a measure for the total repeal of the duties restricting the supply of food."

At this stage of the proceedings, Lord Kinnaird left the meeting, amidst enthusiastic cheering.

Mr. NEISH seconded the adoption of Mr. Duncan's resolution. He referred to the potato disease, and expressed his conviction that so far from being exaggerated, its full extent was not yet known. In illustration of this, he mentioned the case of a cargo of potatoes sent by himself to Rotterdam, which, although they appeared sound on landing, were found, in a day or two, to be not worth the freight. He urged the necessity of trusting no longer to Sir Robert Peel in this question—they had trusted too long to that pretended reformer already, and had been made fools of for their pains. They must now act for themselves, and so determinedly as to oblige even the Iron Duke to give way. He did not trust in Sir Robert Peel; he considered him a false pretender; and, when they saw an honest, upright statesman frankly acknowledging his error, they must look to him as the future head and leader of the party. (Cheers.) They had a cunning fox to deal with, but they must hunt him out of his hole—they must compel him to do justice, or lay his resignation at her Majesty's feet. (Great cheering.) If he still attempted to thwart the just demands of the people in every way, they should appeal to the country. They had no faith in Peel, and it was their duty to tell him so. He had much pleasure in seconding Mr. Duncan's motion, and he only wished that all members of the Legislature did their duty as well as he. (Great cheering.)

The motion was then carried with great applause.

Mr. ALEXANDER LOW proposed the fourth resolution—

"That this meeting views with pleasure the progress of Free Trade principles in this country, and particularly rejoices in the declaration of Lord John Russell, 'That observation and experience have convinced him that the Legislature ought to abstain from all interference with the supply of food,' and likewise in the most emphatic announcement of Lord Morpeth, 'That the time is come for a final repeal of the Corn Laws.' That this meeting, encouraged by these events, pledge themselves to renewed efforts in the cause of Free Trade, and that they will never cease to use every constitutional means in their power for the purpose of abolishing those laws which make food scarce and dear, cripple the energies of the nation, and which are in their operation now threatening to overtake the country with a fearful calamity." The prospects as to the ultimate and complete triumph of that great Free Trade movement which was now occupying the minds of every class of the community, were at present very cheering. The roll of Free Traders in this town was much greater than at any previous period; and, as an evidence of that, he referred to the very numerous and respectfully-signed requisition to Provost Brown, to call this meeting, for the purpose, not only of memorialising her Majesty's ministers to suspend the Corn Laws, but to take measures for immediately and totally abolishing the Corn and Provision Laws. That requisition contained the names of benevolent gentlemen who take an active interest in promoting the religious, moral, intellectual, and physical improvement of the people, whose conscientious convictions were worthy of the greatest respect, and who have for the first time thus publicly declared that the Corn Laws ought no longer to be maintained. A number of the shipowners of Dundee, and others engaged in the trade of the town, were some time ago unfavourable to an unconditional repeal of the Corn Laws; they urged the plea of reciprocity; they considered that we ought not to admit the corn of other countries free of duty, unless they in return opened their ports to the free admission of the manufactures of this country. The plea was now seen to be a fallacy. It was just saying that, unless we can have two good things, we will refuse the one we may have; and now all the merchants and shipowners of Dundee were, with very few exceptions, prepared to vote for the total, immediate, and unconditional repeal of the Corn Laws. (Cheers.) What had taken place here had also occurred in every town in the kingdom—one after another was subscribing to the justice of the cause, and the soundness of Free Trade opinions; the tide of public opinion in favour of Free Trade was advancing every day, and it would continue to swell until it swept away every oppressive power. (Cheers.)

Mr. JOHN PETER, in seconding Mr. Low's motion, remarked, that the conduct of the Government was insane in refusing to open the ports at a time of such urgent need. They had the example of foreign countries before them, who lost no time in admitting a supply of food for their people. (Cheers.) They should not however deceive themselves—all their exertions would still be required to crown their just cause with success. For himself, he could use no language sufficiently strong in condemnation of the infernal Corn Law. (Great applause.)

The motion was carried amidst hearty cheers.

Mr. EDWARD BAXTER then read a memorial founded on the preceding resolutions, addressed to Sir Robert Peel, First Lord of her Majesty's Treasury; and which, being moved by him for the adoption of the meeting, and seconded by Bailie MOYES, was carried by acclamation.

Votes of thanks were then severally proposed to Provost Brown, the Leaders of the League, and George Duncan, Esq., M. P., all of which were carried with rounds of cheering.

Just as the meeting was breaking up, Mr. WILLIAM CHRISTIE presented himself, and begged to ask a question of the worthy Provost. He was glad to see the Member for the Burgh present: Had the member for the county been invited to attend the meeting?

The Provost—Not that I am aware of.

Mr. NEISH inquired who he was? to which Mr. Christie replied—Lord Hallyburton.

Mr. Low explained, that he believed the hon. member was at present in Germany.

Mr. CHRISTIE said, he put the question as he had noticed that the honourable gentleman had voted against the repeal of the Corn Laws; and he therefore declared publicly, that, as a voter for the county—and there were many present—he would not again support him. Under present circumstances, he would recommend an organization of the Liberal electors of the county, for the purpose of attending to the registrations.

Mr. T. WIGHTON considered that the inhabitants of Dundee had a great interest in the county. The League had done much in England with respect to the registrations; and, were the influential gentlemen on the platform to take the matter up, much might be done in the county of Forfar.

Mr. CARNEGY expressed his belief that the honourable member was liberal in his opinions.

A VOICE—Perhaps he had been converted.

Mr. WIGHTON—It's only then since the last division on Mr. Villiers's motion in the House of Commons.

The large assembly then quietly separated.

QUEENSFERRY.

The Magistrates and Council of Queensferry have petitioned the Queen to assemble Parliament, or adopt other measures, with a view to open the ports for the free admission of food.

KILKENNY.

MEETING OF THE CORPORATION.—Tuesday, 9th December. The MAYOR in the Chair. Present—Alderman Hackett, Hart, Smithwick, Town Councillors Lanigan, Kelley, (Altamont), Rowan, Martin, Kelley (Irishtown), Mortan, Bateman, J. Potter, Burke, Cody, Hayland, R. Smithwick, O'Callaghan, Purcell, Kinchella.

Town Councillor LANIGAN's notice of motion for a memorial to the Queen in favour of opening the ports having been read, he said that—Agreeable to that notice he held a memorial in his hand which he would submit to them, and it would be for them to say if it corresponded with their sentiments; or whether it went far enough in the right direction—to release the foreign corn now in bond, and to allow a supply to come in from the countries which were blessed with a superabundant harvest to the relief of this kingdom where want was so imminent. It was but too true that, in this country, from the testimony of those most conversant with the subject, one half of the crop upon which the people depended may be supposed to have been destroyed, and it was impossible to form any opinion as to the safety of the rest; many persons, who from their position, were more experienced than he was, had arrived at the conclusion that it was doubtful if any part would remain safe. This being considered, seeing the danger of a want of food for the people, and how that danger was likely to increase, when the law says that no foreign supplies shall come in to their relief under a duty of fifteen or twenty shillings a quarter—a law which goes to frustrate the law of God that provision should not be withheld from the poor, he was sure that they would agree with him in a prayer for the release of foreign corn from those restrictions, and that he would receive the aid of many more competent than he was in his efforts. He believed that it was known to them all that a county meeting had been held with regard to the potato crop; and a committee formed in which many of the landed interest had enrolled themselves. After three weeks or a month a report was brought up by this committee, which certainly did not suppress the truth but told it plainly. It was reported that the question had been mooted in that committee to request of her Majesty to cause measures to be taken to open the ports. A resolution to that effect had been proposed by one gentleman; he did not know if it obtained a second, but, at all events, it was crushed. It was, therefore, their bounden duty, as the municipal representatives of the people of this city, to come forward and memorialise on the subject. One thing more, and he had done. The Cabinet had met more than once, but had done nothing: in that cabinet there were men who supported monopoly, and would, while they had the power, oppose every amelioration of the present system. Was he to be told that this was to continue, and that this law was to remain in existence

"Until ruin and riot sweep the land,
And powerless Statesmen trembling stand.
'Mid pillaged stores, 'mid trampled laws,
'Mid wretches shot in monopoly's cause,
'Mid the curse and groan of famished men,
Shall the bread-tax fall, and not till then?"

(The conclusion of Mr. Lanigan's address was followed by a unanimous burst of applause, and he then read, and moved the adoption of the memorial.)

Alderman SMITHWICK rose to second its adoption: he regretted that he had not been in time to hear the entire of Mr. Lanigan's able address. It was unnecessary for him to occupy much time. He thought it their duty to support the measures which were approved of by their constituents, and this was a question in which the people of Kilkenny were deeply interested, and in whose favour they were decided. As a farmer, he had himself no apprehension of any danger from the repeal of the corn laws. (Hear, hear.) Modern improvements in agriculture would enable them to meet any increased competition: long before the Corn Laws had existence, land in this neighbourhood bore as high a rent as it does now. But such considerations were trivial compared to that of providing for the necessities of the people. He had, therefore, great pleasure in seconding Mr. Lanigan's motion. (Hear, hear, and cheers.)

The MAYOR said that the Board had heard the memorial read; and also the able and argumentative speeches of the mover and seconder. There was no difference of opinion on the subject: such was the rapid spread of intelligence and public influence, that no minister could be found henceforward, who would be hardly enough to dare to class-legislate. As to the present question, he was happy to tell them that a large number of the landed gentry of this country were in favour of it. He alluded more particularly to this from a remark made by Mr. Lanigan. Having had the honour of being a member of the committee upon the potato crop, he had, with the concurrence of his friend, Mr. Smithwick, drawn up a resolution in favour of opening the ports. If that resolution had been submitted to the committee, so far from not obtaining a second, it would have been largely supported; but a conversation having ensued as to whether this was the proper time to bring it forward, it was agreed that, as they were then only met to report progress, it would be better to postpone its adoption until a future day, when, he could assure the Board, it would be triumphantly carried. He trusted that the citizens at large would imitate the example of the Corporation, and memorialise; that they would be followed by the county, and that the spirit would be caught up by the land. The Mayor then put the question, and declared it to be carried unanimously. (Loud applause.)

On the motion of Alderman Hackett, seconded by Town-Councillor Martin, it was ordered that this memorial should be signed by all the members of the Corporation, as well as the Mayor.

The MAYOR was glad to hear them adopt Alderman Hackett's proposition, as it would be a test whether this memorial embodied the sentiments merely of a majority of the Corporation, or those of the entire board.

OPERATIVES' MEETINGS.

BLACKBURN.

MEETING OF COTTON-SPINNERS, SELF-ACTING MINDERS, ROVERS, &c.—On Thursday evening the 4th inst., a meeting of cotton-spinners and others was held in the large room of the Britannia Inn, Penny-street, in this town, for the purpose of considering a series of resolutions on the prospects of their trade; and, if deemed advisable, to adopt a memorial to her Majesty's Government for the opening of the ports for the free admission of all kinds of foreign corn and provisions. The meeting was summoned by a deputation from the Cotton Spinners' Central Committee, consisting of Mr. H. Turner. The summons was only issued in the course of the afternoon, but notwithstanding the insufficiency of the notice, a numerous attendance waited the opening of the proceedings.

THOMAS BISPIN having been appointed to the chair,

It was resolved, 1st, on the motion of THOMAS SHERIFF, seconded by RICHARD MEADOWS—That this meeting views with feelings of pain and deep regret the consequences which threaten to ensue from the general and almost unprecedented failure in the potato crops, and the deficiency in the late harvest in Great Britain and Ireland.

In proposing this resolution, Thomas Sheriff said, it was very clear they had "bad times" coming back again, and they all knew very well that dear food and bad trade came together. They were hindering their own interests if they did not do everything they could to bring more corn into the country. (Hear, hear.)

Resolved, 2dly, on the motion of THOMAS KAY, seconded by THOS. HOOLE—That having but recently been relieved from a period of 'great suffering and privation, a period when the price of food was high, wages extremely low, and employment most difficult to be met with; that at that period we suffered to a much greater extent than any other class of operatives; we cannot contemplate the recurrence of similar evils without feelings of extreme fear and alarm.—Thomas Kay, in proposing the resolution, said it was time for them to be up and doing, when everybody else was, and there was so much need for action. He believed they would all agree with this resolution. (Hear.)

Resolved 3dly, on the motion of JOSEPH MACNEYS, seconded by THOMAS HOLDEN.—That this meeting is of opinion that the present scarcity of food, leading as it must to a continued rise in prices, will, if not prevented, inevitably bring about calamities as great as those to which we have adverted; and we do therefore resolve to solicit her Majesty's Ministers to open the ports of this country, and let us have the surplus grain of other countries free of duty.—In proposing the above resolution, Joseph Macneys felt fully convinced that the time had come for them to be moving. They were called on, as they regarded their own welfare and the happiness of their families, to do what they could to keep off the suffering that was coming upon them. He thought they would all be agreed about this point, that wages were always lowest when food was dearest, and that at such a time work was always most difficult to be had. (Hear, hear.)

ROBERT WEST said they had met to consider if anything could be done to remove the calamities they were sure of suffering if corn continued to rise, or even maintain its price. They had hardly got out of their last sufferings from bad trade when they were again into it. And he had observed when these bad times came the cotton trade always suffered most. They all knew very well that they had the best wages when bread was cheapest. They remembered the years 1834, 35, and 36, when grain was cheap their wages were good. He considered corn should come in duty free, as well as machinery should go out duty free. Countries sent to us for machinery that they may make goods for themselves, because we would not take their corn for our manufactured goods. (Hear.) He thought the machinery and the corn should be both on the same footing in the way of duty, and if they were he thought more goods would go out than machinery, and more corn would come in. (Cheers.) If they had Free Trade he was sure they would never hear tell of short time. The Corn Laws were destroying their markets. Look to America, for instance in 1807, with its then population, we exported six millions worth of goods to America, while in 1842, we only exported three and a half millions worth. This was because we would not take the American corn for our goods, and they began to make for themselves.—Free Trade was what they all wanted. (Cheers.) A memorial, founded on the resolutions, was then read; and being duly seconded and put by the chairman, was adopted with great unanimity.—The 4th resolution was then proposed on the motion of ROBERT WEST, seconded by RICHARD REID. That a memorial, founded on the foregoing resolutions, be forwarded forthwith to Sir Robert Peel.

Mr. H. TURNER, the deputation from the central committee, was then introduced, and was received with great applause. He said he met them on this occasion under much less agreeable circumstances than when he last had the pleasure of meeting them. They were then prosperous, now they were menaced with adversity. They might ask if the central committee were doing what they could to avert the calamity which threatened them. He thought they were. The central committee were now considering in a more comprehensive spirit the causes that affected their wages; and they had unanimously ascribed an artificial scarcity of food as the chief cause of bad trade and low wages. He was sure there was no man here bold enough to assert that they were ever in danger of a reduction of wages when there was prosperous trade; nor would any man dare state that they had any chance of an advance of wages when employers were suffering from depressed trade. This then was the wage secret—scarcity of food brought bad trade and low wages, while abundant and cheap food brought prosperous trade and good wages. This cause then must be the object of their consideration. All the unions in the world would not secure them good wages, unless these unions were employed to procure abundance of food. He shuddered to think of the periods of suffering they had lately gone through, in consequence of ruined trade by dear and scarce food,—those were times indeed to try men's souls. And were they again to pass through this bitter ordeal? They thought of 42 and 43 with horror. Those days of darkness passed away—44 and 45 came, and they had labour and bread, they had garnered hopes in their hearts that the evil day was gone for a long period; but now at the end of 45 they were again on the point of famine. They are again saddened and shocked with the vision of hungry wives and famishing children;—"coming events cast their shadows before,"—and the indications were, to his mind, clear that they had again entered on one of those periods of sorrow and suffering which they had experienced so frequently during the last 12 years. The speaker then glanced at the failure of the potato crop, &c., and quoted some interesting calculations, shewing the effect which the enhanced price of food would have on the shopkeeper—the merchant—the manufacturer—and the operative. The inhabitants of Blackburn were now paying 1200L a day, or 8400L a week more for their food than they were doing six months since. The country was paying 41 millions more for their food than in May last. They might easily imagine the effect this would have upon trade, when they considered that all this sum was taken out of the consumption of manufactured commodities, and who is the richer for it? Your masters are not, but poorer; so are the Manchester merchants, so are most of your townsmen, it goes from you. There is so much less money in circulation. You pay so much more for your food that you have just so much less to spend for your clothes; you will do without new clothes for six or twelve months; if so, your shopkeeper will not need to buy them of the Manchester merchant. He won't require goods from the manufacturer; your labour will not be required to make them. All this is produced by the Corn Laws, which inflict a two-fold injury on you in raising the price of your food and destroying your means to purchase it. We may expect this season of adversity to be even more severe than others. Short time will assuredly come sooner, and be more general. The masters have suffered too severely already to repeat the expedient of accumulating a large stock. They are determined not to do it, and I cannot blame them. They will commence running short time, and continue running it with a low stock. You make up your minds for this, if the Corn Law is not repealed. They will not again keep you working full time, filling foreign warehouses with goods that they will be compelled to sell as they did before, for less money than they sell for at home. What are we to do then; are we to look with indifference on the thickly gathering dark cloud, and wait for its bursting on our defenceless heads without an effort to dissipate it? Some say it is the will of Providence. I profess profound submission to Him,

"Who marks with equal eye, as God of all;

A hero perish, and a sparrow fall."

But this distress is of man's making. He has sent no more mouths than he has sent food to fill. There is corn in Egypt, and we must and will have it. (Great cheering.) If there is not corn in England, there is a superfluity in other lands. The law to feed the people in proportion to the quantity of food grown in this country is as absurd as iniquitous. In my time I said the Corn Law repealer meant no good, but I have seen my error. Is this law right or wrong? let us approve or condemn it on its merits. Suppose a family of four brothers, one is a pauper and another rich. The rich offers to assist the poor brother, and the other two step forward and say, No! we will not allow you; he may starve, but you shall not feed him. What would you think of the two brothers who acted in this way; would you not be indignant at such conduct? Yet such is exactly the conduct of our Corn Law towards us. We are poor and hungry. Another nation offers to help us, but the Corn Law will not allow it, though we starve. We would have had abundance of food in this country, but for the Corn Law. Where is the food going that we have? To Belgium, Holland, Russia, and Turkey. And is this to continue? If every man was of my mind, it would not. It is the working classes who permit the Corn Law to exist. You must arise from your apathy. Ruin is staring us in the face—the repeal of these laws will avert it—up then to the rescue, and God will speed the right. Mr. T. concluded his long and eloquent address amid loud and continued cheering.

An individual in the audience proposed that a general public meeting should be held in the town on an early evening for the purpose of eliciting a demonstration on this subject.—The resolution was carried unanimously with great cheering.

Votes of thanks having been carried to the chairman and the deputation, and responded to, the meeting adjourned about ten o'clock.

PRESTON.

On Friday evening, the 5th inst., a meeting of the operative spinners of this town was held at the Craven Hotel, North Road, for the purpose of memorialising Robert Peel to open the ports of this country for the admission of grain.

Mr. B. GREENOUGH took the chair.

The CHAIRMAN having read the circular convening meeting, said—In the present alarming crisis they were obliged to do something to better the condition of the per classes and the operatives, and they were fully justified in doing so. (Cheers.) The panic did not so much affect the rich, for they had something to fall back upon; but did press grievously on the operatives, who had no resource to depend upon but their hard-earned wages. (Hear.) He was never a professed Corn Law repealer before the panic arrived, but now the alarming consequences likely to result from it told him something must be done. (Hear, hear.) Trade some time since flourished, and the operatives had full work and good wages; now it had gone, and there was no chance for them of asking for or obtaining an advance of wages. If, however, the ports were opened for the admission of all foreign grain, a period would be put to their distress, and relief obtained. (Hear, hear.) As they were put on short time, they could do better to relieve their condition than by memorialising Sir Robert Peel to open the ports for the free admission of grain into the country. (Cheers.) He would now call on Mr. Amos Wilson to move the first resolution.

Mr. AMOS WILSON said they had not many reasons to pass—working-men indeed seldom had. Their object in meeting was to endeavour, as factory operatives, to better their condition. He was no Corn Law agitator, and had seldom taken part in political discussions. The question to which he was wedded was that of short time; and though he had been at meetings where the Corn Law was sought to be introduced, he had always opposed its being discussed as forming no part of their object; but now he saw it was necessary for the working classes, as well as others, to take an interest in the question, and to do their best to put an end to the Corn Law. They had found that while food was cheap, trade had been good and wages good. They had obtained two advances, and the men and masters were all prosperous together; but now things were looking gloomy, and the first thing talked of was short time. The question, they were now convinced, was a bread and cheese question; and what the working class had to consider was, whether they would be content to starve in the midst of plenty. (Hear, hear.) He had seen in one of the newspapers a recommendation to peel their potatoes thinner, in consequence of the scarcity; and, if that should not be found to answer, they would next be told to eat the potatoes, peel and all. (Laughter and hear.) He concluded by moving the adoption of the following resolution and memorial: "That this meeting, knowing the great deficiency of the late harvest—seeing the present state of the potato crop, which they fear will be still further depreciated as the season advances—and having had previous experience of the dearth and scarcity of provisions, and the lamentable consequences that ensued therefrom, viz. intense suffering from want of employment, and low wages—and knowing that 'like causes produce like effects,' cannot but view with great alarm the present aspect of affairs, and therefore resolve that a memorial be immediately despatched to Sir Robert Peel."

The motion was seconded by Mr. THOS. COUPE.

Mr. H. TURNER (of Bolton) supported the resolution in a long and very able speech, of which we regret our inability to give more than the bare outline, on account of the proximity of the hour at which it was delivered to that of our going to press. He stated that he was an operative cotton spinner and a member of the Central Committee of that body, from whom the memorial just read had emanated. His interest, however, was identical with the interests of all other working men. The object of all classes ought at present to be, to avert the calamity with which they were now threatened in consequence of a scarcity and consequent dearth of food, which was already occasioning a depression of trade. The memorial which had been submitted to them had only been thought of last Sunday, and since then copies had been forwarded to a number of towns, where meetings had been held to adopt and sign them. He had already attended meetings at Bolton and Blackburn, where the operatives were unanimous in their condemnation of the Corn Law. He (the speaker) like the chairman of the meeting, was a Chartist, a backbone stickler for the six points; but he knew that while the grass grew the steed might starve, and he was not so short-sighted as to reject all other questions because he could not carry that which he desired. (Hear and cheers.) The years 1835, '36, and '37 were eminently prosperous, but they were followed by the bad years of '39, '40, and '41; and then, in consequence of the dearth of food, and the bad trade, their children were crying for bread, and they had none to give them. Many of their brethren had gone to other towns in search of work, but they might as well have gone in search of a gold mine. Then came the prosperous years of 1843, '44, and '45 when food was cheap, and trade being good, there was abundance of employment, and wages were raised. A cloud had now again appeared, to blight their prospects, and a storm seemed ready to burst over them—(hear, hear)—and they would again have to endure all the poverty and misery of 1842, unless the calamity should be averted by the removal of the Corn Laws, and the free importation of food from abroad. (Hear.) Four months ago bread was selling in Bolton at 6d. for the 4 lb. loaf; but now already it had advanced to 7d. and 7½d.; and potatoes, which were then selling at 7d. per score, were now selling at 1s. (Hear.) The difference in the cost of provisions within that brief space might be fairly estimated at one penny per head per day, or sevenpence for each per week; which, taking the population at twenty-seven millions, would amount to 787,500l. per week, or to the very large sum of 40,950,000l. per annum. This sum could not be deducted from the amount of food, but must be taken from the amount paid to the shopkeepers for clothing and other goods, which, in times of scarcity, must be dispensed with. The withdrawal of such an enormous amount from trade was sufficient in itself to account for the depression which had already taken place, and which must still extend further, unless means were taken to prevent it. (Hear.) He then entered into a number of statements and calculations, which showed the operation of dear food upon the wages and condition of families of the working-classes; absolving the manufacturers and masters from all blame, with respect to the reduction of wages and hours of work—they being losers to as great an extent, in consequence of the absence of demand when provisions were high, as the men themselves. He claimed for the working population the power to buy food wherever they could get it, not as a favour but as a right—a right which was contested by none but the owners of the soil, who acted in the same way as if they were to stand at the entrance of the Preston market, and request a per centage upon everything bought there, for permission to the buyers to select for themselves what they wanted; or, as if they were to insist upon a right to eat with the working man's family at his expense. (Hear and cheers.) After again forcibly urging the iniquitous operation of the Corn Law, and its result as exhibited at the present moment in diminishing employment and enhancing the price of provisions, by absolutely driving away the grain warehoused at Liverpool and other ports, to be sold in foreign countries, because the duty here was too exorbitant to permit it to be sold profitably at home, he earnestly exhorted the working men to combine on this home question, and by their union in the assertion of their rights, convince Sir Robert Peel and the landlords that they would no longer endure the tampering of the legislature with the means of their existence. (Cheers.) He concluded by recommending that if the working men should call another public meeting, not to hold it at dinner-time, when those employed in the mills were unable to attend, but at night, when they would be able to muster in numbers, and prove that they were ready to adopt the advice of Sir Robert Peel himself, by taking their affairs into their own hands, and sat down amid loud cheering.

The CHAIRMAN put the resolution to the meeting, which was carried unanimously.

Mr. A. WILSON stated that this meeting had originated entirely with the cotton-spinners, and was solely confined to them at present; but he hoped the matter would be taken up by others.

Mr. W. LIVERSEY suggested that a public meeting of workmen might be held in the Cock Pit.

Some discussion took place upon this suggestion, and a committee was ultimately appointed for carrying it into effect.

Mr. WM. HIBBERT moved that the chairman be requested to sign the memorial which had been adopted, and to forward the same to Sir Robert Peel.

Mr. T. BANKS having seconded the resolution, it was put and carried unanimously.

Mr. WILSON moved a vote of thanks to Mr. Turner, for his attendance, and the eloquent speech he had addressed to them.

This having been seconded by Mr. W. LIVERSEY, was carried by acclamation.

Mr. TURNER briefly returned thanks, again urging the working-men to do their duty in promoting the cause of Free Trade.

Mr. WILSON moved, and Mr. J. SHERLIKER seconded a vote of thanks to the Chairman, which was carried with loud applause, and briefly responded to.

A vote of thanks was subsequently passed to the reporters of the Preston Chronicle and Guardian for their attendance; and the meeting broke up about ten o'clock.

LANCASTER.

A meeting of the operative cotton spinners and others was held in the Odd Fellows' Hall, on Saturday evening last, for the purpose of memorialising Sir Robert Peel to open the ports of this kingdom for the admission of foreign grain and provisions duty free. Though the placards convening the meeting had not been issued more than three hours previously, the spacious hall was well filled in every part.

MARK PARKINSON having been called to the chair by acclamation, commenced by observing that the effect of dear food on the working-classes was to abstract the money which would otherwise be expended in trade; for their wives, instead of having money to spend in clothes and other articles, had to spend it in housekeeping. Again, if the shopkeepers had not money, they could not buy of the manufacturers; and if the manufacturers could not sell their goods, there would be less demand for labour. Many of the large capitalists, it was true, could afford to lay their stocks by for a time, in hopes of a change for the better, and that was a benefit to the working-men. But the small manufacturers were obliged to come into the market, and sell at low prices; and consequently those manufacturers who had large stocks on hand were obliged to come down too, and bring their goods into the market. Then there was a reduction of wages, or short time, so that in either case, the poor man's loaf was diminished, and he was therefore out of pocket. (Hear, hear.) Labour, like everything else, must be governed by the supply and demand. When a master was looking out for two men, and could only get one, that man expected a good price for his labour, and got it. But if there were two or three men, and the master wanted only one, it was his interest to get him at as low a price as he could. (Hear.) In common with many other countries of Europe, we had been visited by a serious dispensation of Providence, in the failure of the potato crop. But there was abundance of food in America; and if our rulers would only suffer it to be brought here without taxing it, thousands of lives might yet be preserved. (Cheers.) They had been often told that if the Corn Laws were abolished, foreigners would stop their supplies, if there was any prospect of going to war with us. But did the Americans stop their supplies of cotton? No; it was to their interest to sell us their produce; and that consideration was the best means of preventing war, for no man would shoot his best customer? Calamities like that which had now befallen us, had been permitted from all time, to teach the mutual dependence of nations, and he hoped that the present lesson would not be lost upon Ministers; it was not the working-classes alone who would suffer if something was not speedily done to relieve their wants, but bakers, grocers, butchers, and even the landlords of the soil. (Cheers.)

JOSEPH WILDMAN was then called upon by the chairman to move the first resolution, "That this meeting, knowing the great deficiency of the late wheat harvest; seeing the present state of the potato crops, which they fear will be still further deteriorated as the season advances; and having had previous experience of the lamentable consequences which ensue from scarcity of provisions—namely, intense suffering from low wages and want of employment; and knowing, also, that like causes produce like effects, cannot but view with alarm the present aspect of affairs. Resolved, therefore, that a memorial be forwarded to the Prime Minister, urging the immediate opening of the ports." He thought this resolution was one which could not but meet with their acceptance; for a very great majority of them had been intense sufferers on former occasions, in consequence of a deficiency of food; and although the temporary opening of the ports would only be a temporary relief, yet it might be the means of saving the lives of tens of thousands of human beings who were perishing of want. (Applause.) Look at the influence of monopoly in India. He had read in the last number of THE LEAGUE newspaper that in the year 1769, when a famine broke out there in consequence of the rice crop failing, the East India Company bought up the whole of the rice that was grown in British India, and when they had done this, and forbidden other people to trade in it, they put their own price upon it, and the poor natives were forced to give it, or die of hunger. And when they had no more money to give in exchange, three millions of them died of famine in one year, and the numbers that threw themselves into the Ganges were so great that the river became pestiferous, so that the fish in it could not be eaten. (Great sensation.) These were the awful effects of monopoly; and just the same effects had been produced in this country, and would be again, if the ports were not opened before this time next year. (Hear, hear.) How many had suffered already, and how many would suffer before another spring, no one could tell, but there was no doubt that that suffering would be very great. (Hear, hear.) Poverty was one of the most demoralising things in the world. It kept a man in ignorance, by preventing him from having access to those sources of information which would enlighten his mind. It injured his moral feelings. His sensibilities were blunted, and he felt that it was better to be fed by any means, than to die of starvation. (Hear, hear.) Many had been led away, by this cause, from a life of usefulness, morality, and respectability, to a life of crime and degradation, closed by early death. Let them express in a becoming way their sentiments to the British Government. Let them demand what justice and humanity required—that those nations which were willing to bring their superabundant food for us, should have the ports thrown open to them. (Cheers.) If they had not money, they had the produce of labour to give in exchange for it, and labour was only another name for money. It was labour that gave it its bright and beautiful appearance, and it was labour that shaped the sovereign before it received the impress of our gracious Queen. (Hear.) But under the present system, they were forbidden to exchange the produce of their labour for foreign corn. They were obliged to have it from the home-growers, who would only let them have what they liked, and at what price they pleased. Now this was not what an Englishman liked. He loved fair-play. (Hear.) He hoped the agitation now in progress throughout the kingdom would rouse the sleepy ministers from their shameful carelessness, and not only lead to the opening of the ports, but to the extinction of the immoral, irreligious, and unjust Corn Law, which had punished and hungered so many of them, and robbed them of scores of pounds. (Applause.)

GEORGE NEVATT had great pleasure in seconding the resolution. Carried unanimously.

Mr. T. JOHNSON said he had but one remark to make on the subject of the Corn Laws. He did not look at them in a commercial point of view. He regarded the question, and always had done so, as one of right and wrong. (Hear.) People had no more right to reason on the effects which a repeal of the Corn Laws would have on farmers and landlords than they had to find fault with the institution of the Sabbath or any other divine ordinance. (Cheers.) As a general rule he did not admire the practice of quoting Scripture at public meetings, as it was liable to abuse, but he could not, on that occasion, refrain from calling attention to a striking sentence in the first chapter of the Book of Genesis: at the 29th verse they would find these words:—"Behold, I have given you every herb bearing seed which is upon the face of all the earth, and every tree in the which is the fruit of a tree yielding seed, to you it shall be for meat." Now what could be plainer than this? It did not apply merely to the portion of food produced on our own island, but to that which was distributed over all the earth. (Hear.) Free Trade in bread was as much a divine injunction as the observance of the Sabbath, or any other injunction in the Sacred Volume. (Hear.) The corn was not to be cast into the Thames, or into the Mersey, or into the Bristol Channel, as thousands of quarters had been, but was given to man for meat. (Cheers.)

The CHAIRMAN then put the next resolution:

"That a memorial be adopted, and that the Chairman be requested to sign and forward it."

JAMES SMITHIES, a flax-dresser, said he seconded the resolution in consequence of his own feelings. Want of employment had brought him there. He had worked in Ghent, where trade was free, and plenty of employment was to be got; but in England and Ireland there was no work to be had in his branch of the business. He believed, however, that if we had Free Trade, there would be plenty of work for him and everybody else in this country. (Cries of "We believe it.") Want of food had caused him to come there. (Sensation.)

HENRY TURNER, a deputation from the central committee at Bolton, supported the memorial in an eloquent and argumentative speech, which elicited repeated bursts of applause.

Thanks were then voted to Mr. Turner for his able and convincing address; and to the chairman for his kindness in presiding, after which the meeting terminated.

We understand that deputations have visited most of the manufacturing towns in the county for a similar purpose; and with equally gratifying results.

WIGAN.

On Thursday the 4th, a meeting of spinners and piecers was held at Mr. Grimes, Chapel-lane, Wigan, to take into consideration the propriety of memorialising Sir Robert Peel, at the present important crisis, to open the ports for the free admission of food from all parts of the world. A very numerous body of operatives were present, and the most perfect unanimity manifested itself on the subject, notwithstanding that there were present men from every mill in the town. At the conclusion of the proceedings, the following resolutions were unanimously adopted:—

"That we view with painful feelings the consequences which threaten to ensue from the general failure in the potato crops, and the deficiency in the harvest in Great Britain and Ireland.

That, as the best means to avert the dreadful calamity of famine, a memorial be presented to Sir Robert Peel, earnestly requesting her Majesty's Government to lose no time in removing all restrictions on the importation of food and provisions of all kinds.

The memorial, we understand, was signed by upwards of 200 persons, including nearly all the operative spinners in Wigan.

MOSSLEY.

On Wednesday evening, the 3d instant, a meeting of the operative cotton-spinners, rovers, and self-acting minders was held at the George Inn, Mossley, to consider the propriety of memorialising her Majesty's Government to open the ports of Great Britain and Ireland, for the importation of all kinds of food duty free. Mr. John Winterbottom presided. Several resolutions, condemning the principles of monopoly, and approving of those of Free Trade, were submitted to the meeting, all of which were unanimously agreed to. The resolutions were supported by Messrs. George Andrews, John Mayal, Ephraim Moss, John Hyde, Benjamin Rhodes, and John Haigh. The meeting was addressed afterwards by Messrs. Bunde and Brewer, of Bolton. All present appeared to understand the question of "dear food and low wages," and a memorial embodying the resolution was unanimously adopted.

WARRINGTON.

A numerous meeting of the operative cotton spinners and self-acting minders was held on Wednesday, the 3d inst., at their usual meeting-house in the Market Place, "to consider the propriety of sending memorials to her Majesty's Government, praying them to open the ports of this country for the free admission of all kinds of grain." Mr. H. Ellison presided. A resolution, expressing the painful feelings of the meeting at the deficiency of the crops, was moved by James Shaw, seconded by W. Lawrenson, and carried unanimously. The second resolution, to the effect that a memorial should be forthwith sent to Sir Robert Peel, was moved by J. Stanley, and seconded by T. Massey. It was carried, and a memorial was also agreed to. Several persons addressed the meeting, which, after the business was transacted, separated.

CHORLEY.

The operative cotton-spinners of Chorley held a meeting on Wednesday evening, the 3d instant, at the Fazzackerley Arms Inn, which was numerously attended. A memorial to Sir Robert Peel, praying for the opening of the ports, was unanimously adopted.

COUNTIES REGISTRATION MOVEMENT.

BATH.

One of the most numerous and influential meetings ever assembled in the city of Bath, was held on Dec. the 4th, in the Banqueting-hall of that city, the use of which was kindly granted by the mayor. Between 1000 and 2000 persons were present.

Among those present were—the Mayor, Samuel Bachelor, Esq.; the ex Mayor, Admiral Gordon; Aldermen Edridge, Hancock, Williams, Gill, Hunt, and Spender; Town-councillors J. C. Archard, Samuel, Gore, Brown, Meredith, Passmore, and M. Harries; Wade Brown, Esq., Magistrate for the County; J. Pierrepont, Esq., T. Crisp, Esq., G. King, Esq., &c. &c.

The Mayor having taken the chair, briefly stated that he had always been against the Corn Laws, and the disinterestedness of his own views was proved by the fact that four-fifths of his property consisted of land. (Cheers.) His worship read a letter which he received from Colonel Gore Langton, M.P. for that division of Somersetshire, in which the gallant Colonel expressed his cordial acquiescence in the object of the meeting, and his deep regret at his inability to attend.

Mr. Alderman HUNT proposed the adoption of a memorial praying her Majesty to take steps for immediately opening the ports, and, in a speech of great ability, supported his views.

The Rev. J. MURCH, in a forcible speech, seconded the adoption of the memorial.

The CHAIRMAN then announced Mr. Cobden, when the whole audience rose en masse, and continued cheering and waving hats and handkerchiefs for a considerable period. Silence having been restored,

Mr. COBDEN then proceeded to address the audience in his usual forcible and eloquent manner. With reference to the present prospect of the Free Trade cause, the honourable gentleman said: It had been said that we were coming towards the triumph of the question. He had observed that day in the Times newspaper a statement that at the Cabinet meeting on the preceding day, the Government had decided to call Parliament together in the first week in January, then and there to suspend the Corn Law, with a view to its future abrogation. (Loud cheers.) Now he was most anxious that this should not be an occasion on which they should show themselves deficient in that forecast, resolution, and courage which he thought had been manifested in the previous part of the Anti-Corn Law agitation. He believed that the most perilous time to the cause in which they were embarked was that which was then approaching. (Cheers.) Unless they were on their guard, the hour which was coming, instead of being a time of triumph, would be one of disaster and defeat. (Hear, hear.) There had been long deliberation in the cabinet on the question. It was said that Sir J. Graham, Sir R. Peel, Lord Aberdeen, and others were for Free Trade, and that the Duke of Wellington, Lord Stanley, and others were against it. There had been a month's deliberation, and meeting after meeting. What had been the discussions during those deliberations? What had been said by the one party to reconcile the other party to the measure? It should be recollected that the protectionists represented the great bulk of the aristocracy. What had Sir Robert Peel said in order to bring over the Duke of Wellington and Lord Stanley to his views? Had he made them any promise? Were there to be any clogging enactments? What compensation was offered? (Hear, hear.) How had he managed to reconcile them to the measure? Had he been bartering away some of the people's just claims—the debt which was owing them for a long series of years of injustice and wrong? If he had, it was the people's business to say that this compact for bartering away any portion of their just rights should not be completed. (Cheers.) The League was founded on a principle which had been the rock of their salvation—the total, the immediate, and the unconditional repeal of the Corn Laws. (Loud cheering.) There was no middle point between its total repeal and the present system. If the Duke of Wellington, or Lord Stanley, could show them (for the country was sufficiently awake to require that it should be shown) that there was any justice, right, or reason—one fact or sound argument to warrant the imposition of a single shilling of duty on corn, a tax of any kind on wheat or bread, or the slightest restriction of the supply of food, then they would submit to the restriction being imposed; but, if they could not show that, then not one shilling, not one farthing of tax should they have. (Cheers.) He did not care for dukes or lords: the question was taken out of the hands of dukes and lords, and out of the hands of prime ministers, whether in posse or in esse; the question was in the hands of the people of the country. (Cheers.) * * * The country was prepared not to accept the abolition of the Corn Laws as a boon from any body; but they were determined to have it as an act of simple justice to themselves. (Cheers.) In saying this he did not speak vauntingly. If he had used such language five years ago, it might have been called shallow bombast; but he spoke now under different circumstances; the League had the whole country at its back. He had seen and tested public opinion on the subject for seven years; he had beheld it expressed during the last three weeks in Lancashire and Yorkshire, and now again in the south and west of England; and he found that the people of all classes were united in their opinion against the law. The working classes were to a man for total repeal, without one breath of dissent or one whisper of opposition: and having the whole country at their back, they would not be tricked by any Prime Minister. (Loud cheers.) He challenged the supporters of the Corn Law to call a public meeting in any town or city in the kingdom—he did not except Buckingham (laughter)—for the purpose of supporting a fraction of the bread-tax; and as public meetings might be supposed to act under the influence of excitement, he would challenge the Government to dissolve on the question. (Cheers.) * * * He was very anxious to impress on the meeting that this was not the time for throwing up the caps and fancying the victory was won. It was just the period when the real work was beginning. If the Corn Laws were abolished, it would be by the hands of the people, and not by means of any one else. He had no hesitation in saying that one of the strongest arguments, which applied with most force to the more long-headed portion of the aristocracy (for there were some of them who could see as far as anybody else) was, the result of the efforts made by the League in the qualification of freeholders. (Hear, hear.) "These men," it would be argued, "have got the large towns; they are raising 50,000, and 100,000, at a time; they have a large establishment at Manchester, with 30 or 40 clerks; and they are planting their agents in 30 or 40 counties; why, if we don't stop this League by throwing overboard the Corn Laws, they will not be content by-and-bye with corn, but they will want something else." (Loud cheers.) The men who used that argument were wise in their generation. If the aristocracy wished to preserve their counties they had better put down the League; and there was but one way of doing it, and that was by abolishing totally and for ever the duties on bread and other provisions necessary for the subsistence of man. (Loud cheers.) Now he would make a bargain with them. It was a point of honour among the friends of the League that they would not abandon their organisation till their work was done. Their opponents might give way as much as they liked, or do as they pleased; the more they yielded, the greater confidence would be inspired in the minds of Free Traders as to their giving up the rest. Every step taken in retreat, they would be pressed upon by increased force and augmented numbers. He wanted them to understand that they had honest men to deal with; that they meant what they said, and had fully intended it from the beginning; and that they had amongst them those who would find the ways and means of perseverance. But this he would tell them, that if they would honestly and freely abolish the Corn Laws, and put an end to their system of wrong and injustice; if they would do it honestly and fairly, then the Anti-Corn Law League would melt away like the snow before the summer's sun; not a vestige would remain; and its archives might be placed in the British Museum, or made a boufrie in Palace-yard. (Cheers and laughter.) The delivery of the above portion of the hon. gentleman's address elicited the most enthusiastic applause, by which he was frequently prevented from proceeding. Mr. Cobden then proceeded to explain the registration movements of the League in the north and elsewhere, especially in the counties; showed the peculiar aptitude of Bath, and some of the neighbouring towns for carrying on such efforts, and finally urged them to take immediate measures for carrying on a step so essential to their political regeneration.

The memorial was then put to the meeting and unanimously adopted amidst the greatest enthusiasm.

Mr. Alderman EDIDGE then, in a powerful address, moved a resolution pledging the meeting to co operate in such efforts.

J. KEENE, Esq., having seconded the resolution.

JOHN BRIGHT, Esq., was introduced to the meeting, from whom he met with a most enthusiastic reception. He commenced by a refutation of the propositions contained in the Bath Chronicle of that day, that, because the city of Bath was not noted for any manufactures, it had, therefore, no interest in the prosperity of the industry of the country. It was most absurd to suppose that there could be any permanent prosperity, or any security for the prosperity of the richer classes, unless it were based on the comfort, the prosperity, and the general contentment of the great mass of the population. For a time rich men might appear to prosper, and great men might appear greater, even while the great mass of the people were sinking into a lower and lower state; but, judging from the condition of the country from all periods, when the bulk of the population had been in suffering, he should say that there was no class, however rich or powerful—there was no institution under which we lived, however time-hallowed, however venerable, which could long hope to stand secure, whilst the very foundations of the state, and the industry of the state, were undermined and destroyed. (Cheers.) After some remarks on the general subject, Mr. Bright said that the restriction of trade in corn was not only injurious to the home trade, but also to the trade which we carry on, or should carry on, with those whose commodities are useful to us, and who stand in need of the goods we export.

He loved the question of Free Trade, not only because it would feed our countrymen and clothe the Americans and other people, but because it had some great features which distinguished it from almost all previous popular movements. It was essentially the forerunner of peace throughout the world. He had never attended a public meeting where that view of the question had not been received with the greatest possible cordiality and enthusiasm. (Cheers.) It was unknown what the country had suffered from war; it never would be known until the great day of final account. But, for thousands of years war had desolated the earth; and there were passions in man, there were elements at work which would bring war again to this country and to the world. There was hope, however, that by the abolition of the Corn Laws, by the total repeal of all restrictive and protective duties, all nations would see that their true interest would be most advanced by the attainment of both those objects, and by acting on the principles which are evidently set before us by the law of nature for the regulation of our intercourse with all parts of the world. There were some men who held these opinions, a large number in America, who would make any sacrifices rather than go to war with Great Britain. They had their relations here—our relations were there; they were not only in theory, but actually in fact, bone of our bone, and flesh of our flesh. (Cheers.) Why then should we go to war with them? Was it to please an ambitious president there, or a warlike minister here? Were there no interests connected with this country which affected the interest of both countries? And now when affairs had taken so critical a shape, it should be recollected that in the next session of American Congress, the question of their tariff would be discussed with a view to such a modification of it as should increase the trade of this country and that. Well, the English Parliament was about to assemble. Suppose that the next packet which went out after its meeting should bear the glad tidings that the English Corn Law was suspended, and would, moreover, be finally abolished? (Loud cheers.) Then, not only would the merchants of the Atlantic states, who lowered their flags to half mast when the American tariff was passed—not only would they be rejoiced at the prospect—not only would the people of the southern states know that no war was to be carried on with England, but the people of the western states would grow their corn more extensively at the prospect that henceforth the 28,000,000 of the people of Great Britain would be their customers and their suppliers also. All the people of that vast republic would feel they had an interest with the people of these lands, and then the ambition of men here or men there would go for nothing, and the little matters of dispute which now occur would be settled with the greatest possible ease, because the universal people of both kingdoms would have an undoubted interest in mutual peace. (Loud cheers.)

Several other gentlemen having addressed the meeting, and thanks having been voted to the Chairman, the meeting separated.

BRISTOL.

The Bristol Demonstration against the Corn Laws took place on Friday the 5th instant, in the large public-room, Broadmead, when a meeting was held for the purpose of hearing from R. Cobden, Esq., M.P., John Bright, Esq., M.P., Milner Gibson, Esq., M.P., and other friends of the cause, an account of its present position and prospects.

No sooner was the announcement made by the committee of the intention to hold the meeting, than applications poured in for tickets from all quarters. By Wednesday night all were disposed of, and on Thursday and Friday a half-sovereign, and even a sovereign premium, might be obtained for them.

Before the hour fixed for the chair to be taken, the spacious room was crowded in every part by a highly respectable auditory, there being 1110 persons present. At six o'clock the Rev. J. Glanville asked a blessing on the proceedings of the evening, and the tea commenced, the arrangements being conducted in the same admirable manner as on former occasions. At half-past six the Hon. F. H. Berkeley, M.P., entered the room, accompanied by J. E. Lunell and G. E. Sanders, Esqrs., and took his seat upon the platform amid the most tumultuous cheering. At a quarter before seven o'clock the noble chairman, Earl Ducie, entered the room, accompanied by Mr. Cobden, Mr. Bright, Mr. Milner Gibson, Mr. G. Thomas, and other gentlemen. Their appearance was hailed with reiterated cheers, and immediately upon their taking their seats a transparency, which had been erected over the platform, was instantaneously illuminated. It bore the following inscription from Lord John Russell's famous letter:—"Let us, then, unite to put an end to a system which has been proved to be the blight of commerce, the bane of agriculture, the source of bitter divisions among classes, the cause of penury, fever, mortality, and crime among the people." The illumination of the device was the signal for such an outburst of feeling as we have not often met with.

Earl DUCIE, in opening the proceedings, observed that they had come there to hear Mr. Cobden and Mr. Bright; to be told in what way they were to act so as to further the repeal of the Corn Laws. (Cheers.) On the former occasion it was attempted to show the meeting that more trade—that is, Free Trade—would be a good thing for the port and city of Bristol; that more trade would be a good thing for the manufacturers of the country; that the well-being of the manufacturers of the country was a good thing for the agriculturist, as finding him the best market for the produce of his labour. It was also explained how the existing Corn Laws had been the primary cause of all those distresses which produced misery, starvation, and, he might say, pestilence. The meeting was also told on that occasion that, as like causes produced similar effects, so that, should high prices again recur, those circumstances would again ensue. Those circumstances had again occurred: the price of provisions had risen, and the wages of labour had fallen. (Hear.) It was then explained to them that the sliding scale might be a very pretty plaything in the hands of the landlords, but that it would be utterly inefficient in days of difficulty, in days of distress, and in days of scarcity. Their opponents—he did not know whether he might class Sir Robert Peel as an opponent now or not (loud cheers and laughter)—Sir Robert Peel had told them that a fixed duty was an impossibility; that no Government could keep that in operation in times of scarcity, in the face of the unequivocal demonstration of the wants of the people. Now, what he (Lord Ducie) wanted the meeting to do was this: he wanted them to let Sir Robert Peel have an unequivocal demonstration of their feelings, of their wants, and of their wishes; he wanted them to tell him that they would no longer submit to the sliding scale. He wanted them to tell Sir Robert Peel that they would be satisfied with nothing less than the immediate and total repeal of the Corn Laws. (Cheers.) He wanted them to tell him that they would have no more to do with sliding scales dependent upon averages whose index now points to a moderate price whilst provisions are dear. He (Lord Ducie) knew nothing upon earth like this, except a man ringing his dinner-bell, when there was nothing in his fire-place. (Hear.) At the time they were last assembled in that place their opponents had not, as Mr. Cobden said, "spiked their guns." They had defeated them argument by argument, and they were no longer met, excepting, perhaps, such a chivalrous man came forward to break a lance with them as Mr. Cayley. He (Lord Ducie) thought the Protection Society had resolved not to allow him to write any more; but it seemed that the learned gentleman, notwithstanding his former failure, was determined to break another lance with Lord John Russell. He (Lord Ducie) did not know whether they had read the pamphlet of Mr. Cayley, but, for himself, he thought—he must beg pardon of the ladies—that it must have been written by an old lady, or an Irishman. (Laughter.) One reason alleged by that hon. gentleman, why the Corn Law could do no harm to any portion of her Majesty's subjects, was because it had been passed by the landlords and farmers, and that, had it been injurious, they would not have passed it. (Laughter.) Another reason upon which he based his statement, that the opening of the ports would do no harm, was, that if it were so, the landlords and farmers would repeal them. (Renewed laughter.) Really that was wonderful logic! Was not the writer of that pamphlet a Joe Miller in disguise? (Loud and continued laughter.) He really had been most facetious on the point, and his statements were so extremely rich that he could not help calling their attention to them. Speaking of opening the ports, he said that either they could get together a supply or not. Certainly nobody could doubt that fact. (Hear.) "But," he proceeded to say, "if you could not, then it would be exceedingly injurious to have a large quantity of corn thrown upon the market to lower the prices, and induce people to consume more largely." He (Lord Ducie) did not think that was the old woman, but the Irishman. (Laughter.) He went on further to say, that if they could not get it they had only to go across the Atlantic, or to Italy. With, however, the exception of such chivalrous wights as Mr. Cayley, the Free Traders were methy no semblance of arguments. In fact, the leaders of the two great political parties in this country admit freely that the repeal of the Corn Laws was only a question of time. What he (Lord D.) wanted the meeting to do was to declare the present was the time. (Loud cheers.) It was much to be feared, from the delay which had taken place, that it would be severely felt by the labouring classes. When they last assembled in that room, although the Anti-Corn Law League was considered a "great fact," which, no doubt, it was, yet it was an isolated fact. It was strong in the minds of men of all political opinions; in the truth and justice of its cause; in the support it had received, and the energy of its members, in which no one had been more conspicuous than his friend Mr. Cobden. (Loud cheers.) They were unconnected with any political party in the State; they had no one to look to as a leader but their friend Mr. Cobden, and a good leader he had proved himself to be. (Renewed cheering.)

Still the Anti-Corn-Law League continued to grow, increase, and flourish in the opinions and good sense of the people of England. But the case was very much altered. They were indeed prepared to receive the adhesion of the amiable Lord Morpeth—the talented and statesmanlike Morpeth too; (cheers;) a man who must be esteemed, whose character was so irreproachable, that no man even amongst the monopolists could put his finger upon any blot in his reputation. If, therefore, any man were to adopt towards him (Lord D.) the cant imputation of being a member of a democratic body, he would throw Lord Morpeth in their faces. (Cheers.) If he were charged with being a member of an unconstitutional association, he would throw Lord Morpeth in their teeth. If he were accused of affecting popularity, and seeking to set up one interest in the state against other interests, he would throw Lord Morpeth in their teeth. The adhesion of that noble lord to the Free Trade cause was at once a warrant that the League was both honourable and useful. (Cheers.) But, in addition to Lord Morpeth, they had also the adhesion of Lord John Russell (loud cheers)—a man so well known for political courage, that none would dare to say that he had done what he had from the influence of any popularity. That noble lord was purely a Conservative statesman, most unwilling to submit to any change unless he clearly saw his way that that change was beneficial. Lord John Russell had done himself the greatest honour in so openly, fearlessly, and politically admitting his former errors. (Hear.) It was as honourable to him as it was unusual among statesmen. He (Lord Ducie) could not but hope that that great political party, of which Lord John Russell had hitherto been the leader, would also see the necessity of following in his footsteps. (Hear.) As an individual, he (Lord D.) must confess that he felt great satisfaction in thinking that there was a probability that that great political party with whom he had always acted, and between whom and himself there had been an identity of political principle, except only upon the one question of the Corn Laws—that that party, as they ought to do according to their own political principles, would be the repealers of monopolist laws. As a member of the Anti-Corn-Law League, which was composed of individuals of all parties—as chairman of that meeting, composed, as he hoped, of men of every shade of political opinion, he felt he was not uttering a word that could be supposed to be an expression of anything like party opinion upon the question. It had been said that, in consequence of Lord John Russell's letter to his constituents, that, let Sir Robert Peel do what he might, the credit would not be his, but that of the noble lord. He trusted that the men and women of Bristol would do their duty—that they would throw aside all recollection of petty contests, lay aside all paltry political animosities in that city, and seek, heart and hand, to give his friend, Henry Berkeley—(Long-continued cheering.) They were so anxious to give his friend, Mr. Berkeley, a cheer, that they did not hear the conclusion of the sentence. They must not be satisfied with only returning him, but they must give him a Free Trader to sit alongside of him (loud cheers.) He hoped they would act like rational beings, and that they would use the franchise which was given to them for the benefit of their fellow-subjects. (Loud cheering.)

GEORGE THOMAS, Esq., then addressed the meeting, but we find it impossible to abridge his earnest and excellent address. He was succeeded by Mr. Cobden, who spoke for about an hour, with his usual vivacity and telling illustration of, and comments upon, passing events. The enthusiasm of the meeting was unbounded as the hon. gent. resumed his seat.

Mr. Cobden was followed by THOMAS MILNER GIBSON, Esq., M.P., at great length, after whom

JOHN BRIGHT, Esq., M.P., addressed the meeting, and as we are desirous of giving such room as we can command to the remarks of the member for the city, Mr. Berkeley, we find it impossible to attempt a report of his observations.

H. VISGER, Esq., briefly proposed a vote of thanks to the Hon. F. H. Berkeley, M.P., for the support which he had given in Parliament to every motion for the repeal of the Corn Laws, and to every measure of similar tendency.

The resolution having been adopted amid loud cheers, The Hon. F. BERKELEY rose and said—He had the honour to address them on an occasion most interesting to them and to himself. He knew of no occasion which brought so much self-gratulation, or which permitted so true an offering of congratulation to them, as the present state of affairs. To make this clear he would ask them to permit him to turn the eye of reflection backwards. At the time when he first had the honour of presenting himself, unknown to them, to be judged by the political sentiments which he should offer to their consideration, he stood in a different position. For at that time, when he proposed as his opinions—opinions on which he intended to act—that the Corn Law ought to be repealed, he did not stand supported by a Cobden, a Bright, or a Milner Gibson. He stood not then supported by the noble lord, their respected chairman, though he was aware that he had had his (Earl Ducie's) perfect coincidence in his views. But, let him attempt to realise what took place in 1837 (and there were too many familiar faces present to prevent his realising it.) At that time what he said against the Corn Laws created dissension among the the Whigs, and consternation amongst the Tories: he was looked upon as a kind of destructive, or visionary madman; and they were aware that they did not mince matters in that city—they were aware that he had got abused as well as he could desire: it was one of the many reasons for believing him a lunatic. Well, at that time, the League was scarcely born; it was in 1837 to which he was referring, and they had limited the age of the League to seven years; and, as had been stated, at that time it was hardly worth 5s. a year. It certainly was not then the giant which it had since grown. But he nailed his colours to the mast, and inscribed them with the word "Abolition." He had done his best to second the motions which Charles Villiers had made, time after time, and had never swerved from the same course. (Loud cheering.) Considering the great trust of representing a city like this, and standing on his original principles, he had some right to be proud when he saw their opponents yielding and adopting those principles which would in time become the foundation of the law of the land. Again, he said it was matter of self gratulation and congratulation to those who had stood by him, and who had given him fresh strength. Their approbation he looked upon as praise—praise which it had been his endeavour to win—which he had won, and which had cheered him on in his endeavours. (Cheers.) The hon. member went on to say that he should always be found at his post, ready in his efforts to crush monopoly of every kind; and concluded by returning thanks, and expressing a hope that, when next they met, the battle would be won.

Mr. GEORGE THOMAS rose to record the amount of a contribution which had been voluntarily sent in by the workmen of Messrs. Tunstall and Co., 141. ls. 9d. It was a good example to those who had the means of securing the forty shilling qualification, and deserved a vote of thanks. (Carried unanimously.)

Rev. G. ARMSTRONG, in a long and eloquent address, proposed a vote of thanks to Messrs. Cobden, Bright, and Milner Gibson.

Earl DUCIE, in putting it to the assembly, said that he had also a petition from the working men of Bristol to Mr. Cobden, praying that a meeting on the subject of the repeal, at which they might all be present, should be convened to-morrow evening. This, from the engagements of Mr. Cobden, would be of course impracticable, but arrangements might probably be hereafter made to do so.

Mr. COBDEN returned thanks on behalf of himself and colleagues. He was not sure that their engagements did not extend over every day until Parliament met; however, if it could be so arranged, he should have much pleasure in attending an open meeting—and if arrangements were made they might depend upon his coming, either before or shortly after the opening of Parliament. The hon. gentleman then proceeded to propose a vote of thanks to the noble chairman, Earl Ducie, who always paid the penalty of attending such meetings by an illness consequent on exposure to the heat of the room and the night air. The motion was seconded by Mr. Berkeley. (Three times three.)

Earl DUCIE warmly acknowledged his reception, and the meeting then broke up, at past eleven o'clock.

WOOTTON-UNDER-EDGE.

On Saturday afternoon a very large Anti-Corn-Law meeting was held in the National School-room, and which was attended by nearly two thousand persons, among whom were many respectable farmers of the surrounding neighbourhood, and the principal inhabitants of Wootton-under-edge. A large number of ladies also attended.

The Right Honourable EARL DUCIE entered the room at three o'clock, accompanied by Mr. Cobden, M.P., the hon. F. H. Morton, Mr. Bright, M.P., Mr. Child, Mr. Austin, &c. &c., and having taken the chair, said it gave him great pleasure to find that the progress of this agitation for the repeal of the Corn Laws had been such as to unite under its banners men of every political creed. He had, therefore, no doubt as to their success. (Hear, hear.) But it would be hopeless to attempt to carry such a question with a disunited people. They would have difficulties enough when united, having, as they had, to combat with prejudice and self-interest. (Hear, hear, hear.) They should, therefore, cast aside all minor differences, and join heart and hand for the attainment of this great object. They were told that Sir Robert Peel was about to remove the Corn Laws, and he had done so many extraordinary things, that he (Earl Ducie) should not wonder at any thing which the right hon. baronet might do. But they must not depend upon this, and consider that, because it was so said, that the question was carried—they must not relax in their efforts, for they should remember that Sir Robert Peel had a good deal of the eel in him, and was very slippery—and the farmers, he thought, had found him to be an electrical eel (loud laughter), for he had given them many a shock. There was no county or district which had suffered more from the Corn Laws than that in which they then were. Let them only look at their cloth-mills, which were standing still, the people that were unemployed, and the misery and distress that everywhere prevailed, and they would see whether they ought to support these baneful laws, which were useful to no one but the huge monopolist. Why, the very rivers of the county rose up in judgment against these laws, for they ran less blue than usual. He was glad to see so many farmers present, and his friend Mr. Cobden, who would presently address them, would, he was sure, convince them that a repeal of these laws would be no injury to them. He knew a good many of them who believed that if the Corn-Laws were abolished the country would be inundated with foreign corn, and that there would be nothing but corn in England; but this idea was as ridiculous as the one that prevailed among some of the young apprentices and servant maids, who having read the story of Whittington and his cat, believed in their simplicity that the streets of London were paved with gold. He could assure his brother farmers that they would have nothing to fear, for he verily believed that instead of reducing the home grown corn to the foreign standard, it would raise the foreign standard to their own, and, therefore, there was not the slightest reason to fear that the country would be inundated with corn. (Cheers.)

Mr. COBDEN then addressed the meeting, and was received and accompanied throughout with unbounded acclamation.

Mr. BRIGHT, M.P., followed, in an able and eloquent speech; and resolutions in favour of Free Trade, and thanks to Messrs. Cobden and Bright, having been carried unanimously, upon the motion of Mr. Austin, Mr. Child, and Mr. Bedie, the meeting separated.

NOTTINGHAM.

On Monday night a public meeting of the inhabitants of Nottingham was held in the spacious Exchange-rooms, for the purpose of taking measures to secure the return of Free Trade representatives in future for the county of Nottingham.

Long before the time announced the hall was crowded principally by operatives, while on the platform there were assembled many of the leading manufacturers and merchants of the place. Among those present we observed Mr. Herbert, the Mayor of Nottingham; Mr. Cripps, Mr. Enfield, the Town-clerk; Mr. Knight, Mr. Hill, Mr. Jonathan Dunn, Mr. Hovy, Mr. J. Herbert, Mr. J. Wilson, Mr. Heymen, Mr. Eddison, F. Melville, Esq., (a Conservative); Messrs. J. and G. Galloway, Mr. W. Taylor, Mr. S. Fox, Mr. Alderman Leamer, Mr. Enfield, Mr. J. Ellis, of Mansfield; Rev. B. Carpenter, Mr. Neighbourgh, Mr. Coroner Brown, Mr. Lomax, Mr. Frost, Mr. Cooke, Mr. Alderman Knight, Mr. C. Paget, one of the Magistrates of the county; Mr. Alderman Keane, Mr. Malban Hurst, the sheriff; the Rev. Mr. Linwood, &c.

Mr. Charles Paget took the chair. There never was, we may remark, a Free Trade meeting so numerous and so enthusiastic held in Nottingham, or one at which the working classes mustered in greater numbers, and with a more determined resolution to throw all their energies into the cause of Free Trade.

The Chairman opened the proceedings by a few introductory remarks, and Mr. Cobden and Mr. Bright both spoke with telling effect. The report of these speeches occupies four columns in the Morning Chronicle, but we cannot possibly give any portion of them. At the conclusion of Mr. Bright's speech,

Mr. HAZEN, the mayor, moved the first resolution,

After passing a high eulogium upon Messrs. Cobden and Bright, he observed, with reference to the question in general, that the matter lay in a nut-shell. The question now was, whether or not certain artificial restrictions should be removed from the natural energies of a great people. (Loud cheers.) They had heard to-night something about the rapid increase of the population of England. Since last Monday upwards of 7000 living creatures had come into the world; 7000 living arguments had thus been added to their cause; 7000 living open-mouthed witnesses could be brought forward on their side of the question. (Cheers.) Who would dare to stand in the way between these helpless creatures and the food which Heaven in its bounty had provided for them? (Cheers.) He could not reflect without shuddering upon any human being plunged in such selfishness and ignorance as to attempt, by imposing artificial restrictions on food, to carry suffering and want to so many of his fellow-creatures. (Cheers.) But the system, its arguments, and its upholders, had been alike exposed. There did not seem any disposition to persevere in monopoly. Lord John Russell was deserting his fixed duty, as Sir Robert Peel was giving up his sliding-scale. (Hear, hear.) This was as it ought to be. No legislation could settle the fluctuations of the corn market with so much certainty as that market, left untouched by external influence, could in itself regulate the people's supply of food. (Hear, hear.) He had great pleasure in moving a resolution pledging the meeting to use their best endeavours for the return of Free Trade members for the county of Nottingham at the next election.

Mr. Alderman HEARD seconded the resolution, trusting that the Corn Laws had not only departed this life, but would be buried so deeply as to prevent even their ghost visiting the earth they had too long afflicted. (Cheers.)

The resolution was carried by acclamation. Mr. S. Fox moved a resolution with the view of carrying out practically, by the appointment of a committee, the purpose of the first resolution.

Mr. W. FELKIN seconded the proposition, which was carried nem. con.

Mr. Alderman BEAN then proposed vote of thanks to Mr. Cobden and Mr. Bright.

Mr. HEALEY, a tenant farmer, seconded the proposition, taking occasion, in a vigorous address, to declare that the farmers of England were rapidly becoming converts to Free Trade, and repeating a picture he had drawn at a recent meeting at Leicester, of the sufferings of the agricultural labourers of Rutlandshire.

Mr. COBDEN having, in a word or two, acknowledged the compliment, thanks were voted to the chairman, three cheers given for Free Trade and the League, and the proceedings terminated.

HAMMERSMITH.

There was a great district meeting at Hammersmith on Thursday night, called by the League, Captain Cogan in the chair. The place of assembly was crowded to excess. The all-important speech of the evening was that of Mr. Villiers, which was received with great and enthusiastic cheering. The Chairman having introduced the honourable member, he spoke as follows:—

Mr. VILLIERS, M.P., who was received with enthusiastic applause, said, that owing to severe indisposition, and constant occupation, he had been unable to attend any meeting which had lately taken place on the Corn Laws, to which he had been invited; but his gallant friend in the chair, knowing that he (Mr. Villiers) passed this spot in going to his residence in this neighbourhood, had tempted him to enter that meeting. (Hear, hear.) He hardly knew, however, if his eloquence would have been sufficient, had he not felt, as he believed everybody had who had read the public journals of that day, that the moment had arrived (cheers) when those who regarded the Corn Laws as he did, were bound to waive their own convenience and to make some sacrifice to turn this most auspicious and critical moment in their cause to account. (Hear, hear.) During the 30 years that this law had existed, he believed that no time had been at all equal in importance to the present for their cause. (Cheers.) For 30 years the public had complained of this law—sometimes more and sometimes less; but during the last few years an association had been formed or leagued together. (Hear, hear)—the most important, influential, and intelligent that had ever existed in this country or any other (Hear, hear)—with the view of making manifest to the meanest understanding the bearing and mischiefs of this law, and that day they had seen one of the best results of better information, of more experience, and of the anticipation of the evils of the system, in the indisputable announcement, that the first minister has declared that he, no more than the leader of the Liberal party, will consent to meet Parliament, to hold the reins of power, or be in the service of the Crown, unless he has the power, the support, the encouragement requisite, totally and completely to repeal the Corn Laws. (Loud cheers.) Glorious announcement to every just and liberal mind—(Cheers)—for it now tells you that the two leaders of the two great parties to whom alone the Sovereign can refer—(Cheers)—are now agreed that they will not take office, that they will not give counsel to the Crown, that they will not pretend to rule this country, without having full power totally and entirely to abrogate the law which exists for the single, sole, and exclusive purpose of making scarce and dear the necessities of life. (Loud cheers.) What, then, they had there to-day to consider, and what the object of every other meeting that was taking place all over the country was, how they could turn that event to the best account. (Hear, hear.) They had nothing to do with the tardiness of their declaration; time lost could not be recovered. What they had done did not surprise him. Lord John Russell had voted for his (Mr. Villiers') motion last summer, and he believed that he had been long since impatient to make the declaration he had lately made; and as for Sir Robert Peel, he had invaded every small interest with the principles of Free Trade, and he would justly have deserved public scorn if he had shrunk upon such an emergency as the present from extending the same principle to the strong. (Cheers.) What he marvelled at was the meanness of those who were said to have deserted him upon this occasion simply because their own interests were affected, but who continued to enjoy the profits of office, and extend their blind confidence to him while he was each session more confidently propounding the doctrine of Free Trade, and fearlessly and unscrupulously applying it to every other interest but that with which the Cabinet was connected. (Loud cheers.) He for one honoured them that at the last moment the leaders of the two parties had preferred their duties as statesmen, as Christians, as citizens; had preferred the peace and prosperity of the country to the approval and support of men of their own station and order, and that they had not heeded the charge of inconsistency from reckless and irresponsible men, when their consistency would have been in error, in wrong, and injustice to the people. (Hear.) However, the object was now to turn the occasion to account. Often had the people, upon this question, been near success, and as often had they been defeated. (Hear, hear.) It is now twenty years since Canning and Huskisson, fearing the evils of this accursed law, threatened to mitigate its severity, and nothing was left undone by the landed aristocracy to drive them from power, in which they succeeded. (Hear.) A few years since Lord Melbourne offered a compromise, leaving them 8s. fixed impediment to the supply of food, and he was, as you know, indignantly dismissed from power for having made this proposition; and now the question is, when the real thing—when the thing worth fighting for—when complete justice is offered, under the auspices of Peel and Russell—whether the people will allow themselves again to be disgracefully and disdainfully beaten? (Hear, hear, hear.) He ventured upon a confident prediction that they will not. (Loud cheers.) The people are, then, from this moment put upon their trial. (Hear, hear.) They are put upon their mettle (cheers), and he knew they would not, like slaves and cowards, give in. (Hear, hear, hear.) They will be true to their own interests, and they will not exhibit the melancholy spectacle of men complaining of a wrong and flinching at the moment when legitimate means are offered them for redress. (Cheers.) No man advised them to break the peace, or to violate the law. This would notoriously retard the progress of any cause. (hear, hear.) Let them proceed constitutionally, and for this purpose turn their eyes to the electors of this country—they are a small number with reference to the population (hear, hear)—they have, however, the destinies of this country in their hands (hear, hear)—the whole body are under a million. He said, let every man get a list of those who were entitled to the privilege of making a member of Parliament in his own district—let every village, parish, and district of the country be familiar with the names of the men who vote for a supporter of the Corn Laws, and without depriving him of freedom of opinion, let the people call upon those voters to give some account of the opinions they hold. (Hear.) Let them call upon these men to say why they differed from Sir Robert Peel, Lord John Russell, and all the able, reflecting, experienced men of the country, who thought it was for the good of the country to remove all impediments to this vast population in the supply of their food. (Hear, hear.) This was a fair place to make the experiment in. No man of common understanding could explain why the county of Middlesex should return a man pledged to make food dear, and impede the commerce of this country with the rest of this world. (Hear, hear.) Why should they not require of the electors of this district to explain why they voted for such a man, and if they could give no honest reason for their vote, why let them be treated as men who vote for their own interest against the welfare of their country ought to be treated. (Cheers.) He could hardly believe that the electors of this country, as a body, could be as bad as they were represented to be. (Hear, hear.) He did not believe that any candidate, if the electors were free, could hope to gain influence by pledging himself simply to raise the price of food, and to do what he is able to prevent the necessities of life being cheap and plentiful; and yet in the book recording the pledges given by members, this appeared to be one by which a man secured his seat by promising to make the necessities of life dear. (Shame.) He could not think so ill of the electors as to suppose that they would freely choose those, who by the hour would complain of the cheapness and abundance of provisions, and withdraw his support from a Government whom he charged with having caused a fall in price of the articles on which the poor depended for subsistence. (Hear, hear, hear.) He believed that these members only represented their own breeches' pockets, and those of the squires who exerted themselves to secure their return at the time of election. (Loud cheers.) He would not yet believe that the electors called upon by that class of the community to do their duty would countenance such atrocities, if they were proposed to them. (Cheers.) They would hear no doubt that the farmers were the people who would be opposed to the policy now proposed by Sir Robert Peel and Lord John Russell. He disbelieved it entirely (Hear.) He heard many farmers speak on the subject, he had heard many a report of what had occurred at the farmers' meetings, and he found or had heard nothing that justified such a notion; and firmly believed that the malevolent landowners from one end of the country to the other would not dare to hold a public meeting, for the fear that some farmer would appear at that meeting, and there denounce the system of protection as fraudulent and delusive as regarded them, or, at least, would name things at that meeting which he claimed at the hands of the landlord, which he considered of far greater importance than Corn Laws to his interest. (Loud cheers.) The farmer, whenever he dared speak out, was ready to burst with his wrongs, which had nothing to do with Corn Laws and protection, and which it was entirely in the power of the landlord himself to redress. (Hear, hear.) What is uppermost in the mind of the farmer is the insecurity of his tenure, the want of a lease, the reduction of his rent, and the power to destroy the vermin on his farm (hear, hear); eye, and much more so than giving a value to land by a law which is artificially to raise the price of produce, for which higher rent is paid for land. (Hear, hear.) The farmers and the farm labourers were an interesting class, deserving of their sympathy; he should be sorry to think that they were injured by anything that was done, but he felt sure that they had no better chance of getting justice than by a system which would tax the wits of the landlord to make the most of his land. (Cheers.) His first step would be doing justice to a good tenant, and the last thing he would think of, if he was a good tenant, would be to run the risk of losing him by interfering with his independence. (Cheers.) He did not believe that the farmers had a strong interest in this question, from the fact that several farmers had volunteered to state their opinions in favour of Free Trade in the most public place in the kingdom—namely, Covent Garden theatre; and though they defied contradiction, from no quarter of the kingdom had they received any answer. Men, moreover, of undoubted character and respectability (hear); they state that their grievance is not the removal of the Corn Law, but that they cannot get justice from their landlords, owing to the great competition for land, and that they wish for Free Trade that the landlord might feel a deeper interest in them. It may answer the purpose of some titled landlord to talk of the farmers where they cannot be answered; but wherever their opinion could be fairly tested, he repeated, the landlord and the Corn-Law supporter were not among them. (Cheers.) Among the farmers the protectionists could find no sympathy; to the working men (whose ideas they had lately much confused), should they appeal, they will hear from them that they regard protection, as it is called, as only protection from food, as protection from wages, as protection from commerce and industry, as a tax upon the prime necessities of life, by which they were made dearer and more scarce, and which compelled the working classes to toil like slaves and live like slaves to procure them. (Hear, hear.) No! Lord John Russell was right; it was, as he said, a law to raise rent, without regard to the many interests, and to the numerous beings that it might vitally affect. (Cheers.) Without detaining you further, then, gentlemen, I do say that the cause for which you have to contend is clear and obvious, and the parties to whom you are opposed equally so. You may, by procuring a repeal of this law, avert great evils from the community, and obtain great advantages for yourselves. You have an opportunity of doing so now, which you have not had before. You are in a position that you may not have again. (Hear.) Your victory will be short and complete if you will be true to yourselves. (Hear.) Gird up your loins for the fight; Richmond and Buckingham are opposed to you. Forego at present your other grievances—forget the offences of the past; and, in order that you may peacefully, speedily, and completely accomplish your object, oppose to them those leaders who have tendered your support, and place Russell and Peel in front of the fight.

On Mr. Villiers resuming his seat the cheering was enthusiastic.

Mr. R. R. Moore having also addressed the meeting, a resolution was agreed to adapted to the crisis, pledging the persons present to use all their exertions to secure the return of two Free Trade members for the county of Middlesex.

A committee was appointed to carry out the resolution, and the meeting separated.

To the Editor of THE LEAGUE.

SIR,—In your report of a meeting held in this town last week, to memorialise the Government to open the ports, I am stated to have seconded an amendment for which eight hands were held up, praying that the manufacturing population might be relieved, by locating the factory hands upon waste and other lands, as a more advantageous and profitable sphere of labour. From my having more or less publicly these thirty years advocated the repeal of the Corn Laws, this statement has excited no small amount of surprise on the part of those to whom I am known. Allow me, therefore, through your columns to say, that what I advanced was in direct opposition to the amendment, and an endeavour to convince its mover and the meeting that an immediate and entire removal of these "accursed" laws was what we alone ought to seek; and of course that the motion ought not to be attempted to be got rid of by any such proposition as the one just offered. In this view the meeting, as you state, was nearly unanimous.

I may take this opportunity of observing, that the poor stocking-weavers (of whom, I believe, the person proposing the amendment to be one) are becoming much more alive to the importance of supporting the repeal of the Corn Laws. The addresses delivered at our registration meeting this week by Messrs. Cobden and Bright, have produced the happiest impressions on the minds of our working-classes in removing their deeply-rooted prejudices.

I am, yours respectfully,

W. FELKIN.

Nottingham, 11th Dec., 1845.

[We exceedingly regret that Mr. Felkin's name should have been associated with any show of support to such an amendment as that proposed at the Nottingham meeting; but as we copied our abridgment from a cotemporary, the misstatement was unavoidable.—ED. LEAGUE.]

REGISTRATION MOVEMENT IN MIDDLESEX AND PARTS SURROUNDING.—The meetings addressed by Mr. Robert R. Moore last week, as announced in THE LEAGUE of Saturday, the 6th inst., have been attended by crowded audiences, and the greatest excitement and enthusiasm manifested. The following is the list of meetings for the ensuing week:

Monday, Dec. 15th, Cowper-street, City Road, Finsbury, at half-past Seven o'clock.

Tuesday, Dec. 16th, the Theatre, Rochester, at half-past Seven o'clock.

Wednesday, Dec. 17th, Town Hall, Gravesend, at half-past Seven o'clock.

Thursday, Dec. 18th, Town Hall, Maidstone, at half-past Seven o'clock.

Friday, Dec. 19th, Lecture Hall, Greenwich, at Seven o'clock.

LORD GLENELG'S PROPHECY.—Mr. Charles Grant (Lord Glenelg) entreated the landed interest to reflect, "In times of pressure and difficulty, there might come a crisis in which there would be no longer an option as to the rate and manner of admitting foreign grain. There might come a time of extremity in which Government would find itself constrained to attend only to the interests of a starving population, when the pleas of humanity and justice would become all-powerful. They are also bound to consider, in settling a question of this important nature, the growing intelligence of the age, the enlightened mind of the community, and the power of the public press, and he was greatly mistaken if they would not find themselves before long under the necessity of viewing it in regard only to the real justice of the question.—Extract from the Morning Chronicle, Oct. 26, 1841.

The flax crop in Ireland this year is less by one-fourth than that of last year, owing to the failure of the Russian seed; but still the value of the flax and seed of the present year is not less than 1,750,000l.

CRIEFF—POTATOES.—At a potato mill lately erected in this neighbourhood, no fewer than 3000 bolls of diseased potatoes have been purchased from the farmers around, and 3000 bolls more are yet to come in. At a potato mill at Dunning, we are informed that nearly 4000 bolls of potatoes have been purchased, all of which are unfit for food. The accounts for nearly twenty miles round are most deplorable. This state of things calls aloud upon the Government to interfere, by opening the ports for the free admission of grain without delay.

NATIONAL ANTI-CORN-LAW LEAGUE.

GREAT LEAGUE MEETING IN COVENT-GARDEN THEATRE.—The COUNCIL of the NATIONAL ANTI-CORN-LAW LEAGUE begs to announce that the AGGREGATE MEETINGS of the LEAGUE, in the Theatre Royal, Covent Garden, will re-commence on WEDNESDAY EVENING NEXT, 17th of December.

George Wilson, Esq., will take the Chair at Seven o'clock precisely.

The Meeting will be addressed by Richard Cobden, Esq., M.P., John Bright, Esq., M.P., and W. J. Fox, Esq.

Tickets of admission to all parts of the House may be had as usual at 67, Fleet-street.

Seats will in future be reserved for all farmers who may make application at the Offices of the League, 67, Fleet-street, up to the hour of meeting; and their attendance, whether favourable or opposed to Free Trade, is especially requested.

QUALIFY! QUALIFY! QUALIFY!

THE FRIENDS of FREE TRADE residing in the Northern or Midland Counties, desirous of purchasing Freeholds in any of the undermentioned Counties, are requested to apply to the Secretary of the League, Newall's Buildings Manchester.

North Lancashire	North Derbyshire
South Lancashire	South Derbyshire
North Cheshire	North Durham
West Riding of York	East Cumberland
South Stafford	West Cumberland
North Stafford	South Northumberland
South Cheshire

Each applicant is requested to give his name and residence at full length.

By Order of the Council,

JOSEPH HICKIN, Secretary.

QUALIFY! QUALIFY! QUALIFY!

FREE TRADERS desirous of purchasing Freeholds for Middlesex, East Surrey, West Kent, South Essex, East Sussex, and South Hants, are requested to send their applications, with name and address in full, to the League Offices, 67, Fleet-street, London.

By Order of the Council,

JOSEPH HICKIN, Secretary.

FREEHOLD QUALIFICATIONS FOR HERTS.

FREE TRADERS desirous of purchasing Freeholds in Hertfordshire are requested to send their applications to The League Offices, 67, Fleet-street, or to Mr. J. F. Bontems, Herts Registration Office, Hertford.

NORTH LANCASHIRE.

QUALIFY! QUALIFY! QUALIFY!

FREE-TRADERS desirous of purchasing Qualifications for North Lancashire, are informed that they can be obtained for 33l. and upwards each, yielding from 6½ to 7½ per cent.

Applications may be made to Mr. Moorhouse, League Rooms, 4, Cheapside, Preston.

CORN LAWS.—Third Edition, Now ready, price 2s.,

AN ATTEMPT TO ESTIMATE THE EFFECTS of PROTECTING DUTIES on the PROFITS of AGRICULTURE, by JOHN MORTON, F.G.S., Author of "The Nature and Property of Soils," &c.; and JOSHUA TRIMMER, F.G.S., Author of "Practical Geology and Mineralogy," &c. Also "The Nature and Property of Soils, and Rents and Profits of Agriculture," by J. Morton. 10s. 4th Edition. James Ridgway, Piccadilly, and all booksellers.

"On occasions of this kind I have generally said a few words as to the bearing of the Corn Laws on Agriculture, but that part of the subject has been taken out of my hands. A little pamphlet, published by Messrs. Trimmer and Morton, practical agriculturists, has quite superseded any observation I could make. They looked on the Corn Laws in a debtor and creditor point of view. They took different farms in different soils, and they showed what their owners gained by protection, and what they lost. The first time I received that book I was a little staggered by the facts which it adduced; but having read and considered it several times, I am quite satisfied that it underpins rather than overpans the real state of the case. Now, as I know a great many willing and anxious to see a repeal of the Corn Laws, and to secure full commercial freedom, who have some lingering doubts as to whether their agricultural friends may not suffer in some way or other from such an event, I recommend all such persons to lay out a couple of shillings in the purchase of the pamphlet, and to read it carefully through."—From Earl Ducie's Speech at the Birmingham Meeting.

TO PRINTERS, NEWSPAPER PROPRIETORS, &c.—New Perfecting Machines, of from 30 in. to 56 in. Cylinders, at J. GADSBY'S, Whitefriars Printing Office, Bouverie-street, Fleet-street.—MACHINING done at low charges, and in the best style. BOOK-WORK, and Railway and other Printing, expeditiously executed. All new Type.

. In consequence of the great pressure on our space, we are compelled to postpone the Subscription List until next week.

POSTSCRIPT.

LONDON, Saturday Morning, December 13, 1845.

Ministers have resigned; the weight of the Corn Laws has broken down the strongest Cabinet formed in England within the memory of the existing generation. Peel refuses to take upon himself the responsibility of scarcity; and even Wellington shrinks from raising the standard of famine. "This is the Lord's doing, and it is marvellous in our eyes." Men who set up their puny wisdom to rival the dispensations of Providence have found that "He who dwelleth in the heavens hath laughed them to scorn; the Lord hath had them in derision;" their bonds have been broken, and their cords shall soon be cast from us. With humble thankfulness we recognise the hand of Him who has declared, that "he heareth the desire of the poor, that the man of the earth be no more exalted against him." Under Providence the people are the authors of their own triumph; they must hold fast to the position they have taken, they must carry through the measure which they have proposed and brought to the threshold of accomplishment. Manchester must not sleep; the exertions of Birmingham must not be relaxed. Liverpool must struggle for its redemption, and the boroughs of the manufacturing districts must be nerved to meet the decisive issue. We have suffered too much, and struggled too long, not to have learned the peril of being negligent at our posts. Our enemies have taken the field; contemptible as is their appearance, utterly ridiculous as are such weapons as curry-powder and mangel-wurzel, we cannot yet afford to despise them. They may bully statesmen, they may intrigue with ministers, they may cajole parliaments, but they cannot face an outraged nation. It is against the people that the sordid protectionists are banded; it is by the people that they must be encountered. The stake is too serious, the risk too great for us to trust to delegation. Parties are now the followers, not the leaders, of the people. Moreover, though there is much to do, the time allowed for the healthy action is brief. It was no great hardship to have the fate of rotten boroughs suspended while the servitor of the Marquis of Hertford, the Right Honourable (?) J. W. Croker, surprised the House by statistical discussions; hunger is impatient, and will no longer endure the parade of empty debates. The circumstances of the time require not talking, but acting; every day is of importance, not so much to the final issue, as to its attendant perils.

Of the probable composition of the new ministry it is not yet time to speak. Whoever may be its members, they have their first work cut out for them; they must set themselves to the task without hesitation or delay. Food for the people is our first object, and that we must have, from whomsoever may be the minister. Lord John Russell has solemnly and publicly pledged himself to total and immediate repeal of the laws which restrict our food, but he is likely to find himself surrounded and ear-wigged by those who may be anxious for compromise. The people must stand firmly by him, to keep his courage to the sticking point. We express no doubt of his perseverance, no want of reliance on his integrity; but he will want all the support which the united nation alone can give. The great measure is indeed made to his hands; he will be but the instrument of giving effect to the popular will; but that will must be so emphatically pronounced as to allow of no possibility of mistake or evasion. The blatant dukes that prate about famine, as if food was a luxury which the industrious should only enjoy at the discretion of their caprice, must be taught that the majesty of an insulted and injured people is not to be made the subject of trifling or sport. Increased vigilance, renewed exertions, united efforts, are the great requisites of the time. Let us meet the crisis fearless of the issue, for "the Lord of hosts is with us; the God of Jacob is our refuge!"

GREAT MEETING OF THE ELECTORS OF THE CITY OF LONDON IN THE GUILD HALL.

On Monday next, at twelve o'clock, a meeting of the electors of London will take place at the Guildhall, convened by the Lord Mayor, in compliance with a most influential and numerous signed requisition, to memorialise Ministers to open the Ports and repeal the Corn Laws. It will be seen in another part of our paper, that Mr. Cobden, at the Manchester meeting, declared his intention of being present on the occasion as an Elector of the City. We trust this will be an overwhelming demonstration of unanimity on the part of the electors of London, against the bread tax. The citizens of London were foremost in the struggle of 1815, against the imposition of this monopoly. Let them only put forth their energies—firmly and unanimously at this crisis—and they ensure its overthrow.

THE WEST RIDING MEETING.—The requisition has been signed by about 160,—a number which, if it had been needful, might have been multiplied almost indefinitely. The intention appears to have been to confine the signatures within certain limits, and to embrace those gentlemen who are more or less connected with land. Sir Wm. Cooke has, it is believed, appointed the meeting to take place at Wakefield on Wednesday next. In all probability the meeting will not only be extremely numerous, but most enthusiastic, and produce that impression in high quarters which has never yet failed to be the case on former occasions. We understand that special trains will be provided at all the stations on the Midland and the Leeds and Manchester line. We learn that the attendance from this town and neighbourhood will be large, and contribute to that manifestation of feeling on this momentous question which its immeasurable importance imperatively demands.—Doncaster Gazette.

Several cargoes of potatoes, which have been shipped at the Isle of Man for Liverpool, have become so much diseased that they are unsaleable, and, consequently, lost to the exporters.

THE PERSECUTED WILTSHIRE LABOURERS.

The following letter shows our expectation that the sympathy of Free Traders would be drawn towards the poor persecuted Wiltshire Labourers, Bullock and Pearce, has been realized. The money has been transmitted to C. Day, Esq., of Marlborough, for the benefit of the poor men.

To the Editor of THE LEAGUE.

Sir,—I shall be obliged by your taking charge of the enclosed 1*l*. for the relief of Thomas Bullock and William Pearce, the two labourers of Beckhampton, near Marlborough, whose statements appeared in your paper of Saturday last, as having been discharged by Mr. John Wentworth of Beckhampton, for attending an Anti-Corn-Law meeting, and who are consequently suffering from want of employment.

I am, Sir, yours very obediently,

JOHN FINCH.

47, Cambridge Terrace, Hyde Park, London,
December 1st, 1845.

THE LEAGUE AND THE REGISTRATION.—Manchester, Dec. 10.—Last night the weekly meeting of the Registration Committee of the League was held in the Council-room, Newall's-buildings, Mr. George Wilson in the chair. Mr. Brindle read the list of applications for qualifications for votes, which were 235, sent in during the week, and 16 applications during the meeting of the Committee that evening, towards which they had obtained 131 qualifications. Mr. Owen applied, on behalf of the Freeholders' Building Society, to state that the Society was then in a condition to lend 1500*l*., and by the first week in January they would be ready to lend 3000*l*., and to guarantee a distinct residence and a house to his own qualification, for 45*l*. to each purchaser. This he thought of great importance to be known, because many people thought that if they purchased a freehold under the League they would be joined to some one else, and that they could not dispose of it when choice or necessity might point out such a course as expedient. He would guarantee, however, that all parties joining that society should have the choice of a ready and fair, and most probably a profitable sale of his shares, if he ever wished to dispose of them. The matter was ordered to stand over till next week.

We understand that at a meeting of masters of power-loom factories, held in Glasgow on Monday, the propriety of putting their establishments on short time during the month of January was taken into consideration. In the meantime, any definite arrangement in the matter has been delayed till a second meeting, which is to be held in the course of the present week.—Glasgow Guardian.

THE FUNDS.

	SAT. Dec. 6	MON. Dec. 8	TUES. Dec. 9	WED. Dec. 10	THUR. Dec. 11	FRI. Dec. 12
Bank Stock	202	200	201	201	201	201
3 per Ct. Red. Ann. ..	94	94	94	94	94	94
3 per Ct. Con. Ann. ..	94	94	94	94	94	94
3 per Ct. Red. Ann. ..	95	95	95	95	95	95
Long. An. Ex. 1860 ..	10	10	10	10	10	10
Cons. for Acct.	95	95	95	95	95	Shut
Exc. Bills, pm.	18-20	20	23	23-21	21	..
Ind. Bds. in 1000 l . ..	30	30	..
India Stock	261	260	Shut
Austrian
Belgian Bonds	95	95	94	96	94	..
Brazilian 5 per Ct.	80	..
Chilian
Colomb. ex. Venez.
Danish
Dutch 4 per Cent.	92	..	93	93	93	93
Dutch 2 per Cent.	59	59	59	60	59	59
Mexican	30	..	29	29	29	29
Peruvian	35	..	35	..
Portug. conv.	59	58	59
Russian 5 per Cent.	112	113	..	112
Spanish 5 per Ct.	28	27	26	28	..	28
Do. 3 per Ct. ex. dv.	37	37	38	38	38

MARKETS.

CORN MARKET.

MONDAY, DEC. 8.—The uncertainty of what Ministers intend doing with respect to the Corn Laws continues; but the repeated assertions in the Times give greater credit to the report of Thursday last than many people were willing to acknowledge last market day. The consequence is, that though the arrivals of all grain during the past week, and to this morning's market are only moderate, the dullness in all branches of the trade is extreme. English Wheat is generally quoted *s. to 3*s*. cheaper* than last Monday, and inferior samples even lower. Foreign wheat meets a similar reduction. For Bonded Wheat little or no inquiry is made. The sales of Barley are quite insignificant, and quotations are merely nominal. The same may be said of Oats: this article is unsaleable except in very small retail parcels to needy buyers at *1*s*. lower* than this day week. Beans are not quoted cheaper. Peas are in pretty good supply, and worth 2*s*. less money. Even at the reductions noticed, there is but little business doing.

BRITISH.

	Per Imperial Quarter.
Wheat, Essex,	Red 50 to 60 White 53 to 68
Kent & Suffolk	49 58 56 64
Lincolnshire & Yorkshire ..	47 54 51 62
South.
Oats, Lincolnshire & Yorkshire ..	25 27
Do.	26 28
Scotch Feed	26 28
Limerick	25 27
Do.	27 29
Cork
Waterford, Yougal, & Cork Black ..	23 25
Sligo	24 26
Galway	24 25
Barley	32 39
Beans, Mazagan	New 32 34 Old 40 41
Harrow	38 42
Small	40 44
Peas, White	Boilers .. 54 56
Grey	36 48 Maple .. 38 40
Flour, Town-made	per sack of 280 lbs. 48 60
Norfolk and Suffolk

FOREIGN.

	Per Imperial Quarter.
Wheat, Dantz, high mixed	58 to 66 46 52
Holbeck	56 60 44 48
Stettin	54 60 43 46
Humburg	52 57 42 45
Odessa	46 50 40 42
Russian Polish	50 56 40 43
Do.
Do.
Do.
Do.
Do.
Australian	60 68

Barley, Grinding	27 30
Distilling	30 32
Oats, Archangel	27 28 24 25
Danish	27 28 24 22
Sveedish	25 26 22 23
Stralsund
Dutch Feed	23 25 20 22
Brew	29 35 26 32
Poland	30 26 24
Beans, Egyptian	40 41 39 40
Peas, White	54
Ditto Boilers	none
Flour, Canada, fresh, per barrel of 166 lbs. ..	34 35
United States	32 35
Dantz
Australian, per sack of 280 lbs.

Account of CORN, &c., arrived in the Port of London, from Dec. 1 to Dec. 6, 1845, both days inclusive.

	Wheat.	Barley.	Oats.	Beans.	Peas.
English	3269	4704	875	1280	2160
Scotch	15	1500	648
Irish	200	11908
Foreign	3190	320	3033	4	658

Flour, 4262 sacks; 5593 barrels.

FRIDAY, DEC. 12.—We can only repeat our reports of this day week and Monday last. There are no transactions of any importance whatever in any branch of the trade. Needy buyers purchase in very retail quantities, and when vessels are coming on demurrage lower prices are taken; but it is impossible to fix the value of the stock, while the present uncertainty lasts. On the whole, holders seem disinclined to yield to the present panic; and the consequence is, the stagnation before noticed. The duties remain the same for all grain this week.

S. H. LUCAS.

Account of CORN, &c., arrived in the Port of London, from the 5th of December to the 28th of December, both inclusive.

	English.	Irish.	Foreign.
Wheat	8250	..	6990
Barley	7260
Oats	6460	3450	6710

Flour, 4940 sacks.

LONDON AVERAGES for the Week ending Dec. 9, 1845.

	Qrs.	Price.		Qrs.	Price.
Wheat	8715	66 s . 0 d .	Rye	87	40 s . 3 d .
Barley	6140	33 s . 7 d .	Beans	1658	30 s . 3 d .
Oats	2543	26 s . 0 d .	Peas	1443	46 s . 7 d .

IMPERIAL AVERAGES, Weeks ending

	Wheat.	Barley.	Oats.	Rye.	Beans.	Peas.
s. d. s. d. s. d. s. d. s. d. s. d.
1st Nov.	60	1. 34	3. 26	2. 33	2. 45	3. 43
8th "	59	7. 35	1. 25	2. 35	7. 45	1. 44
15th "	58	6. 35	0. 26	3. 38	2. 44	5. 45
22d "	57	11. 34	1. 25	5. 37	1. 43	4. 45
29th "	58	2. 33	2. 25	0. 35	4. 41	9. 45
6th Dec.	59	0. 32	10. 24	7. 35	0. 41	8. 43

Aggregate Average of the Six Weeks. Wheat, 58*s*. 10*d*.; Barley, 34*s*. 1*d*.; Oats, 25*s*. 5*d*.; Rye, 35*s*. 9*d*.; Beans, 43*s*. 7*d*.; Peas, 44*s*. 9*d*.

Duty. Wheat, 14*s*. 0*d*.; Barley, 4*s*. 0*d*.; Oats, 3*s*. 0*d*.; Rye, 7*s*. 6*d*.; Beans, 1*s*. 0*d*.; Peas, 1*s*. 0*d*.

Stock of Corn in Bond, Nov. 5, 1845.

	Wheat.	Barley.	Oats.	Rye.	Beans.	Peas.	Flour
In London, 279040	10900	56942	..	799	570	55679	Cwts.
Unit. King. 667773	59477	107219	..	1678	2063	278683

MEAT MARKET.

Trade, upon the whole, very heavy considering the fine weather.

PER STONE OF 8 LBS. BY THE CARCASE.

Prime Beef.	3 s 6 d to 3 s 10 d	Middle Mutton.	3 s 6 d to 3 s 8 d
Middleling do.	3 s 2 d to 3 s 4 d	Veal, from ..	4 s 0 d to 4 s 8 d
Plain, or inf.	Small Pork ..	4 s 6 d to 5 s 0 d
rior Beef.	2 s 6 d to 2 s 10 d	Large, or inf.
Prime Mutton 3 s ..	8 d to 4 s ..	rior Pork ..	3 s 6 d to 3 s 10 d

THE LONDON GAZETTE.

FRIDAY, DEC. 5.

BANKRUPTS.

J. SPONG, Ockham, Surrey, coal and timber merchant. [Mr. J. Jordonson, St. Mary-at-Hill.

J. C. EDWARDS, Conduit Street, Hanover Square, bill broker. [Mr. Godden, John Street, Bedford Row.

J. McDermott, Gray's Inn Lane, victualler. [Mr. Hunt, Bernard's Inn.

E. LE ROY, Upper Norton Street, Portland Place, wine merchant. [Mr. Lewis, Wilmington Square.

J. ELLIOTT, Bristol, coal merchant. [Mr. Charles Hassell, St. Stephen's Avenue, Bristol.

J. MANN, Warwick, grocer. [Mr. Nicks, Warwick.

DIVIDENDS.

Dec. 29, C. G. Webb, Long Lane, Bermondsey, woolstapler.—J. Haycock, jun., Wells, Norfolk, corn factor.—Dec. 31, W. Monk, jun., Nottingham, currier.—Dec. 20, J. Ashbarry, Hereford, farmer.—Jan. 2, E. Hesketh, Hulme, Lancashire, victualler.—Jan. 6, J. Y. Betts, Cardiff, grocer.—T. Jenkins, Brecon, maltster.—Jan. 9, J. Whitlow, Manchester, laceman.

CERTIFICATES.

Dec. 26, N. G. Coombes, Craven Street, Strand, coal merchant.—G. E. Noone, East Street, Manchester Square, engineer.—T. Cotsworth, Reading, builder.

SCOTCH SEQUESTRATIONS.

J. Young, Macduff, Banffshire, wood merchant.

TUESDAY, DEC. 9.

BANKRUPTCY ANNULLED.

Dec. 5, S. Thomas, Cornhill, merchant.

BANKRUPTS.

T. MORTIMER, East Street, Walworth, victualler. [Mr. Harpur, Kennington Cross.

J. D. WILLIAMS, Newcastle Street, Farringdon Street, blacking manufacturer. [Mr. Austin, St. Swinith's Lane.

T. MAGER, Holborn Hill, poultryer. [Messrs. Kiss and Son, Fenchurch Street.

R. G. SPEEDING, Bush Lane, Cannon Street, zinc manufacturer. [Mr. Taylor, North Buildings, Finsbury Circus.

R. W. SHEPPARD, Enslam, Oxon, innkeeper. [Messrs. Pownall and Cross, Staple's Inn.

C. K. LUCE, Southampton, mercer. [Mr. Combe, Staple's Inn.

H. GAMBLE, Gaimstone, Norfolk, grocer. [Messrs. Hill and Matthews, St. Mary-axe.

T. RATNETT, Cambridge, tailor. [Mr. Wilkins, Fumival's Inn.

J. POULTON, jun., Luton, straw hat manufacturer. [Messrs. Dynes, Lincoln's Inn Fields.

A. S. TUCKER, and G. M. BIDWELL, Melcombe Regis, grocers. [Messrs. Cook and Sanders, New Inn, Strand.

W. LEWIS, Barnsley, tobaccoist. [Messrs. Sudlow and Co., Chancery Lane.

F. STAMFORD, Manchester, woollen draper. [Mr. Reid, Bread Street.

C. ILES, Bristol, grocer. [Mr. Hudson, Bloomsbury Square.

J. POPE, Ashley Down, Gloucestershire, lime burner. [Mr. Hudson, Bloomsbury Square.

W. OCKLESTON, Liverpool, hide merchant. [Messrs. Norris, Allen, and Simpson, Bartlett's Buildings, Holborn.

T. FRIEDLANSKEY, Birmingham, chandler. [Mr. Corser, Birmingham.

DIVIDENDS.

Jan. 2, J. Bryan, Bristol, chemist.

CERTIFICATES.

Dec. 30, J. Breakenridge, Liverpool, tailor.—S. Davies, Bank-side, Southwark, coal merchant.—Jan. 8, T. Hodgson, Greta Bank, Yorkshire, brickmaker.

SCOTCH SEQUESTRATIONS.

W. Whyte and Co., Glasgow, cotton yarn merchant.

THE LEAGUE.

No. 117.—Vol. III.]

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 20, 1845.

[3d.

NOTICE TO THE PUBLIC.

LEAGUE FUND.

All Subscribers of £1 and upwards to the LEAGUE FUND will be entitled to, and receive, a copy weekly of this publication for twelve months from the date of the receipt of their subscription.

Subscribers of half-a-crown, and under £1, will have forwarded to them a copy of THE LEAGUE, containing an acknowledgment of their subscription; and it is requested that all subscribers will be kind enough to send their names and addresses to the offices of THE LEAGUE, Newall's-buildings, Manchester, or 67, Fleet-street, London.

N.B. As there is considerable risk in the transmission of gold and silver by post, parties wishing to forward small contributions to THE LEAGUE FUND are particularly requested to make their remittances by post-office orders.

The Council of the League would also suggest to their friends in the country the importance of transmitting their copies of THE LEAGUE newspaper, after perusal, to such parties (more especially farmers) as may be either hostile or indifferent to the question of Free Trade.

By order of the Council,

JOSEPH HICKIN, Secretary.

THE COUNTIES! GO ON QUALIFYING!

We have so often and so fully pressed on the Free Trade public the vital and paramount necessity, under ANY circumstances, of unremitting activity and energy in the great work of WINNING COUNTIES, that we might be disposed, in the present crowded state of our columns, to suspend, for one week at least, our somewhat monotonous appeal, but that it might possibly be imagined that we regarded the urgency of this movement as in some degree abated by the new prospects of early success which have recently opened upon us. We must not, however, even by the silence of a single week, make ourselves accessory to so grave and fatal an error. Again we would renew, with the utmost possible emphasis, our counsel of last Saturday, "WHATEVER HAPPENS, QUALIFY, QUALIFY, QUALIFY." Whatever happens, nothing CAN happen to abrogate the necessity, or lessen the importance, of our arming ourselves with the one only weapon which can really ensure our victory. Whatever happens, we must go on just as if nothing had happened.

We write, at this moment, in perfect ignorance as to how the "Ministerial crisis" may end—whether in a Free Trade Cabinet, with Lord John Russell at its head, or in a high Protectionist Richmond and Tyrrell Cabinet, or in a new and improved Peel Cabinet, or what not. We only say that, and how it will, it can make no sort of difference in our policy. The great fact remains, and will remain—that the people must do the work. After all, the real question is—and this will become more and more visibly the real question,—which is the strongest in voting power, the squirearchy or the country? Whether a Free Trade ministry be formed, or not; whether Sir Robert Peel and his adherents support such a Ministry, or not; whether Parliament be dissolved, or not; whether the present House of Commons or the next House of Commons pass the bill, or not;—in any and every case, we must go on, just the same, winning counties. The prospect of a general election under the registration of 1845 can make no manner of difference. Who knows but that a second general election may be necessary before all is over? And, without going to such extreme possibilities, who can calculate the effect which must be produced on any House of Commons—not to speak of the House of Lords—by the knowledge that the movement which the monopolists most dread is still going on, and that the registration of 1846 will give some dozen or score of counties into the hands of the Free Traders? The more counties we win, between now and the 30th of January next, the greater will be the power, and the fewer the difficulties of a Free Trade Minister and a Free Trade majority, or minority, in this Parliament or in the next. The more counties we win, the less will the monopolists be disposed to prolong a contest, the palpable tendency of which is to pluck up the very roots of oligarchical domination. The more counties we win, the better will our great and sacred cause be shielded from all risk of an attempt at compromise. The moral effect and power of a dozen or twenty counties won from landlordism between now and the 30th of January, in time for next year's registration, may be equivalent to a casting vote between delay and promptitude—between compromise and no compromise—between an obstinate resistance by the landlords' own House of Parliament, and a sullenly reluctant assent.

Were this a time for congratulating our friends on what they have done, and are doing—rather than for urging the necessity of sustained and increased exertions,—we should speak with lively satisfaction of the vigour with which this movement is now going forward in many of the most important counties of England. For the present, our business is to make progress, not to stop to amuse ourselves with measuring the progress already made. We may, however, notice, as one example out of many of business-like activity and organization, the way in which our friends of the Carlisle Anti-Corn-Law Association are working this matter: The council of that body has, we see, resolved itself into a committee for promoting the qualification and registration of Free Traders in East Cumberland, West Cumberland, and Westmoreland, and has placed itself in communication with the towns of each of these three electoral districts, with the view of inducing "the largest possible number of Free Traders to purchase freeholds previously to the 30th of January next." In other places, the same system of organized co-operation between adjoining counties is being extensively acted upon. Thus, the Nottingham Free Traders have challenged their South Derby friends to purchase fifty qualifications in their division, with a promise to repay the compliment in kind. The challenge is accepted, and the pledge of mutual help is in due course of fulfilment on each side.

Present electoral conflicts, no less than the great Ministerial crisis itself, offer incentives and stimulants to a vigorous prosecution of this movement. There is Hertfordshire, for instance—which, looking at the ease and rapidity of railway communication that brings it almost within omnibus distance of London, we may call one of the metropolitan counties. This county, which sends three members to the legislature, has now a vacancy; and that vacancy is going to be quietly filled up by somebody of whom nobody knows anything, except that a few squires think him likely to prove a steady monopolist voter. And this man will be sent by the said squires to London, to help to legislate against that commerce of the world, of which London is the centre. London, all the while is powerless to prevent it—Hertfordshire is powerless, too. The gentleman in question is so poorly off for popularity, in the very county which he is going to "represent," that he dare not submit his pretensions to the decision of a public meeting (a semi-public meeting has rejected him); yet he will "represent" Hertfordshire all the same. This might have been prevented, if Hertfordshire had, two years ago, or one year ago, been looked after by the Free Traders of the metropolis; for Hertfordshire has already—had even in 1841—a numerous and powerful Free Trade minority. Now, will the Londoners not put their interdict on such humiliating exhibitions for the future? Why not secure Hertfordshire now—so that, in any election which may take place under the registration of 1846, the representatives of this metropolitan county shall represent metropolitan intelligence and national interests, not squirearchical nescience and rents? It is a tempting prize. England has none more so. London has none equally so. Hertfordshire is one of the few counties—the only county within easy reach of the metropolis—returning three members. A forty-shilling freeholder in Hertfordshire has, therefore, not one vote only, but three votes. Really, we do not see that political power could well be offered on more reasonable terms than those on which the English constitution makes this handsome overture to the men of London. We trust that hundreds and hundreds of them will have the spirit to close with it.

Once more, to all our friends in every county in England, we say, GO ON QUALIFYING! Make the landlords feel your power in the very heart and centre of their own. Nothing will more certainly and decisively cut short our struggle, than a vigorous and unsparing use of this good old constitutional weapon—the forty-shilling freehold franchise. The thirtieth of January approaches; let it find us with our work done—ready for whatever may happen.

THE CRISIS.

The present, or recent, "Ministerial crisis"—we know not, at this moment of writing, which of the two will be the appropriate word by the time our columns reach the public eye—has been sadly complicated by considerations and topics perfectly foreign to its real nature. Our great and simple question is just now in the hands of politicians; and certain classes of politicians are working hard, it would seem, to mystify and entangle it. Lord John Russell, we are given to understand, has found "difficulties" in the construction of his Cabinet;—difficulties arising, it is said, partly, from uncertainty as to the kind and degree of support, if any, which he is to calculate on receiving from Sir Robert Peel and those "Conservatives" whose course will be shaped by Sir Robert Peel's—and partly, from the doubts, fears, scruples, and hesitations, of some of his Lordship's own political friends among the "Whig" aristocracy. The nature of these difficulties may be inferred from the circumstance, that some of our extremely clever and knowing politicians have represented the noble Lord's "chief difficulty" to be his recent letter to the electors of the City of London. Actually, that frank and manly declaration of concurrence in national convictions—that timely and explicit recognition of national exigencies—which alone has made Lord John Russell anything at the present moment, is spoken of by some of these persons as a source of embarrassment and a subject for regret!

Yet, after all, the crisis is a very simple one. Nothing was ever simpler. A strong Minister breaks up a strong Cabinet, and abdicates the command of a strong party, because his Cabinet and his party would force him into antagonism to a power stronger than all of them together—the power of nature and the elements—recognised by the national intelligence, and acting, through that intelligence, on the national will. And Lord John Russell is "sent for," because he had just before made a public avowal of allegiance to the power of nature and the elements, and of participation in the national intelligence and will. Lord John Russell is sent for, to carry out the policy indicated in that avowal—to rectify the monstrous aberration of the statute-book from justice and common-sense—to put the law of the land into harmony with the law of nature, and with the “unequivocal expression of the public voice.” Lord John Russell has nothing else to do than this;—nothing else than his predecessor's inability to do this is the cause of his being sent for. If Lord John Russell eventually decide on taking office, it will be because he is satisfied that he can do this. If he seriously doubt his power to do this, of course he will not take office. To take office, and not do this—to take office, and do less than this—to take office, and do something contrary to this,—we hold, with our opinion of Lord John Russell, to be a flat impossibility.

An overpowering national necessity, and a profound national conviction of that necessity, are, then, the elements of the present crisis. And Lord John Russell's letter to the electors of the city of London, recognising the one, and avowing participation in the other, is that which makes him the man of the crisis.

And this is all. There is nothing else. This is absolutely the whole of the case. It is not an affair of “politics.” For anything that “politics” have done to the contrary, Sir Robert Peel might be, at this moment, in office, with every prospect of another four years' term of possession. The “Tories” have nothing to do with it—the “Whigs” have nothing to do with it. The landlords have nothing to do with it, except in the way of obstruction and denial. The League have nothing to do with it, further than that they have educated the mind of the nation to put the true interpretation on the facts of national experience. The great question which has now assumed so vast a power and significance, owes nothing whatever to any political party—and no political party can claim a right to adopt it as their own, for the purpose of moulding it to suit their good pleasure and convenience. As a “Whig” or “Liberal” leader, Lord John Russell himself has no special concern with it whatever. He is sent for by his Sovereign, simply because, holding a position in the first rank of Parliamentary statesmen, he has written—as one of “us, the Queen's subjects”—a certain letter to his constituents, which letter expresses, with admirable force and truth, the wants and convictions of us the Queen's subjects. He is sent for that he may realise the expectations which that letter has excited—those expectations being, first, a Parliamentary “suspension of the import duties on corn”—a measure which the letter characterises as not only “beneficial,” but “URGENT,”—and next, a final legislative settlement of the whole matter of the trade in food, on the principle that “WE OUGHT TO ABSTAIN FROM ALL INTERFERENCE WITH THE SUPPLY OF FOOD.” To do this is Lord John Russell's mission.

All idea of compromise, or “adjustment,” to please the landlords, or to oblige and accommodate Lord John Russell's “Whig” friends, is thus precluded by the very nature of the case. We need not speak of the hopelessness of compromise; of the sheer impossibility, at the present national juncture, of offering any substantial “boon” to landlordism; or of the futility and mischievousness of tendering illusory concessions that could have no other effect than to retard all settlement. Nor is it necessary to insist on the obvious consideration, that all the old pleas for doing right partially and gradually are nullified by the present overwhelming national exigency—that we must have total repeal IMMEDIATELY, de facto, by suspension of the Corn Law—and that to do anything, after that, short of simple repeal, would be beginning again on the old “false and vicious” system. We simply say, nothing of this kind is in Lord John Russell's commission. This is no part of the business which the Queen and the country call on Lord John Russell to do. It does not signify how agreeable some little addendum of this sort might be to the “leading Whigs.” In this business the country knows nothing of “Whigs.” The country has nothing, just now, to say to Lord John Russell's “Whig” friends, nor to Lord John Russell himself, in their, or his “Whig” capacity. The country knows, right well, the noble lord, the Free Trade Member of Parliament for the City of London; and it knows such Free Traders as Earl Grey and Lord Morpeth. Others of his lordship's friends the country will be very happy to know, as and when they make themselves known, in the character in which alone the country is, at this moment, at all interested in its public men. But “Whigs,” as “Whigs,” have nothing to do with a crisis which has nothing to do with Whiggism. The country's commission to Lord John Russell to work out the principles of his letter to the London Electors, in the shape of an Act of Parliament, is not a commission to Lord John Russell's friends to hinder and spoil the work.

We have only to add, that the promises of Lord John Russell, as of all other public men, are conditional; conditional on the sufficiency of the power placed at his disposal. That power it is for the people to supply, by unswerving fidelity and steadiness to the one grand and simple purpose to which Lord John Russell's acceptance of the Premiership would indicate his determination to accomplish; by taking and keeping such an attitude as shall convince all time-serving and trimming politicians, that the bold and simple course is also the easy and safe course.

RETROSPECT OF THE CORN LAWS.

A law passed by a packed Parliament of Members interested in the perpetration of injustice naturally provoked the indignation of the people; and its authors, as we mentioned last week, took measures to suppress the expression of public opinion by military violence. No sooner was the increasing extent of popular discontent known, than before anything like outrage was committed, preparations were made to occupy London with an overwhelming army, as if it had been a hostile capital. The following circular was addressed by the high constable of Brighton to the different innkeepers of that town and the surrounding district:

“In consequence of a requisition received by me from the Quartermaster-General, I have to request you will, on or before Monday next, furnish me with a correct return of the number of soldiers you can accommodate, in case of emergency, on their march through this town; also, what number of horses you can possibly make room for.”

This precious missive is dated March 4th, 1815, and there was not the slightest disturbance of the public peace before Monday, March 7th. The soldiers were stimulated to commit acts of violence. We have already mentioned the two murders committed at the house of the present Earl of Ripon. On the same evening, Mr. Henrick, of Cecil-street, Strand, who was quietly going down to the House of Commons on private business, was sabred by one of the Life Guards; and a person who was near him had his thigh broken. Two gentlemen who attempted to address the multitude in St. James's Park were very roughly handled by the soldiers, and would have suffered severe injury but for the interference of the peace-officers.

On the following days, London presented the appearance of a place in a state of siege. The King's Mews was formally garrisoned by the Life-Guards, and the leading bread taxers applied for and obtained detachments of soldiers to guard their houses. There was one honourable exception; Lord Darnley, deeply affected by the wanton sacrifice of life at Mr. Robinson's—now Lord Ripon's—house, insisted that the military should be removed from his mansion. On Wednesday, the 8th of March, the House of Commons, alarmed by a false report of the approach of the mob, hastily adjourned. The inquest on Mr. Vyse, shot from Mr. Robinson's house, adjourned for a very different reason. Mr. Baker, one of the police magistrates, interposed his authority, though manifestly contrary to law, to prevent Mr. Robinson's servants from being examined at the coroner's inquest. In most of the shops of the metropolis, written papers were posted, inscribed with “No Corn Laws”—“Cheap Bread and Good Trade.” The troops from Windsor were marched into London on the same day; and in consequence of the heavy rain, the 5th regiment of foot was brought a great part of the way in waggons. The artillery was also brought up from Woolwich, and ball-cartridges were distributed to the troops.

The citizens of London were completely at the mercy of the army. Everywhere through the metropolis posts were formed to command the principal avenues; and a proclamation issued by the Prince Regent forbade them to assemble to protest against the iniquity of taxing their food. Lord Sidmouth addressed a circular to the different vestry clerks, requiring them to convene the several parochial authorities to take measures for preventing riots and tumults; and at the same time care was taken to suppress any mention of the acts of violence committed by the military.

At this crisis intelligence of the escape of Napoleon from Elba arrived, and the bread taxers took advantage of the diversion which this incident afforded to the public excitement to hasten the Corn Laws through the House of Lords with all the speed that the caravan of legislation can travel. The riots in the metropolis were not renewed, for the following harvest happened to be most abundant; and the Corn Laws were thus rendered virtually inoperative. Great distress, however, continued to prevail among the farmers; they were under leases and rents founded upon an extraordinary conjuncture of bad seasons with a state of war, and upon an Act which promised to keep up prices by excluding foreign grain, but which made no provision for the effects of a productive harvest. The strange complexity which ensued is shown in one of the resolutions moved by Mr. Huskisson in 1822. It asserted “That the excess of the supply above the demand must have arisen either from an extent of corn tillage more than commensurate to the general consumption of the country, or from a succession of abundant harvests upon the same extent of tillage, or from the coincident effect of both these causes.” In the crowded state of our columns we cannot complete this retrospect from 1815 to 1822 in our present Number; but we shall return to the subject.

THE MOVEMENT.

Though we have devoted all our available space to the record of the great public meetings which have been held throughout the empire, and have omitted most of our miscellaneous matter to find room for these interesting reports, we have to apologise to our friends for omitting many heart-stirring speeches, and but briefly noticing many interesting proceedings which mark the spirit of the people and the character of the crisis. Elsewhere will be found an account of the great meeting of the citizens of London in the Guildhall; never was there a more important, a more enthusiastic, or a more influential assemblage collected in the metropolis. The intense anxiety of the auditors, the solemn earnestness of the speakers, and the unanimity of all, produced an impression which those who witnessed it can never forget. Never, in the whole course of his career, was Mr. Cobden more warmly received, and never was he more successful in developing the great principles on which the prosperity of the community and its chances of escape from impending peril depend. The meeting was one of men thoroughly in earnest, who had resolved that their determinations should not be mistaken.

Of equal importance was the great meeting of the West Riding of Yorkshire, held in front of the Court-house of Wakefield, and attended by more than twenty thousand persons.

The meeting was called by the high sheriff, in obedience to a requisition signed by a great proportion of the most influential inhabitants of the West Riding, including many of the most extensive landed proprietors. The requisition was one for calling a meeting to memorialise her Majesty to call Parliament together with a view to the repeal of the Corn Laws.

From early dawn the town of Wakefield was all astir. The church bells rung merry peals, and the place looked as if a fair was on the point of opening. People came pouring in from all sides—all the surrounding towns and villages sent their representatives—bands in and out of uniform marched in, playing merry tunes, coaches whirled along decorated with Free Trade banners, and clustered over with passengers, all crowding to the scene of action; while waggons, country carts, and gigs of every description came rattling in, many of them fluttering with banners inscribed with every species of Free Trade mottoes, set off by every species of gaudy emblazonry.

Besides this, special trains arrived in time for the meeting from Sheffield, Halifax, Rochdale, and the various places on the Leeds and Manchester Rail way, conveying thousands to Wakefield; while great walking processions—each of them many thousand strong—came in from Leeds, Huddersfield, and those towns from which special trains did not run. Many places, however, dispatched both their walking processions and their special trains, many of the most important factories in Leeds, Huddersfield, and Bradford having been closed, to enable the hands to participate in this most splendid demonstration.

Altogether the display was very imposing, and certainly one of the greatest that has occurred in the history of the Anti-Corn-Law agitation.

By the time the proceedings commenced, the open space in front of the hustings was, as we have already said, crowded by one dense mass of people, which extended many hundred yards down into Wood-street—thousands being congregated at points where a chance of hearing the speeches was quite out of the question. Besides this, all the avenues leading to the place of meeting, the smaller streets and lanes, were just as densely crowded, walls and windows, every spot, in fact, from which a glimpse of the hustings could be obtained, were alive with spectators.

The meeting was addressed by Mr. Fawkes, of Farnley Hall; Mr. J. Marshall, of Leeds; Mr. C. Wood, M. P.; Mr. Rand, a Conservative gentleman from Bradford; Mr. Wrightson, M. P.; Mr. Blea-then, and Mr. Dunn. Such was the earnestness of the people that, though rain began to fall, few of the immense multitude quitted the assembly until the proceedings were concluded.

At Birmingham a very splendid and a very gratifying Free Trade demonstration took place within the great Music Hall. The room, floor and galleries were crammed, the greater proportion of the audience consisting of operatives. There could not have been less than 8000 people present, and the decision of this noble assemblage, in favour of repealing the Corn Laws, at once and before any other political question should be opened up, was perfectly unanimous. An attempt was made to connect the question of the suffrage with that of Free Trade, but when the movers of the amendment found that the sense of the meeting was decidedly against them, they submitted to its decision, and joined their fellow-townsmen in the demand for Free Trade. The principal speakers at the Birmingham meeting, over which the Mayor presided, were, Mr. W. Scholefield; Rev. Mr. Melsom; Mr. J. Sturge; Alderman Weston; Mr. W. Blaxland; Mr. J. Edmunds; Mr. Muntz, M. P.; Mr. Spooner, M. P.; Mr. Dawson, M. A.; Mr. L. Chance, and the Rev. Mr. W. Swann.

At Perth, a meeting of the inhabitants was convened in the City Hall by the Provost, over which the Dean of Guild presided. In number, respectability, and intense earnestness for the attainment of its great object it surpassed any assembly that had ever been collected in that ancient city. The principal speakers were Dr. Young; the Right Hon. Fox Maule, M. P.; Mr. Duncan, M. P.; and Mr. Nairn, of Milnhaugh. Letters approving the object of the meeting, and regretting their inability to attend personally, were read from the Marquis of Breadalbane, Lord Kinnaird, and Lord Duncan.

A public meeting has been held at Bradford, surpassing any that ever assembled in that thriving town, in its manifestation of high resolve and inflexible demonstration. The chair was taken by E. C. L. Kaye, Esq., formerly member for the borough, and the proceedings were of the most exhilarating kind; the resolutions were carried not merely unanimously, but by acclamation—and the speakers were received with a cordial welcome, and retired with a hearty response. The "telling" speech of Mr. Beaumont particularly created quite a sensation; almost every sentence elicited marked applause; and when he spoke of "the Giant Monopoly being prostrated by the sling and the stone of the Anti-Corn Law League," round after round of tumultuous cheering followed, rivalling, if not surpassing, the celebrated "Kentish fire" at Orange demonstrations. The other speakers were Mr. W. Rand; Mr. J. Russell; the Rev. J. H. Ryland; Mr. S. Smith; Mr. Ackroyd; the Rev. J. Arworth; Mr. Hepper, and Mr. W. Rawson.

Another Free Trade meeting, convened by the constable, was held at Little Horton, in the vicinity of Bradford, and was addressed by Mr. W. Rand; Mr. J. Rawson; Mr. E. Waud; Mr. J. Yates, and Mr. W. Biles. Similar meetings were held in the same vicinity of Birkenshaw, Farsley, and Idle.

We have next to notice the great Free Trade meeting in the Staffordshire Potteries, held in the Bethesda School-room at Hanley. The chair was taken by Mr. W. Ridgway, and the meeting was addressed by Mr. J. Ridgway, Mr. F. Wedgwood, Mr. L. J. Abington, Mr. J. L. Ricardo, M. P.; Mr. J. Bright, M. P., and several other gentlemen. Much amusement was excited by the reading of a letter from Alderman Copeland, one of the representatives (!) of the district, in which he described himself as a Free Trader, but under certain conditions, which he declared himself unable to describe, or even to understand.

The High Constable of Rochdale convened a meeting of the inhabitants, in the public hall of that town, pursuant to a requisition signed by 2300 of the inhabitants. The chair was taken by the High Constable, and the meeting was addressed by Mr. Kelsall, Mr. J. Wilkinson, Mr. J. Hayle, and Mr. J. Bright.

Hardly second in importance to any we have mentioned was the great Free Trade meeting in Hull, over which the Mayor presided. It was addressed by Mr. Alderman Thompson, the Rev. J. H. Bromley, Dr. Gordon, the Rev. J. Libree, the Rev. E. Higginson, Mr. Alderman Atkinson, Mr. Lissesson, Mr. Blundell, Mr. J. Jones, the late Mayor, Mr. E. T. Collins, and the Rev. Dr. Aspinall. The speech of the last-named gentleman was characterised by more than his usual force and eloquence. We deeply regret that our unparalleled press of matter prevents us from giving it insertion.

An important Free Trade meeting took place in the agricultural borough of Rye. Rye is situated in the centre of one of the best cultivated districts in England. The meeting was attended by several tenant farmers, and by the member for the borough, Mr. Herbert Curteis, who is a large proprietor in the neighbourhood. Mr. Curteis admitted that the present system of Corn Laws had been an utter failure; and expressed a hope that Lord John Russell would be enabled to put an end to a system which had proved itself to be the bane of agriculture. Mr. Selwes, an agriculturist of well-known celebrity, stated that he had long been of opinion that the Corn Laws must be repealed; and Mr. Jeremiah Smith, one of the largest farmers in England, stated that if he had freedom of trade, he dreaded no foreign competition.

The Town Council of the ancient borough of Congleton has addressed a memorial to her Majesty, praying that the ports should be opened for the admission of foreign grain. The meeting was addressed by Mr. Alderman Broadhurst, Mr. Lockitt, Mr. Alderman Waddington, and Mr. Alderman Hadfield. It was resolved that J. Pattison, Esq., one of the members for the City of London, who is a native of Congleton, should be requested to present the memorial.

Our space will only permit us to mention that the meetings which we announced that Mr. R. R. Moore would hold in the course of the current week have been attended by crowded and enthusiastic audiences. There were more than twelve hundred present at the Rochester meeting, including several influential farmers in the vicinity, and the resolutions in favour of Free Trade were carried by unanimous acclamation.

In addition to the series of important meetings above enumerated, the columns of the daily press are this day again crowded with the reports of other and no less forcible demonstrations of the popular will. Wolverhampton, Newcastle-upon-Tyne, Bolton, Staley Bridge, the important metropolitan parish of St. Pancras, and various other minor towns have all unequivocally testified their determination to meet this great crisis of our common movement with the requisite energy and firmness.

We deeply regret our inability to gratify our readers with a full report of the eloquent and stirring speech made by our Parliamentary champion, Mr. Villiers, before his constituents at Wolverhampton, on Tuesday evening. It was a speech replete with that earnest, logical humour, and forcible argument and eloquence, which is so characteristic of his best efforts.

DEATH OF LORD WHARNCLIFFE.

Lord Wharncliffe, Lord President of the Council, expired at his residence in Curson-street, at half-past ten on Friday morning. His Lordship had been ill for some days past, but no immediate danger had been apprehended.

His Lordship's son, the Hon. John Stuart Wortley, was with his noble parent at the time of his decease.

This will occasion a vacancy for the West Riding of Yorkshire, for which Lord Morpeth will be returned by acclamation.

The following circular, with the annexed resolution, has been addressed by the Council of the League to the principal merchants and manufacturers in and around Manchester:—

Manchester, Dec. 13th, 1845.

Sir,—We beg leave respectfully to refer you to the annexed Resolutions of the Council of the League, and urgently to request your attendance at a Meeting of Merchants, Bankers, Manufacturers, Traders, and others, to be held at the Town Hall, Manchester, on Tuesday, the 23rd December next, at eleven o'clock precisely, to consider the best means of aiding the operations of the National Anti-Corn-Law League in the present crisis.

We are, respectfully,

Richard Cobden, M.P.
John Bright, M.P.
Henry Marsland, M.P.
Richard Walker, M.P.
W. B. Watkins (Mayor)
James Kershaw, Alderman
C. J. S. Walker, Alderman
John Mayson, Alderman
John Burd, Alderman
E. Armitage, Alderman
John Potter, Alderman
William Harvey, Alderman
Thomas Bazley
John Brooks
Robert Munn
J. B. Smith
Alexander Henry
N. Buckley, Ashton
John Whittaker
Richard Matley
T. Thomasson
George Wilson
Robert Hyde Greg
Henry Ashworth
Edmund Ashworth
P. R. Arrowsmith
William Bickham
William Rawson
W. Evans
T. Whitehead
T. Taylor, Wigan
J. Wrigley, Bury
J. R. Barnes
— Barnes, jun.
J. Barratt

E. P. Thompson
Josh. Simpson
E. Hall
H. Bannerman
Josh. Acton, Wigan
W. R. Callender
Nathan Lees
J. Schofield
A. Prentice
John Harding
Thos. B. Potter
Thos. Woolley
R. A. Thicknesse, Wigan
J. Midgeley, Rochdale
W. Morris
C. Potter, Darwen
Jno. Graham
Samuel Lees
N. Heald
Thomas Bright
E. J. Kay, Whitworth
Robert Platt, Stalybridge
E. Grundy, near Bury
E. T. Grundy, Rusholme
W. Alcard, Warrington
Robert Stewart
Henry Rawson
T. Ashton
William Ross
Josh. Whitworth
John Gallemore
J. Cheetham
John Hoyle, Rochdale
Thomas Booth, Rochdale
John Petrie, Rochdale

At a Special General Meeting of the Council of the National Anti-Corn-Law League, held in Manchester, on Saturday, the 13th December, 1845,

It was moved by Henry Marsland, Esq., M. P., seconded by R. H. Greg, Esq.,

And resolved unanimously—"That from the altered position of parties in the House of Commons, in reference to the Repeal of the Corn Laws, it is desirable to rescind the existing resolution against petitioning this present Parliament, and that this meeting recommend that petitions be sent from every town and district in the kingdom, as numerous as possible, praying for the Total and Unconditional Abolition of the Corn and Provision Laws."

Moved by John Bright, Esq., M. P., seconded by Richard Walker, Esq., M. P.,

And resolved unanimously—"That a Subscription of a Quarter of a Million Sterling be immediately commenced to meet the present emergency. That a call of 20 per cent. thereon be forthwith made. That a Public Meeting be called in the Town Hall, Manchester, for Tuesday, the 23rd December instant, for the purpose of giving effect to the foregoing resolution."

GEORGE WILSON, Chairman.

Newall's Buildings, Dec. 13th, 1845.

THE CORN TRADE.—The number of grain laden vessels which passed the Sound and Belt for England, from the 3rd of December to the 9th of December, were ten wheat, three barley, two peas, and two linseed.—From Body and Co's Circular.

OPENING OF THE PORTS

CITY OF LONDON.

On Monday a most numerous meeting of the constituency of the City of London took place in the Guildhall, the Right Hon. the Lord Mayor in the chair.

Amongst the gentlemen who appeared upon the hustings we observed the following:—Mr. James Pattison, M.P.; Mr. Raikes Currie, M.P.; Dr. Bowring, M.P.; Mr. R. Cobden, M.P.; Mr. W. Williams, M.P.; Mr. T. Milner Gibson, M.P.; Mr. Archibald Hastie, M.P.; Mr. George Moffatt, M.P.; Mr. John Dillon; Mr. R. Ricardo; Alderman Sir John Key, Bart.; Mr. Alderman Wood; Mr. Sheriff Laurie; Mr. W. G. Prescott; Mr. J. Ingram Travers; Mr. D. W. Harvey; Mr. P. A. Taylor; Mr. Charles Perkins; Mr. W. Miller Christy; Mr. W. Wansley; Mr. W. D. Sault; Mr. William Nicholson; Mr. W. Hawes; Mr. R. R. Moore; Mr. S. B. Venning; Mr. M. Seward; Mr. C. Wordsworth (Temple); Mr. John Locke (City Pleader); Mr. R. Taylor; Mr. J. T. Norris; Mr. H. L. Keeling; Mr. W. H. Ashurst, &c.

The appearance of Mr. Cobden was hailed with tremendous applause; and several of the other members of the meeting were welcomed according to their advocacy of the popular measure, the abolition of the Corn Laws.

The LORD MAYOR came forward amidst applause and expressions of disapprobation. His Lordship said—Gentlemen, this meeting has been convened by me at the wish of a numerous signed requisition, to give you the opportunity of expressing your sentiments upon the subject contained in the paper which I now have the honour to present to you. I desire now only to observe, that whilst I advise that you enter upon the subject referred to in the requisition fairly and dispassionately, you should act with prudence and discretion, that the subject may be duly considered, and that order may be preserved in this assembly, I assure you that I will encourage a patient hearing of any sentiments that you may be disposed to offer upon the subject. (Cheers.)

The clerk then read the following requisition:—

"TO THE RIGHT HON. THE LORD MAYOR.

"We, the undersigned electors of the City of London, being desirous of holding a public meeting for the purpose of expressing our sentiments on the subject of the existing Corn Laws in connection with the prevailing apprehension of a scarcity, request that your Lordship will call a meeting of the electors in the Guildhall of this city, to be held at an early day, and that your Lordship will be pleased to preside at the same."

The LORD MAYOR then stated that he had received a letter from Lord John Russell, of which the following is a copy:—

"Chesham-place, Dec. 14.

"My Lord,—As I understand that your Lordship is to preside at a meeting of the livery to-morrow, on the subject of the Corn Laws, I request you will have the goodness to state that the peculiar circumstances of my position at this moment will prevent my attendance.

"I have the honour to be, your Lordship's most obedient servant,

"The Right Hon. the Lord Mayor."

Mr. DILLON stepped forward upon the platform amidst loud cheering, and said they were met to express an opinion on the existing Corn Laws, and he suggested that the conclusion they should come to was, that the Corn Laws should be repealed. (Loud cheers.) He would briefly give his reasons for that suggestion. In the first place, as conveyed in the resolution he was about to propose, the principle of protection was bad, false in theory, hurtful to the class protected, and injurious to the whole community; in the second place, it was a bad law in its general application, but more particularly so in the present state of this country; and in the third place, it operated in a partial and injurious manner at most times, but more decidedly so when famine stared the nation in the face, as it now did. Some four years ago a law was passed for a sliding scale, but what had been the result? Had it produced the wonders promised? (No, no.) Had it regulated the supply in a legitimate manner? (No, no.) Had it not turned out a total failure? (Cries of Yes, it has.) At that time many honest men—at least he believed them honest, and he was one of them—differed from the sliding scale, and advocated a fixed duty. That opinion was thought the best adapted then to the exigencies of the country. Circumstances had changed since then, and now he was an advocate for a fixed duty no longer, but for absolute Free Trade. (Loud cheers.) He could advocate such a view in the present state of the country. But in advocating the total repeal of the Corn Laws, they should do so not as a party question—not as a measure to benefit one class at the expense of another class, but as a measure well calculated to benefit the great body of the community. They sought not to benefit one class or party, but to benefit every class of society. A great difference of opinion prevailed in this country as to the comparative advantage of an agricultural or a manufacturing population. There were those amongst them who advocated the existence only of an agricultural population, and said it was greatly superior to a manufacturing population; but how absurd was it in this age to entertain such a view of society! How could they go back to an agricultural state of society? (Hear, hear.) It would be as easy for a man to return to the age of childhood as it would be for this country, advanced as it was in civilisation, to return to an agricultural state of society. But if they were to return to an agricultural state of society, what was to become of our manufactures? Were they to be destroyed? (Cries of No, no.) No, it was perfectly absurd; it was monstrous; it was perfectly ridiculous to hold such an argument in the present state of society. (Hear.) What was the question which agitated the country at this moment? It was, whether an agricultural or a manufacturing state of society was best; but let him remind those thousands who had started this question that there was a population more to be cared for and more to be feared than either an agricultural population or a manufacturing, and that was a starving population. (Cheers.) How were they to deal with them? Would gunpowder stop them? Would curry powder feed them? (Laughter and cries of No, no.) When first he heard of the noble duke's recipe he was amused at it, but upon more serious thought his indignation was moved, because he saw in it reason to believe that it was the intention of the noble duke to excite the stomachs of the labouring population for the purpose of making them contented and as quietly as possible submit to starvation. (Cheers.) What were the arguments in favour of the Corn Law? Why, first, it was said that agriculture was the base of society. Let them make the base as broad as they possibly could; let them extend it to other countries. It was asked what they would do in time of war if they repealed the Corn Laws? Why, let them remain at peace, and let them make it for the interest of other nations to remain at peace with them. Let them buy corn from America when they could not produce enough in their own country, and then America would not go to war with them. (Cheers.) Now, let the meeting look at this for a moment. In the first place, he could never understand how the present system of policy was calculated to increase the resources of the country, or add to its prosperity. He thought the interest of the proprietors must increase with the prosperity of the country; for, if there was an increase in the supply of crops, it would be necessary for the landlords to improve their crops. Besides, when there was a great demand for a supply of food from abroad at hand, there was a tendency to increase the price of corn in those countries, and therefore to enable the growers of corn in this country to compete with the foreign growers. (Hear.) Food was necessary for all classes of the people, and therefore those who would tax it did a wrong, while they did not hesitate to try and cheapen their own luxuries. (Hear, hear.) It was the boast of Mr. Huskisson that he had expunged from the statute-book the word "prohibition." (Cheers.) Let it be the boast of the people of the present day that they had expunged from the statute-book the word "protection." (Cheers.) Let the Government pass laws for the repression and the prevention of crime, and let them too have taxes—as few as possible (laughter)—for the maintenance of the state; but let them have no taxes which would operate as a premium upon famine. (Cheers.) In the spirit of these observations he begged leave to move the first resolution:

"That the principle of protection in commerce is unsound, false in theory and in practice, injurious to the classes who seek protection, and to the community at large.

"That the great practical rule of leaving all commerce unfettered applies more peculiarly—and on still stronger grounds of justice as well as policy—to the trade in corn, and to all articles whatsoever which form the food of the people, than to any other trade." (Cheers.)

Mr. RICARDO came forward to second the resolution. He said that if it had been necessary to apply talent to the seconding of that resolution, he would not have come forward to do so; but the proposition it contained was so self-evident that it carried conviction with it, and therefore it would not be necessary for him to say a word in support of it; and indeed the eloquent gentleman who had proposed it had left him not a word to say in addition. He begged to second the resolution. (Cheers.)

Mr. WILKINSON said he wished to speak on the resolution before it was put. He was as determined an enemy to the Corn Laws as any of them; but he could not agree to the conclusions that many had come to in arguing the question. Had it not been for the violent language used by many of the advocates of Free Trade, the Corn Laws might have been repealed. (Uproar.) He repeated that such parties had materially arrested the progress of Free Trade. (Increased uproar.) Moreover, it had been said that at present there was a deficiency of food in the country. He did not believe that there was. (Great uproar.) He maintained there was no deficiency of food. (The speaker was here stopped by a tremendous burst of hissing and yelling, which lasted several minutes. He, after the exhaustion of the first volley of discordant shouts, attempted to go on; but after several attempts desisted.)

The LORD MAYOR came forward, and requested the meeting to give a patient hearing to Mr. Wilkinson.

Mr. WILKINSON again essayed to speak; but after the delivery of several sentences which were inaudible to those even immediately around him, on account of the hisses and shouts with which he was assailed, he stood still. Then retiring amidst loud and indignant cries of "Turn him out!" "Off, off!" "We have had enough of you," he again sat down.

The LORD MAYOR then took the sense of the meeting whether the speaker should proceed, when the negative was carried by an immense show of hands.

Mr. Wilkinson then retired, amidst loud and continued derisive shouts and cheers.

The LORD MAYOR having again put it to the vote whether the speaker should be heard, the question met with its former fate—namely, a negative.

Mr. Wilkinson having bowed to the wish of the meeting, the original resolution was put, and carried unanimously.

Mr. ROBERTSON said, however trite might be the remark, he felt himself bound to say, that he felt perfectly incompetent to do justice to the subject now under discussion. This was partly owing to natural inability, and partly to having been only that minute called on to propose a resolution touching the Corn Laws. (Hear, hear, and cheers.) Now let them look to the consequences that were likely to result from persisting in these laws. On the 5th of January last there were only 300,000 quarters of corn in the market, while in the Baltic there was a superabundant supply; but from this they were unable to derive any benefit. He would conclude by moving:

"That the protective law, commonly called the Corn Law, has in this country wholly failed in either benefiting the agriculturists, or in providing for the wants and protecting the interests of the community; that it has engendered strife among classes at home, and provoked against us hostility and retaliation abroad; that it has neither secured the promised stability in price, nor regularity in supply; that it has neither made us independent of foreign supply, nor provided against the recurrence of scarcity and famine; that the sliding scale particularly has added the risks of chance and the spirit of gambling to the common irregularities of trade and the uncertainty of the seasons; that this law, whilst it has altogether failed in realising the advantages promised by its supporters, has brought upon us all, and more than all, the evils predicted by those who were opposed to its introduction."

Mr. CHRISTY seconded the resolution; but he delivered his observations in so low a tone that it was impossible to hear him. However, he was understood to say that he had great pleasure in seconding the resolution, which was put and carried amidst loud cheering.

Mr. C. PERKINS proposed the next resolution. He said that the resolution intrusted to him to propose contained matter for the grave and serious consideration of the meeting as well as of all persons in this country who were in any manner connected with the land. He proceeded to say he would ask the people to look at the present difficult and embarrassing position of the country by reason of the resignation of the Ministry. (Hear, hear.) The Ministry had looked about in every direction for an excuse or a means of escape, but they found they could not shrink from the responsibility they had incurred. (Hear.) This country was now looking forward with anxiety to the arrival of the speech of the President of the United States, which they might expect within the next ten days. That was a document which he knew the Government of this country did not like to face. (Hear, hear.) The United States of America were now somewhat more extensive than they were a few years ago; in fact, they had extended all over the continent. Such of these states as were situated inland or at a distance from any port wanted to dispose of their produce to the best advantage. (Hear, hear.) The states had now a majority in the Congress, and it might be relied upon that they never would meet this country upon terms of amicable feeling and mutual interest until they had free access to the markets of this country. (Hear, hear.) He had heard a great deal said about the protection of the landed interest, but he could assure that class that it would be infinitely more secure and satisfactory to them to have the Corn Laws repealed altogether and all artificial prices for food. (Cheers.) Until that were done, he would ask, how was the farmer to act? How was he to take a farm? What was he to bid for it? (Hear.) In fact, he knew not how to proceed while these Corn Laws existed, for all was now confusion (hear), and a confusion so great that the present Ministry did not dare to face it. (Hear, hear.) But it was for the electors of London to be now serious and determined in the good cause, and they might rest assured of success. (Cheers.) Mr. Perkins concluded by proposing the following resolution:—

"That, looking to the present political, commercial, and economical state of this country, it is indispensable (as part of a more liberal and enlightened system of policy) that the present Corn Law, and all laws which levy a tax upon the food of the great mass of the people, should be immediately repealed."

Mr. W. HAWES next came forward. He said he would not detain them many minutes in observing upon the resolution, for he was certain that it would meet with the unanimous approbation of the meeting. (Hear, hear.) He would just call the attention of the meeting to the fact, that the feelings of the country had now attained such a height in regard to the Corn Laws, that the Prime Minister himself had been convinced of the necessity for their total repeal. (Loud cheers.) It was but a few years back that they had met in this hall, and declared in a favour of a bill—the Reform Bill, and the Government of the day resolved to carry it; but even that was spoiled, not by those who had originated or introduced it, but it was spoiled in its progress through the legislature by a few interested persons, who introduced so many qualifications into it that it was rendered almost useless. (Hear.) But now that the people were resolved to have a repeal of the Corn Laws, that repeal must be without any qualification whatever. (Cheers.) They should have a total and effectual repeal of every tax upon food. (Cheers.) The meeting was aware that Mr. Cobden was present (cheers), and therefore he (Mr. Hawes) would not longer deprive them of the pleasure of hearing him. (Cheers.) He was a citizen of this county, and had been received everywhere with the greatest enthusiasm and honour, for he was, indeed, now regarded as the great leader of this movement. (Cheers.)

Mr. COBDEN then presented himself, and was received with loud cheering, which continued for several minutes. He said, that though he had been living almost in public meetings for the last fortnight, yet, until he came within that splendid hall and witnessed that magnificent gathering, he did not know the full strength of the movement in which they were engaged. (Hear, hear.) Hitherto they had been dealing with the extremities of the body politic. They had given a good lusty kick in Lancashire, and a blow had been struck by the right hand of Scotland in Edinburgh; but now the head was in motion. (Hear, hear.) He brought to the inhabitants of this vast metropolis a message from the men of the north. They looked to the inhabitants of the metropolis; they waited for them to take that position in this great cause which alone they could take with honour to themselves in the van and front of the movement. (Cheers.) For whom was this cause if not for them, the inhabitants of this city, the centre of the greatest commercial emporium ever known on the face of the earth, whose every pulsation was felt wherever civilisation extended? (Hear, hear.) Could there be a law, then, the object of which was to restrict trade, to convulse monetary operations, to starve the mass of the people, in which they in London were not more deeply interested than any other part of the community? (Cheers.) And who were the opponents with whom they had to deal on this occasion? Who were the men who ventured to tell them, the inhabitants of London, and the vast multitudes of the populous north, that they should not be allowed to exchange the fruits of their industry for food, which was offered open handed by every country on the globe? (Hear, hear.) Who were the men that stood up arrayed against this magnificent movement? They were to be found, forsooth, in Buckinghamshire and Essex! (Laughter.) Yes, in Essex! The great protectionist gathering which was to stop this mighty avalanche of opinion was to come from Chelmsford! (Renewed laughter.) Essex was fertile in wheat, and, as a gentleman below remarked, was also fruitful in calves. (Laughter.) He believed that all the wheat which the Essex people had to sell came to London. The people of London were the customers to the Essex growers. (Hear, hear.) They bought and paid for all the wheat which the Essex growers had to sell, and, he believed, gave a higher price for it than those growers could obtain in any other market in the world. (Hear, hear.) But the people said that they still wanted more wheat, and then Sir J. Tyrell called his protectionist squires together, to tell them, the citizens of London, that there was enough for them, and that they should not have any more. (Cheers and laughter.) That he thought was about a fair illustration of the case between the population of England and the landowners. (Applause.) The people told them that they would buy their wheat as they had already bought it, but at the same time they claimed the right, in addition, of buying as much more as they could get, pay for, and eat. (Hear, hear.) They were rather a bold set, these gentry in Essex, considering that the people of London were their customers. (Laughter.) He believed that it was usual in the city to behave civilly and politely to those by whose custom they were enabled to keep their shops open; but these Essex gentry seemed to set themselves up as something above their customers. (Laughter.) Now, he would tell them, that if they could do better with their wheat by sending it to Russia, Poland, Spain, or America, they might do so with welcome; but, if the people of London were to have it, they must have it on ordinary market terms, and the sellers must be civil into the bargain. (Cheers and laughter.) But, these gentry told the people that they had enough; and a gentleman who had spoken a short time since declared that there was no scarcity in the land. (Cries of shame.) Judging from the capacious spencer which the gentleman wore, and seeing how well it was filled (roars of laughter), he had not the slightest doubt but that that gentleman did have enough. (Renewed laughter.) There certainly was no scarcity there. (Cheers and laughter.) Now, all he (Mr. Cobden) wished to stipulate for was this, that all those who had not got so good a spencer on, or quite so much to fill it, might be allowed to judge for themselves whether there was scarcity or not, and he had no doubt that many in Bethnal-green and Spitalfields would declare that they did not get a sufficiency of Essex bread. (Hear, hear.) Leave every man to be himself the judge whether he had plenty or not. If he had plenty he would not go 3000 miles to America to get more; (hear, hear)—and if he had not plenty, it was an unrighteous scheme—it was a scheme abhorred of every law, human and divine, to put barriers in the way of his obtaining a sufficient supply of food from any part of the world. (Loud cheers.) These protection societies, of which they had heard so much, were very careful to tell them that there were still sufficient potatoes and corn in the country. If that were so, he should like to know what then was the matter at head-quarters? (Cheers and laughter.) If there were no potato rot, he should like to know what that murrain was that had got into the Cabinet? (Laughter.) When the Parliament dispersed at the close of last session, to judge from the jaunty airs of Sir R. Peel, Sir J. Graham, and the rest, it would have seemed that they were revelling in the flattering notion that power and place were with them an affair of a lifetime. But lo! the Cabinet was now broken up and dispersed. (Hear, hear.) If there were an abundant crop and no scarcity, what was the matter? (Hear, hear.) He thought that there were very ominous signs in the sudden rupture of the Cabinet. Bad as had been some reports—bad as still were the reports from Ireland and some parts of England, he could not help suspecting and fearing that Sir R. Peel had still worse information than any which the public had yet obtained. (Hear, hear.) Since he had been in that hall, a gentleman had put into his hand a paper, giving an account of the number of sacks of potatoes delivered from ships in the port of London during the following periods, viz., the three months ending December, 1842, 1843, 1844, and 1845. During the first period the amount of sacks delivered from ship was 404,400; during the second, 315,800; during the third, 381,800; while during the fourth (the three months ending in December, 1845) the amount of sacks delivered from ship was only 195,400. The prices fluctuated in 1842, 1843, and 1844, from 40s. to 90s. per ton, while in the present season the price had varied from 10s. to 150s. per ton. To that same gentleman's knowledge there had been 12 cargoes of potatoes cleared out to the lightermen and given away, on condition that they would carry them off to be used as manure, and he knew of one instance where a cargo of potatoes cost 30l. of expenses, for they had to be dug up, and they were afterwards of no use to any one. (Hear, hear.) In almost every part of England, and he (Mr. Cobden) could speak with regard to accounts he had received, the potato crop corresponded with the return he had just laid before them. He believed that in many districts before next spring time there would not be a sound potato even for seed. What infatuation, then, it was in dukes and squires, who rose up in the morning, went out hunting or shooting, and afterwards came home to champagne and venison, to be maundering like old women, and telling the people, as a worthy gentleman had at that meeting, that there was no scarcity! (Cheers and laughter.) These men were ignorant of what was going on in the cottages on their own estates, and they were utterly unprepared for the evils impending over them. (Hear, hear.) He ventured to predict that before the fine weather in next spring there would be whole districts depending on charity. The consequence would be that the persons in distress would be flocking into the towns for the purpose of obtaining subsistence, and the people who had no land would be called on by the dukes and squires to subscribe their means to keep the peasantry from starvation. (Hear, hear.) And now, what state of things existed in this country at the present moment? As for an executive Government—there was none. (Hear, hear.) It turned out that Sir Robert Peel had taken flight at the first operation of his own sliding scale. (Laughter.) With a majority of 100 in the House of Commons, he had run away from his own handiwork. (Continued laughter.) Why, that was not very "plucky," gentlemen. (Cheers and laughter.) But there was something characteristic in his very retreat, for he had not told them what he had intended to do, or what he now intended to do, and he (Mr. Cobden) ventured to predict that Sir Robert Peel would veil in as much mystery his intentions towards the Free Traders as he did his intentions towards the agriculturists in respect to his tariff, in order that by-and-by he might deal with them as he pleased. (Hear, hear.) Nobody knew what Sir R. Peel intended to do for the country. All that they knew was that he had run away from office, and left the ship without a helmsman; and now was wanted that courageous little man whom they, the citizens of London, had had the honour of sending to Parliament. (Loud cheers.) They were interested—deeply interested, in the public career and honour of that statesman, and he (Mr. Cobden) said for himself, as an elector of London, that he wished Lord John Russell would advise her Majesty to send for the Duke of Richmond. (Loud laughter.) Then let that noble duke try to constitute his Cabinet, placing, no doubt, Sir J. Tyrell in the Home-office, and Col. Sibthorp probably at the Horse Guards. (Shouts of laughter.) Let a protectionist Government be tried, and let it be seen what they could do. (Hear, hear.) There was only one objection to the experiment, and that was, that it would kill them all with laughter, and even those venerable figures at the end of the hall (Gog and Magog) would scarcely be able to keep their sides from shaking at such a spectacle. (Laughter.) But if Lord John Russell undertook to carry on the government of this country with only 180 or 200 members in the House of Commons to vote with him in accordance with the sentiments contained in his late letter (cheers)—that, at all events, would be something different from the conduct of the Minister who ran away, though he had a majority of 90 behind his back. (Cheers.) Well, suppose Lord John Russell did undertake the government, and suppose he stood by the principles announced in his late letter—and he (Mr. Cobden) vouched that Lord John Russell would stand by them (loud cheers)—then, in case of an appeal to the country, what would they in the city of London do? They would send four good ones to Parliament, and no "shams." (Cheers, and a voice—"You shall be one.") Somebody cried out that he should be one, but he did not mean to leave Stockport until he went in for Buckinghamshire. (Cheers and laughter.) When an election arrived, it must be, with the electors of London, four or none. There must be none of those half-and-half renegades at another election, who voted two on one side and two on another, like firing, on going into action, one half of their guns against their own friends. (Hear.) The electors must do as they did in America, have a ticket for four good free traders, and "go the whole ticket." (Cheers.) The electors of London had two good representatives already, but he wished them to have four good ones, because their election took place among the first, and their example was felt throughout the country. (Hear, hear.) He knew they could do it, for he knew more of the registration than probably almost any man in that hall; and it had been right well looked after during the last two years. But he really did not think that they would have any opposition in the city of London at the next election. (Cheers.) What, too, was the state of the case with regard to the metropolitan boroughs? Did they imagine there would be any "curry-powder" candidates? (Laughter.) No. The free traders would have every metropolitan member (cheers); Middlesex also (renewed cheers); and he promised them every large town in the North—Edinburgh, Glasgow, &c. Did they think that any person would stand up on the rotten potato system for Bristol or Newcastle? (Laughter.) No, they would not much like the very name of rotten potatoes there. (Hear, hear.) Let there be a general election, and the Free Traders would carry the total repeal of the Corn Laws in every large and free constituency. (Cheers.) Could the calf interest of Essex stand against the power and wealth of this united community? No. Let them, then, proclaim to Lord J. Russell that if he would be firm, as he (Mr. Cobden) was sure he would, to his principles, he would have the country at his back; and would also have the support of a disinterested organization, conducted not by men who sought for place or power (as that noble lord knew), but by men whose only object for coming into public life was to free industry—to emancipate the commercial, middle, and working classes from the thralldom of an injurious monopoly, and who would be fully satisfied with the accomplishment of that object. (Cheers.) He said, let Lord J. Russell be firm. The time was gone for tricksters and chicaners; the country wanted honesty and straightforwardness. (Cheers.) They wanted a man to avow boldly his opinion—to print it—to put his name to it, so that it might be brought against him at a future period, if necessary. That was the man they wanted, and they had now got him. (Cheers.) It had been said by one of the speakers that day, that four years ago the League would have been satisfied with a compromise. He (Mr. Cobden) could only say, for his part, that he would never have been any party to any compromise of this question. (Hear, hear.) He had never looked on the repeal of the Corn Laws as a matter of expediency or compromise. He looked at the question on the broad ground that their legislators had no right to tax the food of the people; to prevent the industrious man from living by the fruits of his industry; and if the pressure was but as a feather's weight, they were on principle bound to remove it, and by God's help they would remove it. (Cheers.) There was still some talk of compromise. He saw by the Morning Herald (loud laughter) that, according to that venerable authority (renewed laughter), if Sir Robert Peel had introduced a measure on the subject of the Corn Laws, he intended to have given compensation to the monopolists. (Cries of "Oh.") The paper to which he referred then went on to say, that the country which gave compensation to slave owners would never object to compensate the landlords. (Oh, and laughter.) Why, said the hon. gentleman, there is just this difference between the two cases—we are not slaves and we do not intend to be slaves. (Great cheering.) In his opinion, if the landowners had any compensation at all, it ought to be the compensation which one of the city police would give to a light fingered "gent," in whose possession he might find the property of an industrious artisan. The possessor of the stolen property might say, "I have been using this furniture—this chest of drawers—for 30 years; I have been making arrangements founded on my possession of it; and surely you won't take it from me without giving me compensation." (Laughter.) The artisan would step forward and say, I have been deprived of my property for 30 years, and you talk of compensation! Aye, away with them to the police office, and let him get compensation there." (Laughter.) There was one resolution to be submitted to their approval to day, which he (Mr. Cobden) regarded with very great satisfaction, and by which they requested and instructed their four representatives in the House of Commons to vote for the total and immediate repeal of the Corn Laws. (Cheers.) That was language all electors should hold in communicating with their representatives on this subject. (Hear.) He hoped the example thus set by the city of London would be imitated by the electors throughout the country. They were evincing the same noble and courageous spirit which actuated their forefathers who met in that hall 70 years ago, when they had to contend with the power of a court, and the arrogant dictation of a haughty monarch. (Cheers.) That their forefathers did not quail before the frowns of a sovereign—that monument (pointing to Beckford's monument), recording an act of spirited citizenship on the part of a Lord Mayor in the presence of his King, was an honourable memorial. (Cheers.) But the struggle now was not between the people and our Most Gracious Queen. (Loud cheers.) Her Majesty had no interest in the starvation of her people. (Hear, and cheers.) She did not desire to be the sovereign of one class of her subjects only, and that a sordid and a selfish class; but her wish was to be the beloved Queen of a great, a happy, and an united people. (Loud cheers.) Their struggle was not against the Queen; it was with a section, not the most intelligent, (a laugh)—not the most disinterested (laughter)—not the most useful of their countrymen. (Hear, hear.) They were struggling against a large section of the landed aristocracy of this country, whose object was to prevent the people of England from exercising—beyond the narrowest limits—their skill and industry, and from obtaining those rewards to which they were fairly entitled. (Hear, hear.) It was the desire of that class rather to live great among a crushed and impoverished people, than to rise with the greatness, and to recognize the power of those who would raise them to a high and proud position if they would allow others to grow beneath them. (Hear, and cheers.) Their struggle was with the monopolist landowners of this country—a mere handful of men, who, compared with the great bulk of the people, were but as a cork on the cataract of Niagara. That class before the millions of this country would shrink into utter insignificance; their power, founded upon injustice, would be wrested from their hands. The object of this meeting was to show that class that they would no longer be allowed to legislate to the injury, instead of the benefit, of 28,000,000 of their fellow-countrymen. (Hear, hear.) He was convinced, by the cheering aspect of the present meeting, that the time had now come for putting an end to that odious system. (Cheers.) London was now just where it was in 1815. "You compensate the landowners for their bread-tax (continued the hon. member.) They never had a right to that tax. They passed the law by which it was imposed in 1815, under protest from the people of London. (Hear, hear.) There are men here old enough to remember how crowds assembled round the Mansion House to sign the petitions against the tax—petitions praying not only that the tax might not be imposed, but that Parliament would allow time for considering its effects before the measure was pressed forward. Why, in one day 40,000 signatures were attached to that petition. London was moved to its very centre in opposition to this infamous law, and yet its supporters will talk to us of compensation and compromise. To such proposals we cannot listen; our motto is, "The total, immediate, and unqualified repeal of the Corn Laws." (The hon. gentleman resumed his seat amidst enthusiastic and prolonged cheering.)

The resolution was then put by the Lord Mayor, and was passed almost unanimously, only two or three hands being held up against it.

Mr. P. TAYLOR moved the following resolution:—

"That our four representatives be requested and instructed to support such repeal in the Commons' of House Parliament."

Whether their four representatives would all comply with this request he could not say; but he hoped that, if any of them declined doing so, they would follow the example of Sir R. Peel by resigning. (Laughter and cheers.) Mr. Cobden had told them that great pains had been taken in attending to the registration for the city of London during the last two years; and he (Mr. Taylor) was happy to inform them there was not the slightest doubt that, whenever an election took place, four thorough Free Traders would be returned for the city by a very large majority. (Loud cheers.)

Dr. BOWRING, M.P., in seconding the resolution, said he was delighted to find that the work of conversion was going on in that meeting. Only three individuals had courage to hold up their hands against the first resolution; two only had signified their dissent from the third; and he believed that no person would venture to oppose the resolution now before the meeting. (Hear, hear.) The city of London had to-day done its duty most nobly and honourably; and the object of the present resolution was to call upon those who professed to be their representatives to do their duty also. (Cheers.) He (Dr. Bowring) had been much gratified in witnessing the progress of this great cause. When his hon. friend (Mr. Cobden) first came forward, in a most disinterested and self-sacrificing spirit, to organise that body whose efforts had produced a visible effect in every part of the kingdom, he (Dr. Bowring) little anticipated that, in the city of London, his proposals would ever have been received with such perfect unanimity, or that the inhabitants of this metropolis would have declared, as with one voice, their conviction that the period had arrived when the corn laws must be repealed at once and for ever. (Loud cheering.) Why, who had they to convince of the necessity of repealing the corn law? From the Premier himself down to Punch, every body was with them. (Laughter.) The Premier had shown his adherence to their views by deserting his friends (a laugh); and they had now the satisfaction of knowing that no ministry could long exist whose name and reputation were not associated with the total overthrow of the corn law. (Cheers.) His hon. friend, Mr. Cobden, had alluded to the formation of a new Ministry. He, Dr. Bowring, believed that public opinion would not be satisfied unless a portfolio were offered to that hon. gentleman. (Loud cheering.) He should be made President of the Board of Trade. (Continued cheering.) He was the man to hold out the hand of peace and friendship to all other nations; to teach mankind generally, as he had taught his countrymen, that their interests was to maintain peace, to unshackle commerce, and to extend trade; and to give a new tone and character to the legislation of the kingdom. (Hear, and cheers.) Those whom he (Dr. Bowring) was now addressing, electors of this mighty empire, in whose hands the real power of government was vested, had a right to require, and should require, that their views and opinions should be fairly represented in the Legislature; and he trusted that Parliament, concurring in the views of the people, would adopt this motto, which would be echoed not only throughout England, but throughout the world—"Free trade; the overthrow of monopoly." Free trade for ever." (Great cheering.)

The resolution was then carried, with loud cheers.

Mr. PATTISON, M.P., said the letter which had been read from his noble colleague, Lord J. Russell, afforded a most satisfactory excuse for his absence from their meeting to day. (Hear, hear.) Why his other two colleagues were not here was best known to themselves. (A laugh.) He was not responsible for their acts. (Renewed laughter.) He could only say, that he (Mr. Pattison) trusted he required no instructions from his constituents as to his conduct on this question. (Hear, and cheers.) Since he had the honour of a seat in Parliament he had uniformly supported Mr. Villiers' annual motion for an inquiry on the subject of the Corn Laws. When he (Mr. Pattison) came forward recently, in consequence of the death of his friend, Sir M. Wood, as a candidate for the honour of representing them in Parliament, they were told that he had joined the Anti Corn-Law League. He took that step at a time when he did not contemplate the probability of becoming a candidate for their suffrages; and he gave in his adhesion to the League because he honestly believed the objects it proposed to accomplish would promote the best interests of the country. (Cheers.) They were now placed in a most singular position. Since 1841 the country had been ruled by one of the most powerful Governments that ever presided over the destinies of a nation. They had had fair weather up to a very recent period; but the moment a cloud appeared in the horizon they at once deserted their posts. (Hear, hear.) He would say, "Shame upon them." (Cheers.) And he really felt disgusted at the conduct of men who displayed such a lamentable lack of courage. They had, at present, no government; although it was reported that his noble colleague (Lord J. Russell) had been called to undertake the direction of public affairs. He could only say that if the noble lord did accept office, he (Mr. Pattison) would, to the utmost of his ability, assist him in carrying that great measure to which he had declared his adherence. (Cheers.) They might rest assured that if Lord J. Russell and his Government were supported by the people, no resistance on the part of royal and illustrious dukes, or of Essex and Buckinghamshire farmers, could prevent the repeal of the Corn Laws. (Loud cheers.) Even the Duke of Wellington, with 100 proxies in his pocket, would be utterly powerless before them. The hon. gentleman, after reiterating the assurance of his readiness at all times to support the repeal of the Corn Laws, concluded by proposing three cheers for Lord John Russell—a call that was cordially responded to by the meeting.

Mr. WANSEY, in proposing a vote of thanks to the Lord Mayor, expressed his satisfaction at the feeling manifested in favour of a repeal of the Corn Laws by one of the most numerous attended common halls he had witnessed for 30 years. (Hear.) The Lord Mayor had entitled himself to their thanks by calling this hall, in compliance with their request, and thus disregarding his private and individual opinions in the discharge of his public duties. He moved, "That the cordial thanks of this meeting be given to the Right Hon. the Lord Mayor for his kindness in calling this meeting, and for his ability and impartiality in presiding." (Cheers.)

Mr. DILLON, in seconding the resolution, eulogised the Lord Mayor, whose conduct, in convening this meeting, had been most manly and honourable.

The Lord Mayor briefly returned thanks, expressing his determination not to allow any party or private feeling to interfere with the discharge of his public duties. (Cheers.)

The meeting then separated.

GREAT OPEN AIR DEMONSTRATION IN THE WEST RIDING OF YORKSHIRE.

This most important meeting took place on Wednesday, before the Court-house at Wakefield, and whether considered as an enormous numerical gathering, or a most decided demonstration of one of the most important counties of England, it was of the most gratifying description. The time of the year was somewhat unfavourable to out-door meetings, but of course it was utterly impossible to find a building spacious enough to accommodate one tithe of the vast assemblage which gathered from all parts to Wakefield. A hustings was accordingly erected before the Court-house, and the large open space before it, as well as the street which stretches away opposite, were crowded long before the commencement of proceedings by a vast throng of people. It was a true Free Trade Monster Meeting, and by far the greatest which has been held at Wakefield since the days of the Reform Bill.

Upon the platform we observed, among hundreds of other influential gentlemen—Sir W. Cook, high sheriff; Lord Stourton, Mr. C. Wood, M.P., W. Aldham, M.P., Mr. Prothero, M.P., Mr. Busfield, M.P., Mr. J. Parker, M.P., Mr. Wrightson, M.P., Messrs. T. Starkie, Huddersfield; J. Marshall, Robert Bentley, Rotherham; T. Bengier, W. Fisher, Edward Smith, Sheffield; Thomas Dunn, the Mayor of Sheffield; T. W. Tottie, Leeds; W. Rand, Bradford; Fred. Shwann, Huddersfield; John Sutcliffe, Huddersfield; Jonathan Ackroyd, Halifax; Rawdon Briggs, H. Stansfeld, and—Lupton, Leeds; R. Milligan, Bradford.

The HIGH SHERIFF presided, and formally opened the business of the meeting by reading the requisition which had been addressed to him, with the advertisement calling the public meeting in pursuance of it. He urged upon the meeting the necessity of giving a fair hearing to all who addressed them—a necessity all the more urgent when they reflected upon the vital importance of the occasion which had drawn them together. (Cheers.)

Mr. FAUKES, of Farnley Hall, one of the most extensive landed proprietors of the county, then addressed the meeting. Before entering upon the business of the meeting I would express my great satisfaction in seeing before me so splendid a proof that the West Riding of Yorkshire has shaken off that four years subservience to an anti-national policy, has risen at last to a right understanding of its mighty interests, and has determined to stand forth in defence of the poor man's cause, and the rights of industry and trade, as in other days it struggled for the civil and religious liberties of the country. (Loud cheers.) But though the front we here assemble be a very good beginning—the acorn to the oak of your resolves—even such a demonstration as this cannot be the "be all and the end all" of your exertions in the cause you advocate. (Hear, hear, and cheers.) What the effects of this Corn Law have been upon trade and manufacturers I leave to others who have felt them, I fear too bitterly; but as to the influence which this law has had on agriculture, I, as a farmer, as a country squire, and as the president of an agricultural society, may be supposed to be able to form some opinion (cheers); and I do not think it fair to take as a criterion such a district as that I live in—a district bordering upon a manufacturing one; and one, too, in which any blow struck to trade is always felt immediately and acutely; but I have lived for two years in a purely agricultural country in the south of England; and I have observed the results of protection there; I have seen there the protected labourer, I have seen what is his condition. I have seen protected land, I know what is its condition. (Hear.) I declare to you that I never saw labourers or land in a more wretched or destitute plight than they are in Devonshire, part of Gloucestershire, the Isle of Wight, much of Devonshire and of Somersetshire. (Hear.) No doubt it is true that agriculture and agriculturists will undergo a great change when protection is taken from them; but what sort of change? (Hear.) When the bread tax ceases, the agriculturist can no longer afford to persist in those slothful, slovenly, wasteful habits, which are the bane of agriculture. (Cheers.) In their pasture lands they will no longer be able to afford to let the lands grow rushes instead of grass (cheers), in their arable lands more weeds than corn. They will not be able to afford to allow their teams to be obstructed, instead of expedited, by a perfectly unnecessary number of horses. They cannot afford, as they can and do now, to allow the essential part of the manure to run to waste, or serve no other purpose than to impede the free current of a farm's drainage. (Cheers.) They will be no longer able to afford to the population which they now rear that leisure which leads to vice, and that neglect which promotes retaliation, but to keep pace with the growth of a population, however scattered, always increasing. The agriculturists will have to divert their now unproductive contributions to the workhouse into the more remunerating channels of adequate wages for skilful work. (Loud cheers.) Now, with these feelings deeply impressed—with these sentiments I ask no more than this, that you will not stand stupidly gazing at each other, and contenting yourselves with inquiring how it is that an intelligent people are not governed by the dictates of what has been pronounced on the highest authority common sense—why the first commercial people of the world are not to be admitted to that privilege which ought to be common to all, of buying in the cheapest market and selling in the dearest?—or why a superior and civilised race of people are not to be permitted the exercise of that degree of forethought granted by nature to the meanest insect under our feet that instinct which prompts them in the time of plenty to lay up a supply against the time of scarcity? (Loud cheers.) This reminds me, gentlemen, that I have a resolution to propose, and after reading it I shall only have a few more words to say to you. It is to the following effect: "That the present alarming condition of the people, from a defective harvest and the calamitous loss of potatoes, especially in Ireland, the high price of corn of a good quality, the difficulty of obtaining a supply from abroad, arising not only from the dearth that prevails in some countries of Europe, but also from the operation of the sliding scale of duties, by which the inferior quality of the new wheat, depressing the legal average price, becomes the means of increasing the restrictions on the importation of foreign corn; and the severe distress which must be thus entailed on the labouring classes, demand the earnest and early attention of the legislature." Now, gentlemen, we owe, I think, our sanction to this resolution as a duty to our Sovereign. We owe it also to one who, at the hour of his country's need, has made more sacrifices than any other statesman of modern times. (Cheers.) This resolution will also furnish Sir Robert Peel and those who acted so nobly with him, the fullest apology for the inconsistency in which his public spirited conduct must inevitably involve him, and will also enable him to lay the credit of a perfect concession to public opinion, by the total, immediate, and unconditional abandonment of the Corn Laws, to his having been taught by a Power which no mortal can withstand, that these laws are too vicious in character, and too mischievous in tendency for any statesman, however powerful in Parliament, or influential without, to venture with credit to himself, or safety to the country, any longer to support. (Loud cheers for some time.)

JAMES MARSHALL, Esq., of Leeds, came forward amid loud cheers to second the resolution. Let us weigh well the motives that urge us to exertion. You are on the one hand threatened with scarcity and famine; on the other hand, if we exert ourselves, we have the prospect of securing now and for ever the triumph of the freedom of industry. (Hear.) We are threatened, I say, with scarcity and famine. Let us weigh for a moment the miseries conveyed by these words. We are not speaking of the awful dispensation of pestilence, or of the scourge of war, or of civil war, the most cruel part of that curse (as the Duke of Wellington has told us.) It is now high time that the people of England should tell that duke and those who support him in the hard denial of our claims, that not pestilence, nor war, nor civil war, in all its horrors, creates more wide-spread and heart-sickening misery than the slow death of long years of scarcity and famine. (Loud and continued cheering.) Let us welcome with all due honour the accession to the cause of Free Trade of the experienced and leading statesmen of the Liberal and Conservative party. It is to the mighty power of truth so nobly and ably advocated by Mr. Cobden and his associates (loud and vehement cheering)—it is to the complete understanding of this great question which these gentlemen have effected, that we are indebted for such an accession to our numbers. But a great work yet remains for us to do. Our opponents, though their dual wisdom does not shine very brightly (a laugh), are a vast and heavy body. That vast and heavy body must be moved, and their position overcome by the instantaneous, vigorous, and determined expression of the will of the people of this country—that they will be no longer satisfied either with a sliding scale or a fixed duty (Cries of Yes.) That result is your undeniable birth-right, and that you must have. We have, on the one hand, to urge us to instant exertion, motives as strong as life and death. Let us turn to another and a pleasanter side of the picture. We ask for Free Trade, especially in bread, the staff of life. We ask that there should be no shackles on industry, and that the whole land should be filled with an abundance of food. (Cheers.) If you would address a man starving with hunger on the national happiness and individual improvement, you would but add insult to his misery. But give him cheap food in exchange for his labour, and immediately his surplus fund will be exchanged for other things. We shall see how, step by step, he will proceed to ascend in society's scale. First, he will cover himself and family with warm and comfortable clothing, and thus give comfort and employment to those who make that clothing. Next, he will leave that cold cellar in which he has been living, for a clean cottage, its clock behind the door, its crockery on the shelves, and, best of all, the Bible on the table. He would be in a position to send his children to school, and he himself able to join a friendly society or mechanics' institute. He will improve and cultivate his mind and house, and feel himself a man. (Cheers.) He will then, most probably, aspire to become the owner of the freehold of his cottage, and enroll himself a full citizen of a free and powerful state. (Cheers.) Is that, then, an exaggerated picture? Have we any such men? Yes, thousands. Without them what would England be? They are the very life-blood of the community. And why should the natural course of God's providence, intended plainly for the reward of the industry of man, be cruelly interfered with? We have been told that one of the consequences of Free Trade in this, the richest, one of the most populous and industrious countries in the world, and to which every foreign supply of corn must be brought, at a distance of thousands of miles, and at a great expense, will be to make food here too cheap. We are told sometimes of Poland. God help the blundering brains of the bewildered men who talk thus. (Hear, hear, and laughter.) If we go to Poland, let us see if that country, like ours, is filled with the most industrious and skilful workmen. Let us see if it is covered with railways and canals, and that every sea that surrounds it is covered with ships; that that country is, in fact, one great hive of industry. Let them say this, and then draw their logical conclusion between this country and Poland. (Cheers.) I say the attempt to interfere in the great social arrangement of God's providence, by which the surplus of one country and one year is intended as the natural guarantee against famine in every country and in every year—I say the attempt to interfere in these matters, is an impious folly, as great as though we should attempt to regulate the seasons at our pleasure, and command, at our will, the sun to shine, or the rain to fall over the earth. (Cheers.) Let us, then, all unite, and devote heart and hand to the settling of this last great struggle. Let us approach it after the manner of Englishmen, not rashly and inconsiderately; but having well considered our cause, and measured the difficulty we have to encounter, let us go forward with calm determination to dare and to do all that is necessary to command success. (Loud and continued cheers.)

C. WOOD, Esq., M.P., then came forward amid loud cheers. I am about to call on you to express your opinion that not the Corn Laws merely, but that all laws that tend to enhance the price of food, are impolitic. I hope the West Riding will tell whatever Government is formed that it is their opinion the Corn Laws ought to be abolished. (Cheers.)

I suppose I must give some reason for so doing, although I confess that, after what you have so often heard upon the subject, you could easily dispense with my so doing. We have been told that the principles of Free Trade are the principles of common sense; and told that, upon an authority no less than the recognised organ of the Government; and we have to look to our opponents if we require to hear what may be said in the attempt to rebut the principles of common sense. (Hear.) What can be more clear than the principle of free commercial intercourse? Suppose, for example, that the meeting now before me was divided by an imaginary line, and that upon one side of that line were stationed half the number present, that half having abundance of corn but not more than half-clothed, and the other half of the meeting in possession of a large quantity of cloth, but with an insufficient supply of corn—I believe that in such a case even the president of the Protection Society himself would not defend such a monstrous proposition as preventing an interchange of cloth and corn between the two portions of the meeting, by which the abundance of one division might be given to supply the scantiness of another. (Laughter.) You naturally laugh at the very mention of such an absurd proposition; but let me ask what is the practical difference between an imaginary line—between two portions of this meeting and a boundary caused by the sea? Will any one say that it would not be as absurd to prevent us from giving from the abundance of our manufactured goods a portion of those goods for corn to the inhabitants of those countries which produced so much corn as to afford them more than they could consume, whilst they were in great want of our manufactured goods, and desirous to obtain a supply of them? There are numbers in this country, and those numbers are increasing, who look with horror upon the consequences which war produces, and I would ask, what could be so well calculated to prevent a recurrence of the horrors of war as a perfect and unrestricted mutual intercourse amongst nations? Nothing could more directly tend to put an end to bloodshed, and all its evils, than a constant intercourse between nations (hear, hear), for there is a great difference as regards the tendency to go to war when the nation which is affected is one with which we have little to do, as compared to a nation with which we are in constant and daily intercourse. (Hear, hear.) Can it be of small importance to the labouring man that he is obliged to expend more of his wages than ordinary in the purchase of bread for his family? It might happen that his income would be so small as to render his condition the very opposite of that which was described by my friend Mr. Marshall, and that he could afford to expend a comparatively small sum, in certain particulars, by giving his children a more cheap and deficient education, or by giving them less clothing, in consequence of lower wages; and it is quite clear, that any course which obliges him to give a higher price than usual for his food, lessens his capacity to discharge with success those other duties to his family. (Hear, hear.) It is therefore of the greatest advantage to the labourer to have the price of corn low, but it is also an equal advantage to the manufacturing interest, for the home market is materially affected by the amount of money which the working men are obliged to pay for food. When the working people are obliged to expend a more than usual sum in the purchase of food, they are the less capable of purchasing clothes and other articles, and thus the demand for manufactured produce becomes less in the home market. (Hear, hear.) In consequence of this diminished demand, the manufacturers sell less of their produce—numbers of their workmen are discharged, and thus the incomes of the working people are diminished at the very time when the food of the people is most high in price. (Hear, hear.) The labourer thus receives less money when his food is dearest. We have had a prosperous period in the country for some time back, but I am afraid that we may be near a turn, and I fear that the condition of the manufacturing districts, both as regards the demands for manufactures and the condition of the labourers, is not what it was, whilst the price of wheat greatly exceeds what it was twelve months ago, by about ten or twelve shillings a quarter. It is quite clear that the labouring population of the country must suffer by the price of their food being raised so much above the price at which it was at this time last year, whilst their means of purchasing corn are so much less. (Hear, hear.) Every one who is acquainted with the condition of the country knows the state in which some of the towns in the manufacturing districts were a few years ago. (Hear, hear.) You all remember the condition in which Stockport and Paisley were at that time, in a condition in which perhaps nearly all the West Riding participated to a greater or lesser degree. (Hear, hear.) There were fearful scenes witnessed at that time (hear, hear)—scenes which I hope we shall never again witness (hear, hear), for I hope we shall not at any future period see all the evils of manufacturing distress and want of employment aggravated by an accompanying high price of food. (Hear, hear.) I am myself an agriculturist, and nothing but an agriculturist, and I believe that my interest is bound up with yours; for I feel that nothing so much increases the demand for the articles which we sell as an increase of your means of purchasing those articles. (Cheers.) But if an additional price of food were calculated to give us comforts and luxuries, and that a reduction in the price of the food of the people would diminish those comforts and luxuries, I for one, and I am sure all the gentry of England would be ashamed of maintaining any comfort or luxury by such means. (Loud cheers.) It is only persons who are altogether ignorant of the effects of the Corn Laws who could think of putting forward the argument which is founded on the assumption of separate interests; but I am glad to be able to state that we see some of the most influential men in the country coming forward to show that they hold no opinions in common on this subject with those who are thus ignorant of the effect of the Corn Laws. (Hear, hear, and cheers.)

Mr. RAND, of Bradford, seconded the resolution. He said that it was unnecessary for him to allude at any length to the intelligence, the wealth, the industry, and the influence which was represented at that meeting of the West Riding of Yorkshire. (Hear, hear.) He need not point out to them the magnitude of the commercial enterprise and skill which were displayed in that district, and which made it one of the most important portions of the United Kingdom. (Hear, hear.) In no other portion of the Queen's dominions could there be found a more intelligent, moral, and religious population than in the West Riding of Yorkshire; and the expression of their opinion from such a body of men as compose its inhabitants, must have, as it always has had, the greatest influence upon the legislation of the country. The West Riding is a district which has always been looked upon as of the greatest importance (hear, hear), a fact which was borne out by the observation of George III., that Yorkshire governed England. The unanimity which prevailed on this important subject in such a district of the West Riding must necessarily be of the greatest importance. (Cheers.) He had the pleasure of attending a meeting at Bradford on last Monday—it was a meeting convened by the proper authority, and attended by at least 2000 persons, and all of these came to an unanimous vote in favour of the abolition of the Corn Laws. (Loud cheers.) That was, in his opinion, a striking example of the influence of these principles in a town like Bradford, which was formerly the head-quarters of Conservatism. (Cheers.) He, Mr. Rand, had given much consideration to the subject, and all his experience and observation had gone to convince him that the Corn Laws were an unmitigated evil. (Hear, hear, and loud cheers.) He had not been always of that opinion; and he was willing to give credit to some of those who were their supporters and advocates of a desire to serve their country by their introduction (hear, hear); but experience had taught him that those who formed that opinion as to the effect of the Corn Laws were in error. (Hear, hear.) He would ask any country gentleman who was an advocate for these laws, why it was that he was desirous to maintain them? The answer of those who advocated the Corn Laws was, that those whose property was in land had exclusive burdens to bear; and the opponents of the Corn Laws, willing to test the accuracy of such an argument, had frequently expressed a desire for a Parliamentary committee, in order to ascertain what those exclusive burdens were; but the friends of protection would not agree to the appointment of a committee. They would not agree to such an inquiry; they shrunk from investigation. He had been told that we should be rendered by the Corn Laws independent of foreign supply; but that was an argument which would not have much weight in such a district as the West Riding of Yorkshire. (Hear, hear.) Suppose the inhabitants of the West Riding were told that they were made independent of supply from the agricultural districts of all countries, they would very soon find trade worse, and manufactures so much depressed, that they would desire to emigrate to some portion of the globe where no such law existed. It was said that the lands in England would go out of cultivation. That was an argument which had been also used with respect to wool, when five or six years ago it was proposed to reduce the duty on foreign wool from 6d. to 1d. It was then said that the wool growing in this country would cease if that law were carried into effect; but the law was carried into effect, and the wool growing of this country had increased, whilst the price of British wool had not diminished. The same argument had been used when Sir R. Peel proposed to make an alteration in the Tariff. It was prophesied that if a foreign bull were let into this country, the price of meat would fall to 4d. per lb., and the farmers were afraid lest that result should follow, but they had recovered from their fears, for the price of meat had not fallen. (Hear, hear.) Those arguments against the abolition of the law were not well founded, and they afforded no reason for maintaining a law which was most injurious in its effects on the commerce of the country, and which had the effect of making the food of the people scarce, whilst it diminished their means of obtaining it. The effect of this was obvious, for when the working people had less to expend in food, they were enabled to expend less in manufactures, and this acting as a depressing cause on the manufacturing interest, less work people would be employed by the manufacturers. It was a painful course for the manufacturers to adopt to discharge workmen when the demand for their produce became less; but they had no other course left at such periods of distress, in order to establish the proper proportion between supply and demand. The effect of a deficient supply of food was clear and palpable upon the state of the country—it was a cause which affected every man, woman, and child in the country—it was a cause, the operation of which could be distinctly traced upon the condition of the industry and commerce of the country; and from all their experience the deduction was clear that abundance produced prosperity, and that whatever law interfered with abundance interfered with prosperity. (Cheers.) He did not dwell on the responsibility of those who refused to accede to this measure of justice and humanity; but this he would say, that the man who stood between a people's famine and that people's food, stood in a situation which he did not think that any who there heard him would envy. (Hear, hear, and loud cheers.) Let the upholders of this iniquitous law declare that it should stand—an authority greater than theirs had decreed that it should fall (loud cheers)—an authority to which all others must consent to submit—the authority of public opinion. (Loud cheers.) No institution and no order could exist one moment after its continuance had ceased to coincide with public opinion. (Cheers.) Let those who opposed the demolition of the bread tax think of that. They had a great work before them to accomplish (hear, hear), but he had not the slightest fear for the result. (Cheers.) He had no doubt but that freedom of trade was destined to wave her banner over the grave of monopoly. (Loud cheers.) Now, in the engaging in this great work which lay before them, they were called upon to undertake and conscientiously to fulfil very grave and very solemn duties, and one of those duties was the total abandonment of all party spirit. (Hear, hear.) Without that they would do nothing; but with that aid which the blessing of a free press and free institutions conferred upon them, there was nothing which the people of England could not achieve, supposing it to be based upon the principles of justice and truth. (Cheers.) To give them a proof that he was willing to lay aside all party spirit, all party claims, he would have to tell them but one fact. Where he resided, and where he employed more than two thousand hands, he had always been regarded, and certainly he had always been what was termed a Conservative—an appellation the exact meaning of which by the way, he did not pretend to understand. (Loud laughter and cheering.) Well, there was a noble lord connected with the county of York—a noble lord who was an honour to the county, and to his order, and his country (hear, hear); a noble lord who had announced himself a total repealer—he meant Lord Morpeth. (Tremendous cheering.) He was glad to hear the heartiness of that greeting. Well, should Lord Morpeth, whose politics were known to them all, again stand for the West Riding, as he hoped, he would, he would support him, and not only support him by his individual vote, but canvass to obtain others. (Long continued cheering.) The honourable gentleman concluded by seconding the resolution.

The HIGH SHERIFF then put it, and it was carried amid deafening cheering, without a dissentient voice or hand.

The weather, which had been cold and cloudy all the morning, became still worse at this stage of the proceedings; rain began to fall, and the inclemency of the afternoon produced its natural effect of, in a considerable degree, shortening the latter part of the business. Notwithstanding the rain, however, few or none of the crowd left the place of meeting.

Mr. WRIGHTSON, M.P., for Northallerton, then proceeded to move the next resolution. The country had, in his opinion, too long suffered from an unjust and impolitic Corn Law, while the system of tampering with the food of the people had been carried to a most extravagant length. The constant tinkering of the means whereby they got their bread was not only most injurious and most iniquitous, but it was also certainly ridiculous. (Hear, and cheers.) During the time allotted for man's life—during the last three score and ten years, they had suffered under no less than seven systems—distinct systems of corn duties. (Hear, hear.) Of these there was but one which had any worth, and it was a system which happened to be connected with that country. The first of the seven having been brought in and laid on the table of the house by Sir George Saville, then the member for Yorkshire. The honourable gentleman then entered into an elaborate history of the Corn Laws, comparing Sir George Saville's law with the present system, demonstrating the defects of the latter, under which it was our misfortune, or, as he would prefer saying, our fault, to live. Under the enactment of 1815, the corn trade was no trade, but to all intents and purposes a gambling speculation, just as much as was a race at Newmarket, or a throw with the dice in one of the hells of St. James's-street. (Cheers.) But if the business of the merchant was impeded in this way, what must be the condition of those workmen who laboured for the manufacturer who supplied the merchant? With the exception of the workman for the foreign trade, all of them must suffer. (Hear, hear.) The truth of it was, that it was not the ministers of state who were to blame for this condition of matters—it was that power behind Government which controlled Government itself. (Hear.) Both Pitt and Lord Grenville would have restored things to their proper state if they could. Canning attempted it, but failed. Huskisson did all he could, standing up before the monopolists and telling them to their faces that, between 1815 and 1826, they had shut their ears and their eyes to the distresses of their fellow-countrymen. (Hear.) Then, four years ago, Lord J. Russell wished to have given us a Free Trade, subject only to a duty which, whatever might have been its disadvantages, would have made that a trade, and a steady trade, which was only gambling before, and was likewise only gambling now—and finally it was only the other day that the strong Government of Sir R. Peel was broken up in consequence of his liberal views on the question. (Cheers.) Now, under these circumstances, and an enlarged review of the whole case, he would ask any conscientious advocate of the Corn Laws how it was they did not see that a large importation of foreign grain would take place and be paid for by the industry of the people, without interfering in the slightest degree with the culture of the soil. (Hear.) The resolution which he would propose was, "That the demands of the population, and the growing severity of the times, rendered the repeal of the Corn Laws essential to the interests, if not to the peace and safety of the kingdom."

Mr. BLEATHAM seconded the resolution. He was not going into any argument on the Corn Laws. But when he reflected on the degree of protection which some agriculturists demanded, he could not help thinking that they were like antiquated nursery-maids, who continued their attentions to their young master long after he was old enough to take care of himself. (Hear, and laughter.) He asked that assembly whether agriculture was not old enough to take care of itself? (Cries of "Yes, yes.") Their opponents maintained it was but in its infancy; and the old lady who had charge of it had great apprehensions that some Blue Beard from the Dardanelles, or Brother Jonathan from the United States should kidnap her darling. (Laughter.) There was another young gentleman, the twin brother to agriculture, who was the cause of the greatest uneasiness to his guardian. It was commerce, who said that he was able to take care of himself—"Oh!" sighed the old lady, who would restrain his spirit, "he is so enterprising that he wishes to cross every sea in his boat: he will buy corn from the red man, the black man, or the yellow man; and I fear if he once sets out we shall never see him again; but what he is most particular about are his meals, and the quantity and quality of his food—a thing the more to be wondered at, as he knows that I can only afford him the produce of his brother's kitchen garden." (Renewed laughter.) If there were not great evils attending the system we could not treat the arguments in defence of it with common gravity. Of all times the present was the best to do away with this law. The scarcity abroad and at home, and the threatened famine in Ireland; the voice of the great workshops in this country, cried aloud for the abolition of the Corn Laws. (Loud cheers.)

Mr. W. MILNER said he had a resolution to propose, the effect of which was that they should pray her Majesty to advise the free importation of corn. The failure of the potato crop, and the insufficient yield of wheat, produced a state of things which called forcibly on the manufacturing and agricultural interests to come forward and exert themselves to afford timely supplies to those who might otherwise starve in thousands. It was a boon which the people deserved, and which would be peculiarly acceptable to them at this crisis. Mr. Milner concluded by proposing a resolution to the effect, that the meeting had the fullest confidence in her Majesty's desire to secure the welfare of her subjects, and praying her Majesty to call Parliament together speedily, and direct its attention to the total and immediate removal of all restrictions on the importation of foreign corn, and that in the meantime her Majesty might be graciously pleased to direct that measures should be taken to secure an adequate supply of food for the people of the United Kingdom.

Mr. DUNN, of Sheffield, seconded the resolution, which was passed unanimously.

A vote of thanks was then passed to the High Sheriff, after which the meeting separated.

KENDAL.

A meeting of the Council was held on Tuesday last. Present—The Mayor, Cornelius Nicolson, Esq.; Aldermen Bindloss, Machell, Whinery; Councillors C. L. Braithwaite, Busher, Compston, I. Edmonston, John Fisher, jun., Harrison, Jackson, Mashiter, Parker, Raine, Scott, J. Thompson, jun., and John Wilson, Town View. The Mayor in opening the proceedings read a memorial praying for the opening of the ports, and the abolition of the Corn Laws.—The memorial was adopted amid loud cheers.

PONTEFRAC.

A memorial is at present in course of signature by the inhabitants of Pontefract, to Sir Robert Peel, expressive of their opinion that Parliament should be called together at the earliest possible period, and that some effectual measures ought immediately to be adopted for the purpose of securing the population of this country against the evils of a deficient supply of food.

KEIGHLEY.

A public meeting was held in the hall of the Mechanics' Institution, on Tuesday evening last, at which a memorial was adopted to the Right Honourable Sir Robert Peel, Bart. M.P., praying her Majesty's Ministers immediately to assemble Parliament, that legislative measures may be passed for the abolition of all monopolies. The hall of the institution was crowded to its very utmost powers of accommodation, and many manufacturers and gentlemen of influence were upon the platform or attended the meeting, amongst whom were Samuel B. Clapham, Esq., of Airworth House; John Butterfield and Frederick Butterfield, Esqrs.; William Lund Esq.; T. B. Laycock, Esq.; J. Briggs, Esq., of Guard House; J. Town, Esq., of Mansion House; and many others. John Town, Esq., took the chair, and after a few pertinent remarks on the subject which called the vast assemblage together, spirit-stirring addresses on the evils of the protective system were made. After the adoption of the memorial, and a vote of thanks to the chairman had been carried, the meeting gave three hearty cheers for Free Trade, and then separated.

OTLEY.

A public meeting was held in the Court House, Otley, on Wednesday evening, in pursuance of a requisition signed by some of the most influential inhabitants, for the purpose of considering the propriety of memorialising the Government upon the immediate and absolute necessity of advising her Majesty to issue an Order in Council for the free importation of all kinds of grain. About eight o'clock a great number of persons had assembled; and we noticed on the platform W. Ackroyd, Esq., P. Garnett, Esq., Thos. Constable, Esq., Wm. Ackroyd, Esq., having been voted to the chair, read the requisition calling the meeting, and stated that the constable probably refused to call the meeting on account of his never having known want. P. Garnett, Esq., moved the first resolution. Mr. Ferguson seconded the resolution, which, as well as the others, was carried unanimously. Mr. M'Landsbro moved the next resolution. Mr. W. Walker proposed the adoption of the memorial to Sir Robert Peel. Thomas Constable, Esq., seconded the adoption of the memorial, and stated that he would have been glad if Mr. Shaw, the constable, or any representative of the agricultural interest, had attended, to state on what grounds they relied for protection. The cordial thanks of the meeting were voted to the chairman.

PLYMOUTH.

A highly respectable and most important town meeting was held in the Guildhall, Plymouth, at noon, on Friday, pursuant to public notice, to take into consideration the present state of the nation. The news of the dissolution of the Conservative ministry—the protective ministry—having arrived in the morning papers last night, and having been confirmed by the evening papers which arrived this morning, the feelings of anxiety and of interest in the progress of repeal, and of public affairs generally, were intense. The streets were sprinkled with knots of people discussing the event. Report was rife that Sir Robert Peel had quarrelled with the Iron Duke, who had grown irascible through having had the question of the Corn Laws so much thrust upon him of late. Some talked of a coalition ministry for the purpose of carrying Free Trade; and while they deprecated such an event, they gladly welcomed the present juncture, inasmuch as it is calculated to settle the movement in a way that must be satisfactory to the Free Trader.

Among the gentlemen present who took a part at this deeply interesting crisis was our old and highly-esteemed friend and late representative, Mr. Collier, who brought with him a valuable letter from his late colleague, Viscount Ebrington was also present, as was also our excellent representative, Mr. Gill, who came down from town yesterday, by express train, to attend this meeting.

JOHN COLLIER, Esq., begged to move that the mayor be requested to take the chair.

THOMAS CATER, Esq., seconded the motion, which was received with loud cheering.

The MAYOR then introduced the business by stating that a requisition, most respectfully signed by 1010 inhabitants of the borough, had been presented to him, and he had convened the meeting as a matter of duty in compliance with that requisition. The meeting was addressed at great length in a series of most able and spirited speeches by Mr. Collier, the late representative of Plymouth; G. W. Soltan, Esq., of Efford Lodge; John Bayly, Esq.; Admiral Phillips; T. Gill, Esq., M.P.; Lord Ebrington, M.P.; Isaac Nichols, Esq.; and the Rev. W. J. Odgers. The resolutions were carried unanimously, and the meeting was a most enthusiastic one.

GLASGOW.

On Thursday night, about 8 o'clock, one of the largest and most important public meetings ever held in Glasgow took place in the City Hall, "for the purpose of considering the propriety of petitioning Parliament to repeal the Corn and Provision Laws, and memorialising Sir Robert Peel to take immediate measures for obtaining an Order in Council for opening the ports for the admission of grain and other provisions free of duty." The hall on the occasion was filled in every part, and the proceedings throughout were of the most enthusiastic and cheering description. It is supposed that there were not less than 4000 to 5000 persons present. The meeting was called by the Lord Provost, in compliance with a requisition numerously signed by respectable merchants and other inhabitants. On the hustings we observed the members for the city, Messrs. James Oswald and John Dennistoun, the Lord Provost, Bailie Anderson, Bailie Whitehead, Bailie Brodie, Bailie McKinlay, and Bailie Stewart, Professor William Thompson, of the University of Glasgow, the Rev. Dr. McFarlane, of Erskine church, &c. &c. On the committee and requisitionists making their appearance on the platform, they were greeted with loud cheering.

Mr. ALEXANDER GRAHAM in a few complimentary remarks, moved that the Lord Provost take the chair, which was carried by acclamation.

The Lord Provost opened the proceedings in an excellent speech, and was followed by the Rev. D. King, Mr. Oswald, M.P., for Glasgow, Walter Buchanan, Esq., Mr. Dennistoun, M.P., Professor Wm. Thompson, of Glasgow College, Bailie Anderson, Mr. S. Higginbotham, and Mr. John Tennant. We cannot do justice to this most important meeting by affording any adequate space for a fair report of the very able speeches that were made by the above-named gentlemen. We must content ourselves with a mere record of the facts, and with congratulating the Free Traders of Glasgow on the powerful demonstration they have made in support of the great national movement against monopoly.

REPEAL OF THE COIN LAWS.—A Borough of LAMBETH Meeting will be held at the Horns Tavern, Kennington, on Tuesday Evening, 30th December.—The Members for the Borough will attend. The Committee will meet at the Elephant and Castle on Tuesday, the 23d inst., at Seven o'clock in the evening.

J. DONKIN, C.E., } Secretaries.
J. A. LYON, }

TO PRINTERS, NEWSPAPER PROPRIETORS,
&c.—New Perfecting Machines, of from 30 in. to 56 in. Cylinders, at J. GADSBY'S, Whitefriars Printing Office, Bouverie street, Fleet-street.—MACHINING done at low charges, and in the best style. BOOK-WORK, and Railway and other Printing, expeditiously executed. All new Type.

CONTRIBUTIONS TO THE LEAGUE FUND.

Subscriptions received during the week ending Wednesday, Dec. 10, 1845.

N.B.—As the Subscription List is made up from Wednesday to Wednesday, contributions received on Thursdays and Fridays are not published in the LEAGUE of the Saturday immediately succeeding, but are included in the list of the week following.

Neild, William, Manchester	£100 0 0
Price, David, Union Club, Manchester, and Reform Club, London	10 10 0
*Robinson, George, Cannon-street, Manchester	2 2 0
*Atherton, Edward, Newall's-buildings, ditto	2 0 0
Owen, Miss, Breminning, Chesterfield	2 0 0
*Bass, Abraham, Burton-on-Trent	2 0 0
*Thomas, D., draper, Oswestry	2 0 0
*Macfarlane, John F., 17, North Bridge, Edinburgh	1 1 0
*Woolley, James, 69, Market-street, Manchester	1 1 0
*McKie, John, 5, Riga-street, ditto	1 1 0
*Pate, Whitaker, Parsonage, ditto	1 1 0
*Grimshaw, Chris., Sussex-street, ditto	1 1 0
*Ryder, John, Bradford-street, ditto	1 1 0
*Miller, David, Wood-street, Greenheys, ditto	1 1 0
*Wilson, G. and R., 31, Church-street, ditto	1 1 0
*Winterbotham, A., at H. Bannerman and Sons, York-street, Manchester	1 1 0
*Ormerod, J. S., Strawberry Hill, Pondleton, Manchester	1 1 0
*Lockett, W., Richmond Hill, Salford	1 1 0
*Sugden, Robert, 6, Broad-street, Manchester	1 1 0
*Townley, John, ditto	1 1 0
*Hunley, Wm., 434, Oldham-road, ditto	1 1 0
*Aspell, Robert, 432, ditto	1 1 0
*Winstanley, D., Argyle street, ditto	1 1 0
*Woodcock, Mrs., 61, Duke-street, Hulme, ditto	1 1 0
*Lawson, John, 70, King-street, ditto	1 1 0
*Davenport, H., 17, Welcomb-st., Hulme, ditto	1 1 0
*Bowker, Joseph, 3, Bailey's-court, ditto	1 1 0
*Duncan, R., 4, St. John's-place, Broughton, ditto	1 1 0
*Rigby, Thos., 33, North-street, Cheetham, ditto	1 1 0
*Bryden, J., 10, Byrom-street, ditto	1 1 0
*Lord, R., 58, Walmer-street, Hulme, ditto	1 1 0
*Jones, John, 43, Dale-street, ditto	1 1 0
*Mavor, R., 34, Booth-street, Mosley-street, ditto	1 1 0
*Dalrymple, P., 23, Dale-street, ditto	1 1 0
*Barrow, Corbyn, 1, Hill Side, Lancaster	1 1 0
*Jones, George, John's Town, Ystrad, Carmarthen	1 1 0
*Booth, Thomas, Rochdale	1 1 0
*Acton, William, Wigan	1 1 0
*Waddington, Robert, Black Horse, ditto	1 1 0
*Wall, Thomas, bookseller, ditto	1 1 0
*Straker, George, West-street, Gateshead	1 1 0
*Sharp, Isaac, Darlington	1 1 0
*Woodfenden, Thomas, Royston, near Oldham	1 1 0
"Penny Tribute" to Free Trade by Workmen at London near Swansea	0 10 0
Lee, Thomas, Chobwell, near Manchester	0 5 0
Gray, Wm., 39, Gray street, Ancoats, ditto	2 6 0
*Bell, Joseph W., 72, Bootle-lane	1 1 0
*Roberts, Jonathan, 8, Mill-street	1 1 0
*Nicholson, Mary J., 153, Richmond-rd	1 1 0
*W. A. H.	1 1 0
*McCrum, John, 70, Bootle-lane	1 1 0
"For the interment of the Corn Laws"	1 1 0
*Stanfield, Abraham Robert, Great Crosby, near	1 1 0
*J. H.	1 1 0
*Hutchinson, Henry, 13, Summer Gardens, Kirkdale	1 1 0
Breyer, L. F., 36, Spikefield Cottages, Wavertree-road	1 1 0
Gladstone, Ebenezer, 67, Islington	1 1 0
*Ekins, Admiral Sir Charles, 69, Cadogan-place	50 0 0
*Moses, Isaac, 154, Minories	5 0 0
*Ellis, Wm., Champion Hill	5 0 0
Bertram and Harvey, Holborn Hill	5 0 0
A Free Trader	2 2 0
*Gardner, H. W. & P., St. John's-street, Clerkenwell	2 2 0
*Young, J. Col., Ailsa Villas, Twickenham	2 0 0
*Wood, Samuel, 8, Hamilton-place, Brixton-road	1 1 0
*Mitchell, Richard, 94, Oxford-street	1 1 0
*Harrison, R. Tarrent, 2, Pump-court, Temple	1 1 0
*Tweedale, R. L., 56, Wood-street	1 1 0
Smith, Samuel, 1, High Holborn	1 1 0
*Lauder, R. S., 35, Upper Charlotte-street, Fitzroy-sq.	1 1 0
*Ferguson Daniel, 21, Giltspur-street	1 1 0
Johnstone, J. C., Bolton-street	1 1 0
Browne, Edmund, 157, New Bond-street	1 1 0
Fotherby, Charles, 54, Poland-street, Oxford-street	1 1 0
*Fooks, Henry Marshall, 3, Staple Inn, Holborn	1 1 0
*Swinstead, Charles, 15, Ludgate-hill	1 1 0
*Holmes, Wm., Alton	1 1 0
*Taylor, W. G., 11, Brunswick-street, Leamington	1 1 0
*Reed, Nicholas C., Fawcett-street, Sunderland	1 1 0
*Walker, James Robertson, Gilgarrow, Whitehaven	1 1 0
*Eaglesham, R. & S., Paisley	1 1 0
Fordham, Richard, East Peckham, Kent	1 1 0
*Hymers, James, Gateshead	1 1 0
*Cundell, J., Shalbourne, Hungerford	1 1 0
*Thicknesse, Mr., Beech Hill, Wigan	1 1 0
*Peavey, James, Fisherton, Salisbury	1 1 0
*Rice, Wm., Newport, Isle of Wight	1 1 0
*Armistead, E., Rectory, near Huddersfield	1 1 0
*Bram, Thomas, Park-lane, Leeds	1 1 0
*Black, Thomas, Ford Forge, near Coldstream	1 1 0
*Whyte, Mrs. Isabella, Holy Island	1 1 0
*Gatchell, Henry, Waterford	1 1 0
*Criswell, Henry, Huddersfield	1 1 0
*Scorer, John, Norfolk-street, Sunderland	1 1 0
*Johnston, Joseph, Gomersal, near Leeds	1 1 0
*Worsell, Thomas, 88, London-road, Brighton	1 1 0
*Farnell, R. W., Salisbury	1 1 0
*Coleman, John, Manor Farm, Effingham, Surrey	1 1 0
*Coleman, George, ditto ditto	1 1 0
*Harbord, John, 126, Bunhill-row	1 1 0
*Amies, Edward, 57, New Church-street, Paddington	1 1 0
*Haigh, John, 29, Park-place, Mile End-road	1 1 0
*Stone, Mr., 20, Chiswell-street, Finsbury	1 1 0
*Barron, W., 56, Aldermansbury, per James Pike	1 1 0
*Everett, Ebenezer, Lamb-ale, Bermondsey	1 1 0
*Brettell, Thomas, 25, Rupert-street, Haymarket	1 1 0
*Cooper, Francis, 17, Clapton-square, Hackney	1 1 0
*Wild, R., 15, Houndsditch	1 1 0
*Snow, W. E., Tredgar-square, Mile End	1 1 0
*Perival, Joseph, Green-street, Blackfriars-road	1 1 0
*Noble, Frederick, 8, Ouslow-place, Brompton	1 1 0

*Hutchinson, Henry Arthur, jun., 19, Little Pulteney-street, Golden-square	1 0 0
*Dowling, Thomas, 24, Pantton-street, Haymarket	1 0 0
*Runtz, John, 3, Dalston-road, Kingsland	1 0 0
*Bowman, David, 118, Wardour-street, Soho	1 0 0
*Ridge, George, 17, Wharton-street, Lloyd-square	1 0 0
*Johnson, Henry Wm., Green-terrace, Gloucester-street, Clerkenwell	1 0 0
*Smith, W., 113, Fleet-street	1 0 0
*Robertson, John, 115, Piccadilly	1 0 0
Folkard, A. L., 1, Upton-place, Commercial-road East	1 0 0
Newman, Charles, City Arms, Mill Wall, Poplar	1 0 0
Edgar, John, Stone House, Forrest-row, Dalston	1 0 0
*Beale, W. E., 12, Bolingbroke-row, Walworth	1 0 0
*Seamer, Mr., 5, Milk-st., Cheap-side	1 1 0
*Clarke, Mr. Claremont Cottage, Stoke Newington	1 0 0
*Dalton, J. ditto	1 0 0
*Drake, Mr., Down Cottage, Rectory-road, Shacklewell	1 0 0
*Rathbone, Wm., Kingsland	1 0 0
*Battley, J., ditto	1 0 0
*Crossley, Mr. Kingsland Green	1 0 0
*Sutton, G., Dalston	1 0 0
*Matson, J., Matson-terrace, Kingsland-road, West Hackney	1 0 0
*Wilden, Charles, 35, Cumming-street, Pentonville	1 0 0
*Dunn, G., Robinson-row, Kingsland	1 0 0
*Poulton, C., Shacklewell-lane	1 0 0
Engishish, Mr., Stoke Newington	0 5 0
Hughes, W. N., 4, Castle-street, Falcon-square	0 5 0
Hammon, James, 9, Northampton-square	0 5 0
Lickfold, W. E., 13, Fox-lane, Shadwell	0 2 6
Banbury, T. S., 35, Union-street, Somers Town	0 2 6
Miller, J., 49, Whittebury-street, Euston-square	0 2 6
Mingles, J., 20, Great Wild-street, Lincoln's Inn	0 2 6
Dunain, James, 32, Ashley Crescent, City Road	0 2 6
Sands, James, 3, Ratcliffe-terrace, Goswell-road	0 2 6
Johnson, Charles, 4, Palace-row, New-road	0 2 6
A Friend	0 2 6
Dennis, Wm., King's-road, Chelsea	0 2 6
*Dickinson, James	1 0 0
*Priestley, Edmund	1 0 0
*Wilde, James, Winding-road	1 0 0
*Morton, E. J.	1 0 0
*Marshall, H., Claypath	1 0 0
*Hutchinson, Wm., 78, Sailer-street	1 0 0
*Holmes, Joseph, Elvet Bridge	1 0 0
*Bardon, George, Claypath	1 0 0
*Blivh, Henry	2 0 0
*Sharp, John	1 0 0
*Patterson, James, of Haddon and Patterson	1 0 0
*Haddon, John, ditto	1 0 0
*Dunne, John, St. Andrew-street	1 0 0
*Moir, John, ditto	1 0 0
*Molwo, Herman, ditto	1 0 0
*Watson, Peter, ditto	1 0 0
*Guthrie, James, ditto	1 0 0
*Todd, James, Seagate-street	1 0 0
*Tweedale, Jacob, Henly Hall	1 1 0
*Tweedale, John, ditto	1 1 0
*Sharp, James, Griffin Inn	1 0 0
*Hyland, C., West-street	1 0 0
*Kelsall, Robert, Town Meadows	1 0 0

Subscriptions received during the week ending Wednesday, Dec. 17, 1845.

Nelson, Knowles & Co., George street, Manchester	£ 50 0 0
*Oldham, G., 40 Bridge street, Sutton, Macclesfield	1 1 0
*Douglas, John, 14, Bedford Street, Glasgow	1 1 0
Lloyd, Roberts, Carmarvon	1 1 0
*Peacock, Michael, 3, St. Mary's Gate, Manchester	1 1 0
*Knowles, R., 7, Princes st., Market st., ditto	1 1 0
*Knowles, Thomas, ditto ditto	1 1 0
*Woodfall, John, Arkwick Green	1 1 0
*Dutton, John E., Clivetham	1 1 0
*Bird, Thomas, Dransgate	1 1 0
*Marshall, John, Downgate street	1 1 0
*Taylor, James, 86, Union street, Ardwick	1 1 0
*Mills, John, 151, Rochdale Road	1 1 0
*Samuel, J. & W., 14, Byrom-street, Liverpool	1 1 0
*Bond, N. C., Richmond Grove, Forton	1 1 0
*Estlin, T. R., 189, Great Howard-street	1 1 0
*Lloyd, T., 8, Chester-st., Toxteth Park	1 1 0
*McGeorge, Wm., 70, Lime-street	1 1 0
*Williams, Owen, 32, Plumbe-street	1 1 0
*Hughes, Joseph, 18, Gill-street	1 1 0
*Macintyre, L. H., 26, South John-street	1 1 0
*Gordon, John, 22, Water street	1 1 0
*Horsfall, James, Clifton Park, Birkenhead, Cheshire	1 1 0
*Ashworth, Thomas Poynton, Stockport	1 1 0
"A Free Trader, Fernworth, near Bolton	1 1 0
*Pickard, Matthew, 25, Broughton Road, Salford	1 1 0
*Lingard, Rev. John, D.D., Hornby, near Lancaster	1 1 0
*Metcalf, Henry, Todmorden	1 1 0
*Wild, Thomas, Roundfield Lane, ditto	1 1 0
*Stephens, S., Ebley Mills, Stroud, Gloucestershire	1 1 0
*Smith, Joseph, ditto ditto	1 1 0
*Chapman, John, ditto ditto	1 1 0
*Harris, Geo., ditto ditto	1 1 0
*Poulson, Wm., ditto ditto	1 1 0
*Simmonds, Wm., ditto ditto	1 1 0
*Fowler, Samuel, ditto ditto	1 1 0
*Latham, Joseph, ditto ditto	1 1 0
*Ranson, Richard, Standishgate, Wigan	1 1 0
*Cooke, Thomas, Market place	1 1 0
*Waddington, Wm., ditto	1 1 0
*Lea John, Chap-lane	1 1 0
*Atherton, Richard, Wallgate	1 1 0
*Pearson, Wm., Standishgate	1 1 0
*Scarf, J. W., Leeds	1 1 0
*Thistlethwaite, Chris., New Ea ley Mills, near Bolton	1 1 0
The Hand-loom Weavers in the King's Factory, Aytoun street, Glasgow, per James Russell	0 6 6
Amount of Collection at Messrs. Tunstall and Cash's Manufactory, Stroud	14 1 9
*Salway, Colonel, Guards, subscription for 1845	10 0 0
Ditto ditto for 1846	10 0 0
Morpeth, Lord	5 0 0
*Taylor, J., Buntingdale, near Market Drayton	5 0 0
*E. F. and Co.	5 0 0
*Cotton, Michael Geo., White Hart-lane, Tottenham	5 0 0
*Robinson, Thomas Maltby, 7, A. Portman-square	5 0 0
*Waterman, James, Brewery, Stoney-lane, Tooley-st.	5 0 0
*Wormum, R., 2, Camden-street, Camden Town	3 0 0
*Guthrie, Samuel, Charles-street, Westminster	2 2 0
*Darwin, Charles, 7, Park street, Grosvenor-square	2 0 0
A Subscriber from an Agricultural District	1 5 0
*Baker, T. W., 4, Roe-street, Liverpool	1 1 0
*Brook, Edward, Chatham	1 1 0
*Mayer, Joseph, Longport, Staffordshire Potteries	1 1 0
*Procter, Geo., the Hoo, Great Goddassen	1 1 0
*Rossa, Charles, B. akenny, Gloucestershire	1 1 0
*Jones, Edward, New-room, Portmadoc, N. Wales	1 1 0
*Mavillier, J. W., Leicester	1 1 0
*Gardner, John, Westbury, Wilts	1 1 0
*Wilkins, John, Hertford	1 1 0
*Salisbury, H., 13, Rook-street, Manchester	1 1 0
*Constable, Chas., Horley Mill, Crawley	1 1 0
*Crustons, Jos. ph., Henel Homsted	1 1 0
*Everest, Dr., 33, St. Ann's street, Liverpool	1 1 0
*Edwards, Mrs. Wm., 90, Aldersgate-street	1 1 0
*Cowie, Mrs., ditto	1 1 0
*Penny, Henry, 11, Old Bailey	1 1 0
*Udall, John, Winchmore Hill	1 1 0
*J. C.	1 1 0

Esdaile, Edward, City Saw Mills	1	1	0
Hayward, J., 17, Middleton-square, Pentonville	1	1	0
*Holste, Mr., 76, Besinghall-street	1	1	0
*Nyren, Henry, 70, Great George-street, Bermondsey	1	1	0
*Wratten, John, Queen's Head, Green Lane, Tottenham	1	1	0
*Diggins, Edward, 91, Wood-street	1	1	0
L. M.	1	1	0
Bradley, James, Harrow-street, Mint-street, Borough	1	1	0
*Walker, J. E., Grecian Chambers, Devereux-ct., Strand	1	1	0
*Hurry, S. W., 13, Montague-terrace, De Beauvoir Road, Kingsland	1	1	0
*Ball, John F., 53, St. Martin's-lane	1	1	0
Carr, Messrs., and Co., 10, Hatton Wall, Hatton Garden	1	1	0
Brunt, Geo., 3, Charlotte row, Pond st., Bermondsey	1	1	0
*Carpenter, H., Shad Thames Steam Mill, Dockhead	1	1	0
*Evans, John Edward, 4, Snowhill	1	1	0
*Vine, H., 48, Great Russell-street, Bloomsbury	1	1	0
*Whitell, H. W., Staple-street, Long-lane, Bermondsey	1	1	0
*Wells, John, Baker's-row, Whitechapel	1	1	0
*Paget, R. G., 49, West Smithfield, 3d subscription	1	1	0
*Ewart, Wm., Jernym-street	1	1	0
Ross, A., 28, Singleton-street, East-road, Hoxton	1	1	0
Gillies, R. M., 17, Mark-lane	1	1	0
*Wilson, Robert, 32, Bistrew-place, Poplar	1	1	0
*Greenlees, R., 24, Friday-street, Cheapside	1	1	0
*Mills, S., 25, Seymour-place, Bryanston-square	1	1	0
*Coulso, T., Mortlake, Surrey	1	1	0
*Smith, W., 5, Canton-place, East India Road	1	1	0
*Shedlock, James F., 6, Johnson-street, Westminster	1	1	0
*Cheesman, Geo., Rye Lodge, Peckham Rye	1	1	0
*Daikers, John, 13, Prospect-place, Kingsland Road	1	1	0
*Russell, Alex., 2, Newman-street, Oxford-street	1	1	0
*Maddonell, P., 9, Shoe-lane, Holborn	1	1	0
*Buckler, N. P., Cold Harbour-Lane, Camberwell	1	1	0
*Nightingale, W., 64, Wardour-street	1	1	0
*Nightingale, C., ditto	1	1	0
*Rowlands, W., 33, Smith-street, Clerkenwell	1	1	0
Rowlands, C., 146, Regent-street	1	1	0
*White, John B., Milbank-street, Westminster	1	1	0
*Jenkin, Edward, 19, Tooley-street, Borough	1	1	0
*Campart, T. and J., 16 & 17, Burlington Arcade	1	1	0
Hill, W. M., 10, Charlton place, Islington	1	1	0
*Saul, W. D., 15, Aldersgate street	1	1	0
*Saul, W. D. L., ditto	1	1	0
*Howell, W., 53, Great Windmill street, Haymarket	1	1	0
*Bright, W., 16, Bury street, St. James's	1	1	0
*Higgins, Geo. R., Royston, Herts	1	1	0
*Radford, Isaiah C., Devonport	1	1	0
*Aldridge, W., Rochester	1	1	0
*Toomer, S. E., Preston Court, Wingham, Kent	1	1	0
Thompson, T., Darlston	1	1	0
*Parker, W., chemist, ditto	1	1	0
*Taylor, R., 28, Park-place, Monkgate, York	1	1	0
*Heaton, J., Heaton-pl., Beck-road, Everton, Liverpool	1	1	0
*Gray, John, 7, Earthen Mound, Edinburgh	1	1	0
*Thursfield, John, Newcastle-under-Lyne	1	1	0
*Menly, Richard, Ide, near Exeter	1	1	0
*A Free Trader, High street, Sunderland	1	1	0
*Moore, Chas., grocer, Darlston, near Birmingham	1	1	0
*Buzaglo, F. W., Nibley House, Blakeney, Gloucester	1	1	0
*Malcolm, G. & Son, merchants, Hull	1	1	0
*Nicholson, W. F., merchant, Whitehaven	1	1	0
*Peile, Geo., ditto	1	1	0
*Watson, W., jun., 33, Bridge street, Gateshead	1	1	0
*Ramsay, John, Dundee	1	1	0
*James, S. & J., Truro	1	1	0
*Cox, W. H. Rev., St. Mary Hall, Oxford	1	1	0
*Bernard, J., Spaldwick, Huntingdonshire	1	1	0
*Hudson, W., High street, Ramsgate	1	1	0
*Dignum, Edw., Northwich	1	1	0
*Critchell, John, Yeovil, Somerset	1	1	0
*Duke, Geo., Hemingfold, Battle	1	1	0
Sharp, Thomas, farmer, near Elham, Canterbury	1	1	0
*Ashdown, Robert, 2, Albion-terrace, Horsham, Sussex	1	1	0
*Rowlands, W., jun., Wellington, New Zealand	1	1	0
*Estill, Edward, 49, Pembroke-place, Liverpool	1	1	0
*Hall, W., Rose and Crown, Chippingham	1	1	0
*Walters, Joseph, Alfreton, Derbyshire	1	1	0
Denton, Thomas	1	1	0
*J. J. Jones, Wm.	1	1	0
*McClellan, W.	1	1	0
*Greaves, J., Luddenden Foot	1	1	0
*Wainhouse, Thomas	1	1	0
*Moorhouse, Thomas	1	1	0
*Crooke, Joseph, Winding Road	1	1	0
*Brooke, Robert	1	1	0
*Wrigglesworth, John	1	1	0
*Stancliffe, John, Woolshops	1	1	0
*Davies, Richard, 22, Broad street	1	1	0
*Pearson, Thomas	1	1	0
*Hartley, John, Bedford-street	1	1	0
*Milner, Wm.	1	1	0
*Horsfall, Geo., Pellon Place	1	1	0
*Jackson, John, Old Market	1	1	0
*Hebblethwaite, T., Green Mount	1	1	0
*Topham, John, Call lane	2	1	0
*Knight, Joseph, 120, North-street	1	1	0
*Andrews, C. H., Camp Road	1	1	0
*Croft, Samuel, & Son, Water-lane	1	1	0
*Wooler, Jonathan, Victoria Road	1	1	0
*Kershaw, John, 14, South Market	1	1	0
*Whitehead, Wm., Duncan street	1	1	0
*Atkinson, E., 12, Trafalgar-street	1	1	0
Hargrave, Joshua, Fleece-lane	0	10	0
*Haimes, Wm.	1	1	0
*Haimes, Thomas	1	1	0
*Earp, Mr., grocer	1	1	0
*Chandler, Hemsley	1	1	0
*Draper, Thomas	1	1	0
*Clemson, John	1	1	0
*Gutteridge, John	1	1	0
*Tagg, Joseph	1	1	0
*Salisbury, E.	1	1	0
*Pitt, Wm.	1	1	0
Newton, James, 48, Bankside, Borough	0	10	0
Friends to the Cause, per C. Ridge	0	10	0
Lipcomb, James, 93, Regent-street	0	10	0
A Few Free Traders in the employ of Messrs. Spring- weiller & Co. in the street, Little Britain	0	10	0
Nevill, J. F., 128, Fenchurch-street	0	5	0
Williams, Z., 5, Dean's-row, Walworth Road	0	5	0
Bright, R., 66, Long-acre	0	5	0
Pratt, N., cheesemonger, 6, Eccleston-street, Pimlico	0	5	0
Ashley John, Dispatch Office, Fleet-street	0	5	0
Wood, J. R., ditto ditto	0	5	0
Terratt, J. W., 9, Finsbury Pavement	0	5	0
Luffman, A., 7, Bell's buildings, Salisbury-square	0	5	0
Robbins, J., 4, Seabright-street, Bethnal Green	0	5	0
Tulley, Wm., 5, Mint-street, Borough	0	5	0
Carter, Isaac, 83, Church street, Bethnal Green	0	5	0
Young, Robert, 76, ditto	0	5	0
J. J. E.	0	2	0
Bradford, William, 43, Bethnal Green Road	0	2	0
Adams, Charles, Willingden, Sussex	0	2	0
A. B.	0	2	0
Gill, Thomas, 34, West Smithfield	0	2	0
Brook, Benjamin, 7, Farringdon-street	0	2	0
Cuister, John, ditto	0	2	0
North, Thomas, 234, Strand	0	2	0

* Those names marked with an asterisk are renewed subscriptions.

MEETING OF THE LEAGUE AT COVENT GARDEN.

In the present extreme excitement of the public mind on the question of Free Trade, it was of course anticipated that the first great meeting of the Anti-Corn-Law League, after the recent important adhesions to the cause, and pending the formation of a new administration, would be an unusually crowded one; but even the most sanguine could scarcely have imagined the scene which was presented about the doors, and in the avenues leading on all sides to the theatre, before the opening of the doors last evening. According to the advertisements, the public were to have been admitted at half-past 6 o'clock; but so anxious were persons to secure their places, that many took their stations outside the doors as early as before 5 o'clock. By 6 some thousands were closely packed together under the piazzas in Covent-garden and in Bow-street—the outsiders forming a dense semicircular phalanx, extending nearly to the centre of the street; whilst Hart-street was totally blocked up. By an arrangement which, however annoying it may have been to those who were excluded altogether without having had the satisfaction of a rush and a struggle, yet proved to be highly beneficial in preserving order and preventing personal injury, the persons nearest to the doors were admitted by degrees, until the theatre was completely filled in every part. So that at the hour appointed, instead of a scene of confusion, the house presented the most magnificent appearance it has exhibited since the dinner that was given in it to O'Connell after his celebrated "conviction." From floor to roof it was a living human pile, in which the fairer portion of creation held a large proportion. The open doors of the boxes giving vistas of anxious countenances, extending along the corridors, and an occasional murmur of distant struggling, evidencing the fact that there were crowds content to take their chance of catching the voices of the speakers from the distant passages and staircases.

At a quarter before 7 o'clock, Mr. Cobden entered the house, and his appearance upon the stage was the signal for a burst of cheering from the entire audience. He was followed shortly afterwards by Mr. Bright, who was obliged to struggle through the crowd into the orchestra, from whence he was assisted to the stage, where he received a similar greeting to that with which Mr. Cobden had been honoured. The stage had then become as densely crowded as any part of the house. Amongst those assembled upon it were the Hon. C. P. Villiers, M.P., in the chair. Richard Cobden, Esq., M.P., John Bright, Esq., M.P., T. C. Grainger, Esq., M.P., Henry Metcalf, Esq., M.P., Howard Elphinstone, Esq., M.P., Benjamin Smith, Esq., M.P., Thomas Milner Gibson, Esq., M.P., James Pattison, Esq., M.P., Arthur Pattison, Esq., W. J. Fox, Esq., Adam Smith, Esq., Captain Cogan, John McClode, Esq., W. A. Wilkinson, Esq., P. A. Taylor, Esq., Norman Wilkinson, Esq., Dr. Stoner, William Leaver, Esq., Colonel Gardner, Dr. Lobb, George Stephenson, Esq., N. Stone, Esq., H. Fowler, Esq., Henry Staples Foster, Esq., Cambridge; J. Phillips, Esq., Henry Lloyd Morgan, Esq., Rev. S. Luke, J. A. St. John, Esq., Boyle St. John, Esq., William Mortimer, Esq., William Pollard, Esq., Hertford; B. M. Roberts, Esq., J. Parrott, Esq., Somerset; J. Somers, Esq., Bridgewater; J. Calverley, Esq., Somerset; Alfred Levitond Middlezoy, Esq., Bridgewater; Sir William Baynes, Bart., T. M. Robinson, Esq., J. McCall, Esq., Manchester; Hugo Reid, Esq.,—Hills, Esq., Stilton; F. Scheer, Cherapanat, Siberia; Ralph Ricardo, Esq., James Brotherton, Esq., John Moss, Esq., Derby; P. Davy, Crediton; H. L. Keeling, Esq., Sylvanus Partridge, Esq., Robert Price, Esq., Summers Harford, Esq., Charles Lattimore, John Collett, Esq., M.P.

At 7 o'clock precisely the chair was taken by the Honourable CHARLES PELHAM VILLIERS, who, upon coming forward, was loudly cheered. He was, however, for some time unable to obtain a hearing, in consequence of the uproar raised outside by the enormous crowds who found themselves unable to make good their entrance. The chairman directed that all the doors of the boxes should be opened, so as to give the greatest accommodation possible to those outside; and after a little while order was restored.

Mr. VILLIERS then came forward and said: Ladies and Gentlemen, the only purpose for which I have to ask your attention for one moment is to explain to you the reason why I occupy the chair this evening. It was only a few minutes before I entered this theatre that I was informed by some of my friends around me that the gentleman who so frequently and efficiently presides as chairman of these meetings was seriously and suddenly indisposed; and the gentleman who applied to me stated that it would be convenient if I would supply the place of my friend, Mr. Wilson, for this evening. When the request was made to me to preside at this meeting, I had some impression that it was no easy duty to discharge, and at first declined to undertake it. Subsequently I did consent to occupy the chair. (Mr. Villiers was here prevented from proceeding owing to a slight disturbance from the over-crowded state of the theatre.) The little disturbance that has occurred has not proceeded from any want of respect either for the meeting or the purpose for which we assemble (hear, hear), but only from an excess of zeal on the part of our friends to get within hearing, and to occupy a place in this building. (Cheers.) As I have stated, it is no easy task to preside at a meeting of this kind; but I really did assent when the request was made to me for no other purpose than that for which I have for the last six or seven years had in view with respect to the Anti-Corn-Law League; namely, to cordially co-operate with them whenever my humble services could be rendered available. (Cheers.) Gentlemen, I well remember the difficulty there was before the establishment of the Anti-Corn-Law League in advancing this question; and I have always been of opinion, and I continue to be so still, that if some such great and powerful and intelligent organisation as the Anti-Corn-Law League did not exist, there would not be the most distant hope or prospect of success. (Cheers.) And earnestly as I have desired to see the repeal of the Corn Laws, I have thought it my duty to place my very feeble services at their disposal whenever they might be required. (Loud cheers.) Gentlemen, notwithstanding the errors that are said to have been committed during the course of past years by some of this body—errors which have been most candidly admitted by many of the most leading members—I am of opinion now, that if our opinions should come to their senses, and concede the abolition of the Corn Laws before the day arrives—and arrive it will if these laws are maintained—when the people will be maddened by the privations which it is their natural consequence to produce—then this great triumph of reason and justice will be mainly the result of the intelligent and active means so energetically and continuously sustained by the Anti-Corn-Law League. (Great cheers.) Gentlemen, one of the reasons that I so sincerely regret the absence of our friend, Mr. Wilson, on this occasion is, that it had been his intention to have detailed to you the extraordinary exertions that have been made recently by our enlightened friends, and by those who have represented the deputations from the League in the provinces; and to have afforded you satisfactory and clear proofs of the extent to which conversion and conviction upon this subject are going on; and I hope it will be satisfactory to you to hear that wherever they go, wherever their names are mentioned, their valuable and important services are fully and gratefully recognised. (Cheers.) Gentlemen, it probably would have been one part of the address that Mr. Wilson might have thought it right to make to you, to congratulate you, as I do myself, most cordially, upon the accession of strength which we have lately received in the conversion of some of the most eminent statesmen existing in this country, to the principles and views that have been propounded in this theatre. (Loud cheers.) We now know that these men—the only statesmen that could be referred to by the crown to form an administration to govern this country, have come to the conclusion that they will be no longer parties to withholding one of the most obvious and natural rights which the people of this, or of any other country, can claim or enjoy—namely the simple and plain one of feeding themselves. (Cheers.) We have now the only men who can, without exciting ridicule and contempt, be called to the councils of the crown, allowing themselves to be announced to the country and the world as opposed to that policy which we have been so long condemning. (Cheers.) Of Lord John Russell's opinions there can now be no doubt. (Great cheers.) He has in a bold, manly, clear, and intelligent way, made them manifest to the whole world. We have all read his recent address to the electors of the city; therefore about his views, and I trust also his intentions, there can be no doubt. It was with no surprise that I read that address, because I remembered that during the last session he did for the first time vote for the motion that I submitted to the house for the total repeal of the Corn Laws. (Cheers.) By the speeches he made on several occasions during the last session, he exhibited himself perfectly alive to all the injury and mischief that the Corn Laws had produced on the working-classes of society; and he did distinctly predict that a time would arrive when we should be precluded from deciding this question with calmness and quietude. (Cheers.) He predicted the time when some great emergency would arrive—when a scarcity of food would be manifest, and that we should then be called suddenly and at once totally to repeal the Corn Laws. (Cheers.) I could not, therefore, read his address with surprise when that emergency had arisen. All men believe that that emergency either has occurred to the extent to which it was stated but a short time since, or that the people are about to be submitted to very considerable privations. He has therefore come forward in right season, and he has done so at a most opportune moment, to declare that he will be no party to placing any obstruction either to the supply of food to the people, or to the interchange of the products of their industry for the products of the industry of other nations. (Great cheering.) Gentlemen, it has been asserted, and not only not contradicted, but the statement has received confirmation by the resignation of Sir Robert Peel,—that he also has brought his great mind to the conclusion that the people ought to feed themselves. (Cheers.) In what way those conversions have been brought about, seems to me to be a matter of indifference to us. It may have been by the bad potatoes or the good arguments. (Laughter and cheers.) It has been announced to be the case, and it seems to me to be the business of those who assemble here, and of the people at large, to turn the circumstances to the best account. (Hear, hear.) Now this appears to be the great difficulty;—but I say that if these public men are true to you, if you are true to yourselves,—there cannot be much difficulty as to the course that shall be pursued. (Cheers.) If Lord John Russell is really convinced that the Corn Laws ought to be abolished, and has been summoned to the councils of her Majesty, if he has been given a commission to form a Government, let him declare that he will undertake that commission, and that he will form that Government upon the principle of abolishing the Corn Laws. (Cheers.) If Sir Robert Peel is properly represented, and if he has not been actuated by egregious folly in resigning his office without reason,—if he is really and honestly convinced that the Corn Laws ought to be abolished, let him come forward and strenuously and faithfully support Lord John Russell. (Repeated cheers.) If we can be thoroughly convinced that these two men, and these two parties, are really earnest and honest in this purpose of getting rid of this great and giant grievance, it becomes the duty, as it is the interest of this great, powerful, and influential association styled the Anti-Corn-Law League, to direct all their energy, intelligence, and activity, to the support of Lord John Russell and Sir Robert Peel. (Loud and continued cheering.) I do believe that if we can find the common ground of a total abolition of the Corn Laws for each of these three parties to stand upon, the month of February will not pass over without our relieving the statute book of one of the foulest blots that ever disgraced it. (Cheers.) But, gentlemen, if I might be allowed to offer one word of advice, it would be, that if the people of this country depend upon anything, rely upon any person or persons, with more confidence and reliance than they ought to do upon themselves, they run the greatest risk of being deceived and disappointed. (Hear, hear.) Now, I say the time is come; this is the moment. We have got these great parties in such a state of confusion—we have got these public men in such a fix—that if we only do justice to ourselves and the cause, I believe that nothing can prevent our success; and this is the moment—and it will be but a short one—when all men are required to make every effort and all sacrifices in order to convey to their rulers the unmistakable and distinct determination of this country no longer to submit to this iniquitous tax upon food. (Loud cheers.) Gentlemen, I beg to apologise to you for having thus intruded my own views briefly on your notice. (No, no; go on, go on.) I was not advertised for that purpose this evening, and I will not stand another moment in the way of all that eloquence and brilliancy of talent for which you were especially invited to attend this evening. I beg leave to call upon Richard Cobden, Esq.

Mr. COBDEN then came forward amidst the most enthusiastic and protracted cheering. Silence having at length been obtained, the hon. gentleman spoke as follows: Mr. Chairman, Ladies, and Gentlemen, I think some of the protection societies would be glad to have our overflow to-night. (Loud cheers.) If this agitation continues, we shall have to build an edifice as large as St. Paul's to hold the Leaguers. (Hear and laughter.) I believe to-day we have had application for 30,000 tickets of admission; we have now many hundreds round this building more than can be accommodated; and we have a great many more inside than can be comfortable. But I feel confidence in the disposition of all good Leaguers to accommodate each other; and I must say that I have seen in front of me every disposition to be quiet; but it is the same to-night as I have observed generally in my great experience at public meetings, that if there is any disturbance it is always amongst the aristocracy upon the platform. (Cheers and laughter.) Gentlemen, I think this meeting is a sufficient proof of the exciting circumstances under which we meet to-night. I need not say a word—(Mr. Cobden was here interrupted by a slight disturbance arising from the extremely crowded state of the stage.) Some gentlemen at the back of the stage wish to have my assurance that there is no room in front; I can assure them that there is not vacant space for a mouse. Gentlemen, I think the aspect of the meeting is a sufficient illustration of the present crisis of our great movement. The manner in which we are gathered together; the excited feeling which animates all present; all indicate that there is something peculiar in the present phase of our movement. Gentlemen, I do not know how it is, but if I see other people inclined to throw up their caps and become exceedingly excited, it always makes me feel and look grave; for I always think there is the most danger when people are the least on their guard in this wicked world. (Hear, hear.) Doubtless, gentlemen, we have brought our cause to a new position—we have got it into the hands of politicians. The "ins" and the "outs" are quarrelling over it. (Cheers.) But I am very anxious to impress upon you and our friends throughout the kingdom—for what we say here is read by hundreds and thousands elsewhere—that it is not our business to form Cabinets—to choose individuals who shall carry out our principles; we are not to trust to others to do our work; we are not to feel confident that the work will be done till it is done; and I will tell you when and when only I shall consider it done—when I see the sheet of the Act of Parliament wet from the printer's containing the total abolition of the Corn Laws. (Cheers.) Gentlemen, I have always expected in the course of our agitation that we should knock a Government or two on the head before we succeeded. (Cheers.) The Government of 1841 can hardly be said to have been killed by the Corn Law; it took the Corn Law as a last desperate dose in order to cure it of a long and lingering disease—but it proved fatal to it. I think we may say, too, that the recent Government has died of the Corn Law; and our business must be, gentlemen, to try and make the fate of the last Government a warning to the next. (Cheers.) We do not certainly exactly know yet why Sir Robert Peel ran away from his own law; we have had no explanation. I have been in town for three or four days. I thought when I came from the country I might probably get a little behind the scenes, and learn something about it; but I am as much in the dark now as when I came from Lancashire. (Laughter.) I cannot learn why it was that Sir Robert Peel bolted. (Renewed laughter.) From what did he run? It was his own law, passed in 1842; it was deliberated upon about six months in 1841. It was not passed at the pressing solicitation of the people for any such law. I know that almost the whole of the people petitioned against it. It was his own handywork, done in defiance of the people; and now, in 1845, with still the same Parliament, with a majority of 90 to back him, the very men who passed the law being still at his back, he suddenly runs away and leaves his sliding scale as a legacy to his successors. (Cheers.) Gentlemen, if he had carried his own law with him, if he had only carried off his sliding scale to Tamworth, I do not think we should have made many inquiries about him. (Renewed cheering and laughter.) But he has left his law, and we do not know how he is going to deal with it in future. I suppose when we meet Parliament, which may be early next month—at all events, the sooner the better—the first thing I shall look to with some degree of interest will be an answer to the question, What is the reason of this sudden dissolution of the Cabinet? I shall await Sir Robert Peel's explanation with very great interest. He will doubtless be able to tell us whether the facts collected by his commissioners in Ireland as well as in England were of such a nature as to impress him with the idea that we are verging on a probable famine in one country, if not in both. If that be the case, I suppose he will also tell us that, so far as he was concerned, he was the advocate in his Cabinet for the suspension of his own handywork—the sliding scale. Well, that being the case, I presume, when Parliament meets, he will assist us to do that which he could not accomplish himself with his refractory Cabinet. (Cheers.) I expect—I do not know whether I may be rash in expecting it—from Sir Robert Peel straightforward conduct. There are people who tell us that this Corn Law must not be suspended suddenly, that it must not be dealt with rashly and precipitately, and that if we are to have the repeal of the Corn Law, it must be done gradually, step by step. Well, gentlemen, that might have been in the eyes of some very statesmanlike way of doing it six or seven years ago. Some people would have thought last year, when wheat was at forty-seven shillings a quarter, that if a law had been passed then providing for the extinction of the Corn Law in two or three years that that would have been no very bad measure to have been obtained; but who will propose now to pass a law imposing a fixed duty on corn next spring to go off 3s. or 4s. the spring after, and 3s. or 4s. the spring after that, till it comes to nothing? That would not suit the exigencies of the present movement. (Hear.) Our wise Legislature, our wise Conservative statesmen, would not deal with this question when they might have dealt with it with some advantage to their own policy. We were pressing on the Government to deal with the Corn Laws last year and the year before, when wheat was at 47s. a quarter, but we were told then we were rash men; that the Corn Law had not had a fair trial; that ours was not the way to deal with it; that we must wait to see how it worked. Well, now they are seeing how it has worked. (Laughter.) But there is no time for temporising now. Nature has stepped in; Providence has interfered, and has inflicted a famine upon the land, and set at naught all the contrivance, delay, and modifications of statesmen. (Great cheers.) They have but one way of dealing with this question. It is of no use asking us for a feather-bed to drop our aristocracy upon; they might have had a feather-bed, if there had been one to offer them; but there is no feather-bed for them now. (Loud cheers.) They must have the total and immediate repeal of the Corn Laws; not because the League has demanded it: not out of any deference to the Shibboleth of clubs like ours. No, we do not ask them to bow to any such dictation as that; we will not inflict any unnecessary humiliation upon our land-owners; but they have put off this good work so long, until nature has stepped in, and now they must bow to the law of nature without any delay. (Loud cheers.) Gentlemen, we meet Parliament next session—I take it for granted—with but one proposition before us,—that is the immediate and total abolition of the Corn Laws (cheers)—no minister can take office without proposing that measure, whether Sir Robert Peel or Lord J. Russell. I defy them to take office and come before Parliament without the Queen's Speech proposing that measure. (Cheers.) No; we will not exult over them; it is not our doing, after all; we have prepared the public in some degree to take advantage of a natural calamity, but we are not so well prepared as we should have been if they had given us a year or two more; the potato rot has tripped up the heels of Sir Robert Peel, but it has also stopped our registration agents a little. We should like to have had another year of qualification for counties. If we had had another year or two, we could have shown the monopolist landowners that we can transfer power in this country from the hands of a class totally into the hands of the middle and industrial classes of this country. (Cheers.) We shall go on with that movement, and I hope it will never stop (hear), but we shall have to deal with the crisis of the Corn Law question next session. The Queen's Speech, within a month of this time, must recommend the abolition of the Corn Laws. I want to get into the House of Commons again to have some talk about that question. Oh! it is very heavy work I assure you; it is heavier work every day to come into these enthusiastic meetings, and talk of this question, for we meet no opponents. I do not know how it is, but I have that quality of combativeness, as phrenologists call it, and unless I meet with some opposition I am as dull as ditch-water. (Cheers and laughter.) Well, there is no man to be found at large (laughter) out of the House of Commons who can be got in public to say a word in defence of the Corn Laws; that is, you cannot hear any attempted defence out of their own protection societies, and you know they are privileged people. (Cheers and laughter.) I am anxious to meet them in the House of Commons upon this subject; but it will be an odd scene when we assemble next session, for we shall not know where to sit. (Laughter.) There will be such greetings in the lobbies, one asking the other "On which side are you going to sit?" And then, the greatest curiosity of all, the greatest subject of interest will be to see where Sir R. Peel is to sit. (Renewed laughter.) I should not wonder if we shall have to find him a chair, and put him in the middle of the floor. (Cheers and laughter.) Now, I shall be somewhat interested in witnessing the arguments that will be used by the protectionists in defence of this Corn Law. Recollect the debate will come on with reference to the exigency of the moment. The Corn Law must be suspended instantly if Lord John Russell takes office (he will be a bold man if he does); but if he does, I suppose he will either suspend the law the next day by an Order in Council, or he will call us together; and he will throw down his proposition, either you must suspend that Corn Law at once, or I will not hold office a week. (Cheers.) Then the debate will turn as to the necessity of suspending this Corn Law; and we shall have gentlemen getting up from Dorsetshire and Essex (laughter) protesting that there is a great abundance of everything in the country, that there is no scarcity at all, no potato rot, and that there is a full average quantity and quality of wheat. (Cheers, and cries of "Plenty of curdy.") Then I should not wonder, gentlemen, if we were to hear some moral receipts for feeding the people. You know Dr. Buckland has lately been publishing a paper read at Oxford to the Ashmolean Society, I believe, and he has shown that people can live very well on peas, can get on tolerably well upon beans, and if there is nothing else to be had, they can live pretty well upon mangel wurzel; and he gives an instance of one good lady who lived, I do not know how many days, by sucking the starch out of her white pocket handkerchief. (Roars of laughter.) Now, mangel wurzel, starch, and beans, mixed with a little curdy-powder, would do very well. (Renewed laughter.) Well, gentlemen, we shall have a division as well as a debate. I should like to see the names of those good men in the House of Commons who will vote against opening the ports—that is, the men who will decree that we shall not be treated as well as the Prussians, the Turks, the Poles, and the Dutchmen; if they out-vote us upon that proposition, we shall have a general election. I should like to see some of those curdy powder candidates that go down to their constituents. I would advise you to get doses of the curdy powder water ready; a little hot water, and a pinch of curdy powder stirred up, makes a man very comfortable to go to bed with, they say. Try it upon some of the protectionist candidates. (Laughter.) Gentlemen, this is no laughing subject after all. (Hear, hear.) As my friend, Mr. Villiers, says, it is a question very much between Sir Robert Peel and Lord John Russell now. I have no reason, and I think you will all admit it, to feel any very great respect for Sir Robert Peel; he is the only man in the House of Commons that I can never speak a word to in private without forfeiting my own respect, and the respect of all those men who sit around me. But though I say that, and though I am justified in saying it, (Hear, hear,) yet this I will say, that so deeply have I this question of the Corn Laws at heart, that if Sir Robert Peel will take the same manly, straightforward part that Lord John Russell has taken, if he will avow an intelligible course of action—that is what I want, no mystification—if he will do that, I will as heartily co-operate with him as with any man in the House of Commons. (Cheers.) I should think now the time was come, when every statesman, of whatever party, who has a particle of intelligence and conscience, must be anxious to remove this question of supplying the food of the people out of the category of party politics; for see what a fearful state it places the Ministry in. They maintain a law for the purpose of regulating the supply of food to the people; if the food falls short, the people assail the Government as the cause of their scarcity of food; this is a responsibility that no Government or human power ought to assume to itself. (Hear.) It is a responsibility that we should never invest a Government with, if that Government did not assume to itself the functions of the Deity. (Loud cheers.) Gentlemen, why should we tax the Government with being the cause of our suffering when we are visited with a defective harvest? Why should a Government fly away? Why should a Prime Minister retire from office because there is a failure and rot in the potatoes? Suppose we had a devastating flood that swept away half our houses in a day, we should never think of charging the executive Government with being the cause of our calamities. The Government does not undertake to build houses, or to keep houses for us. Suppose half of our mercantile marine was swept away with a hurricane, and if the whole of it was submerged in the flood, we should never think of flying at the Government, and making them responsible for such a calamity. On the contrary, if we had such a dire event by flood or fire happening to the country, we should instinctively rally round the Government, one helping the other in order to mitigate the horrors of such a calamity. And why should it be otherwise with supplying the food of the people? Why, because the Government of this country,—Ministers and Parliament in this land—have arrogated to themselves functions which belong not to man, but to nature—not to laws of Parliament, but to the laws of Providence—not to regulations of statesmen, but to regulations of the merchants of the world; it is because they have taken upon themselves superhuman functions that we make them responsible for divine inflictions. (Loud cheers.) Then, gentlemen, I hope that every intelligent statesman in this country will be anxious to get rid of this question of protection to agriculture. But there is another reason why our intelligent statesmen ought to wish to bury it so deep that even its ghost cannot haunt us again, this ragged and tattered banner of protection; and it is this, that if you leave a rag of it behind, these protectionist squires will hoist that ragged standard again. And my firm conviction is, that they will find farmers enough to rally round that old rag—they will have the same organisation, the same union in the counties between the protectionist squires and their dupes—the protectionist farmers, that would prove an hindrance to everything like an enlightened and rational Government on the part of any Administration. I say, then, whether it be Sir Robert Peel, or whether it be Lord John Russell, put an end to this protective principle; destroy it thoroughly; leave no part of it behind. And the only way you can do that is by proposing honestly totally to abolish the Corn Laws, and the rest of the system will abolish itself very soon afterwards. (Cheers.) Gentlemen, there are terms talked about; they talk of some terms; they talk of re-adjusting taxation. I am told Sir Robert Peel has got a scheme as long as my arm for mixing up a hundred other things with this Corn Law. I say we will have no such mystification of our plain rights. (Cheers.) We have had too much of his mystification before. In the north of England, where we are practical people, we have a prejudice in favour of doing one thing at a time. Now we will abolish the Corn and Provision Laws if you please—that shall be one thing we will do; and anything else they propose to do we will take it upon its merits as we take the Corn Law upon its demerits. (Cheers.) They propose a modification of taxation, and I am told that Sir Robert Peel has some such up in view to compensate the landowners. (Hisses.) He has not been a very safe guide hitherto to the landowners of this country; he has led them into a quagmire with his leadership. I predict that if Sir Robert Peel provokes a discussion upon the subject of taxation in this country, that he will prove as great an enemy to the landowners as he is likely to prove, according to their views of the question, in his advocacy of protection for them. I warn ministers, and I warn landowners, and the aristocracy of this country, against forcing upon the attention of the middle and industrious classes the subject of taxation. (Tremendous cheers.) For, great as I consider the grievance of the protective system; mighty as I consider the fraud and injustice of the Corn Laws, I verily believe, if you were to bring forward the history of taxation in this country for the last 150 years, you will find as black a record against the landowners as even in the Corn Law itself. (Hear, hear, hear.) I warn them from ripping up the subject of taxation. If they want another League, at the death of this one—(loud cheers)—if they want another organisation, and a motive—for you cannot have these organisations without a motive and principle—(hear, hear)—then let them force the middle and industrious classes of England to understand how they have been cheated, robbed, and bamboozled upon the subject of taxation; and the end will be—(now I predict it for the consolation of Sir Robert Peel and his friends)—if they force a discussion of this question of taxation; if they make it understood by the people of this country how the landowners here, 150 years ago, deprived the sovereign of his feudal rights over them; how the aristocracy retained their feudal rights over the minor copyholders; how they made a bargain with the King to give him 4s. in the pound upon their landed rentals, as a quit charge for having dispensed with these rights of feudal service from them; if the country understand as well as I think I understand, how afterwards this landed aristocracy passed a law to make the valuation of their rental final, the bargain originally being that they should pay 4s. in the pound of the yearly rateable value of their rental, as it was worth to let for, and then stopped the progress of the rent by a law, making the valuation final,—that the land has gone on increasing tenfold in many parts of Scotland, and fivefold in many parts of England, while the land-tax has remained the same as it was 150 years ago—if they force us to understand how they have managed to exempt themselves from the probate and legacy duty on real property, how they have managed, sweet innocents that tax themselves so heavily, to transmit their estates from sire to son without taxes or duties, while the tradesman who has accumulated by thrifty means his small modicum of fortune is subject at his death to taxes and stamps before his children can inherit his property; if they force us to understand how they have exempted their tenants' houses from taxes, their tenants' horses from taxes, their dogs from taxes, their draining-tiles from taxes, if they force these things to be understood, they will be making as rueful a bargain as they have already made by resisting the abolition of this Corn Law. (Cheers.) Do not let them tell me I am talking in a wild chimerical strain—they told me so seven years ago—about this Corn Law. I remember right well, when we came to London six years ago, in the spring of 1839, there were three of us in a small room at Brown's Hotel, Palace Yard, we were visited by a nobleman, one who had taken an active part in the advocacy of a modification of the Corn Laws, but not the total repeal,—he asked us, What is it that has brought you to town, and what do you come to seek? We said, "We come to seek the total and immediate repeal of the Corn Laws." The nobleman said, with a most emphatic shake of his head, "You will overturn the monarchy as soon as you will accomplish that." (Laughter.) Now, the very same energy, starting from our present vantage ground, having our opponents down as we have them now, the same energy—aye, half the energy, working for seven years, would enable a sufficient number of the middle and working classes of this country to qualify for the counties, and might transfer the power utterly and for ever from the landowners of this country to the middle and working classes, and they might tax the land, and tax the large proprietors and rich men of every kind, as they do in all the countries of Europe but England. (Cheers.) Again and again I warn Sir Robert Peel, I warn the aristocracy of this country, that on the settlement of this question, they do not force us into a discussion upon the peculiar burthens upon land. (Hear and cheers.) Well, they cannot meet us now with any modification of the law, because however it might have suited past years, to have let them down on a feather bed as they call it, to have given a salve to their wounds, the crisis of the potato rot will not wait for it now; they dare not open the question of taxation. What will they attempt to do then? What can they do? Why, I would advise them as friends to do justice speedily and promptly; and if we take the repeal of the Corn Laws and ask no further questions; if we let bygones be bygones, they ought to be abundantly satisfied with the bargain. (Cheers.) I am disposed, gentlemen, to ask no questions, to let bygones be bygones. I want no triumph; I want no exaltation. I think no one will accuse us of having crowed over converts, or exulted over repentant sinners. We exist as an association, solely for the object of converting people. It would be a very bad piece of tactics if we ever offered the slightest impediment to an honest conversion to our ranks. We began in a minority of the intelligent people of England. I am willing to admit it, we had to inform the country and to arouse it; we live only to convert; and I am very glad indeed to congratulate you upon having converted some very important allies lately. (Cheers.) But, gentlemen, there are some who join our ranks who seem disposed to kick their schoolmaster when they come into our body. I observed the other day a letter from a gentleman, I have almost forgotten his name, I believe it was a Mr. Vernon Smith—this Mr. Vernon Smith, writes I believe to the electors of Northampton, and declares his adhesion to our principles; but in the concluding paragraph he says, "that he may be a little paradoxical perhaps; but he is of opinion that the progress of Free Trade opinions has been greatly accelerated by the arguments of the monopolists and retarded by the violence of the League." (Laughter.) Well, gentlemen, we do not boast of our converts even when they are worth converting, but when we are charged with violence, and charged by Mr. Vernon Smith, whom I have sometimes suffered the infliction of listening to in the House of Commons, why, considering that we are a kind of great national school, I think if we do sometimes fall a little out of temper, some allowance ought to be made for the kind of scholars we have to teach; and I must say that a duller scholar than Master Vernon Smith no schoolmaster ever dealt with. (Tremendous cheers and much laughter.) Gentlemen, I feel very great pleasure in noticing a statement which appears in to-day's paper in the news from Ireland. It is a report of a speech of Mr. O'Connell. Gentlemen, we of the Anti-Corn-Law League have every reason to feel indebted to Mr. O'Connell for the uniform and consistent course which he has taken in reference to the Corn Laws. (Hear.) From the beginning he has acted and co-operated with us both in our great meetings and in the House of Commons; but I have never considered him as acting here upon English ground. I have always regarded him as promoting a measure for the benefit of his own countrymen in Ireland when he has co-operated with us for the repeal of the Corn Law (hear, hear); because we have had the best possible proof in the continued misery and semi-starvation of the Irish people, that whatever good the Corn Law may have done to the landowner in England, it is quite certain that it has never been of any benefit to the people of Ireland, a large majority of whom never taste anything better than lumper potatoes. Then, gentlemen, both upon Irish and English grounds, I am glad we have an opportunity of co-operating with Mr. O'Connell. (Cheers.) I rejoice that upon this question, at all events, there cannot be a line of demarcation drawn between the two countries. Our interests are theirs, and theirs are ours. (Cheers.) They want more bread, God knows Ireland; and if we can help Mr. O'Connell to give it them they shall have it. (Loud cheers.) Gentlemen, I am not going to talk argumentatively to-night; and I have but to add, that the times that are coming are just those that will most require our vigilance and activity. Demonstrations now are comparatively valueless; we shall want you all next spring. There is a great struggle for that period. The Duke of Richmond has told us he shall trust to the hereditary legislators of the country. Well I might say—

"Hereditary bondsmen, know ye not." (Loud laughter.) I will back the "hereditary bondsmen" against the hereditary legislators upon this question. (Hear, hear.) But, no; we have not all the hereditary legislators opposed to us. I am glad of it; we have the best of them in our ranks (hear, hear); we always had the best of them with us. If they have not all joined our club we do not care about it so long as they adopt our principles. (hear, hear.) I have never been for making this a class question. I have preached from the first that we would have the co-operation of the best and most intelligent of all ranks in life—working, middle, and upper classes. No, no; we will have no war of classes in this country. (Cheers.) It is bad enough that in free and constitutional States you must have your parties; we cannot in our state of enlightenment manage our institutions without them; but it shall never be our fault if this question of the Corn Laws becomes a class question between the middle and working-classes on the one side, and the hereditary legislators on the other. No, no; we will save the Duke of Richmond's order from the Duke of Richmond. (Cheers.) We have got Lord Morpeth, and we have also Lords Radnor, Ducie, and Kinnaird, and a good many more; and among the rest Earl Grey, our earliest and most tried champion of the aristocracy. (Cheers.) This is one proof that ours is not a class question, and that we are not at war with the whole landed aristocracy; but if the Duke of Richmond sets up the Noodles and Doodles of the aristocracy, why before we have done with them they shall be as insignificant and more contemptible than the round-frocked peasantry upon his grace's estate. (Hear and laughter.) Gentlemen, this is a question that during the next three months will allow of no sleeping; we must be all watching. I have confidence in Lord J. Russell; I think if you have his word, you have his bond. (Hear, hear.) I do not know at this moment whether he will take office or not, but if he does, and has Lord Morpeth and Lord Grey associated with him, you are as safe with them as you are with Lord John Russell himself. I do not know who besides he may have. (A voice, "Yourself.") Most enthusiastic cheering and waving of hats and handkerchiefs. Yes, I will be the watchman so long as bad characters are abroad. But, Gentlemen, Lord John may have some difficulty, perhaps, in making up a Cabinet as willing to stick to the principles of Free Trade as himself; and he may not find them quite so willing to coerce those refractory legislators as he may wish. We must back him, gentlemen (cheers); we must show him the power we can give him to carry this question. (Tremendous cheers.) They talk of Lord John Russell having made a mistake in putting out that letter to the citizens of London. I have heard some mean and shabby people say, if he had not put out that letter, how much freer he would have been now. Why, Lord John Russell would have been nothing now without that letter. (Cheers.) The Queen would not have sent for him without that letter. (Renewed cheering.) Lord John Russell would no more have commanded the people's confidence, or excited their hopes or enthusiasm without that letter, any more than Sir Robert Peel himself would have done. Gentlemen, it is a proof not only of the vitality of the principle, that without joining the League, he did not join us by the mere enunciation of a principle which the people quite understand and feel. Lord John Russell, as if by change of a magic lantern, became from the most obscure the most popular and prominent man of his day. (Loud cheers.) Gentlemen, ours is the only party that is now solid, growing, and consolidated in this country; all that is good of the Whig party have joined the Free Traders (hear, hear), the Whig party is nothing without the Free Trade party. The Tory or Conservative party, call them what you will, are broken to atoms by the disruption in the ranks of their leaders. (Cheers.) The League stands erect and aloft amidst the ruins of all factions. (Tremendous cheers.) Let us hold on to the principle which has made us as strong as we now find ourselves; let us hold on to it, not turning to the right, or to the left. (Great Cheers.) No man, or body of men, Ministers, or ex-ministers, have a right to expect it, nor shall they have it; we will not turn a hair's breadth to keep men in office, or put them out of office; and if we maintain this ground, aye, for another six months, then we shall be near that time which I so long for, when this League shall be dissolved into its primitive elements by the triumph of its principles. (The hon. gentleman concluded his speech amidst most enthusiastic applause, again and again renewed—the whole audience standing for some minutes waving their hats and handkerchiefs.)

Mr. BRIGHT, on presenting himself to the meeting, was received with much enthusiastic applause. He said: During the last month, as one of a deputation from the council of the League, I have visited many towns in this country. I have been present at meetings in Lancashire, Cheshire, Yorkshire, Nottinghamshire, Derbyshire, Gloucestershire, Staffordshire, Somersetshire, and now in Middlesex; and I am forced to the conclusion that the agitation now in progress throughout this kingdom is one of no common or trivial character (hear, hear). Notwithstanding the hope that my friend who has just addressed you has expressed, that it may not become a strife of classes, I am not sure that it has not already become such, and I doubt whether it can have any other character. I believe this to be a movement of the commercial and industrious classes against the lords and great proprietors of the soil. (Hear, hear, hear.) Within the last fifty years trade has done much for the people of England. Our population has greatly increased; our villages have become towns, and our small towns large cities. The contemned class of manufacturers and traders have assumed another and a very different position, and the great proprietors of the soil now find that there are other men and interests to be consulted in this kingdom besides those of whom they have taken such great care through the legislation which they have managed. In the varying fortunes of this contest we have previously seen one somewhat feeble and attenuated administration overthrown, and now we see another, which every man thought powerful and robust, prostrate in the dust. (Cheers.) It is worth while that the people and statesmen should regard this result, and learn from it a lesson. What was it that brought the Whig Government down in 1841, and what is it that has brought down Sir Robert Peel now? (Hear, hear, hear.) Have not we good grounds for asserting that the Corn Law makes it impossible for any party longer to govern England during its continuance? (Hear, hear.) No statesman dare now take office upon the understanding that he is to maintain the system which the protectionists have asserted to be a fundamental principle of the constitution of the kingdom. (Cheers.) We have heard that the Whig Government left the country in great distress, and its financial affairs in much embarrassment. But no one has ever pointed out the particular acts of that Government which made the revenue deficient. (Hear, hear.) It was not the taking off of taxes injudiciously—it was not a more than ordinarily extravagant expenditure of the public funds which produced that effect; but it was the collapse of the national industry—it was the undermining of the sources of the prosperity of our trade, which arose from the deficient harvests that preceded their fall, those deficient harvests being destructive to our trade and industry, because the Corn Law denied to us the power of repairing the mischief by means of foreign supplies. Now landed proprietors may fancy that trade is of small importance; but of this we are at present assured, that no Government can maintain its popularity or keep up its power so long as we have deficient harvests and restriction on the importation of foreign food. (Hear, hear.) Under such a state of things, how is social order to be preserved? When prices are high the revenue invariably declines, and higher taxes must be imposed; general discontent prevails, because there is general suffering; and the Government, whatever be its party name, or whatever the number of its supporters in either House of Parliament, must, under these circumstances, first become unpopular, and then, finally, become extinct. We are now brought to this conclusion, that the continuous government of this country by any administration is totally incompatible with the maintenance of the Corn Laws. Lord John Russell acknowledges it, and Sir Robert Peel, by his sudden retirement from office, has given his testimony to the fact. (Hear, hear.) But there are men who deny it; such men, for example, as Sir John Tyrrell and Mr. Bramston, the latter celebrated, I believe, as the leader in the great land debate. (Laughter.) These men, down in Essex, speak of Sir Robert Peel in the most opprobrious language. They say they are glad that the "organised hypocrisy" is at an end—that they are delighted that "the reign of humbug is over;" that they are astounded at the perfidy and treachery of the men whom they lifted into office. It is neither perfidy nor treachery of which they have to complain. Sir Robert Peel cannot, any more than other men, do impossibilities; and it is an impossibility to govern this country with the Corn Law in existence. Sir John Tyrrell, and the like of him, do not shrink from the heavy responsibility of attempting this impossible task; but Sir R. Peel does shrink from it. Sir R. Peel is in a very different position from that which they occupy. The country has a hold upon him; he is responsible, and as Prime Minister he knows that he must be held responsible. But, further, he is responsible also to posterity, and no man more than Sir Robert Peel wishes to stand well upon the page of his country's history. (Loud cries of hear, hear.) But as for the squires, the country has no hold upon them; it expects nothing from them, and will make them responsible for nothing. The Tyrrells and the Bramstons are lost amid the herd of squires, and nobody can lay hold of them to make them atone for national calamities. (Hear, hear.) And if the country has no hold upon them, certainly posterity has none. No man who records the history of this period will ever write long paragraphs about the Tyrrells and the Bramstons. (Loud cheers.) All that posterity will know of these, and of such as these, will be communicated to them upon a marble tablet in some obscure parish church. (Laughter.) This contest has now been waged for seven years; it was a serious one when commenced, but it is a far more serious one now. (Hear, hear.) Since the time when we first came to London to ask the attention of Parliament to the question of the Corn Law, two millions of human beings have been added to the population of the United Kingdom. (Hear, hear.) The table is here as before: the food is spread in about the same quantity as before; but two millions of fresh guests have arrived, and that circumstance makes the question a serious one, both for the Government and for us. These two millions are so many arguments for the Anti-Corn-Law League—so many emphatic condemnations of the policy of this iniquitous law. Why, I see them now in my mind's eye ranged before me, old men and young children, all looking to the Government for bread; some endeavouring to resist the stroke of famine, clamorous and turbulent, but still arguing with us; others dying mute and uncomplaining. Multitudes have died of hunger in the United Kingdom since we first asked the Government to repeal the Corn Law, and although the great and the powerful may not regard those who suffer mutely and die in silence, yet the recording angel will note down their patient endurance and the heavy guilt of those by whom they have been sacrificed. (Loud cheers.) We have had a succession of skirmishes; we now approach the final conflict. It may be worth while to inquire who and what are the combatants in this great battle? Looking in the columns of the newspapers, and attending, as I have attended, hundreds of meetings held to support the principles of Free Trade, we must conclude, that on the face of it the struggle is that of the many against the few. It is a struggle between the numbers, wealth, comforts, the all in fact, of the middle and industrious classes, and the wealth, the union, and sordidness of a large section of the aristocracy of this empire (cheers); and we have to decide, for it may be that this meeting itself may to no little extent be the arbiter in this great contest (hear, hear); we have to decide now in this great struggle, whether in this land in which we live, we will go on with the kind of legislation to which we have been subjected, or whether we will make one effort to right the vessel, to keep her in her true course, and, if possible, to bring her safely to a secure haven. (Cheers.) Our object, as the people, can only be, that we should have good and impartial government for every body. As the whole people, we can by no possibility have the smallest interest in any partial or unjust legislation: we do not wish to sacrifice any right of the richest or most powerful class, but we are resolved that that class shall not sacrifice the rights of a whole people. (Loud cheers.) We have had landlord rule longer, far longer than the life of the oldest man in this vast assembly, and I would ask you to look at the results of that rule, and then decide whether it be not necessary to interpose some check to the extravagance of such legislation. They have had unlimited sway in Parliament and in the provinces. Abroad, the history of our country is the history of war and rapine: at home, of debt, taxes, and rapine too. (Hear, hear.) In all the great contests in which we have been engaged we have found that this ruling class have taken all the honours, while the people have taken all the scars. (Applause and laughter.) No sooner was the country freed from the horrible contest which was so long carried on with the powers of Europe, than this law, by their partial legislation, was enacted—far more hostile to British interests than any combination of foreign powers has ever proved. (Cheers.) We find them legislating corruptly: going to the table of each house of Parliament, and making oath that in their legislation they would altogether discard all private ends and partial affections, and the very same day, it may be, sitting down to make a law for the purpose of extorting from all the consumers of food a higher price than it is worth, that that extra price may be placed in the pockets of the proprietors of land, they themselves being the very men by whom this infamous law was made. (Cheers.) In their other legislation we find great inequality. For example, they deal very leniently with high gaming on the turf, and very severely with chuck-farthing and pitch and toss. (Laughter.) We find them enacting a merciless code for the preservation of wild animals and vermin kept for their own sport; and, as if to make this law still more odious, we find them entrusting its administration, for the most part, to sporting gentlemen and game preservers. We find throughout England and Wales, the proportion of one in eleven of our whole population consists of paupers; and that in the south and south-western counties of England, where squiresdome has never been much interfered with, the pauperism is as one to seven of the whole population. (Hear, hear.) We find, moreover, that in Scotland there is an amount of suffering no less, perhaps, though not so accurately set down in figures. We find the cottages of the peasantry pulled down in thousands of cases, that the population on the landed estates may be thinned, the unfortunate wretches driven into the towns to procure a precarious support, or beyond the ocean, to find a refuge in a foreign land. (Cheers.) But in that country across the Channel, whence we now hear the wail of lamentation, where trade is almost unknown, where landowners are predominant and omnipotent, we find, not one in seven, but at least half the population reduced to a state which may be termed a condition of pauperism. (Hear, hear.) The men who write for protectionist newspapers sometimes heap their scorn and contumely upon the inhabitants of the American republic. New York is that state of the Union in which there is the most pauperism, for to that state the stream of emigration from this country and from Ireland flows; and yet in that state—the most pauperised in the whole republic, there is only one pauper to every 184 of the population. (Cheers.) It is true that they have not an hereditary peerage to trust to. (Laughter.) They know nothing there of a House of Lords, seventy or eighty members of which deposit their legislative power in the hands of one old man. (Hear, hear, and cheers.) It is not a wise thing for the hereditary peerage and the protectionist party to direct the attention of the people of this country to the condition of the American republic. We do not expect perfection either in the new world or in the old, all we ask is that when an abuse is pointed out, it may be fairly and openly inquired into, and if it be proved to be an abuse, honestly abated. I am always fearful of entering upon the question of the condition of that portion of our working population amongst whom these squires and lords principally live; but I find that those newspapers which stand in a very ambiguous character before the public, which sometimes are, and sometimes are not, the organs of the Government, but are always organs which play a tune that jars much upon the nerves of the people—I find those papers are now endeavouring to play the old game of raising hostile feelings in the manufacturing districts between the employers and the employed. (Hear, hear, hear, and loud cheers.) Let them write; bread has risen too much within the last six months, and within the last two months trade has suffered too sad a reverse for their writing to have any effect now. There is the most cordial, complete, and, I believe I may add, lasting union amongst all classes in the manufacturing districts in reference to this cause. (Cheers.) But how stands the case in the rural districts? Can the protectionists call a meeting in any town or village in the kingdom, giving a week's notice of their intention to call their tenants together, and imagine that they will have a vote in favour of protection? (Hear, hear, and cheers.) They sometimes think we are hard upon the aristocracy. They think that the vast population of Lancashire and Yorkshire are democratic and turbulent. Why there are no elements there, except that one of great numbers, which are to be compared in their dangerous character with the elements of disaffection and insubordination which exist round about the halls and castles of this proud and arrogant aristocracy. (Cheers.) You have seen in the papers, within the last fortnight, that the foul and frightful crime of incendiarism has again appeared. It always shows itself when we have had for some short time a high price of bread. The Corn Law is as great a robbery of the man who follows the plough as it is of him who minds the loom, with this difference, that the man who follows the plough is, of the two, nearest the earth, and it takes less pressure to press him into it. (Hear, hear.) Mr. Benett, one of the members for Wiltshire, at an agricultural meeting, held not long since, made a very long speech, in which he said some remarkable things—the most remarkable being, that if he had again to come into the world, and had the option of choosing the particular rank or class in society to which he would belong, after reviewing, I believe, a period of about 70 years, he confessed that he would choose to be an agricultural labourer. (Laughter and cheers.) Now, this sentiment is certainly of a very novel character; and it is one worth examining, coming, as it did, from a man who had at one time, I am told, a property of eight or ten thousand a year in land. Now, what is the condition of this agricultural labourer, for whom they tell us protection is necessary. He lives in a parish whose owner, it may be, has deeply mortgaged it. The estate is let to farmers without capital, whose land grows almost as much rushes as wheat. The bad cultivation of the land provides scarcely any employment for the labourers, who become more and more numerous in the parish; the competition which there is amongst these labourers for the little employment to be had, bringing down the wages to the very lowest point at which their lives can be kept in them. They are heart-broken, spirit-broken, despairing men. They have been accustomed to this from their youth, and they see nothing in the future which affords a single ray of hope. We have attended meetings in those districts, and have been received with the utmost enthusiasm by these round-frocked labourers. They would have carried us from the carriage which we had travelled in, to the hustings; and if a silly squire or a foolish farmer attempted any disturbance or improper interference, the round-frocked men were all around us in an instant, ready to defend us; and I have seen them hustle many a powerful man from the field in which the meeting was being held. (Cheers.) If there be one view of this question which more stimulates me to hard work in this cause than another, it is the fearful sufferings which I know to exist amongst the rural labourers in almost every part of this kingdom. (Hear, hear, and cheers.) How can they be men under the circumstances in which they live? During the period of their growing up to manhood, they are employed at odd jobs about the farm or the farm-yard, for wages which are merely those of little children in Lancashire. Every man who marries is considered an enemy to the parish; every child who is born into the world, instead of being a subject of rejoicing to its parents, and to the community, is considered as an intruder come to compete for the little work and the small quantity of food which is left to the population. (Cheers.) And then comes toil, year after year, long years of labour, with little remuneration; but perhaps at 60 or 70, a gift of 20s., and a coat, or of 2l. from the Agricultural Society, because they have brought up a large family, and have not committed that worst of all sins, taking money from the parochial rates. (Hear, hear.) One of their own poets has well expressed their condition:

"A blessed prospect—
To slave while there is strength—in age the workhouse,
A parish shell at last, and the little bell
Toll'd hastily for a pauper's funeral!"

But the crowning offence of the system of legislation under which we have been living is, that a law has been enacted, in which it is altogether unavoidable that these industrious and deserving men should be brought down to so helpless and despairing a condition. By withdrawing the stimulus of competition, the law prevents the good cultivation of the land of our country, and therefore diminishes the supply of food which we might derive from it. It prevents, at the same time, the importation of foreign food from abroad, and it also prevents the growth of supplies abroad, so that when we are forced to go there for them they are not to be found. The law is, in fact, a law of the most ingeniously malignant character. It is fenced about in every possible way. The most demoniacal ingenuity could not have invented a scheme more calculated to bring millions of the working-classes of this country to a state of pauperism, suffering, discontent, and insubordination than that Corn Law which we are now opposing. (Cheers.) And then a fat and sleek dean, a dignitary of the church and a great philosopher, recommends for the consumption of the people—he did not read a paper about the supplies that were to be had in the great valley of the Mississippi, but he said that there were Swede turnips and mangel wurzel; (great laughter)—and the Hereditary Earl Marshal of England, as if to out-herod Herod himself, recommends hot water and a pinch of curry-powder. (Renewed laughter and cheering.) I was rejoiced, not for the sake of the Duke of Norfolk, for I pitied him, but still I was in my heart rejoiced when I saw the speech which he had made in Sussex. The people of England have not, even under thirty years of Corn Law influence, been sunk so low as to submit tamely to this insult and wrong. (Cheers.) It is enough that a law should have been passed to make your toil valueless, to make your skill and labour unavailing to procure for you a fair supply of the common necessities of life—but when to this grievous iniquity they add the insult of telling you to go, like beasts that perish, to mangel wurzel, or to something which even the beasts themselves cannot eat, why then I believe the people of England will rise, and with one voice proclaim the downfall of this odious system. (Cheers.) This law is the parent of those grievous fluctuations in trade under which so much suffering is created in this commercial kingdom. Now there is a period coming—it may be as bad or worse than the last—when many a man, now feeling himself independent and comfortable in his circumstances, will find himself swept away by the torrent, and his goodly ship made a complete wreck. Capital avails almost nothing; fluctuations in trade we have, such as no prudence can guard against. We are in despair one year, and in a state of great excitement in the next. At one time ruin stares us in the face, at another we fancy that we are getting rich in a moment. Not only is trade sacrificed, but the moral character of the country is injured by the violent fluctuations created by this law. (Hear, hear.) And now have we a scarcity coming or not? They say that to be forewarned is to be forearmed, and that a famine foretold never comes. And so this famine could not have come if the moment we saw it to be coming we had had power to relieve ourselves by supplies of food from abroad. The reason why a famine foretold never comes, is because when it is foreseen and foretold, men prepare for it, and thus it never comes. But here, though it has been both foreseen and foretold, there is a law passed by a paternal legislature, remaining on the statute-book, which says to 27 millions of people, "Scramble for what there is, and if the poorest and the weakest starve, foreign supplies shall not come in for fear some injury should arise to the mortgaged landowners." (Hear, hear, and cheers.) Well, if this class of whom I have spoken have maintained this law for thirty years—if they continued it from 1838 to 1842—be assured that no feeling of mercy, no relenting, no sympathy for the sufferings of the people, will weigh one atom in the scale in making them give up the law now. (Hear, hear.) They have no one to whom they can look for a promise to maintain it; but we have some one to whom to look for a promise to repeal it. (Cheers.) But the promises of Lord John Russell, or any other minister, are entirely conditional. He knows that he alone cannot repeal the Corn Law. I had almost said that the overturning of the monarchy would be a trifle compared with the touching of the pockets of the squires. Lord John Russell himself has said that it can only be done by the unequivocal expression of the public will. (Hear, hear.) How is this expression to be made? Why, by meetings such as this, and by the meetings which myself and others have seen in all parts of the kingdom; and also by preparations of the most active character of that general election which, in all human probability is near upon us. (Hear, hear.) I believe you have heard that we had a meeting in Manchester the other day, which was attended by more of the wealth and influence of that district than I have ever seen assembled at a meeting of the same numbers before. It was resolved on Tuesday to have a general meeting of all those who were wishful to support the League in this great and final struggle. It has been announced that the council of the League are calling upon their friends throughout the country to raise a fund of 250,000*l.* for the purpose of being ready, in any emergency, and for the sake of maintaining before the ranks of the Protectionists, at least, as bold and resolute a character as we have maintained for the past seven years. (Loud cheers.) Now, that money will be subscribed as it is required, and that large sum will be paid, and I can promise this meeting and the country that it will be honestly and judiciously applied to carry out the great national object for which the League has been established. (Tremendous cheers.) If the protectionists like to defer the settlement of this question till the warm weather comes, we will not trouble our friends to tear themselves half to pieces in getting within the walls of this theatre, but we will ask them to meet here, in Manchester, Leeds, Glasgow, Sheffield, Birmingham, and other towns, in numbers so great, unanimity so remarkable, and resolution so undaunted, that the aristocracy of this country, with all their pride of ancestry and their boasted valour, will quail before the demonstration that will then be made. (Loud cheers.) Two centuries ago the people of this country were engaged in a fearful conflict with the Crown. A despotic and treacherous monarch assumed to himself the right to levy taxes without the consent of Parliament and the people. That assumption was resisted. This fair island became a battle field, the kingdom was convulsed, and an ancient throne overturned. Well, if our forefathers 200 years ago resisted that attempt—if they refused to be the bondmen of a king, shall we be the born thralls of an aristocracy like ours? (Loud cheers and shouts of No, no, no.) Shall we, who struck the lion down, shall we pay the wolf homage? or shall we not, by a manly and united expression of public opinion, at once, and for ever, put an end to this giant wrong? (Loud cheers.) Our cause is at least as good as theirs. We stand on higher vantage ground; we have large numbers at our back; we have more of wealth, intelligence, union, and knowledge of the political rights and the true interests of the country; and, what is more than all this—we have a weapon, a power, and machinery, which is a thousand times better than that of force, were it employed—I refer to the registration, and especially to the 40*s.* freehold, for that is the great constitutional weapon which we intend to wield, and by means of which we are sure to conquer, our laurels being gained, not in bloody fields, but upon the hustings and in the registration courts. (Cheers.) Now, I do hope, that if this law be repealed within the next six months, and if it should then be necessary that this League should disperse, I do trust that the people of England will bear in mind how great a panic has been created among the monopolist rulers by this small weapon, which we have discovered hid in the Reform Act, and in the constitution of the country—I would implore the middle and working classes to regard it as the portal of their deliverance, as the strong and irresistible weapon before which the domination of this hereditary peerage must at length be laid in the dust. The hon. gentleman resumed his seat amid loud and prolonged cheering.

Mr. W. J. Fox upon advancing, was greeted with the loudest plaudits, which having subsided, he proceeded to speak as follows: I should rather have avoided speaking this evening had I not been previously announced, not from any indisposition to be in active sympathy with this magnificent meeting, but because of the unpleasantness of the present confused state of the political atmosphere—the uncertainty that hangs over our condition—our Parliament not at its post—one administration out, we scarcely know why, and another administration delaying to come in, we scarcely know where—friends and enemies confusedly mixed, so that we cannot discriminate the one from the other, and the whole political condition of the country a chaos, the darkness of which may be felt, but where nothing is seen—a fog in which one cannot breathe, and where one longs for every coming day to bring some decisive information as to who are to be practically the rulers of the country, what difficulties our cause is next to struggle with, or to what triumphs our cause is about to advance. One longs for some certainty in which to rest; one wants this confusion to have a speedy termination, that we may not have to think and speak hypothetically, that our desires and wishes may not be contingent on something as yet unascertained; and our whole course like the old Castilian oath of allegiance, which was to obey the sovereign if he preserved their laws and privileges; but if not, not—the last negation being often much more important than the positive by which it was preceded. But there are circumstances on which to fall back; there are facts in the state of the country; there are truths in the principles we hold; there are assured hopes in the prospects opening before us, where we find something like solid footing; and it is to turn the mind away from the uncertainties of the passing day, and to fix it on these certainties that I would now endeavour to direct your attention. (Cheers.) Of these, some are sad and some are joyous; but still they furnish in their combination the elements and materials to which we have to look for the completion of the great work so long, honourably, and successfully carried on by the leaders of the League. The first certainty, I take it, that we can discern in looking around us is a dreary one; it is, that the country is short in its supply of food, and that its means are not in the best condition for making good the deficiency. At first this allegation was met, as so many truths have been met from the same quarter, by a brazen denial. We were told by the Protection Society in the first floors of No. 17, Bond-street (laughter), that it was an insidious and base delusion; that this outcry of coming scarcity was got up for selfish and interested purposes. We were told that nobody knew—they did not themselves know—what the harvest was; but they contradicted the assertion of scarcity by the assurance that they would write down to their local societies, and get back satisfactory information. The denial has now faded away; it was too daring, in the face of ascertained facts, to be any longer adhered to. (Hear, hear.) There is a deficiency of supply; there is peril of scarcity; and scarcity to a nation is famine and starvation to thousands of individuals. There is peril; or why these commissioners to inquire into the state of the potato crop in Ireland? There is scarcity; or why the rejoicing of the Somersetshire farmers, that this season promised to be more remunerative than the last; that is, the price of food would be higher in consequence of deficient quantity? There is danger; or why these suggestions of all sorts of preposterous substitutes for human food? Why learned disquisitions on the different roots that may be brought into play as food, or of the compounds of "peppers and that sort of thing," with which water may be made to comfort the human frame? There is something—there is truth in the apprehension, or why the breaking up of one Government, and the difficulties that exist as to the formation of another? Then where are we as to the supply that should come in readily, that the wealth of this country should set flowing in from all other countries, to stay even the apprehension, and to put down the fear of the most timorous as to such tremendous consequences? Why the sliding scale, with all its boasted operations, is rendered altogether useless; the bad wheat keeps down the price, and keeps up the duty; and with eatable corn at famine prices, we are turning back importation from our doors. We had a little stock of foreign corn in bond; but under the operation of the same law, that leaves our shores in the time of our own want, and amid all our apprehensions quits our land to seek the more provident, just, and careful regions that open their ports and invite supplies from other people the moment the danger appears above the verge of the horizon. (Cheers.) The fields that should supply us—the rich fertile fields, of which there are so many thousand square miles on the Continent of Europe and in the vast prairies of America—they have not borne the corn that might be sent for now to feed the population of these realms; they have not been tilled, because the restrictive system gave the cultivator no prospect of a market here, however much the food might be wanted. Monopoly here has laid on them in the distance the curse of sterility; it has arrested the arm of the cultivator, and robbed him of his profits and us of our provisions. (Cheers.) To this has that boasted system brought us which has been lauded as though it were the perfection of human wisdom. Here ends the sliding scale, smashed in the moment of trial, ridiculously inefficient to cope with the emergency that has occurred; showing that, from beginning to end, the system has been full of fallacy,—false in its profession of rendering the country independent of foreign supplies; false in its promises of promoting cultivation, so that it should be adequate to the demand; false in its promise of giving the farmers stimulating and remunerating prices; false in its declaration of utility to the labouring classes, the proportion of whose numbers employed in the cultivation of the land as a percentage of the whole population has been regularly diminishing; false in its promised connection with the stability of our means and the increase of our prices; from first to last one mass of falsehood, engendered by the sordid cupidity of a class, carried by interested majorities with indecent haste, under the protection of bayonets, in the face of popular commotion, supported by one administration after another, to curry favour with those who commanded votes in the House of Commons, and formed a great body of the House of Lords—prolonged, altered, and tinkered in various ways, in order to meet particular exigencies, but still retaining its original sin—fallacious at the end as it was at the beginning, and deserving to perish, as I trust it soon will, amid universal contempt and execration. (Cheers.) A time of trial and privation is before the people of these lands; they have borne such again and again; but there is something more formidable in the prospect now; it is more distinctly anticipated; its privation in many respects will be aggravated by the general knowledge of the cause from which those privations flow, and the means by which, with wiser and juster rulers, they might have been avoided. The horrors of past times will come back with aggravated force upon us and those great capitalists in the country who, while this matter was not understood, subjected themselves to severe losses—who struggled as they might through times of depressed trade and of heavy losses—who kept their works going by drains on their own resources, or what should have been their own reserved private fortunes, and thus formed some sort of employment, although for diminished time, and consequently diminished wages, to the great mass of operatives. Can we, therefore, expect that, now that every body knows that it is not Providence, but unjust laws—now that an exposed and exploded system is seen to be the origin and source of this—can we expect of them with any reasonableness that they should make themselves martyrs for the sake of the monopoly under which they suffer and groan, that they shall ruin themselves in order to avert some few of the operations of a law which is still obstinately upheld by its authors, that they should interpose, as it were, between the dead and the living, and themselves perish in the strife, when they know that it is by the alteration of the law, and by that alone, that master and workman can hope to hold on his course, and get safe through this time of peril? (Cheers.) We have no right to expect any such conduct of them, nor can we look without apprehension at the mode in which, when there is a deficiency, the food in the country has to be distributed; for if there is not enough, do we not know that there are plenty of persons in the country that will be sure to have sufficient for themselves? Do we not know that the division of the deficient supply will be much for the wealthy and little for the poor; that there will be meat for these, and bones for those,—food for the one class, and garbage for the others; that there will be the same sort of division as between the lion and the jackal, when the prey seized is not enough for the stronger and more rapacious creature's appetite? Such will be the condition of the several classes; and let no man in comfortable circumstances wrap his warm cloak about him, and hug himself in the thought, that however it may fall with others, he shall get through this time; it will not retrench his table; he has a relish for potatoes, but he can do without them,—he will be furnished with his usual supply of dainties, and will live in his customary state of luxury. Let not any one, I say, be making himself comfortable in this way, for there is an atmosphere of evil that cannot be restrained. If you set up typhus fever in St. Giles, the effluvia will spread abroad, and press into the parlours of St. James's (cheers); if there be want, and hunger, and desperation in some classes, it will be felt by others; aye, the most easy and the most comfortable. They will have to look well to their doors at nights,—they will have to barricade their windows,—they will have to take care of their pockets when they walk the streets,—they will be wise to avoid lonely roads, especially if they are known to have money about them; there will be danger everywhere. Want and desperation are the sources of crime and violence; if we subject England to the privations of Ireland, we shall import the outrages of Ireland, and our comfortable man will find his slumbers broken, and he will scarcely sleep the better for having pistols near his pillow, or every night when he retires, feeling it expedient to call for his bed-candle and his blunderbuss. Throughout all the ranks and classes of society, the pressure that is set up too heavily for one portion to endure brings a reaction upon other portions of society. "No doubt we shall get through it;" that is to say, the British islands will not be swamped in the ocean; the race by which they are inhabited will not become extinct; we shall get through somehow; but with how many shattered fortunes and broken hearts? With how many families plunged into desolation who had before them the fairest prospects? With how many of the sturdy operative classes, their frames attenuated, until, as happened the last time that distress visited us, when there was work they found their muscular strength so gone, that their frames were unable to go through with it. We shall get along and survive it; the soil and people of the country will survive it; but what dreary monuments and recollections of it will be left! What sad testimonies will there be to the iniquity of this system in churchyards crowded with dead corruption, and gaols crowded with living corruption! (Loud cheers.) If I see dismal certainties in the condition of the country, and no appearance as yet of legislative interposition to ward off the danger, no Government at work, no administration in existence, I turn on the other hand and behold the people of this country in one of the truest and proudest positions they ever occupied. Come the danger when it may, be the suffering what it will, in the sight of heaven and earth it is not the fault of the people of this country, but of their rulers. (Hear, hear.) For years now have the great truths of political economy, throwing light on our state interests and duties, been, one may say, studied by the population of the country; they have been the subject of discussions. Topics that had been confined to the pages of philosophers and sages have been made familiar to public meetings; they have analysed and compared and deliberated. Opinion has gradually advanced, and has been declared again and again in its strength and clearness. Whilst there was a hope in petitioning Parliament, the people did petition; when that was turned from with disgust at the disregard with which it was treated, they then looked to themselves and their resources. Money was wanted, and it was subscribed; the registration was suggested, and they have registered, and will register by tens and twenties of thousands more. No state pilot sung out from the mast head that there were breakers; the warning of the danger was not given to the people by the Government; the people had to give it themselves, and the notion grew up amongst them, and was canvassed and found to have something in it: its truth was ascertained, but they were left to work all this out as they could. Information was denied by the last Parliament as to the progress of agricultural produce in this country, no official helps have been given now for comprehending our condition; the people have done it all themselves; they have seen the danger; they have sounded the alarm; they are demanding the remedy; they are prepared for the assertion of the only principles that can guide us through this difficulty. They began to assemble first in town councils, remonstrating quietly with Government upon opening the ports; then in chambers of commerce, and bodies of that description, still going on deliberately and gradually; then in larger meetings; and now multitudinous assemblages in every great town and city throughout the country, north, south, east, and west: they are raising their clamour for our deliverance from this impending storm, speaking in a voice of thunder: Whosoever duty is neglected they are doing theirs; and in their great peaceful decisive movement, in the firm step they take, in the onward ground by which they advance to the possession of it, we see what in other countries would be a convulsion and revolution, but which here is only the firm march of the people to the possession of justice and the enjoyment of their rights. (Loud cheers.) Where are those who should have taken this charge off the people's hands? Who should have done this for them? Who should have been foremost? Where is the suggestion of the remedy? Where is the great party that fought for and won the government of the country, and drove the Whigs from office,—that boasted of having gained the perpetual tenancy of the seats they held, and to have the wisdom and the power to render office subservient to the right government of the nation? Where are they—that mighty party so much talked of? It took 10 long years in its formation, and great were the toils and many the expedients that were employed to build it up to its towering grandeur. It welcomed comers from all quarters: there was not a discontent of whatever description throughout the country with which it did not affect to sympathize in order to get its little modicum of support; its recruiting sergeants were everywhere offering high bounties: apostates from every principle, and professors of every principle were alike welcomed into its ranks. There was no principle but what some of its members professed to hold, no principle but what some of its members abjured. It sympathized with the proud aristocracy of Whiggism and with the fierce democracy of Chartism—it held out its fraternal hand alike to the Anti-Roman Catholic dissenter and to the Romanizing Puseyite; it professed to adhere to absolute monarchy on the one hand, while some of its orators were reminding Queen Victoria of the abdication of James II.; it thought every thing a bait that would catch a fish;—and thus collected its band together. The time of trial came; its proud majority of 90 was ascertained, and then the great party, with the great Premier at its head, marched triumphantly into office, drums beating and colours flying:—"See the conquering hero comes." There they were safely housed, thence to dispense law and justice to the world; in doing which they are now confessing the astounding truth that, for these four years they have been voting against their own consciences; and all at once, in their pride and plenitude of power, just as the architect was exclaiming, "The mighty structure stands complete:" "Is not this Great Babylon that I have built to the glory of my name?" his Babylon falls to pieces in a marvellous confusion of tongues; the whole vanishes away, and like the magician deserted by his demons, he is left forlorn. (Loud cheers and laughter.) There he is, left alone on the wide waste to endure the pelting of the pitiless storm—a more pitiless storm from all quarters than has ever been on any public man in my recollection. (Renewed cheers.) And perhaps it will one day be felt to be too pitiless. There is one thing, which all the world seems to have made up its mind not to believe in, and that is, the sincerity of Sir R. Peel. (Laughter.) I cannot profess my faith in it, but if it be true that he has broken up this great party that was banded at his back—that he has forfeited his own grasp of office and power from a sense that the condition of the country needed measures the reverse of what he had hitherto in some particulars supported—that the only remedy for their distress was that entire freedom of trade which his colleagues, or some one or more of them, would not co-operate with him in producing: if upon such grounds and for such reasons he has thrown himself out of his position, and is ready to co-operate with those who will promote the same great ends of securing the freedom of food for the people of this country, why then I do say, that if not confidence, he has gratitude; if we do not believe him for the future, we have reason to thank him for that one thing in the past; and nothing in his public life will have become him like the leaving it, and for that act let him have the full measure of the approval and thankfulness to which such a deed is most assuredly entitled. (Hear, hear, and loud cheers.) Well, then, there is the other party; those who are not in, although their opponents are out: who seem to take a pretty large time in considering whether they shall come in. Grateful as I am to Lord John Russell, as well as Sir Robert Peel, for the letter which is completely intelligible, as well as the resignation, which is not yet completely intelligible—I must nevertheless look with some anxiety to the restoration of the Whig Ministry to office. If they do come, in I trust—and I believe the people of the country join me in that hope—that it will be with the determination, at once to carry the repeal of the Corn Laws completely unshackled, and to admit of no compromise whatever. This we expect of them, and also that they should omit no means within their reach for the accomplishment of that object. (Hear, hear.) There must be no squeamishness; no deference to absurd and pernicious prejudices. If to carry this measure through the Commons a coalition with Sir Robert Peel be necessary, why then there should be a coalition with him. (Hear, hear.) We have had many coalitions for party purposes; the country would not find fault with one for patriotic purposes. (Cheers.) If a creation of Peers should be necessary to carry the measure through the other House, the country looks then to have it done. (Renewed cheers.) It wants no delaying, paltering, and temporising as there seemed to be at one time when the Reform Bill was in jeopardy from the Peers. And why should they not make Peers? Can they make any who will be worse than some who now sit in that House? (Hear, hear.) If such swamping hurts the dignity of the House of Lords, why all the good that the House of Lords does this country, as far as I know, is not for a moment to be compared with the mischief that the Corn Law does this country. (Hear, hear.) If a dissolution be necessary, they should dissolve Parliament; and, if needs be, dissolve it again. (Hear.) They should give the people the chance of the next registration as well as the last. They should let those who are qualifying themselves to speak out politically—who are buying the character of county voters—buying their emancipation at 50*l.* a piece or more—they should give them an opportunity of using a voice they thus purchase. Let them have fair play; let the registration reform, which has been commenced in the north, be carried on to the south: let it be extended to every county in the kingdom; and then take the voice of the people of England, and not till then can you get the voice of the people of England through the means of Parliamentary representation. If all this will not do, why let them throw up office again, and fight out this battle in the ranks of opposition, assured that if they failed to carry it in the one case they must succeed in the other. (Hear.) I would say further to this party, in coming in, "Identify yourselves with the people; sympathize more with them than you have been accustomed to do in this matter. (Loud cheers.) No doubt some of the noble members of that party are amongst the most illustrious-titled, or untitled, that the country now bears; but still for all that, for all one's gladness to see them there, the old familiar names, if not in every case the old familiar faces; still for all that, it does not accord with the tone and temper of the English people at this time,—it does not agree with the feeling and notions which this agitation has fostered and matured in their minds, that we should be altogether under the government of lords, though they be Whig lords, or that the business of the country should not have some men of business, trained in the ranks where alone they can best acquire the knowledge of such practical transactions. For some of these the country looks. I need not say in what direction; but it anticipates, and demands, that the Commons of England be represented in the Cabinet. (Loud cheers.) As they may not be so open to admonition when once they are snugly housed in Downing-street, I will go on a little further to say, that they will be wise to whip themselves up more closely to a level with public opinion, and that especially if they aspire again to be the leaders of this nation. Now, in this question before us, this principle of Free Trade, sixty years ago all the philosophical minds in this country came to an agreement upon the matter. They saw that interference with the people's food was a nuisance, and a thing which no legislature ought to attempt. Thirty years ago, when the first Corn Law was passed, the first of this series of Corn Laws, the multitude of this metropolis had an inkling of the question, a sort of glimpse bursting into the darkness of their minds, and they offered what rough, rude obstruction they could to the passing of that monopoly act of the present system. Twenty years ago, the question expanded itself, and descended from the philosopher to the expositor, taught by reviewers and by journalists, by those whose office it is to stand between the profound thinkers and the enquiring many; they familiarised the minds of thousands with it, and brought it on another stage. Ten years after this, the manufacturers of Manchester found where the shoe was pinching: they traced the difficulties and struggles that they had to undergo to this preposterous and iniquitous system. They made up their minds, and they took their course; they entered on the course which they have ever since so nobly pursued. Five or six years ago we may say that the public generally of Great Britain became decided upon this question, and multitudinous meetings reiterated the intelligent expression of their determinations on an alteration of plans which had worked so mischievously. Two or three weeks ago, my Lord John Russell came in, having the advantage, by 18 days, of the resignation of Sir Robert Peel,—perhaps about 18 hours of the determination of that Right Hon. Baronet. These two great leading statesmen of the country thus following at the heels of the farmers,—of the meetings and multitudes, of the manufacturers,—of the expositors and philosophers that had gone before,—coming with all their leading power at the very end of the time, making it a most important point which of them should arrive first at the goal—having, after 20 years' hesitation, the two of them, to run as fast as magicians are said to run upon Hallowe'en, I believe it is called, when the devil has a right to take his own—(laughter)—they accomplished their race seemingly with all the speed arising from the principle of "the devil take the hindmost,"—and of those that should have been first, that should have gone at the head of the people,—of the mass of the manufacturers—we can only say as was said of a certain race-horse, "although he was behind before, he was first at last." (Laughter.) Now this will not do in carrying out the principles of Free Trade; there must be a struggle of a bolder spirit than is here shown. There must be real leading of the country—leading it on; and it will not do for them to sit like the gods of Epicurus, in the clouds, enjoying their own leisure and dignity, and looking down on mankind in their toils and struggles. If they would have us rest with confidence upon them as the men who are to work out the deliverance of the country, let them show themselves amongst us; let them give their active and decided countenance to what can only be achieved by a great movement of the industrial masses: let them come forth and help the power which they invite to back them, and strengthen them in office: let us see their subscriptions of thousands down towards the proposed quarter of a million, or another quarter of a million of their own, if they like, raised among the Whig aristocracy, to combine with that raised by the manufacturers and the commonalty. Let them do this, and there is no strength and confidence, there is no heartiness of co-operation, nay, there is no child-like sympathy and facility of guidance that they will not find in the people of this country, knowing whom they trust, as in such a case, with evidence of this sort, they may do confidently with their whole hearts and minds. Let them think over the matter; there is something worth their subscribing for. As manufacturers count the cost, as they look to the falling off of their orders—as they see how their trade is affected by the action of restrictive legislation—as they put down their subscriptions to the League in some sort as an insurance for the future—let the liberal aristocracy do the like; let it count the cost or the worth of its stars and garters, and subscribe accordingly; let it count the worth of its fertile fields and that security of improvement which they will derive from the establishment of Free Trade principles, and from their influence in enriching the country. Let them count if they can what a nation's confidence and gratitude are worth. These are all before them—safety, honour, and the noblest powers that man can exercise over his fellow man; and they surely deserve some demonstration of fellowship in this good cause, and fraternity in what they tell us shall be our common cause; and let it be manifest on their part, and they know very well there will be no lack of responsive demonstration on our parts. (Cheers.) There is a third party in the State of whom something is known in this matter—or rather, a man with a party in his pocket, which, considering his years, he carries with wonderful ease. (Laughter.) Sed is the anticipation expressed in so many quarters that European honour and a European name should be tarnished in the latter years of life by struggling against the rights of a country—their rights in that most important article, the free importation of their food at times of apprehended scarcity. Oh, could voice of remonstrance reach that old man's ears—for we may not yet say—

"Down Marlborough's cheeks the tears of dotage flow"—Could we reach his ears, our language would be something like this: Man, upon whose brows are the laurels of a hundred fights, and in whose pocket are the proxies of 60 peers,—True, you conquered Napoleon; you have his statue in your mansion—look at it well, and its marble lips may seem to speak to you and warn you of a deeper fall than his whom you hurled from his high eminence. (Cheers.) Though you were the conqueror of Napoleon, I would say, remember, there are certain differences and contrasts in your characters and histories. You won many a brilliant battle; won it with troops well trained, troops, the flower of the English people; while he had to invent the art of war to baffle the most accomplished generals of Europe with raw regiments, who had never before entered the battle field, nor knew aught but by report of the dangers they should face or the exertions they had to make; and yet with these he commenced that splendid series of victories of Lodi, Marengo, Austerlitz, and Jena, which will beam and blaze so fearfully for ages upon the page of military history. You, Duke of Wellington, have won principalities and broad estates in many of the countries of Europe; but he did more, he won realms, kingdoms, crowns, and empires. You have been the servant of monarchs, and have rendered them good service, supporting for a while their tottering thrones; he made himself the master of sovereigns, and compelled them to wait like menials in his ante-room. (Cheers.) You, by Catholic emancipation, freed your fellow-subjects from civil disabilities; he throughout Europe opened a career for talents and showed them the path for energetic exertion, by which any one might rise from the lowest ranks to the highest, by the force of his ability. Such has been the difference of your courses. You have equestrian statues. But wander over Europe; bridges here and aqueducts there—open squares in one place and roads cut across mountains in others—these are the monumental records of Napoleon; identifying his name with the progress of art and the grandeur of any nation that has advanced high in civilisation. With all this difference, remember, that the date of the Berlin Decrees was that of the commencement of the fall of Napoleon. Powerful against armies, resistless by monarchs, he fought against the laws of trade, and they "crushed him like a weed." (Loud cheers.) From that moment hearts left him; the injury which he inflicted on every country to which his proscriptive system extended, alienated their feelings. When he raised fresh armies they were filled with traitors or thinned by deserters, until at last the tide of battle followed the tide of human feeling, and there followed his deposition, exile, imprisonment, and death at St. Helena. Duke of Wellington, take warning; remember, that if the Berlin Decrees brought on the downfall of Napoleon; so in all that is most precious to man, the Corn Laws may mark the downfall of the Duke of Wellington. (Tremendous cheering.) You would be more humbled in that than the man you vanquished; and with withered laurels, with a stained name—with reverence alienated that was long paid so readily—you will go to your grave coupled with him you defeated in this, that you both

"Leave a name, at which the world grew pale,
To point a moral and adorn a tale."

That moral is that no political ascendancy, no mere station, no strength of party—no antiquity of prestige—can successfully maintain battle against the laws of nature, of which the laws of trade, as Edmund Burke has taught us, are part and parcel. They are the laws of nature; a manifestation of the same Providence, characterized by the same universality and omnipotence. (Cheers.) And not only has trade its laws, but opinion—opinion in its progress according to the circumstances of modern civilisation. I believe that the advance of this agitation is referable to those same principles, and that we shall find in it an exhibition of the operation of those self-same laws. It has grown, this agitation, as the glacier grows on the mountain top. The snows descend silently and softly, like the progress of conviction in individual minds, penetrating and abiding, yet not attracting notice. Every passing cloud drops more and more, and one stratum accumulates upon another, and then the wild winds that rage and the biting frost in its severity do but knit it the firmer, and make it the stronger and more compact; and still as the seasons return, the winter which forbids the growth of vegetation, gives growth and nutriment to this same mass in its progress, and through years and ages it accumulates, and is bound together by the freezing atmosphere, firm and fast, like the opinion—the riveted opinion and principles of enlightened multitudes; and then by its very growth and magnitude the time for moving comes; by its own weight it is loosened—it rushes down, the avalanche, and bears all before it; and no trophy of military greatness; no senate house, however venerable; no palace, however splendid; no church, however towering, can stop its progress; down it rushes over all, turning even the ancient rivers from their courses, and thus sweeps away the monuments of man, proclaiming that nature's laws are like nature's God—are vested with omnipotence; and that they are resisted only to the destruction of their opposers. (Enthusiastic cheers.) In the determination which these meetings evince, in the growing power of popular opinion, in the certainty that whether we can or cannot rely upon Sir Robert Peel or Lord John Russell, we can rely upon ourselves—in that is our hope and our strength for the future. You have petitioned; you have resolved; you have remonstrated; many of you have registered; and many more will possess yourselves of the 40*s.* franchise. You will do this until it is achieved through the length and breadth of the land; and if that does not win the battle, you will do more than this—you will do whatever is necessary; and the means will be found—honourable, legal, and peaceable—for the accomplishment of your purpose. Towards that you are advancing in a march that nothing can resist, because your reliance is upon principles that are everlasting, and universal as truth itself. You have identified your cause with this power of truth; that must fail; the experience of ages must be reversed; the maxims of the wisest must be proved folly, before you can flinch in your course: and when once you have worked out this great and good achievement; when you have done what is to be done for grappling with and abating the pressure of temporary suffering; when beyond that, you have made this country pre-eminent in the world for the adoption of a liberal and generous policy; when the blessings of Free Trade are felt through the nations as averting wars, and keeping down the rage of hostile feeling and antagonistic passions; when experience has taught the most backward of them to acknowledge that at last you have rightly guided them in the course of peace, prosperity, and of social advancement; Oh, then, it will be the disposition of mankind at large to render honour in the records of historians to whom honour is due, and in that sort of pyramid which the world will pile in commemoration of this grand event, of this peaceful, just, and fraternal policy, there may be the names of political and party leaders at the base, but above them will be the names of philosophers, our Adam Smith, and other enlightened men, whose works made the subject understood, and prepared the way for those blessed changes; and above them will be the practical men, your Bright, and Cobden, and their fellow-labourers (cheers) the real abolishers of the Corn Law, so far as individuals are able—above them, and above all, will be the inscription of the world's gratitude to the people of England, for that they enforced the adoption of a Free Trade policy. (Vehement cheering.) Well is it that you should raise your voice for marshalling on this mighty and blessed change, now when the exigencies of the time render immediate action necessary; and I will add that you should do it now is not unfitting, at this particular season of the year; for if there be a cause—if there ever has been a cause—discussed in public meetings, intermixed with political antagonisms, which deserves the name of "holy, sacred, and Christian," it is this. And when you raise, as you do, your shouts of gratitude and acclamation for the abolition of restriction, and for the establishment of a brotherly policy inducing brotherly love among all varieties of the human species, you are, in fact, sending back the echo of earth to the song of angels of "Glory to God in the highest, with peace on earth and good will among men." It is almost impossible to describe the alternations of intense interest and enthusiastic applause which accompanied the delivery of the above most eloquent address, or the prolonged burst of applause which followed its close.

Mr. COBDEN then came forward and proposed three cheers for Free Trade, which was instantly complied with.

AGRICULTURE.

WHO WILL MARCH THROUGH COVENTRY?

Another attempt is to be made upon the gullibility of the farmers. The Corn Laws are given up as untenable by every public man with any pretension to talent or influence. The farmers themselves are anxiously desirous that the question should be settled, and that speedily, in the only way it can be settled, by a total and immediate repeal. The protectionist Ministers are, it is said, preparing to propose to the monopolist Parliament the complete abrogation of the Corn Laws—so strong, so irresistible, has become the public opinion of their impolicy. Yet, in spite of all these things, in utter disregard of the teachings of experience, that blind section of the landed oligarchy, of which the Duke of Richmond is the leader and the type, seeks again to arouse the farmers to bellow for the lost monopoly.

Now, before the British farmer consents to march through Coventry with the Duke of Richmond's (politically) ragged regiment, let him take a rational review of the backward movement of the "protectionist cause" during the past two years, and then let him say whether he can do anything except make himself ridiculous, by marching at the word of command from the room in Bond-street?

It was about this time two years that land-lordism, alarmed by the progress Free Trade opinions were making amongst the farmers, established the "protection societies," and got up for a moment a kind of galvanic agitation in support of monopoly. We then hailed that agitation as a valuable adjunct to our own efforts in favour of a Free Trade in corn. We well knew that monopoly could not open its mouth without speaking its own condemnation; and we were right glad to find the monopolist landocracy driven into the necessity of maintaining its wrong by argument, and the result has justified our expectations. Hundreds and hundreds of farmers who had not come within the influence of the direct arguments of the Free Traders, went home from "protection" meetings, disgusted with the rancorous spirit and unseemly violence of the protectionist landowners, to ponder over and soon to detect and despise their false assertions and fallacious reasoning. Then came the "lard and grease" defences of monopoly in the House of Commons, by Mr. Miles and his feeble clique, the Duke of Richmond's unblushing pleas in the House of Lords for his salmon and timber monopolies, and the growl of every "conservative" public man, who had a character for anything but stupidity, that "protection" could never survive such defences as had been made on its behalf. Then, the Corn Laws have been proved ineffectual to give the farmer the prices promised by Sir Robert Peel in 1842, while they have proved most efficient in converting a deficiency into present scarcity with a prospect of famine.

Then the League, which was to have been annihilated by the protection societies, has steadily grown in power and influence. It has drawn forth from the repertoires of the constitution the 40s. franchise, and has shown how the landed oligarchy may be met and conquered on its own ground. Two of the largest, most populous, most industrious, and most wealthy divisions of English counties have been won by the Free Traders. The metropolitan county, and several others, have been made too hot for monopolists at any future election. Some 10 or 12 other counties, or divisions of counties, are in the course of being converted from monopolist into Free Trade strongholds.

The monopolists have not a public man amongst them fit to undertake the lowest responsible office in the government of a country, much less to form an administration. The Duke of Richmond, their leader, is a shallow, vain, and selfish man, who moreover knows full well the utter prostration of the monopolists—is only half in earnest, and ready at any moment to swap the whole influence of the clique "in Bond street," for substantial favours to his kith and kin. But were the Duke of Richmond as politically honest as he is hollow, he could no more form a ministry than he could create a world. For the maintenance of the restrictive system, then, there is no chance; and it behoves every farmer who regards the welfare of his class to come forward and declare that all this turmoil and uncertainty, bitterness and strife, shall have an end.

If more was required to prove the utter uselessness of any further effort to sustain the Corn Laws, it would be found in the statements and admissions of the melancholy remnant of the protectionist party which assembled at the room in Bond-street on Tuesday last. There the muster consisted of between "fifty and sixty" landowners and tenant farmers, the peerage being represented by the Duke of Richmond and the Marquis of Salisbury; the only members of the House of Commons present were Messrs. W. Miles, Stafford O'Brien, Newdegate, and Heathcote. This shows the low estate of the monopolist cause. And then the speeches and the report were more like funeral orations over the dead Corn Laws, than stirring appeals to their defenders.

The Duke of Richmond began by stating that since their last annual meeting "a certain number of individuals," who formerly called themselves "friends of the farmer," who stated boldly on the hustings their adherence to our opinions, and who said that they were willing to give protection to agriculture, had since changed their opinions." He then referred to the letter of Lord John Russell, at which he did not wonder, and the adhesion of Lord Morpeth to the League, at which he did wonder; gave his own word that the potato failure was a "delusion," and called upon the farmers "to agitate the country in favour of protection." He urged them to consent to no compromise; hoped there was no truth in the Times report that the Government is about to repeal the Corn Laws, promised to re-say in the House of Lords all the nonsense he had there and then uttered, and sat down.

Mr. Stafford O'Brien, chairman of the Publication Committee, then read a report, embodying statistical returns made by the branch societies, to show that the potato-crop had not failed, and other matters equally surprising and true!! But what cannot a publication committee prove, who contrived to make Adam Smith bear testimony in favour of monopoly?

Mr. Thomas, a tenant farmer, made the comfortable assurance to the meeting that "if the percentage of the diseased potatoes were taken away, there would remain nearly the same available amount of potatoes as in ordinary years!" We presume the salvo for Mr. Thomas's veracity is to be found in the indefinite meaning of the word "nearly."

Mr. Bennett, a farmer and auctioneer, of Bedfordshire, made this, to the monopolists, startling admission—"that the everlasting meddling with agriculture was its greatest bane. There was no security whatever. When they sowed, they did not know but some newfangled notion would be promulgated, and perhaps adopted, before their crop was secured. This awful insecurity of everything relating to the soil was calculated to drive a wise man mad. He confessed, if it were to come to a total repeal, he said the sooner the better." True, Mr. Bennett, most true, and a capital Free Trade argument.

Then followed Mr. Allnatt, of Berkshire, who seems to be just one of those imaginative gentlemen who suit protection meetings; for after sundry ideal statements, he said, "Supposing that League principles had been adopted, and that League predictions had been fulfilled, that the poor soils would be thrown out of cultivation," &c. &c. &c. Now, it so happens that the League prediction is, not that poor soils will be thrown out of cultivation, but that poor soils, and all soils in this country, will certainly be more highly cultivated than at present, as soon as the Corn Laws are repealed; that nothing can prevent such improvement but the blindest obstinacy on the part of the owners of such soils. However, as protectionist statements of fact rank amongst the wildest works of fiction of the day, it may be scarcely worth while to set Mr. Allnatt right. This gentleman ended with the discovery that "the League had been nearly dead up to the time when the two noble lords, Russell and Morpeth, thought fit to join and resuscitate it." That might be a pleasant delusion for a gentleman to indulge in the seclusion of his farm in Berkshire, but those who have chanced to come into collision with the League have had pretty plain proof of its vitality. Thus, Mr. Wm. Miles, who has felt the force of the grip of the League leaders in the House of Commons, said:

"He would touch upon one point which Mr. Allnatt had mentioned. He said that the League would have been dead but for the support and assistance of Lord J. Russell and Lord Morpeth. Let the farmers of England not so deceive themselves. The League was still using the most active exertions, and it would require all their energies to prevent those exertions from being successful. From what he heard, he was afraid that so many Free Traders had been placed upon the registration in South Lancashire and in the West Riding of Yorkshire, that it was very doubtful whether they would not carry those elections."

He alluded to the possibility that his own seat might be endangered by the Bath and Bristol Leaguers, and he added:

"Now, though they could not, and would not, interfere in elections, as the League did, yet much was to be done by union—much by the friendly intercourse at market and at farmers' tables—much by energy, perseverance, and determination; and, if they were all united, let them remember the great force they carried along with them in their labourers, who were their 40s. Freeholders."

Does Mr. Miles mean to say the monopolists will qualify the agricultural labourers and 40s. freeholders? We wish they would try it.

Mr. Newdegate, whose seat in Warwickshire is likely to become a little too warm, was greatly irate with the League, but gave this (for a monopolist landowner) curious reason for the growing influence of the League:

"The recent support given to the League has arisen from the fact, that they stood in need of a diversion of attention. Men's minds had become tired and disgusted with their old talk and their old practices, and to this account might be attributed the new adherents they had gained."

Mr. Heathcote's speech was quite that of a Corn Law martyr. "Whatever changes had occurred in the opinions of others, his own were unaltered." Whereat the little band of despondents cheered vehemently. He added:

"He well knew that they had many difficulties to encounter in fighting this question. Many eminent men on both sides in the House of Commons, he feared, were against them. He feared that the recent declarations of the leaders of the Whigs showed that they were opposed to them; while speeches made last session by several of the Conservative leaders showed that they took far too low a tone—that they, in a great measure, gave up the principle for which the agriculturists were contending. He was aware that great odds were placed against them—that they had to contend with many highly talented men who were against them; but, in the midst of this gloom, there were still some rays of hope to which they could cling."

Now, this is not a very hopeful frame of mind wherein to march to the relief of monopoly, under such leadership as that of Richmond and Miles.

A Mr. Weale was very learned about malt as food for stock, and said:

"One fact had been alluded to of great importance to graziers—the feeding of cattle on malt. They were told that the importation of cattle under the tariff would do the British grazier no harm. Now it appeared that the first year there were 1100 cattle imported, in the next year there were 2900, and last year there were 11,000. This was a fact of great importance. Why did they find the Belgian and other foreign breeders going round the country and purchasing the best bulls and cows they could procure? Why, but because they had been in the markets of the metropolis, and saw the kind of cattle that were wanted there, and were now endeavouring to supply them. They were told that they might easily compete with foreigners in the breeding of cattle. But to show the meeting the disadvantages under which the British grazier laboured, it would be enough to state that they were prevented from converting their inferior barley into malt. The foreigner was not prevented from doing so; but in consequence of this prohibition, the British grazier was compelled to purchase oil-cake, which was the produce of another country. Look at the large quantity of barley in the market that was not fit for malting, a large proportion of which might be usefully converted into malt for feeding cattle."

Poor Mr. Weale seems to be a simple chap, who has slept since the fancy of malt feeding was in being, now nearly two years ago, and forgot to mention—if he knew it—two other "important facts," that, notwithstanding the importation, stock is selling at very high prices, and that free import of grain would give British breeders and graziers an ample supply of grain at moderate prices. We estimate the farmer's gain from this alone at 20s. an acre. We must pass over many other gems of monopolist argumentation, and come to Mr. Stafford O'Brien, who thought the landlords "ought to come forward and state the high grounds upon which they advocated the continuance of agricultural protection." We think so too. The only "high ground" we have ever heard of is the maintenance of "high" rents. Still Mr. O'Brien has his misgiving, for he said:—

"On the whole, their present meeting had been a satisfactory one. If they disbelieved the report of the Times, their position was still difficult. The report stated to them the minorities in which they had been left on questions affecting agricultural interests last session; but now, when they found the League not merely existing by a cry of clamour, but that it had cleared all neutral ground, and that it ranked amongst its supporters the leader of a great constitutional party, as well as many other noble lords, the position of the agricultural interest was a different one; and while they would not complain of the past, they might at least expect more resolute and determined conduct on their part for the future."

Then, after thanking the Duke as chairman, the meeting broke up. Now, can any farmer note the above wailings from the "room in Bond-street" without exclaiming, "Verily, the game of protection is up?"

QUALIFY! QUALIFY! QUALIFY!

THE Friends of FREE TRADE residing in the Northern or Midland Counties, desirous of purchasing Freeholds in any of the undermentioned Counties, are requested to apply to the Secretary of the League, Newall's Buildings Manchester.

North Lancashire	North Derbyshire
South Lancashire	South Derbyshire
North Cheshire	North Durham
West Riding of York	East Cumberland
South Stafford	West Cumberland
North Stafford	South Northumberland.
South Cheshire

Each applicant is requested to give his name and residence at full length.

By Order of the Council,
JOSEPH HICKIN, Secretary.

QUALIFY! QUALIFY! QUALIFY!

FREE TRADERS desirous of purchasing Freeholds for Middlesex, East Surrey, West Kent, South Essex, East Sussex, and South Hants, are requested to send their applications, with name and address in full, to the League Offices, 67, Fleet-street, London.

By Order of the Council,
JOSEPH HICKIN, Secretary.

FREEHOLD QUALIFICATIONS FOR HERTS.

FREE TRADERS desirous of purchasing Freeholds in Hertfordshire are requested to send their applications to the League Offices, 67, Fleet-street, or to Mr. J. F. Bontems, Herts Registration Office, Hertford.

NORTH LANCASHIRE.
QUALIFY! QUALIFY! QUALIFY!

FREE-TRADERS desirous of purchasing Qualifications for North Lancashire, are informed that they can be obtained for 33l. and upwards each, yielding from 6½ to 7½ per cent.

Applications may be made to Mr. Moorhouse, League Rooms, 4, Cheapside, Preston.

POSTSCRIPT.

LONDON, Saturday Morning, December 20, 1845.

The "Ministerial crisis" is over, and the NATIONAL CRISIS has begun. We are now fairly entered on the last stage of our struggle for the untaxing of the people's food, and the enfranchisement of the the people's industry. THE FREE TRADE MEMBER FOR THE CITY OF LONDON IS THE FIRST MINISTER OF THE CROWN. The ever-memorable "Address to the Electors of the City of London" is the programme of ministerial policy, as of national expectation and demand. In this great controversy of right against wrong, light against darkness, a nation against an oligarchy, the Queen's Government is heartily, unreservedly, and altogether with "US, THE QUEEN'S SUBJECTS."

Our readers and constituents, the Free Trade public of the United Kingdom, will do us the justice to believe, that we should not make this profoundly interesting and momentous announcement in terms thus unqualified, were we not convinced that there is NOTHING—and will be nothing—to mar or dash the delighted satisfaction with which it will be unanimously hailed by the country. We are entirely persuaded, that Lord John Russell takes office with the one distinct and simple purpose of giving immediate statutory effect to the broad and plain principles laid down in that Address to the London Electors, which has made him the statesman of the crisis.

The delay which has intervened before his lordship's definitive acceptance of the responsibilities with which he has been charged by her Majesty, will be interpreted by the country as indicating that he is most seriously sensible of the magnitude of those responsibilities; that he has thoroughly measured the difficulties that lie in his path with the resources on which he may count for ensuring the success of his mighty enterprise; and that, come what will, nothing will be wanting on his part towards placing on the statute-book of the empire the Free Trade principles which he has deliberately espoused, and with which he has, once for all, identified his name, fame, and power.

IT IS FOR THE PEOPLE TO DO THE REST. Lord John Russell is no more able now, than he was a week or a month ago, to give us Free Trade. He can be nothing more in this matter than the executive organ of national intelligence, the administrative agent of national will, the trusted and honoured depositary of national force. The country must find the power. Nothing but the same "unequivocal expression of the public voice" which has brought our cause thus far, can conduct it to its final glorious consummation. It is a long way yet to the statute-book. We entreat the public to regard EVERYTHING that we have written pending the solution of the late Ministerial crisis,—all our counsels to self-reliance and independent actions—as not in the slightest degree superseded by the cheering intelligence which we now communicate, but as receiving a new force and emphasis. Everything stands exactly as it did, with the only exception that every motive to popular exertion is inconceivably enhanced by the visibly increased nearness of the great and crowning victory. We see land, at last, and we have taken our pilot on board—that is all. The landing is yet to be effected, and for anything that appears at present, the landing will be more arduous and critical than all the rest of the voyage together.

Again we say to the people—and we say it now more earnestly and emphatically than ever—RELY ON NOTHING BUT YOURSELVES AND YOUR OWN EXERTIONS. Take nothing for granted. Go on agitating—and, above all, GO ON QUALIFYING—just as if nothing had happened. Prepare for a tremendous struggle: it is just possible—we are not at all sure that it is in any degree probable—that such preparation may prevent the struggle from being a tremendous one. Believe not that anything is done till ALL is done. Let there be no premature hurraing—no "throwing up of caps;" the time for that will be when the Bill—and this time we must take care that it really is "THE WHOLE BILL, and NOTHING BUT THE BILL"—receives her Majesty's most gracious Royal Assent.

TRALEE, DEC. 16.—Since the intentions of Ministers respecting the opening of the ports to foreign grain became a subject of discussion, the markets have shown symptoms of a decided tendency downwards. Wheat has fallen 10d. at least in the peck; oats came down yesterday to 9½d. for the best quality, and there is every prospect of a further fall. The farmers who have already sold out will probably have reason to rejoice. Barley was down to 9d.—Kerry Examiner.

THE FUNDS.
	SAT. Dec.1	MON. Dec.15	TUES. Dec.16	WED. Dec.17	THUR. Dec.18	FRI. Dec.19
Bank Stock	200½	200½	200½	199½	199½	92½
3 per Ct. Red. Ann. 92½	92½	92½	92½	92½	92½	Shut
3 per Ct. Con. Ann. 94½	94½	94½	94½	94½	94½	94½
3 per Ct. Red. Ann. 94½	94½	94½	94½	94½	94½	94½
Long. An. Ex. 1860 10	10	10	10	10½	10½	92½
Cons. for Acct. 92½	92½	92½	92½	92½	92½	92½
Exc. Bills, pm. 21-22	21-22	19	19-21	18-19-20	18-19-20	18-19-20
Ind. Bds. am. 1000l. 32	32	32	26½	32	32	32
India Stock
Austrian
Belgian Bonds	94½	95½	95	94½	..
Brazilian 5 per Ct. 79½	79½
Chilian
Columb. ex. Venez. 16½	16½	16½	16½
Danish
Dutch 4 per Cent. 93	93	93	93	93½	93½	93½
Dutch 2½ per Cent. 59½	59½	60	60½	59½	60½	60½
Mexican	29	29½	29½	29½	..	30½
Peruvian	35½
Portug. conv. 60	60	60	60	60	60	60
Russian 5 per Cent. 27½	27½	28½	28½	28½	28½	29
Spanish 5 per Ct. 38	38	38½	38½	39	39½	39½
Do. 3 per Ct. ex. dv. 38	38	38½	38½	39	39½	39½

MARKETS.
CORN MARKET.
MONDAY, DEC. 15.—During the past week we have been well supplied with Wheat, Barley, and Oats, and moderately with Beans and Peas. This morning there are in addition a fair number of samples of all kinds of English grain except Oats, of which there is little fresh up. The trade remains much the same as last week as to the amount of business doing; prices are generally quoted 1s. to 2s. lower for Wheat both Free and Bonded. In Barley there is scarcely any business passing, and prices are nominal. The Oat trade is as dull as possible, and it is difficult to find buyers even at a considerable reduction; the business done is 1s. to 1s. 6d. lower than last Monday, but it is almost impossible to fix the exact value of any description. Scarcely a sale of Peas has been made, and Beans are 1s. lower.
BRITISH.		S. H. LUCAS.
	Per Imperial Quarter.
Wheat, Essex,	Red 50 to 60	White 58 to 68
Kent, & Suffolk	49 58	56 64
Lincolnshire & Yorkshire	47 54	54 62
Scotch
Oats, Lincolnshire & Yorkshire Feed	25	27
Do. Ditto	26	28
Scotch Feed	26	28	Potato 29
Limerick	25	27	30
Do. Ditto	27 29	Old Fine none
Cork
Waterford, Youghal, & Cork Black	23	25

Sligo		24	25
Galway		24	25
Barley		32	39
Beans, Mazagan	New 32 34	Old 40	44
Harrow	38 42
Small	40 44
Peas, White		Boilers	54 56
Grey	36 48	Maple	38 40
Flour, Town-made	per sack of 280 lbs.	45	57
Norfolk and Suffolk		43	46

FOREIGN.		FREE. IN BOND.
		Per Imperial Quarter.
Wheat, Dantzic, high mixed	58 to 66	46 52
Rostock	56 60	44 48
Stettin	54 60	43 46
Hamburg	52 57	42 45
Odessa	46 50	40 42
Odessa Polish	50 56	40 43
Russian	soft	48 57
Ditto	hard	46 55
Spanish
Ditto	White
Australian	60 69
Barley, Grinding	27 30
Distilling	30 32
Oats, Archangel	27 28	24 25
Danish	27 28	21 22
Swedish	25 26	22 23
Stralsund
Dutch Feed	23 25	20 22
Brew	28 35	26 32
Polands	30 26	28 24
Beans, Egyptian	40 41	39 40
Peas, White	54
Ditto Boilers	none	..
Flour, Canada, fresh, per barrel of 196 lbs. ..	34 35
United States	32 35
Dantzic
Australian, per sack of 280 lbs.

Account of CORN, &c., arrived in the Port of London, from Dec. 8 to Dec. 13, 1845, both days inclusive.
	Wheat.	Barley.	Oats.	Beans.	Peas.
English	10790	12669	6928	1411	1953
Scotch	1660	3268
Irish	5077
Foreign	9021	766	10696	96	405

FRIDAY, DEC. 19.—Except a fair arrival of foreign Wheat, we have been shortly supplied with all grain since Monday. The same uncertainty with regard to the alteration of the Corn Laws that has paralysed the trade for the last fortnight, still prevails, and the prices of all Corn are consequently nominal. Though the tendency is slightly downwards, the business transacted is of such a trifling nature that we do not alter quotations of any article. The duty on Barley rose 1s. yesterday.

Account of CORN, &c., arrived in the Port of London, from the 12th of December to the 19th of December, both inclusive.
	English.	Irish.	Foreign.
Wheat	5450	..	12330
Barley	9510	..	1570
Oats	2701	7450	2910

LONDON AVERAGES for the Week ending Dec. 16, 1845.
	Qrs.	Price.	Qrs.	Price.
Wheat	6180	64s. 4d.	Rye	1474	38s. 8d.
Barley	5342	34s. 0d.	Beans	1941	44s. 1d.
Oats	12120	25s. 4d.	Peas

IMPERIAL AVERAGES, Weeks ending
Wheat. Barley. Oats. Rye. Beans. Peas.
s. d. s. d. s. d. s. d. s. d. s. d. s. d.
8th Nov.	59	7.35	1.25	2.35	7.45	1.44	5
15th	58	6.35	0.36	3.38	2.44	5.45	7
22d	57	11.34	1.25	5.37	1.43	4.45	4
29th	58	2.33	2.25	0.35	4.41	9.45	10
6th Dec.	59	0.32	10.24	7.35	0.41	8.43	4
13th	59	4.32	9.24	6.36	8.40	8.43	6
Aggregate Average of the Six Weeks. Wheat, 58s. 9d.; Barley, 33s. 10d.; Oats, 25s. 2d.; Rye, 36s. 4d.; Beans, 42s. 10d.; Peas, 44s. 9d.
Duty. Wheat, 14s. 0d.; Barley, 5s. 0d.; Oats, 3s. 0 ; Rye, 6s. 6d.; Beans, 1s. 0d.; Peas, 1s. 0d.
Stock of Corn in Bond, Nov. 5, 1845.
Wheat. Barley. Oats. Rye. Beans. Peas. Flour
In London, 279040	10900	56942	..	799	570	55679
Unit. King. 667773	59477	107219	..	1678	2063	278683

MEAT MARKET.
The supply was limited, which with the damp weather, rendered Sales dull, and prices made with considerable difficulty, many buyers returned home without supplying themselves.
PER STONE OF 8 LBS. BY THE CARCASE.
Prime Beef	3s	6d to 3s	10d	Middl. Mutton	3s	6d to 3s	8d
Middling do.	3s	6d to 3s	4d	Veal, from ..	0s	0d to 0s	0d
Plain, or inf.	Small Pork ..	4s	8d to 5s	0d
rior Beef	2s	4d to 2s	8d	Large, or inf.
Prime Mutton	3s	10d to 4s	4d	rior Pork	3s	4d to 3s	8d

THE LONDON GAZETTE.

FRIDAY, DEC. 12.

BANKRUPTS.

F. TAYLOR, Orange Street, Red Lion Square, tallow chandler. [Mr. May, Queen Square.

H. HARRIS, Leman Street, Goodman's Fields, teacher. [Mr. Watson, Winchester Buildings.

G. WATT, Old Jewry, cotton factor. [Messrs. Lawrance and Plews, Bucklersbury.

F. WHITWORTH, Shawforth, Lancashire, cotton manufacturer. [Messrs. Clarke and Co., Lincoln's Inn Fields.

R. BUCKLEY, Saddlesworth, woollen cloth manufacturer. [Mr. Spinks, Great James Street.

W. FAY, Bath, innkeeper. [Mr. Shattock, Bath.

J. ROTHCHILD, Bristol, watchmaker. [Mr. Hudson, Bloomshury Square.

H. ROWBOTHAM and R. J. KENWORTHY, Brinksway, Cheshire, calico printers. [Messrs. Gregory and Co., Bedford Row.

J. BUTTERWORTH, Manchester, plumber. [Messrs. Johnson and Co., Temple.

F. LINGARD, New Elvet, Durham, dealer in musical instruments. [Mr. Hartley, Southampton Street.

W. ELLARY, Kidderminster, iron founder. [Messrs. Bycott and Lucy, Kidderminster.

TUESDAY, DEC. 16.

BANKRUPTS.

W. KEARTON, Lamb Street, Spitalfields, cheesemonger [Mr. Hutchinson, Crown Court, Threadneedle Street.

M. JONES, Theobald's Road, grocer. [Mr. Miles, Brunswick Place, City Road.

T. POOL, Princes Road, Notting Hill, builder. [Mr. Wright, Lincoln's Inn.

W. GILL, Leadenhall Market, poulterer. [Mr. Tippets, Pancras Lane.

W. HUMPHRIES, Haymarket, hotelkeeper. [Mr. Lewis, Arundel Street.

F. CORDUROY, Liverpool, hatter. [Messrs. Vincent and Sherwood, Temple.

J. REYNOLDS, Fazakerley, Lancashire, cowkeeper. [Messrs. Bridger and Blake, London Wall.

J. HULME, Manchester, paper dealer. [Mr. Abbott, Charlotte Street.

T. I. HELLAWELL, J. NORTCLIFFE, and J. B. HELLAWELL, Ilkley, Yorkshire, dyers. [Mr. Taylor, Nicholas Lane,

THE WEEKLY CHRONICLE of this day contains:—
The Whig Corn and Peel Crisis—Mr. O'Connell's New Position—Cotton Twist to the Free Traders of the United Kingdom—Reports of all the Great Meetings, from the New South Wales Club to the Lord John—Grand Cabinet, Dukes A2, A4, A6, and A8—A Whipping Post for the Monopoli—The Dignity of Wantley, a Fair for Young England in 1945; with the Annual and other News of the Week. 357, Strand, and all News-men.

New and Revised Edition of OLIVER TWIST, in Ten Monthly Parts.
On the 1st of January, price 1s., uniform with "Pickwick," "Nicholas Nickleby," and "Martin Chuzzlewit," by Lord John.
OLIVER TWIST; OR, THE PARISH BOYS' PROGRESS.
By CHARLES DICKENS.
Illustrated by George Cruikshank.
London: Printed and Published for the Author, by Bradbury and Evans, 90, Fleet-street, and Whitefriars.

A HISTORY FOR YOUNG ENGLAND.—This striking Series of Papers, commencing from the Conquest, is carried on to the reign of Henry II. in the first Two Volumes of DOUGLAS JERROLD'S SHILLING MAGAZINE, and will be continued in the Third Volume, the first Number of which will be published on the 31st instant. The first Two Volumes, price 1s. each, are handsomely bound in cloth. London: Published at the PUNCH Office, 92, Fleet-street.

MR. CAUDLE'S BREAKFAST TABLE TALK forms a principal feature of PUNCH'S ALMANACK for 1846, which will be published on the 24th inst., with 12 ILLUSTRATIONS MISERIES by Leech, and other illustrations by Doyle. Price 3d., stamped, 4d. The ALMANACK is this year quite A DISTINCT PUBLICATION, and will not interfere with the week's Number, which will be published as usual, being the first of the year.
Vol. IX. will be ready for delivery at the same time, price 8s. London: PUNCH Office, 92, Fleet-street.

In a few days, fep. 8vo., with Steel Plates, and nearly 300 Woodcuts, MANUAL OF NATURAL PHILOSOPHY: with Recapitulatory Questions on each Chapter; and a Dictionary of Philosophical Terms. By JOHN L. COMSTOCK, M.D., and RICHARD D. HOBBS, A.M., Oxon. Author of a Dictionary of Terms used in Medicine and the Collateral Sciences, and Manuals of Chemistry and of the Steam Engine.
London: Adam Scott, Charterhouse-square.

A SPLENDID HOLIDAY PRESENT.
Complete in Three Volumes, handsomely bound in scarlet and gold, at 3s. each volume (containing, altogether, nearly Two Thousand Pages of closely printed matter).

THE LONDON ENTERTAINING MAGAZINE; or LIBRARY OF ROMANCE. Vols. 1 and 2 contain the celebrated masterpiece NOVEL OF MATILDA; or, THE MEMOIRS OF A YOUNG WOMAN, by EUGENE SCUL; also several other well-written Novels and Romances, besides a vast deal of amusing and useful information. It is the cheapest work ever printed in the English language. Those who want presents at this season of the year will do well to select this work as one of their gifts. Each volume may be had separate.
Published by B. D. Cousins, 18, Duke-street, Lincoln's Inn, London, and sold by all Booksellers.

Will be published in a few days, in the Catholic Series), THE DESTINATION OF MAN. By JOHANN GOTTLIEB FICHTER. Translated from the German, by Mrs. FERRY SINNITT.
London: Chapman (Brothers), 121, Newgate-street.

VENTILATION.—This day is published, by Messrs. MADDEN and MALCOLM, 8, Lendenhall-street, A REPLY to MISSTATEMENTS made by the TIMES and the ATHLETIC, in reference to Ships and Buildings ventilated by the Author, with a few remarks on the opposing demands in respect to Ventilation of different Constitutions. By D. H. REID, M.D., F.R.S.E.
Price One Shilling; by post, One and Sixpence.

WHAT TO EAT, DRINK, AND AVOID. Addressed to the Nervous and Dyspeptic. By R. J. GILCHRIST, M.D., Member of the Royal College of Surgeons in England, and Lecturer in Anatomy, and all Booksellers, or direct from the Author, 21, Arundel-street, Strand.

AMERICAN NOTES.—DR. DICKSON'S LECTURES on the Chrono-Thermal System of Medicine, with an Introduction and Notes by Dr. Turner, Health Commissioner of New York. Price 2s. 6d. "The day is not distant when the Chrono-Thermal System will be universally received. The times of Summer Diseases, in reference to the dust, and the air, with which we breathe, is not truth will at last triumph, and posterity will render to his memory the merit which is his due."—New York Inquirer.
Simpkin & Co., Stationers-court; 3, Oliver, Foul road. 13 Copies for 12s.

THE CORN AND PROVISION TRADES.—The deficiency of the Harvest, the failure of the Potato Crop, and the consequent serious effects upon commercial and monetary affairs, excite great apprehension. Under such circumstances, correct information as to the produce of the harvest, the extent of the failure of the potato crop, the state of the markets, the stock of grain on hand, on the continent of Europe, and in the United States, is of the highest importance. No trouble or expense is spared to furnish such information, which is brought down to the latest moment of going to press, in the MARK LANE EXPRESS, which has been for many years the authority in the Corn and Provision Trades of England and in foreign countries. Published every Monday in one far post, and may be had by order of all Booksellers, News-men, &c. Office, 24, Norfolk Street, Strand. Price 1s. 6d. per annum.

THE TENANT FARMERS' ADVOCATE.—It is abundantly manifest that the position of the Agricultural Interest as a class is undergoing and must undergo a great change. In such change the relative position of "LANDLORD AND TENANT" will form the most important feature, and the establishment of a sound system of "Tenants' Rights" will be a cardinal point for "Tenant Farmers." For fourteen years, THE MARK LANE EXPRESS and AGRICULTURAL JOURNAL has been the zealous and uncompromising advocate of the Tenant's Rights, and with the conviction that the interests of the Tenant are vitally involved in the question, the columns of this journal will be continued to devote to the defence of the Tenant's Rights, and every Monday in time for post. May be had by order of all Booksellers and News-men. Office, 24, Norfolk Street, Strand. London. Price 1s. 6d. per annum.

MEETING OF PARLIAMENT.—Parties residing in the country can be supplied with the London Newspapers at the following reduced price:—Times, 16s. per quarter; Morning Chronicle, 15s. per quarter; the Evening Sun or Globe, 13s. Orders prepaid to E. HALL, General News Agent, 23, Strand, London. Agent for all the Railway Papers, and every paper published in London.

THE Royal Family at Home, consisting of the Queen and Prince Albert caressing their Four lovely Children. The Grouping and Colouring by Madame Tussaud, the Models and Portraiture by Mr. F. C. BAZAAR, Baker-street, Portman-square.
"This is one of the best exhibitions in the metropolis."—Times.
Admission, 1s.; Napoleon Rooms, 6d. Open from 11 till 4; and from 7 till 10.

BETTS'S PATENT BRANDY, certified by the Faculty of England to be the purest spirit, and guaranteed by the Patent Metallic Capsules, embossed "Betts's Patent Brandy," 7, Smithfield-bars, is sold at 3s. 6d., bottle included, by the most respectable dealers, lists of whom may be obtained at the Distillery, where quantities of not less than two gallons, in bulk or bottles, are supplied. Address, 7, Smithfield-bars.

BRANDY AND CAPSULES.
MR. BETTS (the late firm of J. T. BETTS & Co.) Patent Brandy Distiller, 7, Smithfield Bars, feels it due to himself and the public to state, that the Manufacture of the Patent Brandy was not, nor ever has been known to any person except to himself and one of his sons. And that he was engaged in the business of the Distillery, 7, Smithfield Bars, by his sons, J. T. Betts, jun., and Co., on his settling there, in 1843.
Mr. Betts further states, that he is the sole Patentee, manufacturer, and vendor of the Patent Metallic Capsule (or metal covering for the mouths of bottles), that no other Brandy in England, except Betts's Patent Brandy, is thereby protected, the Patent Metallic Capsule if, therefore, applied to any other Brandy, must have been surreptitiously obtained.
Metallic Capsule Manufacture, 1, Wharf-road, City-road.

LUXURY IN SHAVING.
JOHN GOSNELL and CO.'S AMBROSIAL SHAVING CREAM (Patronised by Prince Albert). This inestimable Cream possesses all the good qualities of the Finest Naples Soap, without the disagreeable smell inseparable from that article in a genuine state. It is of a white pearly silvery appearance, produces a creamy lather, which will not dry on the face, and emits in use the delightful flavour of the almond.
In Pots, price 2s. 6d.; 3s. 6d.; 4s.
Perfumers to her Majesty, 12, Three King-court, Lombard-street, London. Manufacturers of Combs and Brushes of the best quality, and on the most approved principles.

JONES'S 24. 4s. SILVER LEVER WATCHES warranted not to vary more than half a minute per week, are selling at the Manufacture, 308, Strand, opposite Somerset House. They combine the truth of a mathematical instrument with the elegance of an ornament. On receipt of a Post office order for the above price, a Watch will be sent free to the limit of the London. Read Jones's "Sketch of Watch Work," sent free for a 2d. stamp.

THE OXFORD AND SALISBURY DIRECT RAILWAY.

The Committee of Management beg to announce that, in compliance with the applications and suggestions of several gentlemen of experience, they have instructed the several bankers named in their letters of allotment to continue to receive the preliminary deposits from this time until the 7th of January next, in order that those parties to whom Shares in this Company have been allotted, may be enabled to draw down the same, by paying the first deposit at the present time, or paying the whole deposit on or before the 7th of January next.

By Order of the Board, Z. HUBBERTS, Sec.
Moorgate Chambers, Moorgate-street, Dec. 9, 1845.

THE LONDON & SURREY BUILDING SOCIETY.
1000 Shares. Entrance Fee, 1s. 6d. Monthly Subscription, 3s. Shares, 200.

Thomas Booker, Esq., 59, Mark Lane.
John Tervan, Esq., Kennington Cross.
J. W. Mitchell, Esq., Hanover-square.
Subscription Rooms, South-west Literary Institution, Hanover Road.
Monthly Meetings, Second Monday in every Month.
Every man of full age should be enabled to vote in the choice of a Member of Parliament. To do this he must be in the Register. To be on the Register he must have a property qualification. To obtain a property qualification (without capital) he must join the London and Surrey Building Society. This Society is in a position at once to advance money. Applications for Shares, and for information, to be made to the Secretary, Mr. W. Millman, 70, Lower Thames-street.

FREE-TRADERS' QUALIFY FOR COUNTIES!
SOUTHWARK AND EAST SURREY FIRE-INSURANCE BUILDING SOCIETY. In 1000 Shares, of £120 each.
Under the management of Four Trustees, Twelve Directors, a Solicitor, Surveyor, and Secretary.
The Subscription of 1s. per Share, payable on the first Tuesday in each month, at the Literary Institution, Borough-road, Southwark. Entrance Fee, 2s. 6d.

With a view to the acquisition of the county franchise in the Eastern Division of Surrey, this Society is specially formed. But it will not be admitted to the franchise until it has secured the right of voting, by the payment of a small monthly subscription, the right of voting, thus enabling those who do not possess the qualification, and whose income is too limited, to acquire it by other means. For the express purpose of aiding the cause of Free Trade, this Society has been established, and to that measure every member will stand pledged.
The Officers of this Society consist of long-tried and well-known friends to that great object; while among the Directors are found some of the most respectable and influential names in the Borough of Southwark and its vicinity.

The first Meeting for payments will take place at the Literary Institution, Borough-road, on Tuesday, the 6th of January, 1846, from 12 till 2; and again at 7 o'clock in the evening.
The Directors will be prepared to offer Shares for sale to a large amount. Application for Shares to be made to the Secretary, Mr. Hearn, 7, Adam's-place, High-street, Southwark.

One-fifth of the Shares was taken at the first Preliminary Meeting, and the number remaining for disposal is daily diminishing.

FREEHOLDERS' BUILDING SOCIETY, Manchester. Shares, 60s. Subscription, 10s. per Month.

John Brooks, Esq., President.
Alderman William Harvey.
Alderman Charles J. S. Walker.
B. SKELLS—Messrs. Cunliffe, Brooks, and Co., Market-street.
SOLICITOR—Mr. John Hewitt, 47, King-street.
SECRETARY—Mr. William Jackson Kedgeley, 3, Princess-street, Manchester.
The object of this Society is to assist the middle and industrious classes to obtain Freehold Dwellings for their own use, and more especially to create a spirit of independence in the latter, and to induce habits of economy in all who have a surplus of income beyond providing for their current requirements.

By another arrangement of the first meeting of the Society to the 7th of January, 1846, other members have an opportunity of entering by paying the first month's subscription only—namely, 10s. on each share.
A Sale of Shares will take place on the 21st of January, 1846.
Persons wishing to take up Shares will do well to make early application, as the above will be the last adjournment, after which the back subscriptions will be required.

One peculiar feature in this undertaking is the facility afforded to Building Members to obtain the County Franchise in the first year; as, on all purchased Shares, for building with, the monthly subscription may be reduced to 2s. 6d. (which is sufficient beyond the minimum) "on request" sufficient to give a qualification.
Applications for Shares may be made to the Secretary, Mr. W. J. Keighley, 3, Princess-street, Mr. John Hewitt, Solicitor, 47, King-street; and Mr. R. Burton, Oldham-st. Mr. A. Burgess, printer, Victoria Arches; and Mr. E. Owen, Oldham-st. Street, Manchester, where Rules, price 6d. and Prospectuses may be had.

THE DISSENTERS AND GENERAL LIFE AND FIRE ASSURANCE COMPANY.

Empowered by Special Act of Parliament, 3 Vic. c. 20.
62, King William-street, London Bridge, London;
21, St. David-street, Edinburgh;
6, King-street, Queen's-square, Bristol.

Capital—One Million.
TRUSTEES AND DIRECTORS.
George Bousfield, Esq., Thomas Chubb, Esq., Ald. Jacob G. Cope, Esq., John Dixon, Esq., Peter Ellis, Esq., Joseph Fletcher, Esq., Richard Hollier, Esq., Charles Hindley, Esq., M.P. Thomas Piper, Esq., Thomas B. Simpson, Esq., John Wilson, Esq., Hon. C. P. Villiers, M.P., John Wilks, Esq., Edward Wilson, Esq.

On the 1st of January last, the Directors, having received the reports of their friends and the public, that in the Fire Department they receive reports of all descriptions, including Churches, School rooms, Mills, Goods, and Shipping in Dock, Farming Stock, &c., at the same reduced rates as other respectable Companies, and make no charge for Fire Policies transferred from other offices.

In the Life Department they continue to transact all business relating to Life Assurances, Annuities, and Family Endowments, upon the most liberal terms consistent with sound principles and public security.
Loans also are granted on equitable terms to Life-assurers on life interests, or on satisfactory personal securities. The Agents and solicitors, surveyors, and auctioneers, liberal allowance will be made.

By Order of the Directors,
THOMAS PIPER, Secretary.

THE PERFECT SUBSTITUTE FOR SILVER.

The high estimate formed by the public during the ten years RIP-PON and BURTON'S chemically purified material has been before it (made into every useful and ornamental article usually made in silver, possessing, as it does, the characteristic purity and durability of silver, has called into existence the dealers in compounds of "copper and zinc," "brass and silver," and other so-called substitutes; they are at best but bad imitations of the genuine articles manufactured with the view of satisfying the purchaser, by Rippon and Burton, and sold only by them.

The high estimate formed by the public during the ten years RIP-PON and BURTON'S chemically purified material has been before it (made into every useful and ornamental article usually made in silver, possessing, as it does, the characteristic purity and durability of silver, has called into existence the dealers in compounds of "copper and zinc," "brass and silver," and other so-called substitutes; they are at best but bad imitations of the genuine articles manufactured with the view of satisfying the purchaser, by Rippon and Burton, and sold only by them.

NICKEL-ELECTRO-PLATED.—The REAL NICKEL SILVER introduced and made only by Rippon and Burton, when plated by the patent process of Messrs. Elkington and Co., is beyond all comparison the very best article, next to sterling silver, that can be employed as such either usefully or ornamentally. In the lengthened and increasing popularity of the material itself, and the high character of the method of plating the public have a guarantee that the articles sold by Rippon and Burton (and by them only) are, as it regards wear, immeasurably superior to what can be supplied at any other house, while by no possible test can they be distinguished from real silver.
By Order of the Directors,
THOMAS PIPER, Secretary.

Teaspoons, per dozen . . . 18s. . . . 32s. . . . 45s.
Desert Forks . . . 30s. . . . 40s. . . . 55s.
Desert Spoons . . . 30s. . . . 40s. . . . 55s.
Table Forks . . . 40s. . . . 50s. . . . 75s.
Table Spoons . . . 40s. . . . 50s. . . . 75s.

Ten and coffee sets, waiters, candlesticks, &c., at proportionate prices. All kinds of replating done by the patent process. Detailed catalogues, with engravings, as well as of every ironmongery article, sent (per post) free.

RIP-PON & BURTON'S Stock of General Furnishing Ironmongery is literally the largest in the world. They regret they cannot employ any language which will convey an adequate impression of its variety and extent: they therefore invite purchasers to call and inspect it—Rippon and Burton, 39, Oxford-street (corner of Newman-street). Established in Wells-street, 1820.

NUMBER ONE, ST. PAUL'S CHURCHYARD.—As real goodness is not helped by praise, nor injured by reproach, so the popularity of a book is not increased by the praise of a book, and COMPANION, over its popularity solely to its intrinsic excellence.
Orders from the country forwarded Carriage Free.

WRITING INK.
WHITAKER'S FRENCH JET WRITING INK.
This splendid freely-flowing Ink is adapted for either steel or quill-pens, and will be found the most desirable for Records, and Office use, as time and the wear of the pen will be less, and the writing more brilliant. It is sold by the Proprietor, 69, Hatton-garden, London, and all respectable booksellers, stationers, and druggists.

THE EIDER DOWN QUILT is the warmest, the lightest, and the most elegant, covering; it is adapted for either the bed, the couch, or the carriage. Also Gown Quilt at half the price of Eider Down. Lists of prices sent free on application to HEAL and SON, Biddling Manufacturers, 196, opposite the Chapel, Tottenham-court-road.

STOOPING OF THE SHOULDERS AND CONTRACTION of the CHEST are entirely prevented, and gently and effectually removed, in Youth and Ladies and Gentlemen, by the occasional use of the Improved Elastic Chest Expander, which is light, simple, easily carried, outwardly or invisibly, without any uncomfortable restraint, or impediment to exercise. Sent per post, by Mr. A. BRYSON, Sole Manufacturer and Proprietor, 40, Tavistock-street, Covent Garden, London, or full particulars on receiving a postage stamp.

GENTLEMEN'S WINTER DRESS.
BURCH and LUCAS, Tailors, 52, King William Street, London Bridge, opposite the Statue of William IV. Waterproof Over Coats, of the newest designs and best materials, kept ready, and made to order in the most approved style, at the lowest possible price for cash. The construction of every garment may be relied on being well and elegantly finished, the whole being made under the immediate superintendence of the Proprietors, who, being Tailors, are able to answer for its superiority over the slopwork generally sold, and which is entirely excluded from this Establishment.
A large and fashionable assortment of Dress and Great Coats, Summer Over Coats, Cloaks, Waistcoats, and Trousers, kept ready made, 52 King William Street, London Bridge.

BERDOE'S WINTER WATERPROOF FROCKS, WRAPPERS, GREAT COATS, and Outside Garments of all kinds. Now complete for the present season, an extensive and first-rate assortment, embracing all that is new, approved, or superior, in either material, style, or quality, and guaranteed to exclude any rain water. Seven years' extensive trial of W. B.'s well-known garments having proved that, beyond all contradiction, General price of lighter kinds, from 48s. to 54s.; and of heavier kinds, from 54s. to 60s. and upwards. An inspection confidently invited. Waterproof Cloaks, Capes, &c. for Ladies. W. BERDOE, Tailor, Great-court-maker, and Waterproof, 69, Cornhill (North side). The public is cautioned against being imposed upon by purchasing either Garments, or a Composition (professedly waterproof), which, although having attached to them W. B.'s name and label, have not been made by him.

THE ATRAPALATORY, or LIQUID HAIR DYE: the only dye that really answers for all colours, and does not require re-dyeing but as the hair grows, as it never fades or acquires that unnatural red or purple tint common to all other dyes. ROSS and SONS can, with the greatest confidence, recommend the above dye as infallible, if done at their establishment. Six months' use of our golden rule, requiring it, is equivalent to a friend or servant with them, to see how it is used, and to enable them to do it afterwards without chance of failure. Several Private apartments devoted entirely to the above purpose, and, some of their establishments having used it, the effect produced can be at once seen. They think it necessary to add that, by attending strictly to the instructions given with each bottle of dye, numerous persons have succeeded equally well without coming to them.
Address ROSS and Sons, 119 and 120, Bishopsgate-street, the celebrated Peruvian, and Chemists, Haircutters, and Hairdressers. N.B. Parties attended at their own residences, whatever the distance.

ACCEPTABLE PRESENTS.—At a period when the social sympathies are most predominant, and the genial influence of "home" is felt in the highest degree—more especially by "My young master and mistress," now spending their vacation at the "Old Hall," the most appropriate and useful, and, at the same time, the most economical, and one which can afford no evidence of taste, while a present possessing no claims to utility, shows a want of judgment. To combine these requisites, a more fitting souvenir cannot be suggested than ROWLAND'S Toilet Articles, the

each of infallible attributes. In creating and sustaining luxuriant silken tresses, ROWLAND'S MACASSAR OIL is highly appreciated by Rank and Fashion, and patronised by all the Sovereigns of Europe. ROWLAND'S KALYDOR is a preparation of unparalleled efficacy in improving the hair, and restoring its natural colour, and ROWLAND'S DENTIFRICE, or PEARL DENTIFRICE, is invaluable for its preservative and beautifying effects on the Teeth and Gums, which infallibly tend to the augmentation of that imposing exterior, which Lord Chesterfield justly observes is "a great recommendation."
* * * * *
Beware of SPURIOUS IMITATIONS! Each genuine article has the word "ROWLAND'S" preceding the name on the Wrapper. All others are FRAUDULENT IMITATIONS. The genuine are sold by the Proprietors at 20, Hatton-garden, Lond. n., and by Chemists and Perfumers.

YEARLY ACCOUNTS.—The present year is very nearly ended, and folks begin to count what they've expended. Yes, e another year its course commences, It is a rule to calculate expenses, Then don't omit, when making up accounts, And noting down your several amounts, To number in the year, be sure it closes, The money sovereigns you have made by MOSES. Take pen in hand, and calculate nigh, And put your estimates in black and white! And, doubtless, you will find in the event You've saved enough to pay a quarter's rent. Remember what you've saved in spring attire And summer dresses, too, which all admire. Remember, too, your garments for the autumn, And don't forget your savings when you ought 'em. Remember what your winter dresses cost, And ditto Trousers, which you would have lost. Take all these various things into account, And highly pleased you'll be with the amount; And you'll determine that when this year closes, You'll deal another year with MR. MOSES.

LIST OF PRICES.
READY MADE.

Beaver Tails	£ 8. 4
Chesterfields or Cordonnets	0 10 6
Boys's Hats, all styles	1 5 0
Boys's Hats, every style	from 0 8 6
Woolskin	0 10 6
Dress Coats, edged	1 10 0
Roll collar Vests	1 5 0
Double breasted ditto	0 2 6
Boys's Hussar and Tunic Suits	0 18 6
Boys's winter Trousers	0 3 0
Boys's winter Vests	1 6

Woolen Coats in every style and shape, handsomely trimmed	1 5 0
Milled Coats Great Coats, velvet collar and cuffs	1 12 0
Tweed Wrappers	0 18 6
Winter Trousers, in all the new patterns	0 8 6
Doeskin Trousers	0 10 6
Best, or Dress Trousers	1 6 0
Dress Coats, best quality made	1 12 0
Frock Coats	1 10 0
Ditto, best quality made	3 3 0
Cashmere Vests	0 8 6
Satin, plain or fancy	0 12 0
Boys's Hussar and Tunic Suits	1 8 0
Boys's Great Coats	0 14 6

IMPORTANT ANNOUNCEMENT.
A new work, entitled "The Leviathan of Trade," with full directions for self-measurement, may be had on application, or forwarded post free. Moulding to any amount can be had at five minutes' notice, at the following prices:

Men's Suits, dress coat, vest, and trousers	from 118 0
Ditto, jacket, vest, and trousers	from 1 16 0
Important: Any article purchased or ordered, if not approved of, exchanged, or the money refunded.

Observe: E. MOSES and SON, Tailors, Wholesale and Retail Woolen-drappers, Outfitters, and General Warehousemen, 151, Minories, and 86, Aldgate, City, opposite the Church.
Persons who are obliged to guard the public against imposition, having learned that the untrustworthy false goods being connected with them, or it's the same concern, has been resorted to in many instances, and for obvious reasons. They have no connexion whatever with a y other establishment in or out of London; and those who do desire well-made Clothings should to prevent disappointment, &c., call or send to 151, Minories, or 86, Aldgate, opposite the Church.
N.B. No business transacted at this Establishment from sunset on Friday to sunset on Saturday, when business is resumed till twelve o'clock.

Printed at the Whitefriars Printing-office, Bouverie street, in the precinct of Whitefriars, in the City of London, by JAMES GANN, printer of Number 7, Rutland-place, Hampstead road, in the County of Middlesex, and at the Press of J. G. B. TAYLOR, at No. 13, Fleet-street, in the parish of Manchester, in the County of Lancaster, and published at Number 67, Fleet-street, in the parish of St. Dunstan-in-the-West, in the City of London, by ABRAHAM WATER, Printer, of Number 67, Fleet-street, printed and published, Saturday, December 20, 1845.

THE LEAGUE.

No. 118.—VOL. III.]

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 27, 1845.

[3d.

NOTICE TO THE PUBLIC.

LEAGUE FUND.

All Subscribers of £1 and upwards to the LEAGUE FUND will be entitled to, and receive, a copy weekly of this publication for twelve months from the date of the receipt of their subscription.

Subscribers of half-a-crown, and under £1, will have forwarded to them a copy of THE LEAGUE, containing an acknowledgment of their subscription; and it is requested that all subscribers will be kind enough to send their names and addresses to the offices of THE LEAGUE, Newall's-buildings, Manchester, or 67, Fleet-street, London.

N.B. As there is considerable risk in the transmission of gold and silver by post, parties wishing to forward small contributions to THE LEAGUE FUND are particularly requested to make their remittances by post-office orders.

The Council of the League would also suggest to their friends in the country the importance of transmitting their copies of THE LEAGUE newspaper, after perusal, to such parties (more especially farmers) as may be either hostile or indifferent to the question of Free Trade.

By order of the Council,

JOSEPH HICKIN, Secretary.

FIRST FRUITS OF THE QUALIFICATION MOVEMENT!

THE COMING VICTORY IN THE WEST RIDING!

When, on the 24th of August, 1841, the coup de grace was to be given to the Melbourne Administration, in the shape of an amendment to the Address, declaratory of "want of confidence," the gentleman put forward by Sir Robert Peel to move such amendment was, it will be remembered, Mr. Stuart Wortley, the then newly-elected representative of the West Riding of Yorkshire. In discharging the task confided to him, Mr. Wortley adverted, with a natural and well-grounded exultation, to the position which he occupied in the House, as justifying the expectant Premier's selection of him, and his own acceptance of so prominent and dignified a post. "It is not long," said the honourable member, in the commencement of his speech, "since her Majesty put a question to the country, and asked them to return an answer that might serve as some guidance to her in the future conduct of her Government; now I appear here as the bearer of a portion of that answer, and I hope that, without presumption, I may say I appear as the bearer of NOT THE LEAST SIGNIFICANT PORTION OF THAT ANSWER."

Mr. Stuart Wortley was right. Certainly, there is no "presumption" whatever, in the representative of West Yorkshire claiming to be the bearer of "not the least significant portion" of the English people's answer to any question that royalty may put to them. The claim has both conventional prescription and reality on its side. The representatives of YORKSHIRE—of which the West Riding includes a full three-fourths, by the test of population alone, irrespectively of its far more decisive preponderance in wealth and intelligence—have long wielded, simply as representatives of Yorkshire, a moral power in the Legislature, exceeding that of the mere numerical votes of the representatives of half a score of ordinary counties. For the past half-century and more, the voice of Yorkshire has been regarded as possessing an especial potency and significance;—it has decided the policy, and even the fate, of Cabinets. Our statesmen and our people alike have ever been accustomed to look to Yorkshire as the great arbiter of national questions, and to its representatives as the most authentic and authoritative exponents of the national will; and some curious facts are on record, showing the eager and anxious interest with which even the strongest of Governments—Governments so strong, that a dozen or two of mere votes more or less could be no great object—have awaited the verdict of Yorkshire on their supporters or their opponents. In the person of Wilberforce, Yorkshire embodied the national protest against the slave trade. By the lips of Henry Brougham Yorkshire pronounced the nation's judgment against the boroughmongers. And Mr. Stuart Wortley, in passing sentence, in the name of Yorkshire and England, on the late Whig Cabinet, quoted, by way of precedent, the example of his predecessor, Lord Morpeth, who had performed the same office on the Peel Cabinet, in 1835. We might almost lay it down, as a general rule in English politics, that changes in the Parliamentary representation of Yorkshire are uniformly introductory to, and prophetic of, corresponding changes in national policy.

The elements of this extraordinary ascendancy of Yorkshire, in our politics, are not for us to seek. It is quite a legitimate and rightful ascendancy. Yorkshire—or the West Riding, which has succeeded to the political prestige formerly possessed by the entire county—counts for more, in the Government and Legislature of England, than whole batches of counties returning ten times its number of representatives, simply because it has more of England in it than whole batches of ordinary counties—more of everything that makes England what it is—more of intelligence, energy, industry, capital, and labour. A few comparisons will make this sufficiently intelligible. This district of West Yorkshire exceeds in population the aggregate of Bedfordshire, Berkshire, Buckinghamshire, Herefordshire, Hertfordshire, Huntingdonshire, Monmouthshire, Oxfordshire, Rutland, and Westmoreland—ten counties, returning twenty-five members to Parliament. It contains within its borders, according to the last census, a quarter of a million of human beings more than the whole of Wales together. Its registered constituency exceeds the aggregate constituencies of twenty-two Irish counties that might be named, or of twenty-eight Scottish counties—and is more numerous, by one-half, than the constituency of London, or of South Lancashire. The representative of the West Riding—the man who can stand up in Parliament, and say, "I am here with a message from the THIRTY THOUSAND registered voters of West Yorkshire"—may well claim to speak on the great questions of public and imperial policy, as one having authority.

It is now a little more than a year ago, that (on the 16th of November, 1844), we appealed to the men of the West Riding, to clear themselves, by one vigorous and resolute effort, of the disgrace and self-stultifying reproach of a monopolist representation of their division. We adduced the significant and striking facts above noticed. We showed them their "proud pre-eminence" among the constituencies of the empire, and urged the duties and responsibilities which that pre-eminence implies. We warned them that monopoly would keep its ground so long as they sent monopolists to bear their messages, and report their opinions to the legislature. We told them, that "no Minister will ever dare to propose the total repeal of the Corn Law, unless he can reckon among his supporters, both the members for the West Riding of Yorkshire." We pointed the way to self-deliverance from landlordism, by means of the forty-shilling freehold franchise. We displayed to them the amplitude of their immense and unrivalled resources for a qualification campaign, and indicated the best mode of using them. The West Riding of Yorkshire had one of our very first lessons on "How to win counties."

The result of our appeal has long been before the world on paper;—it is now about to appear in the more decisive and universally-intelligible shape of a FREE TRADE MEMBER OF PARLIAMENT FOR THE WEST RIDING. The Free Traders of West Yorkshire are now masters of their own county, and are about to seal at the polling-booths the well-fought victory which their two thousand new forty-shilling freeholders have won in the registration courts.

We do not happen to know whether the monopolists will think it for their advantage to contest the coming election for this head and chief of English counties—nor are we at all solicitous to pry into a secret which does not particularly concern us. But, whether with or without a contest, a total and immediate repealer of the Corn Law will presently "appear" in the Imperial Parliament, "as the bearer of not the least significant portion of the answer" of the English people to the first question of the age. This august tribunal, to which statesmen are wont to listen for the decrees that seal the fate of Cabinets, and mark the courses of national policy—whose verdicts have uniformly preceded and presaged those great political and legislative changes which constitutes dates in our history—is now about to pass judgment on monopoly, and to vote the nation's "want of confidence" in any minister who shall dare to face Parliament with credentials less authentic than those of a Bill for the total, immediate, and unqualified repeal of the Corn Law. How long it may be safe, or possible, to govern this country by mere majorities, made up from pocket boroughs and pocket counties, in defiance of the voice of such constituencies as those of the West Riding, and South Lancashire, and the City of London, is a question which there is no occasion for us to put to the present Prime Minister of Great Britain.

Men of the West Riding! We thank you! England, Scotland, and Ireland—the empire, and humanity—thank you. We asked you for "a sign of our deliverance"—and you have given us one most authentic and indubitable. May your triumph be as fruitful of incitement to the people, as it will, beyond all question, be of counsel and instruction to their rulers! In the "great fact" by which you are about to convey a wholesome warning to statesmen, and to impress a salutary fear on the squirearchy, may Englishmen everywhere find suggestion and impulse to win like victories, by a like vigorous and energetic use of the same all-efficient constitutional weapon!

THE BEGINNING OF THE END. THE QUARTER OF A MILLION LEAGUE FUND.

The meeting held in the Town Hall of Manchester on Tuesday last—a meeting, the like of which, we may most safely say, the world never saw before, may, or may not, be immediately and visibly efficacious in enlightening that "ignorance of the country" which, just now, dominates over legislation and Government; but we have no fear that its significance will be mistaken or under-rated, either by our statesmen, or by that intelligence of the country which is rapidly getting the upper hand of the said dominant "ignorance." The stupendous and perfectly unheard-of result which attended that magnificent gathering of the intellect and wealth of the industrial metropolis of England and the world—SIXTY THOUSAND POUNDS, and upwards, subscribed in the course of one morning—will convey a most impressive warning to our public men, and carry hope and gladness into the hearts of the industrious millions, whose rights, as earners and eaters of bread, the gigantic effort thus commenced is destined to realise in our statute book. To each and all, the language of this most irrefragable "great fact" is, that the industrious classes are thoroughly and intensely in earnest; that there is a power in the country adequate to meet any demands that time and occasion may make; that, however obstinate and prolonged may be the resistance of the monopolists to the righteous claims of industry—to whatever length of time this controversy may be spun out—still the movement of the national mind will hold on its course, accumulating new force and momentum from the very obstructions and delays that temporarily retard its triumph; that, at whatever cost of labour, time, and treasure, monopoly MUST, SHALL, and WILL be swept clean out of the statute-book of Great Britain.

From our hearts we thank and congratulate the men of Manchester. They have, in a way worthy of themselves taken the initial step in that great crowning effort which is to seal the enfranchisement of the industry they represent. Their unswerving steadfastness, indomitable determination, unwearied activity, and munificent sacrifices in this vast national work, will be repaid to them, ten, twenty, and a hundredfold, in the social prosperity and contentment that will hereafter claim for them a nation's gratitude.

Of course, Manchester cannot do every thing. Even if Manchester could and would do every thing, the spirit of Englishmen would not permit it. The country will not allow any such monopoly of effort and sacrifice in a public cause. The work is a national work, and the nation must do it. The cause of industrial freedom is the cause of ALL, and all must contribute to its triumph. The splendid meeting of Tuesday is but a beginning, which the country must complete—an example which the country must follow—a proffer of help and service, to which the country must respond by a prompt and hearty co-operation. That co-operation will, we have not a moment's doubt, be most freely given. It has been given heretofore with a zeal and efficiency which justify the confident anticipation that there will be no slackness now. One quarter of the new League Fund of 250,000*l.* will, we presume, be generally regarded as a very sufficient quota for the town of Manchester. The United Kingdom, minus the town of Manchester, will probably find no serious difficulty in providing the remaining three-fourths.

Good and noble deeds are ever in season, and genuine beneficence, like the agency of Deity in nature, works perennially, without pause or break. Yet we cannot but feel that this good work has an especial and peculiar fitness at the present season. The ideas, memories, and hopes proper to Christmas time, have a natural affinity to a spirit of active exertion and open-handed munificence in an enterprise that has for its object to give hunger an untaxed loaf, and secure to industry the full real worth of its earnings. If ever there was a work which commends itself to the feelings and sympathies appropriate to the anniversary commemoration of the birth-time of the Founder of Christianity, such a work is ours. The legislative enfranchisement of labour is most distinctly Christian benevolence, though under another name—benevolence on the very largest scale—benevolence embracing all who earn and eat, or who would earn and eat if they could—benevolence working by means as sure as its ends are vast and comprehensive—a benevolence not exhausting its own resources in the process of distribution, but perpetually reproducing them with increase. No benevolence so certain of its resources and aims—so permanent and self-diffusive in its results—or so universally operative on the moral as well as the material well-being of its recipients,—as that which would render labour valuable, bring the labourer into request, and give him the full and unrestricted disposal of his earnings in the great market of the world. No benevolence can achieve a grander result than that afforded by the prosperous and well-remunerated industry of a whole people.

We know not of any better ingredients in Christmas merriment and New Year's happiness than conscious co-operation in the cause of industrial freedom. Those who work in it with a true heart have indeed a right to their merry Christmas and happy New Year. By breaking down the wrongs which class has inflicted on class, and levelling the barrier which a pernicious code has interposed between nation and nation, they are most fitly and worthily commemorating the advent of Him whose mission was "peace on earth and goodwill among men." The toils and sacrifices of this struggle, fraught, as they are, with cheerful memories of past successes, and bright hopes of an early crowning triumph, are really a Christmas of themselves—while they scatter the seeds that will bear, through many and many a New Year, the rich harvest of a wide futurity of Christmas blessings. Nor need the well-known household symbols of Christmas-time be absent from these festive labours. Even now, in the very heat and thick of our conflict, may we regard as our own the laurels of victories that are within grasp, and the evergreens typical of the gladness which realises, as already present, the triumphs of eternal truth and right.

FREE TRADE VERSUS WAR.—THE AMERICAN PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

On that which is generally regarded by our contemporaries of the press as the main topic of Mr Polk's message to Congress—the state and prospects of the Oregon question—we have nothing to say in these columns. With the right or wrong of the claim, either of Great Britain or of the United States, to the whole or to parts of an unpeopled wilderness, we have here no concern whatever. Nor are we solicitous to criticise or counteract the supposed bellicose tendencies of certain parts of the above-named important document. The "antidote" is given us in so close a juxtaposition to the "bane," as to relieve us of all painful anxiety with respect to the eventual result of this frivolous and vexatious quarrel. The Free Trade paragraphs make us tolerably easy about the Oregon paragraphs. It is clear that the difficulties of a harassing and angry diplomacy will be solved, and its dangers averted, by the necessities and interests of commerce. The Americans are so resolutely bent on trading with us, and on adjusting their fiscal legislation by the true laws of trade, that we positively refuse to believe in their alleged intention to fight us. On the whole, despite a few angry words, we cannot look on this President's message in any other light than as a "message of peace."

We never read any public document of this class with more satisfaction—both on account of the sound principles which it enunciates, and the prospect which it affords of a peaceful solution of a difficult international controversy—than that which we have derived from those portions of Mr. Polk's recent message to Congress, which treat of the question of fiscal reform. Mr. Polk lays down, in the broadest and strongest manner (qualified only by a salvo in favour of what he calls "incidental protection," a fallacy which we need not at present stop to discuss), that great and simple doctrine of fiscal legislation for which we have always contended—that the object of imposing duties on imports should be TO RAISE REVENUE TO PAY THE NECESSARY EXPENSES OF GOVERNMENT. He exposes, in the clearest and most effective way, the fallacy lurking in the phrase "protection to domestic industry," by showing that ALL the industry of a country, whether agricultural, commercial, or manufacturing, is "domestic" industry—that "the joint labours of ALL these classes constitute the aggregate of the domestic industry of the nation, and ARE EQUALLY ENTITLED TO THE NATION'S PROTECTION." "The Government," he adds, "in theory knows NO DISTINCTION OF PERSONS OR CLASSES, and should not bestow upon some favours and privileges, which all others may not enjoy." The whole system of prohibitory, protective, and differential duties, for preventing, restricting, or regulating the importation of commodities in subserviency to the interests of particular classes of producers; the system of levying taxes on the people, not for the uses of the public treasury, but for the benefit of private individuals—is here exploded and denounced officially, by the chief magistrate of a great and powerful State. In the United States President, we, Free Traders, have an able and learned expositor of the great truth for which we have been contending so many years; that the Custom-House is, by right, wholly and solely an instrument of revenue to the State, not of profit to private individuals at the State's cost.

This is most cheering, especially as coming from a man who is known to speak the sentiments of the dominant party in the American republic, and whose words are indicative and prophetic of approaching legislative changes. There can now be no doubt, whatever, that the Anti-Commercial United States tariff of 1842 will, in the present session of Congress, undergo extensive and important alterations; and it is equally certain, that, whatever may be the fate of the Oregon negotiations, this tariff reform will, in conjunction with Free Trade legislation on our side, produce commercial relations and mutual commercial dependence between the two countries that will render war, for the Oregon or anything else, a moral impossibility. Each country is about to bind itself over to keep the peace—to give security for finding some pacific and amicable mode of adjusting diplomatic quarrels.

It is indeed a goodly spectacle which America and England now exhibit to the world—two countries of first-class power and importance running a race of good principles—each ambitious to be foremost in the correction of error and the legislative realisation of truth. Although we cannot grudge our American brethren triumphs of which we shall be admitted to share the spoils, we would not willingly resign to them the palm of victory in this contest. We have sufficient national pride in us to dislike extremely the idea of being distanced. On the whole, however, our sense of national honour will be tolerably well satisfied if both parties reach the winning-post simultaneously—i. e. provided that the simultaneous triumph be total and immediate.

THE MANCHESTER GUARDIAN AND THE CORN LAWS.

The monopolist journals make frequent reference to the Manchester Guardian as "an organ of the League," because it occasionally exposes their folly and nonsense on subjects connected with Free Trade. Whilst we acknowledge the ability of some of its articles on these subjects, it is with regret we are obliged to say that the opinions of the Guardian are too unstable to find a response in THE LEAGUE.

Few honest-minded men, knowing the character of Lord John Russell, could read his able and candid address to the electors of London, exposing the evils and impolicy of the Corn Laws, without arriving at the conclusion, that if he possessed the power he would put an immediate end to these "baneful" laws. His lordship was most unexpectedly called upon by the Queen to form a Ministry; and the Manchester Guardian, in announcing the fact on the 20th inst., takes occasion to point out to him a passage in his address, which leaves him "at perfect liberty, if he should think it desirable, to cheat the people" "by proposing a fixed duty, gradually diminishing to zero."

"What may be Lord John Russell's present intentions on this point (says the Guardian), we have no means of judging. Probably he would much prefer a total and immediate repeal; but, if he finds that the success of his measure would be secured by a moderate concession of the nature that we have alluded to, he is perfectly at liberty to make it; and we are confident that by so doing he would give general satisfaction to the country."

Lord John Russell's interpretation of his address was precisely that which the public put upon it; he declared the time was gone by for fixed duties, and he consented to take office only on the express condition of bringing forward a measure for the total and immediate repeal of the Corn Law, and to this course there was not, we are happy to say, a single dissident amongst those whom he invited to form his administration. The confidence expressed by the Guardian that its fixed duty scheme, or any other compromise, "would give great satisfaction to the country," was put to the test at the meeting, at the Manchester Town Hall, on Tuesday last, (designated by the Guardian as "unexampled in the history of our country") and unanimously and enthusiastically scouted. With these facts before it, the Guardian, on the following day, in announcing the return of Sir Robert Peel, and speculating upon what sort of measure he will propose for adjusting the Corn Law, counsels him also to compromise, by throwing upon the public "the taxes of which the agriculturists complain."

"It is stated in the Morning Post of yesterday," (says the Guardian.) "that he (Sir R. Peel) will probably offer a fixed duty of 10s. per quarter, to be diminished to a permanent duty of 5s. by reductions of 1s. per annum. We hope however, that if Sir Robert Peel finds himself compelled to submit to concessions for the sake of diminishing opposition, he will rather offer equivalents in some modification of those taxes of which agriculturists complain, than clog his great measure with a permanent duty, which would certainly cause great dissatisfaction among the manufacturing classes."

The Guardian appears to overlook the principle of justice involved in this question. It was well observed by Mr. Brotherton, at the Manchester meeting on Tuesday last, in reference to Mr. Heywood's recommendation to a compromise, "He had always opposed the Corn Laws because they were unjust; and what they believed to be unjust could not be compromised."

The monopolist press, who are pleased to call the Guardian "an organ of the League," will probably eagerly quote the sentiments it has expressed, and gladly attribute them to the League. We have thought it necessary, therefore, lest those at a distance from Manchester should suppose that that journal speaks the sentiments of the Free Traders, to refer them to the proceedings of the meeting, held in the Town Hall, inserted in today's League, which leave no doubt that the Free Traders of Manchester are no more disposed to compromise injustice than they are to compound a felony; and this feeling we are persuaded is responded to by every Leaguer throughout the country.

PROGRESS OF THE MOVEMENT.

In addition to the unparalleled meeting held at Manchester on Tuesday last, to which we have more particularly directed attention elsewhere, the following important gatherings have been held since the publication of our last Number.

A Free Trade meeting has been held at the town of Stockton-upon-Tees, over which the mayor presided. It was addressed by Messrs. Sanders, Pease, Ainsworth, Dixon, Berington, Clephan, and the Rev. Messrs. McDowall and Long. The greatest unanimity prevailed; and as this town is in the centre of an agricultural district, such a demonstration affords proof that the agriculturists are beginning to discover the nature of the fraud by which they have been hitherto deluded.

At Bridgetown, in Scotland, Mr. William Johnston, Provost, occupied the chair. The meeting was addressed by Messrs. Nimmo, Wilson, Malcolm, Keeler, Barclay, Jack, McPhail, and by Mr. T. Gillespie, late Secretary to the Glasgow Chartist Association. The resolutions for the immediate opening of the ports, and for the repeal of the Corn Laws were adopted without a dissentient voice.

A similar meeting was held in the Gorbals, presided over by the chief magistrate of that district. It was addressed by Messrs. Mitchell, Pearson, Cameron, Brodie, and Anderson. An amendment, moved by a person named Wilkinson, fell to the ground for want of a seconder; and this was the only interruption to the harmony and unanimity of the meeting.

Similar meetings, marked by no striking event, were held at the close of last week in Alnwick, Maidstone, Greenwich, and the parish of St. Clement Danes.

A very important meeting was held in Devonport, in consequence of a requisition presented to the mayor, signed by 1200 persons. The chief magistrate took the chair; and the assembly was addressed by T. Woolcombe, Esq., the Rev. J. Fyer, C. Trype, Esq., the Rev. Mr. Gillson, J. Norman, Esq., and several other gentlemen. Great enthusiasm prevailed, and the resolutions in favour of Free Trade were unanimously adopted.

At Portsmouth, the mayor took the chair; and after the first resolution had been moved by Mr. Carter, the meeting was addressed by Sir George Staunton, the respected member for the borough, in a speech of great power and earnestness, in which he scouted the very notion of compromise; by Mr. Sergeant Gazelee, the Rev. G. Arnott, and Sir C. Napier, M.P., who came forward as a practical Hampshire farmer to proclaim that Free Trade would be advantageous to the agricultural interest.

At Maryborough, in Ireland, at a dinner given to the tenantry of the Marquis of Lansdowne, the principle of protection was eloquently denounced by J. R. Price, Esq., the agent to that nobleman. He declared that a repeal of the Corn Laws would lead to a great improvement of the relations between landlord and tenant, because under the present fluctuating system there was no inducement to execute a lease, as there was no security for steady prices.

At St. Andrew's, Holborn, there was a Free Trade meeting on Tuesday evening, when Mr. G. Taylor took the chair. A letter was read from Mr. T. S. Duncombe, M.P., apologising for his unavoidable absence, but warmly supporting the repeal of those laws which restrict the admission of food. Messrs. Tidmarsh, Milne, Puris, Humphreys, and others, including Mr. Cramp, a Chartist, advocated the several resolutions, which were unanimously adopted.

Aberdeen has had a meeting, which for numbers and respectability of attendance, and for firmness and enthusiasm in the assertion of opinion, has had no parallel in the history of that town. The Lord Provost took the chair, and the meeting was addressed by Mr. Bannerman, M.P., the Rev. Mr. Kennedy, Captain Fordyce, Mr. Adam, Bailie Forbes, Mr. Neil Smith, and Mr. G. Thompson, Jun.

A meeting has been held at Wigan, where the chair was taken by R. Thicknesse, Esq. The resolutions were advocated by the Rev. Mr. Roafe, Mr. T. Cooke, Mr. Nevan, &c., and a memorial to Sir R. Peel was adopted, calling his attention to the rapid depreciation of manufactures, and the consequent dangers that impend over the operative population.

A public meeting has been held at Bradford, in Wilts, to procure an immediate repeal of the Corn Laws. The chair was taken by Mr. Edward Wilton; and the crowded assembly was addressed by Mr. Wilkins, the Rev. Mr. Hawkins, the Rev. Mr. Waddy, Mr. Cox, Mr. Neale, Mr. Sidwell, Mr. Eddridge, and Mr. Falvey. The resolutions were adopted with enthusiastic unanimity; and the strongest determination was manifested to rescue North Wilts from the hands of the monopolists.

Mr. Moore also has addressed public meetings at Taunton, Plymouth, and Exeter. The meeting at Taunton was on Monday called by the bailiff, in answer to a requisition from the inhabitants. The bailiff presided; numbers attended who had not before been present at such meetings; and the Court-house was crowded to excess. A Mr. Hayman did make a protection speech, and was listened to; but could find no supporters, so entirely, even in a purely agricultural district, is the old protection system given up. Sir Thomas Colebrook, M.P. for Taunton, attended, and was received and heard with the utmost enthusiasm. The meeting was also addressed by Wm. Beadon, and other gentlemen; and a memorial unanimously agreed to for the immediate opening of the ports and total repeal of the Corn Laws. Mr. Moore dwelt upon the practicability and importance of winning West Somerset, and a resolution was carried by acclamation to form a committee for the purpose of canvassing to increase the number of 40s. freeholders before the 30th of January, so as to make the county safe.

The meeting at Plymouth on Tuesday was held in the Mechanics' Institute, and presided over by Mr. Calmarly, a large landowner in the neighbourhood. The room, which will hold from eight to nine hundred persons, was crowded in every part, and hundreds went away, unable to gain admission. The earnest attention of the audience, and their evident understanding of the Free Trade question in all its bearings, gave proof how well the members of the local Free Trade Association have done their work. Both members for the borough have now given up all idea of a fixed duty or compromise of any kind. A vote of thanks to the League, and of congratulation on the counties won, and the spirit and progress of the freehold movement was carried, by the whole audience rising and cheering for several minutes, and by the promise of help to win North Devon and West Somerset.

On Wednesday, a meeting was held in the Royal Subscription Rooms, Exeter, Samuel Maunder, the indefatigable president of the Free Trade Association, in the chair. Although it was Christmas eve, the room was crowded; the most earnest interest was expressed in the present position of the cause, and the resolution, that now more than at any former period of the agitation there was need for the utmost exertion was carried with unanimous enthusiasm. The audience seemed resolved to find another local Free Trader to contest the city along with Mr. Divett at the next election, and the committee have undertaken to aid the 40s. freehold movement in North Devon and West Somerset.

YE PEASANTRY OF ENGLAND.

DEDICATED TO THE DUKE OF NORFOLK.

Ye peasantry of England,
Who till our fertile leas,
How little do ye think a man
May live on, if he please?
Your weekly wages, it is plain,
As far again would go,
And keep you so cheap,
(For Norfolk's Duke says so)
If, when hunger rages fierce and strong,
To curry you would go.

This powder, hungry fathers,
From all expense will save;
For if your children eat thereof,
No other food they'll crave;
And any time that wages fall,
(As oft they fall, you know,)
'Twill come cheap a pinch to sleep
In water—a pint or so;
And when hunger rages fierce and strong,
To your curry powder go.

Our labourers need no dainties,
But something strong and cheap;
No steak from off the rump they crave,
No chop from off the sheep:
With curry powder, thrice a week,
Warm into bed they'll stow,
Nor ever roar out for more—
Their place so well they know;
But when hunger rages fierce and strong,
To the curry powder go.

The 'tato crops of England
May all to gangrene turn,
While Norfolk's Duke about your lot
His wise head shall concern.
Meanwhile, ye hardy labourers,
Your song of thanks should flow
To the fame of his name
Who the powder made you know;
Which, when hunger rages fierce and strong,
Will set you in a glow.

GREAT MEETING AT ACCRINGTON.—On Tuesday evening an Anti-Corn-Law meeting was held at Accrington, in the "hill country" of Lancashire, which had the peculiar distinction of being attended by nearly the whole male adults of the place, the population being 10,000, and the number present being upwards of 2500. It was held in a very large new weaving shed, affording room to seat comfortably nearly all the audience. Amongst the gentlemen on the platform were William Hargreaves, Esq., a subscriber of 250*l.* to the great League Fund; Frederick Steiner, Esq., a subscriber of 1000*l.*; James Simpson, jun., Esq., of Fox-Hill Bank; the Rev. Mr. Bailey, Mr. Smith, and a number of manufacturers of the town and neighbourhood. Mr. Hargreaves being called to the chair, declared his conviction that nothing short of immediate and unconditional repeal would satisfy the people, and his determination to support the cause of Free Trade to the extent of his ability. Mr. Prentice, of Manchester, then addressed the meeting in a short but energetic speech, warning his hearers against a too great reliance on any ministry that might be formed, whether Whig or Tory, and urging the necessity of continuing the agitation which had already staggered the ruling powers, and would ere long compel them to yield to the demand for complete justice. Mr. Brotherton, M.P. for Salford, followed, and in a speech of an hour's duration, gave a number of familiar illustrations of the working of the Corn Laws, which were listened to with deep attention. Mr. Livesey, publisher of the Preston Guardian, and of The Struggle, a useful periodical, which has greatly served the cause of Free Trade, then addressed the meeting, and completely riveted its attention by his plain and simple, but at the same time very able and convincing arguments; He strongly urged the purchase of forty-shilling freeholds, as a means of meeting and overpowering the landed influence. A memorial to the Queen was agreed to unanimously. After a vote of thanks to the chairman, and three hearty cheers for the League, the great and orderly assemblage broke up soon after ten o'clock.

BATLEY.—A public meeting of the inhabitants of Batley, convened by the constable, in accordance with a respectfully signed requisition, was held in the New Connection School room on Wednesday evening last, to consider the propriety of memorialising her Majesty's Government in favour of the opening of the ports for the free admission of all kinds of grain. John Nussy, Esq., the chairman, having in a brief speech, opened the proceedings of the meeting, called upon the Rev. John Allison, Baptist minister, to move the first resolution. The meeting was subsequently addressed by Messrs. S. Jubb, M. Spedding, J. Burnley, J. Jubb, W. Bailey, J. Taylor, S. Burnley, M. Butterworth, jun., and B. Senior. A memorial founded on the resolutions previously agreed to, was unanimously adopted. The thanks of the meeting having been accorded to the chairman, three cheers were given for Lord Morpeth.

GREAT LEAGUE MEETING AT MANCHESTER.

On Tuesday last, Dec. 23rd, a meeting of merchants, bankers, manufacturers, traders, and others, was held at the Town-hall, to consider the best means of aiding the operations of the National Anti-Corn-Law League in the present crisis.

The meeting was held in pursuance of a requisition signed by the following gentlemen:—Mr. Cobden, M.P., Mr. Bright, M.P., Mr. Marsland, M.P., Mr. Walker, M.P., Mr. Watkins, mayor; Aldermen Kershaw, Walker, Mayson, Boyd, Armistage, Potter, and Harvey; Messrs. Bazley, Brooks, Munro, J. B. Smith, Henry, Brickley, Whittaker, Matley, T. Thompson, George Wilson, R. H. Greg, Henry Ashworth, E. Ashworth, P. R. Arrowsmith, W. Bickham, W. Rawson, W. Evans, T. Whitehead, T. Taylor, J. Wrigley, J. R. Barnes, — Barnes, jun., E. J. Barratt, E. P. Thompson, J. Simpson, E. Hall, H. Bannerman, J. Acton, W. R. Callender, Nathan Lees, J. Scholefield, A. Prentice, John Harding, T. B. Potter, T. Woolley, R. A. Thicknesse, Wigan; J. Midgeley, Rochdale; W. Morris, C. Potter, Darwen; J. Graham, S. Lees, N. Heald, T. Bright, E. J. Kay, Whitworth; R. Platt, Staleybridge; E. Grundy, Rusholme; W. Alcard, Warrington; R. Stuart, H. Rawson, T. Ashton, W. Ross, J. Whitworth, J. Gallimore, J. Cheetham, J. Hoyle, Rochdale; T. Booth, Rochdale; J. Petrie, Rochdale.

The meeting, which comprised many of the leading merchants and manufacturers of Manchester and the surrounding towns, though held at the early hour of 11 o'clock precisely, was most numerously attended, the spacious hall being densely crowded from the very commencement of the proceedings.

On the motion of Mr. G. Wilson, Chairman of the Council, seconded by Mr. Bright, M.P.,

Mr. ROBERT HYDE GREG took the chair, and read the minutes of a special general meeting of the Council of the National Anti-Corn-Law League, held at Manchester on Saturday, the 13th of December, when it was moved by Mr. Marsland, M.P., and seconded by Mr. R. H. Greg, and unanimously resolved, "That from the altered position of parties in the House of Commons in reference to the repeal of the Corn Laws, it is desirable to rescind the existing resolution against petitioning the present Parliament, and that this meeting recommend that petitions be sent from every town and district in the kingdom as numerous as possible, praying for the total and unconditional abolition of the Corn and Provision Laws;" and on the motion of Mr. Bright, M.P., seconded by Mr. R. Walker, M.A., resolved unanimously, "That a subscription of a quarter of million sterling be immediately commenced, to meet the present emergency; that a call of 20 per cent. thereon be forthwith made, and that a public meeting be called in the Town Hall, Manchester, for Tuesday, the 23d of December inst., for the purpose of giving effect to the foregoing resolution." The chairman then spoke as follows:—If gentlemen, my own feelings meet with any echo in your breasts, as I am convinced they will, you will think with me that we are met here to-day on this most interesting, anxious, and unprecedented crisis of affairs, rather to back the resolutions of the League, which I have just read, by our deeds, than by discussing them in words. (Cheers.) And as we have on former occasions cashed the cheques which the League have drawn upon us, first for 6000*l.*, then for 10,000*l.*, afterwards 50,000*l.*, and two years ago, in this very room, for 100,000*l.*, so now that they think fit to draw upon us for 250,000*l.* in the confidence that we will honour their draft, and that it will be paid when at maturity, we will not withdraw from them that confidence and support we have shown them on former occasions. (Cheers.) When we think of the very great service which the League have rendered, their unwearying struggle through seven long years against every possible difficulty, with the prejudices and open violence of the operatives, with the coldness and neglect of the master manufacturers and merchants, and the constant hostility of the landed interest, we must be filled with admiration and astonishment that they are now about to see their efforts crowned, there can be little doubt, with complete success. (Cheers.) And if from the great body of the League we turn for an instant to its leaders, we must feel that their sacrifice of time, of health, of every comfort in life—sacrifices which, though they never allude to themselves, the country will never forget (loud cheers); if we think of the unwearied perseverance, the consummate skill, the brilliant talents they have displayed from the beginning of this contest, we must be filled, not with admiration only, but with the deepest gratitude, and every disposition will be felt to listen to their advice and adopt any recommendation that may come from them. What is money, gentlemen, compared with the sacrifices they have made, although in pecuniary sacrifices, too, they have ever been among the first? (Cheers.) This is the last time when such an appeal will be made to you, and I trust it will be answered as it ought to be. If we only show at the present crisis the same determination and spirit we have manifested on so many former occasions, there can be no doubt the next time we meet will be to celebrate our triumph. (Cheers.) But till that triumph be perfectly secured we must not be caught napping—we must not lie upon our oars—we must not forsake the helm, as some other pilots did on a late occasion. (Hear.) It is clear that the successful termination of our struggle cannot long be delayed. (Cheers.) If any one doubts this, let the proceedings of this day put an end to his scepticism. The mischiefs of the uncertainty that prevails should alone make everybody call for a speedy settlement. Not to dwell upon the crippled state of our mercantile and manufacturing concerns, the state of the money-market, the panic in railway affairs, the scarcity acknowledged to exist here and the famine impending over the sister island, if not in this, with the duty on the importation of food, actually rising, and the ports becoming more closely shut the more the necessity of the case calls for their being opened, the very farmers themselves and the landed interests are suffering under the present uncertainty, the price of their produce actually declining while that produce was known to be deficient in amount for the consumption of the country. (Cheers.) Let us then stick to our standard, continue our exertions, in the confident belief that every interest and class in the country will rally around us and call in one universal voice for an immediate repeal of the Corn and Provision Laws. (Loud cheers.) I will now call on Mr. Wilson, the Chairman of the Council, to read an abstract of the finances. (Cheers.)

Mr. Wilson came forward amidst loud cheers, and said he had been instructed by the Treasurer to present his accounts; and as it was desirable, before gentlemen committed themselves to a new subscription, they should know what had been done with the money already paid, he would request the patient attention of the meeting while he read the statement put in his hand. He then read the two statements following:

LEAGUE FUND, 100,000 l.
Dr.	£	s.	d.
January 1, 1845. To balance on hand.....	26,675	19	9
December 6. Subscriptions and Bazaar receipts to this date	35,678	8	10
To discount and interest received this year ..	820	4	11
	£63,174	13	6

Cr.	£	s.	d.
By distribution of tracts, including expenses of distributors, carriage, &c.	840	1	7
By expenses of furniture and fixtures	218	19	0
By deputation expenses, including travelling expenses to attend meetings and Parliamentary elections in various parts of the United Kingdom	462	12	4
By grants to local Free Trade Committees ..	1000	17	0
By general salaries of office-staff, including all employed in London and Manchester on the general business of the League, weekly wages, &c. &c.	1836	14	6
By postage-stamps and postages, sundry office expenses, petty cash, and incidental expenses, including repairs and alterations, coats, cleaning, &c.	1528	1	5
By expenses of meetings, including hire of rooms, erecting hustings, and all other expenses connected with public meetings ..	1069	16	6
By salaries and expenses of lecturers, including travelling expenses, &c.	2320	4	9
By rents, taxes, and gas, including rent of Covent-garden Theatre, house and offices, London and Manchester	3992	1	8
By stamped publications, printing, and stationery, reporting, &c. &c.	6854	9	2
By bazaar expenses, including wages of persons employed during the bazaar, fitting up Covent-garden Theatre, and general expenditure in advertising, printing, travelling expenses, &c. &c.	5712	13	4
By expenses of League newspaper, including salaries of conductors, editor, and contributors, stamps, paper, and printing,	11,388	13	4
Deduct receipts for casual sale	1,227	6	3
	*10,161	7	1

By registration expenses, including salaries, travelling, and other expenses of registration agents, legal expenses wages of clerks, printing and stationery, expenses in registration courts, and general expenses on registration business	15,534	4	1
Balance on hand	12,033	11	1
	£63,174	13	6

WILLIAM BICKHAM } Members of the Finance
SAMUEL LEES } Committee.

W. RAWSON, Treasurer.

Examined and found correct.

WILLIAM EVANS, Member of the Council.

This, as he had stated before, was the remainder of the 100,000*l.* fund; but the following sheet would give the whole of the receipts and disbursements, and the balance on that account up to the 6th instant. He then read the following balance sheet:

Dr.
January 1.	To amount of receipts as statement rendered	£	s. d.
		86,009	7 3
December 6.	To amount of subscriptions and bazaar receipts from Jan. 1 to this date	35,678	8 10
December 6.	To discount and interest received this year	820	4 11
		<hr/>
		£122,508	1 0
December 6.	To balance in hand	12,033	11 1
Cr.		£	s. d.
January 1.	By amount of expenditure, as per statement	59,333	7 0
December 6.	By amount of expenditure to this date as per statement	51,141	2 5
	Balance	12,033	11 1
		<hr/>
		£122,508	1 0

WILLIAM BICKHAM } Members of the Finance
SAMUEL LEES } Committee.

WILLIAM RAWSON, Treasurer.

Examined and found to be correct.

WILLIAM EVANS, Member of the Council.

The report was received with loud applause.

Mr. CALLENDER.—I rise to move "That the account of the receipts and expenditure now presented is highly satisfactory, and that it be and is hereby approved." I am sure it will not require ten words from me to bring you to agree to this resolution. Having been connected—and I consider it a great honour to have been connected—with the Anti-Corn Law League from the very commencement of its operations until the present time, I can assure you that, with the exception of the petty cash items, no sum was ever expended without a vote of the Council, which met every morning for the purpose; and I know of no establishment, however punctual in their payments, and in the examination of their accounts, that could be more exact in seeing that they got good value for every farthing expended. (Cheers.) Indeed, if we look to the amount of outlay, and the estimated advantage that has been obtained, I am sure you will agree with me in thinking that the sum expended has been amply repaid (cheers); and when we look at the accomplishment of the great object we have in view—for I trust we are within sight of its accomplishment—I shall be greatly mistaken if it fail to contribute largely to the happiness and

[* The Standard says, referring to this item, that the LEAGUE newspaper constitutes a dead loss of 10,000*l.* a year to the funds of the League.—and thereupon hangs sundry maudlin ejaculations about the death of the League—which she has so often buried before. The venerable twins of the Standard-Herald would greatly rejoice their proprietors, if they could demonstrate on their balance-sheet a similar loss in the shape of upwards of 15,000*l.* bona fide subscribers—all of whom pay their subscriptions twelve months beforehand. As all subscribers of 1*l.* and upwards are entitled to a weekly copy of the LEAGUE, it follows, of course, that the whole expenses of the LEAGUE newspaper are charged as disbursements in the general account.—ED. LEAGUE.]

contentment of this country, and promote the interests of peace throughout the world (cheers), at once giving honourable occupation to millions, not only in our own country, but to millions in other countries; thus uniting all nations in the bonds of brotherhood, for the true promotion of the great objects of philanthropy and true godliness throughout the world. (Cheers.)

Mr. L. HEYWORTH, of Liverpool, in seconding the resolution said, As far as I have been able to judge, from reading the statement you have just heard regarding the manner in which the accounts of this society are kept, I can bear testimony to its truth. In undertaking a great measure like this—one to remedy a great mischief to mankind—it is a gratifying thing to behold so many, from all quarters, ranging themselves in our support, and eager to promote our object; and it is still more gratifying to find, by such a testimony as that we have now received, that the money which we have advanced as subscriptions the more speedily to gain our end, has been legitimately applied to those objects for which it was originally intended. (Hear, hear.) Some six or seven years ago I appeared before a Manchester public, and so thoroughly was I then convinced that it was for the advantage of every member of the human family that all protective duties should be abolished, that I did not hesitate to declare that I would be one among 50 other individuals to guarantee a subscription of 1000*l.* each. Many parties afterwards came forward, and we ourselves have since expended considerably more than that sum. (Hear, hear.) Do any of us regret having done this? Did we ever expend money more fruitful of results, more capable of attaining the end we had in view? It was in the first instance proposed that the money so raised should be laid out in endeavouring to enlighten the minds of the people, as to the true bearings of commercial freedom, and most strictly has that object been pursued. We have distributed tracts far and wide; we have, ourselves, travelled in every direction to communicate information to various bodies of our countrymen; we have engaged intelligent lecturers to repeat those lessons; and the result has been that the country is enlightened. (Hear.) We have not only roused an apathetic people to consider and reflect on those laws, but we have gained converts and listeners among those who originally were directly opposed to us, and now we can boast that the multitude of the people from every class have joined our ranks. (Cheers.) Shall we now desist from our undertaking—shall we now draw back when at the very point of achieving a victory? It would be unbecoming our character as Englishmen to contemplate such a proceeding. We have enlightened the people, we have educated them, we have taught them to know and understand the principle on which we proposed to act; and are we now to stand still, to desert them, and to leave them without the means of carrying those principles into action? We must not do this. If we send our sons to school, if we impart to them knowledge and information, we do not, when they are educated, leave them there; we bring them forward in the world and give that further instruction which may teach them to take an active and responsible part in the business of life. The people have been at school, they must now turn their acquirements to account, and it is for us to lead them to that position on which they must stand with effect, and from which the declarations of their opinions may come with superadded force. (Hear, hear, hear.) We have come here to-day not merely to raise funds, and to expend contributions, but for the purpose also of giving to the masses of the people the right of participating in the franchise, that they may, conscious of their own interests, choose those individuals to represent them in Parliament, who, in their estimation, will best advance their interests; and having intelligence, there is little doubt that they will make choice of Free Traders. (Cheers.) It is when we have accomplished this, and then only, that we can throw up our hats and declare that we have gained a victory. Our first step must be in regard to the registration, so as to secure a steady footing in all the counties, from one end of the kingdom to the other. (Cheers.) I beseech you, gentlemen, that you will reflect on the necessity for exertions to day, and that you will be steady in your determination to act in proportion to the extent of that necessity. We cannot do without funds, and we must now, in support of our great undertaking, come forward with our subscriptions in a liberal and generous manner. It is true that some persons may suppose that this is merely a patriotic movement, and that, as it is patriotic, it is unprofitable. But all of you know that if we succeed we cannot fail to bring profit to every individual, be he who he may, in this room; that the entire nation will feel the blessing, and that even the landed proprietor, the aristocrat, who opposes it because he sees in it no gain to himself, must inevitably be enriched and advantaged in every possible manner. If there are any men who, notwithstanding these declarations, will still adhere to the opinion that our cause is solely patriotic, merely the result of warm and eager feelings, I would refer them to the effects, of which all can judge, of cheap bread upon your trade during the last twelve months. Has it not during this time been good beyond precedent,—flourished beyond the experience of all the world? And why? because bread was cheap (hear, hear); and if you find that, under circumstances which are necessarily fluctuating and temporary, you derive so many advantages and so great a good, should we not seek, by every means, to render these circumstances, through the operation of wise and national laws, fixed and permanent? (Hear, loud cheers.) This we can do by compelling the universal adoption of Free Trade, for though I am aware it is an argument against us, that even if we do become a nation of Free Traders we shall have no imitators, and shall therefore only suffer by our generosity, it must be apparent to every man who reflects, that when the world observes us becoming richer and richer, when it is known that our prosperity has been increased, and our commerce extended by means of Free Trade, other countries will be but too desirous to walk in the same path, and imitate the example we will have set, in order that they may enjoy and flourish by the same advantages. (Loud cheers.) We concluded by seconding the resolution.

The resolution was then put by the CHAIRMAN, and carried unanimously.

Mr. Alderman NEILD said, I rise to move the following resolution:—

"That we the merchants, manufacturers, traders, and others, inhabitants of Manchester and its vicinity, do hereby repeat our solemn protest against the laws which prohibit the free importation of foreign grain and provisions, believing them to be most oppressive to the great mass of the people, and destructive alike to the great national interests of agriculture and commerce; and, relying upon the justice of our cause, and upon the intelligence and honesty of our countrymen, we do declare most emphatically our determination not to relax in our exertions until those laws be entirely abolished."

(Loud and continued cheering.) Gentlemen, as my townsmen know, I am not in the habit of making long speeches, and fortunately for me on the present occasion, the resolution you have heard contains the essence of the subject. It is fortunate, too, that the principles alluded to in the resolution have been before, again and again, fully discussed, thanks to the operations of the Anti-Corn-Law League. (Hear, hear.) We have also to thank them that the persons who differ from us in opinion are now by far the minority, and not, as formerly, the great majority, of the inhabitants of this country. (Cheers.) It is a most gratifying circumstance, and must be so felt by the members of the League, that after their seven years of constant agitation, they have succeeded in obtaining—at least, they are on the point of obtaining—one of the most complete moral victories ever achieved perhaps in our time. (Hear, hear.) I think I am justified in asserting, that if these laws had been abolished within six or twelve months by a mere numerical vote of the House of Commons, it would have been no victory at all in comparison with that which we have now to glory in. If our battle had been so gained, parties differing with us might still oppose, though beaten; feeling that an exclusive good had been taken from them, they might continue the struggle to resume their position; but now, when the Corn Laws are abolished, every man in this country must know and feel that they are abolished for ever. (Cheers.) After so complete, so utter a victory, every man, whose opinion is worth regarding, must admit that everything in the shape of argument against us has gone. All know and confess that the days of the Corn Laws are numbered; and all will rejoice when those laws are destroyed; at the present moment, as you, Sir, very clearly stated in your opening address, every interest, whether commercial or agricultural, in the kingdom, is completely unsettled; we know the cause of this evil, and we all agree that the sooner it is removed the better for every interest. (Hear, hear.) You stated, Sir, and stated very truly, the numerous obligations which the community are under to the Anti-Corn-Law League. I have sometimes found fault, but I freely admit the extent of those obligations. With respect to our sympathies, we must not forget that which is the most sensitive organ we possess; we are composed of various organs, but there is not one of them so sensitive as the pocket (cheers), and it is to that we now appeal for sympathy. Let this meeting show that they acknowledge and will repay the services rendered to those of whom it is composed and to the community at large, by the Anti-Corn Law League. There are some who will object to this, or who, if they will accede to it, will say, when called upon, on other occasions, that they have given already so large a sum to the League that they can give no more in charity. This is a mistake; the money given to the Anti-Corn-Law League is not charity at all. (Hear, hear.) Will any man in this room, a merchant or trader, deny that if our case is clearly made out, he will not save a large annual expenditure and make increased profits? Or will any man, who has already expended large sums of money in support of the Anti-Corn-Law League, large as those sums may have been, assert that the abominable scheme of the sliding scale has not abstracted from his pocket many times the amount? (Cheers.) I know the value of time to the gentlemen assembled here. I knew that they would not be here, densely crowding this hall, in the midst of the business and the engagements of a market-day, if they did not strongly feel that it is of more importance, even on this day, that they should be here than attending to their commercial avocations. (Hear, hear.) I, therefore, knowing this, will not trespass on the meeting. Before the conclusion we will show that in making these sacrifices we are in earnest; that whatever the losses were, the men of Manchester are in earnest on this momentous question. (Great cheering.)

Mr. R. ASHTON.—I agreed, on coming into this room, to second the resolution which has just been read on condition that along speech would not be necessary. I said, if any one expected a long harangue from me they would be disappointed, on which my friend Bright observed that there was something more important, necessary, and efficacious than long speeches,—large subscriptions (cheers), and for this purpose especially this meeting has been assembled. I believe all the arguments which can be used have been used, and it is unnecessary for me to repeat them. For my own part, I would rather pay than work. (Cheers.) I always pay what the League demands. (Cheers.) I only wish that others who expect to benefit as much by their operations as I do would act in the same manner. (Cheers.) There must surely be a quarter of a million of Corn Law repealers, and if the sum now required were equally distributed over them, it could be easily raised and easily collected. (Cheers.) The time certainly has come when a big shot must be fired. (Cheers.) We must double-shot our guns (cheers), for although the Corn Laws cannot last much longer, we have something to do yet, and it must and shall be done. (Cheers.) The Duke of Wellington once said, "We cannot have a little war;" and the League must have no little subscription; and if it should be necessary another time, although I hope it may not be necessary, that they should ask for a million sterling, they shall have my support at any rate. (Loud and continued cheering.)

The resolution was passed with acclamation.

Mr. H. ASHWORTH said, he rose to propose a resolution which he believed was the most extraordinary and important resolution ever submitted to any assembly in the world. He proceeded to read the resolution.

"That this meeting hereby expresses its high sense of the invaluable services which the National Anti-Corn Law League has rendered to the cause of Free Trade; and, in order to enable the Council to make renewed and increased exertions for the repeal of the Corn and Provision Laws, a subscription, in aid of the great fund of 250,000*l.*, be now commenced, and that the following gentlemen be appointed a committee to canvass for subscriptions in Manchester and the surrounding districts: R. H. Greg, George Wilson, Richard Cobden, John Bright, John Brooks, William Rawson, W. B. Watkins (mayor), C. J. S. Walker, James Kershaw, John Mayson, Thomas Harbottle, John Burd, E. Armitage, John Foster, William Harvey, Thomas Bayley, Watkin Lees, Robert Munn, W. R. Callender, John Whitaker, Thos. Thomasson, Edward Hall, Wm. McCartney, Henry Ashworth, Richard Matley, J. B. Smith, Henry Rawson, William Bickham, Thos. B. Potter, Thomas Woolley, Samuel Lees, William Evans, Joseph Simpson, J. B. Scott, with power to add to their number."

In considering the momentous subject before him, he could not overlook the character of the assembly he was addressing, and he would venture to say that on no former occasion was there ever so influential and powerful a body gathered in any one room. He beheld before him those on whom depended the important interests of the cotton trade, a trade which in less than 70 years had become the largest organisation of industry the world ever saw. It was for the purpose of securing to that industry the just rights to which it was entitled that they were come together. It was well known that at the age of threescore years and ten the human frame exhibited marks of decay; but with the institutions of commerce that period was only the first progressive step towards the development of its power. (Cheers.) They had now to consider whether that industry should proceed to its full measure of strength, or be permitted to decay, like the human frame of which he had spoken. The League had undertaken the subject, and it appeared obvious that the commerce of our country should not die of monopoly. (Cheers.) The sum he had proposed to raise might appear large; it was not large when measured by the magnitude of the object to be gained. By way of comparison, he would remind them that there were many persons in that room who had subscribed to the railway called the "London Direct." They had put down about 12,000,000*l.* to save an hour in travelling to London. They all knew that time was money; and if an hour in business was worth that large sum, surely the business itself was worth saving at the cost of a quarter of a million. It was proposed to raise 250,000*l.*, and how was this to be expended? Not in corrupting the minds of the people, but in advancing their intelligence, and their social and moral position. The League had already so fully instructed the people in the principles of Free Trade, that there did not require much effort in teaching them the knowledge of their rights. It was, however, necessary to acquaint them with the uses and importance of the electoral power they could command, and in inducing them to become freeholders. (Cheers.) In this matter, let it not be supposed that they were calling upon persons of frugal habits to expend money in that which would not pay them fair interest. He believed that freeholds which they had recently seen purchased had paid 5 or 6 per cent., and therefore the outlay involved no sacrifice. (Cheers.) He would also observe that it had always happened amongst working men that the possession of a freehold tended to make a man walk upright, and to carry himself with a greater amount of independence and self-respect, than if he had the money it cost in the savings-bank. (Cheers.) Let them not suppose that the Corn Laws were going to be repealed suddenly; there would yet be some severe struggling, and perhaps an election or two before the repeal was carried. But there was an urgency in the present crisis which it became them to take advantage of—namely, the failure of the potato crop. This calamity had placed the Ministry in an awkward dilemma; they had been called upon to open the ports, and they had allowed the ports to be opened, not for the admission of foreign corn, but in order that the corn in our possession might be carried away to other countries. (Cheers.) Ministers had done something besides: they had sent out learned doctors and chemists to discover whether they could derive either gluten or food out of rotten potatoes, and he need not say that they had not succeeded. However, it appeared that the work which chemistry failed to do had been handed over to political alchemy. Lord John Russell had taken up the question, and, having examined the caldron of mischief and misfortune, he had put in his stirring stick, pronounced a political oration, and raised an odour at once refreshing to Free Trade and noxious to monopoly—so noxious that in less than a week it had expelled from the council-chamber the strongest Conservative Ministry of modern times. (Cheers.) Out of these events it became the League to consider how the famine of potatoes could be converted into the blessing of Free Trade. The commotion thus created, the existing ferment of society, and the intelligence of the people, afforded to the League the brightest hopes of success. Out of these elements there had arisen a trade-wind of excitement, which was the best harbinger of their hopes. The Free Trade ship was now moving gloriously on; plenty was her ensign; the captain, the pilot, and a goodly crew were at their posts of duty, and millions of their countrymen on shore were anxiously waiting to give the exulting shout of victory. (Cheers.) He hoped the resolution he had the honour to propose would meet their concurrence and approbation.

Mr. Alderman KERSHAW rose with the greatest pleasure to second the resolution. The invaluable services which the National Anti-Corn Law League had rendered to the cause of Free Trade were well known, and need not be engaged upon by him. He had been connected with the League from its commencement. He saw it when it was no bigger than a man's hand. He had watched its operations steadily through the whole period of its existence, and he was prepared to say that there never was an institution of such magnitude conducted upon such prudent, and yet such energetic principles. (Hear, hear, and applause.) It was impossible to reflect upon what the Anti-Corn-Law League had done but with feelings of admiration and astonishment. (Hear, hear.) The meeting to day testified the interest which the public of Manchester and the surrounding neighbourhood took in the League. (Hear, hear.) On no former occasion, in reference to the funds of this institution, had there been such a meeting as this. (Hear, hear, and cheers.) He rejoiced to see his fellow-townsmen, and gentlemen from the neighbourhood of Manchester, thus assemble for the purpose once more—and once for all as he trusted—of testifying their disapprobation and disgust of those laws which tended to cramp industry, which depressed the people, deprived the poor man of a proper measure of bread, and injured to an extent which he believed it was impossible to calculate the interests of trade and commerce generally. (Hear, hear.) He felt that this was a most important meeting, and trusted that the subscriptions about to be commenced would be begun and carried on with spirit. (Hear, hear.) It was not too much to say, that the whole country was looking to their proceedings at that hour. He was sure the Government of the country, if there was one—(hear, hear, and laughter),—was looking to them. He presumed that the course which the Government would take would be in some considerable degree determined by the efforts which the League was now about to make. (Hear, hear.) That, he believed, would be the last time that they would be called upon to subscribe to the funds of the League. (Hear, hear.) Could any man doubt that those laws were not to be forthwith put down? (Hear, hear.) There would be a struggle; the monopolists would die hard; but the Free Traders had victory in prospect, and let them that day inflict the last blow upon the head of monopoly. (Loud cheers.) He would not dwell upon the injustice of those laws. The men who supported them, if they were men of intelligence, must know that they were doing what was unrighteous and unchristian—(hear, hear)—in supporting laws which, it had been proved, tended to the starvation of the people. (Hear, hear.) He never in his life gave money with greater pleasure and satisfaction than he did to the Anti-Corn-Law League. (Cheers.) He looked upon it as a species of insurance for his benefit, and as the best investment which he could make. He calculated upon receiving great interest from what he had expended in this way; and depend upon it, that as soon as the Corn and Provision Laws were repealed, every one who had subscribed to this fund would feel a high satisfaction, and those who had not would deeply regret it. (Hear, hear.) The League must be supported. The men at the helm deserved their most cordial support. (Cheers.) None else had made half the sacrifices which those gentlemen had made in this great cause. They must be sustained, cheered on in their exertions. They had to meet a band of monopolists in the House of Commons, and they must be backed out of doors by the people. (Hear, hear, and cheers.) They must be backed in the best possible way by the voice of the people; that voice must be made distinct and loud; and they must, as they were able to do, in a constitutional manner, abrogate those laws. Register, gentlemen (said Mr. Kershaw). Promote as far as possible the extension of the franchise; especially look to the registration in the counties; and depend upon it that the fate of those ruinous, iniquitous laws is for ever sealed. (Loud cheers.) He had only further to add, that he came there as a merchant and manufacturer, and as the employer of a considerable number of his fellow-men, and in his own name and in theirs to protest against those laws which were depriving him of the proper remuneration for his capital, and depriving them of bread. (Cheers.) The resolution then passed unanimously.

The CHAIRMAN said there was now an end to the resolutions, and he should be glad to see them back their words by their deeds. Two years ago, when he presided at the meeting for the 100,000*l.* subscription, they had not one-sixth of the number of gentlemen present on this occasion: they did not then more than half fill the small room now cut off on the other side of the pillars (the Cross Street end of the hall), and then 14,000*l.* were subscribed in the room; and as there were now six times the number they ought to produce six times the amount. Perhaps he ought to say what he intended to do himself; he did not wish to deter others who might choose to give larger amounts, but as his brothers and himself then gave 500*l.*, they would put down their names on this occasion for 1000*l.* (Great cheering.) He invited gentlemen present to state what amount they or friends who had commissioned them to do so, would subscribe; and then announced that their excellent friend, Mr. Chadwick, of Eccles, who could not be present through indisposition, had sent in a note for 1000*l.* (Cheers.)

Mr. LAWRENCE HEYWORTH, of Liverpool, said, as there was a League in Liverpool he would give 500*l.* for Liverpool, and 500*l.* likewise for Manchester, which together will be 1000*l.* (Applause.)

The Chairman then announced the following subscriptions:—

Samuel Greg and Sons, Manchester ..	1000
James Chadwick, Eccles, near Manchester ..	1000
Thomas Thomasson, Bolton ..	1000
Kershaw, Leese, and Co. Manchester ..	1000
Thomas Hoyle and Sons, ditto ..	1000
Lawrence Heyworth, Liverpool ..	500
Mr. COBDEN said their friend John Brooks had commissioned him to say he would not be "second chop" to anybody, and therefore if any one gave more than 1000 l. , Mr. Brooks would give the same amount, whatever it might be; otherwise he must be put down at 1000 l. (Cheers.)
John Brooks ..	1000
Robert Ashton, of Hyde ..	1000
William Bailey & Brothers, Stalybridge ..	1000
Robert Platt, Stalybridge ..	1000
Robert Lees & Sons, Dukinfield ..	1000
John Whitaker & Sons, Hurst ..	1000
John Bright & Brothers, Rochdale ..	1000
(The cheering at this last amount was most enthusiastic.)
Samuel Ashton, Pole Bank ..	1000
James Ashton & Brothers, Pole Bank ..	1000
Thomas Ashton & Sons, Hyde ..	1000
James King & Sons, Rochdale ..	1000
From one family in Rochdale ..	1000
[Viz., Thomas Booth, John Hoyle, James Hoyle, and Thomas Hoyle.]
P. Dixon & Sons, Manchester & Carlisle ..	1000
Joseph Eccles, Mill Hill, near Blackburn ..	1000
Eccles Shorrocks & Co., Darwen ..	1000
Henry and Edmund Ashworth, Torton ..	1000
Pilkington, Brothers & Co., Blackburn ..	1000
A. and S. Henry & Co., Manchester ..	1000
A. and F. Reynier, Ashton ..	1000
James Buckley, Ashton ..	500
John Buckley & Brothers, Mossley ..	500
N. Buckley & Son, Carr Hill, Saddleworth ..	500
One family in Liverpool ..	700
[Viz., Miss Mather, Mount Pleasant, Liverpool, Miss Jane Mather, Messrs. John, Robert, and Daniel Mather, £100 each; and Mr. Thomas Mather, of Glyn Abbot, Holywell, £200.]
J. B. Smith, Manchester ..	500
John Cheetham, Stalybridge ..	500
Richard Matley, Manchester ..	500
Gardner and Bazley, ditto ..	500
John Ashton, Hyde ..	500
Callender, Bickham, and Co., Manchester ..	500
James Heywood, ditto ..	500
J. Fenton, Crimble, (late MP. for Rochdale) ..	500
McConnell and Co., Manchester ..	500
John and Thomas Potter, ditto ..	500
Henry Bannerman and Sons, ditto ..	500
Richard Cobden, ditto ..	500
[Immense cheering, long-continued; the assemblage rising simultaneously, and waving their hats; and the Chairman observed that it went against his conscience to take that sum.]
Elkanah Armitage and Sons ..	500
F. Steiner ..	500
A. Friend, per John Bright ..	500
Samuel Fletcher, Son, & Co., Manchester ..	500
The CHAIRMAN said he received this with great pleasure: it was the first time that house had come forward to join the League, to whose Council it had been a matter of regret every year, that they did not join it.
George Forster, Sadden ..	500
William Ross, Manchester ..	500
Hyde, Sons, and Sowerby, Dukinfield ..	500
Thompson, Brothers and Sons, Manchester ..	400
Wells, Cooke, and Potter, Manchester ..	250
William Morris, Salford ..	200
William Rawson, Treasurer £200 l. ..	400
Hall and Rawson, Manchester ..	200
John Mayson and Co. ..	250
R. A. Thicknesse, Wigan ..	250
James Curton, Manchester ..	250
A. Friend, per George Wilson ..	250
William Hargreaves ..	200
Taylor, Brothers, Wigan ..	300
A. and G. Murray, Manchester ..	100
Robert Stuart, Ardwick ..	300
Mr. PRINCE said when the Manchester Anti-Corn-Law

Association was formed, and collecting subscriptions of 5s., Mr. Robert Stuart was the first to give his name for the then large amount of 10l.

Hindley and Sutcliffe, Ashton	250
W. N. Christie and Son, Fairfield	250
Thomas Whitehead and Brothers	500
W. McCall, ditto	100
John McCall, ditto	100
Mrs. and Miss McCall	100
Robert Johnston, Manchester	500
Evans and Nicholson, Manchester	200
Simpson, Thompson, and Co., ditto	250
Binyons and Hunter, Manchester	250
John Petrie and Co., Rochdale	200
Wm. Alcock, Warrington	250

The CHAIRMAN said this gentleman was to be the Free Trade representative of that borough, and the League cordially wished him success.

John and R. Allen, ditto	250
J. and B. Scholesfield, Littleborough	250
Samuel Brewis and Co., Manchester	250
Robt. Crewdson, Manchester	50

Mr. CALLENDER said this amount was from a young man just commencing business, who said, if his circumstances warranted, he would give 50l. a year for five years.

Binns, Dean, and Co., Dukinfield	150
Thomas Mason and Sons, Ashton	300
J. Marler and Brothers, Newton Moor	100
James Tweedale, Rochdale	100
Henry Crossfield, Liverpool	100
Charles Howard, Hyde	500
Samuel Lucas	150
An Admirer of Sir Robert Peel	100
George Wilson, Chairman of Council	200

[Great cheering.]

Benjamin Smith and Sons	150
Parr, Curtis, and Muleley, Manchester	150
Henry Johnston, jun., Stalybridge	100
Henry Bazley, Manchester	100
Andrew Melly, Liverpool	100
Thomas Harvey, Liverpool	100
W. B. Watkins, Mayor of Manchester	200

["Three cheers for the Mayor" were called for, and three times three were given.]

Smith, Phillips, Robinson, Manchester	100
James Knott and Sons, Ashton	200
Heald and Wilson, Manchester	200
Stanley and Chadwick, Ashton	150
Thomas Ogden, Dukinfield	100
Thomas Hunter	100
F. R. Atkinson, Norfolk-street, Manchester	100
Edmund Potter and Co., ditto	100
Richard Holroyd and Co., ditto	100
Benjamin Sykall, ditto	100
Thomas Woolley, ditto	100
W. Edwards (Bowden & Edwards), Manchester	100
Charles Potter, Darwen	100
Harold Potter	100
Edwin Potter	100
Henry Lees, Glossop	100
Nicholson and Evans, ditto	200
Walker, Smith, and Co., Bury	300
R. Walker, M.P., Bury	250
John Grundy, ditto	250
R. Ashton, ditto	250
Thomas and James Wrigley, ditto	250
John and Edmund Grundy, ditto	250
Thomas, A., and J. Grundy, Bury	150
John Walker, Bury	100
Edmund Grundy, Park Hills, ditto	100
James Wrigley, jun., Bury	50
R. A. Openshaw, ditto	50

The CHAIRMAN said this was a very handsome list for Bury.

Edw. Evans, Wigan	50
J. Riley, ditto	50
Firth and Howarth, Todmorden	250
Wm. Hellawell	250
Abraham Ormerod and Brothers	250
J. and A. Stansfield, Todmorden	100
John and W. Barker	100
Randall, Hibbert, and Sons, Godley	200
D. Clarke and Sons	100
Messrs. Procter, Rochdale	100
Thomas Chadwick, ditto	100
Samuel Taylor, ditto	100
James Chadwick, jun., ditto	100
Henry Kelsall, ditto	100
Robert Kelsall, ditto	100
Robert Heap, ditto	100
Robert Schofield, ditto	100
George Howarth, ditto	100

The CHAIRMAN: Come, I think we must give three cheers for Rochdale.

Mr. BRIGHT: Oh, we have not done yet.
Joseph Crook, Bolton	250
P. R. Arrowsmith, ditto	250
J. Whitworth and Co., Manchester	150
Henry Walmsley, Falsworth	100
J. Barratt, Sons, and Darbyshire	100
F. J. Pettit and Sons, Manchester	200
E. and J. Jackson, ditto	150
James Mingley, Rochdale	100
Jacob Tweedale and Sons, Rochdale	200
"Curry Powder," per Geo. Wilson	100

The CHAIRMAN said this sort of curry powder would go a long way to send the labouring man comfortably to bed.

J. Fenton, Rochdale	100
Thomas Shaw, Rochdale	50
Benj. Heap and Co., ditto	50
Pagan, Ogden, and Co., ditto	50
John and James Bancroft, Ashton	50
John Turner, Godley	50
Prentice and Catbrell, Manchester	50
Petty, Ernst, and Co., ditto	50

The CHAIRMAN called attention to the next as novel in its character

[Great cheering.] And the CHAIRMAN said it was time for the monopolists to be looking about them, when a working man subscribed 25l. for the repeal of the Corn Laws.

J. and J. Platt, Oldham	100
Harvey, Tysoe, and Co., Manchester	200
G. Higginbottom, Ashton	100
W. Richardson and Sons, Stand	200
J. C. Dyer, Barnage, near Manchester	50
Thomas Roberts, ditto	100
Fred. Schwann, Huddersfield	400

Mr. BRIGHT stated that a meeting had been held at Huddersfield, where 1200l. or 1300l. had been subscribed immediately; and every one was doubling his subscription. From Huddersfield at least 5000l. would be sent.

Crosfield, Brors, and Co., St. Helens	50
O. and W. Ormerod, Rochdale	50
A Friend per J. G. Mc Minnies, Warrington	50
Rylands, Brothers, ditto	50
J. Acton, Wigan	100
W. Johnson and Co., Wigan	300
J. Dixon Fenley, Stockport	100
Reece Evans, Wigan	50

The CHAIRMAN then rapidly read a list of smaller contributions from Wigan, and said that the total thence, including a subscription advanced from 100l. to 200l., was about 1200l.

J. Chadwick and Bro., Eccles, nr. Manchest. 50

Dixon and Galloway	50
Langworthy, Brothers and Co., Salford	250
Professor Newman, ditto	30

Mr. COBDEN said that a nobleman whose advocacy of the cause had done great service, requested him to put his name down for 50l., to be doubled if necessary. (Cheers.)

Earl Ducie	100
A Free Trader, Stockport	50
Joseph Brotherton, M.P., Manchester	50
Wm. Sagar, Todmorden	50

[A number of smaller subscriptions from Todmorden were rapidly read.]

J. E. Royle, Manchester	50
John Standing, ditto	50
Thomas Lea, Kidderminster	50
Peter Walker, Eccles, near Manchester	50
J. Colbrooke Gaskell, Patricroft, near ditto	50
J. and J. Vevers, Todmorden	50
George Mallinson and Sons, Huddersfield	200
Schunck, Souhay, & Co., Manchester	500
J. R. Barnes & Son, Farnworth, near Bolton	500
S. Schwabe and Co., Manchester	250
John Slater, Bolton	250
John Harding, Salford	250
A. W. Thorneley, Godley	200
John Burd and Sons, ditto	200
R. and J. Kershaw, Ashton	150
Wm. Ackroyd, Otley	125
Samuel Lees, Manchester	100
B. Nicholls, Manchester	100

Mr. JOHN MARSHALL, of Horseforth Hall, near Leeds, said that he had contributed (when mayor of Norwich) 40l. to the 100,000l. fund, and as the League now wanted 2½ times as much, he would give 100l.

The CHAIRMAN said that Mr. Hamer Stansfield wrote that the Leeds subscriptions would be doubled.

Mr. COBDEN, M.P., then came forward, and was received with tremendous cheering. He said, that two years ago, when they held a meeting in the small room adjoining, and when 14,000l. were subscribed to the great League fund, an influential London paper, in its graphic mode, designated the League "a great fact." Now the subscription to day already amounted to upwards of 50,000l.—(applause)—and that, he supposed, might be designated a still greater fact. He believed he might say, without the slightest exaggeration, that this meeting, in the middle of a market day, in Manchester, was unprecedented in the number and influential character of the individuals assembled. (Hear, hear.) No one would dispute that the amount subscribed far surpassed any subscription ever entered into in one room for any public object whatever. (Hear.) He was glad to witness the tone of the meeting altogether; there had not been the slightest reference to the changes that had been going on at Government head quarters almost as rapidly as the exits and entrances in a pantomime upon the stage; they had not lost the time by speculating what this or that administration was going to do, but they had resorted to the much safer mode of depending only upon themselves. (Applause.) This meeting would afford to any administration the best possible support in carrying out their principles. If Sir Robert Peel had an intelligible and straightforward course to pursue; if he would promulgate plainly and candidly that he purposed fully to carry out the principles of Free Trade, if he would only avow his determination to practise what he preached, then he would see that there was strength enough in the country to support him; and he (Mr. Cobden) would not be speaking the sentiments of the meeting if he did not say, that if Sir Robert Peel took the straightforward, honest, course, he would have the support of the League and the country as fully and cordially as any other Prime Minister. (Applause.) This subscription had been entered into by all present without a full explanation of the mode to be adopted in collecting it, or how they intended to apply it; and he was glad the money had thus been put down, inasmuch as it showed that the meeting was determined, that whatever came, money should not be wanting to fight the battle. But as what passed here would be read by their friends throughout the country, and with interest throughout the world, it was quite necessary to explain the plan they had in view in calling for this large sum. The League were not bankrupt yet, as they had already heard: there was a sum of money in hand; but the executive of the League wished to have an assurance from their friends in the country, that, however long this battle might be prolonged, however obstinate might be the resistance offered to their just demand—there was a determination in the country to back the exertions of the League with adequate funds, to whatever period the controversy might be prolonged. (Applause.) He (Mr. Cobden) knew the League would have their support; he never doubted it; he would not have given one per cent. to any one who would have guaranteed the quarter of a million when they applied for it. (Applause.) The plan proposed was this: To call for an instalment of 20 per cent. on these subscriptions; the rest to be called for when necessary. The meeting were as well able to judge as himself whether this contest was likely to be prolonged beyond another session. For his own part, he thought their opponents could not with any prudence or policy, with respect to their own interests alone, carry out this contest beyond the next session. He did not believe they would find men of sufficient intellect to lead them, to take the power of Government, and maintain this system. (Hear, hear.) It was quite evident that the queen had been in want of servants, simply because no servants could be found who would serve the queen, and do the work of the Duke of Richmond. We were governed in this country not by enlightened men like Lord John Russell, Sir Robert Peel, or Sir James Graham, or by men who were fit to take office and serve the country, but we were governed by the ignorance of the country. There was an inert mass of landlord political power to deal with—impervious to reason, inaccessible to argument, unconscious of defeat in argument, or they would not have resisted the League so long as they had done. (Hear, hear.) The monopolist landowners of this country recognised but one power, the power of force; they would yield to nothing but power, and that power the League had been armed with by the subscriptions recorded. (Applause.) He had said he thought it would be wise in the monopolists to yield the next session; but let us tell them what we were prepared to do if they did not yield honestly. Allusion had been made instinctively by all the speakers, as if they felt it was the business of this meeting, to the necessity of increasing the exertions in the county registrations. (Hear.) The county qualification was a leverage by which the ignorant authority of these monopolist landlords could be overturned. Thus the power could be transferred from the Duke of Richmond and the Duke of Norfolk to the intelligent middle and industrious classes of the towns of this country; and he had no hesitation in telling those noblemen (and they would now believe what he said when it was backed by a demonstration like this), that if they resisted the settlement of this question, if the next session did not bring it to a just settlement, they would plant registration agents in every county in the kingdom, and he (Mr. Cobden) pledged himself, from a long study and wide investigation on the subject, that in less than three years from this time, backed by the funds now at their disposal, they could unseat 100 county monopolist members (immense cheering), and place in their stead men who would vote in accordance with the interests of the great body of the people, instead of the interests of an ignorant class. The monopolists knew what he was telling them to be true. (Hear, hear.) They had felt it; and he had no hesitation in saying that the speedy settlement of this question would be brought about more by the demonstrations already made in the counties, and the success which had attended their efforts in four or five of the most influential counties, than anything else than had been attempted. As they were now speaking to their friends all over the country, he wished to add a remark as to the mode in which the subscription must be raised. Many friends elsewhere might suppose that his friend, Mr. Bright, and himself were in a position to pay them a succession of visits, as they did two years ago, all through the country, to all the large towns, and hold meetings to aid them in collecting the subscriptions. He wished those friends to understand that that would be impossible; for Mr. Bright and himself could nowhere be more serviceable during the next six months than in the House of Commons. (Hear, hear.) However, he felt confident that when other places saw what Manchester had raised at one meeting—nearly one-fourth of the whole amount asked for—seeing that he had no doubt that the other places would, by their own spontaneous exertions, make up the remainder of the fund. He might say that he had not canvassed a single individual for a farthing of this subscription; and he mentioned this that their friends elsewhere might know the spirit which animated the men of Manchester, and act accordingly. It was the opinion of many sanguine minds that this question would now be settled within two or three months without difficulty. He was not so sanguine as that; he could not see how they could tide over another session; but the League must be prepared for all accidents. Some individuals asked, "Shall we be liable to pay down all this money if the Corn Laws are abolished? Now, their object in associating together was to procure the abolition of the Corn and Provision Laws, of which there was but one candid interpretation,—that they meant corn, beef, butter, cheese, in fact, all the elements of human subsistence grown upon the soil. (Hear, hear.) But they considered it was not necessary to have a League to put down the sugar or coffee monopoly, because the landowners themselves, stimulated by a sense of their own interest, would do that. (Hear, hear.) Therefore it should be well understood that the fair and honest settlement of the Corn and Provision Laws, that is, their total abrogation, would at once dissolve this League, and exonerate any gentleman from further claims to contribute to its funds. It might be useful to some of their more candid opponents that they should know this. It has been represented that this was a body seeking anarchical objects, that they wanted to do away with promiscuity, &c.; but he defied any one to find in the House of Lords itself a body of men so deeply interested in public order, so identified with the maintenance of our institutions, as the body of capitalists he addressed on that occasion. They had no such objects as had been stated: their object was bona fide; they were united for one object, and they were like a rope of sand on any other question. He had no doubt, but that his friends, Messrs. Bright and Wilson and himself would differ on a dozen other questions; they were united on this one only. If the monopolist landowners, who were frightened at what the League was doing in the counties, found that this might go on to something more than corn, and that the votes they were now procuring might be given on other questions, they might stop and dissolve it by the total abolition of the Corn and Provision Laws. But if they wanted to keep alive this association, if they wanted some of those gentlemen who had ulterior objects (and he did not doubt there were some present,) if they wanted to give them the power of keeping their bond of union intact, then they must keep on some wretched rag of this system of monopoly. If Sir Robert Peel wanted to root out his friends in the counties more than they were, he must come to the House of Commons with some new dodge at the opening of the session. But whilst they said this, they also said most distinctly that they would have no conditions. (Hear, hear, and great cheering, the meeting rising simultaneously.) If the monopolists asked us to buy the abolition of the Corn Laws by giving them a grant of money, by transferring their taxes to our shoulders (if they could find any that they exclusively pay), the Free Traders would say, "You have been challenged to show your peculiar burdens, and you have uniformly run away;" they asked the monopolists to show one tax they paid that the people did not pay, and they would show five taxes from which the monopolist landowners were exempt themselves, and which the people paid. (Hear, hear.) They had abolished the duty on yarn. By far the largest industry of the manufacturing population was the spinning of cotton yarn, the 10 per cent. duty on which was swept away by Sir Robert Peel. They might say "The 10 per cent. duty was no protection to you;" and we said in return, "That is the very reason why we will not allow you to have any protection at our expense. You can't protect us; you never have protected us, nor will we allow you to protect yourselves at our expense." They therefore said, "No conditions; no qualifications: let this matter be settled fairly and justly, without terms or compromise, and the League is abolished." (Hear, hear, and applause.) For if they talked of compromise or concession, they would admit that these Corn Laws had been a benefit to the parties who maintained them. Now, he (Mr. Cobden) denied that; and he had challenged them to prove it twice in the House of Commons; for he could have proved from the mouths of the best farmers in the country that the Corn Laws were never of any benefit to the farmers or the landlords. They did not go upon the basis that this question merely affected the manufacturing interest; for anything that promoted the wealth and industry must add to the value of the land. (Hear, hear.) He could not say how proud he felt at being surrounded by a body of men who were prepared to make such magnanimous sacrifices in this cause. The meeting had complimented himself and one or two gentlemen near him as to their exertions, but they would have been nothing without the support they had received from those around him. He could not help feeling gratified that this movement had taught the men of this country their power, and he hoped it would tend to bring them to a different social position to what they had previously held. They had not been promoting a narrow interest; the cause was that of the whole kingdom—of the whole world; and in carrying out Free Trade from this, the birth-place, the cradle of their principles, Manchester would become identified to all ages with the cause of Free Trade. As Jerusalem was with the origin of our faith; just as Mecca was in the eyes of the Mahometans, so would Manchester, in the eyes of the historian, be identified as the birth-place, the centre, of the greatest movement since the invention of printing,—one which would have the greatest effect in the world's history of any struggle that ever took place in the annals of civilisation. (Great cheering.)

The Chairman said they had all heard Mr. Cobden's explanation of what it was intended to do with the large sum to be subscribed; so that the timid might now come forward, and any gentlemen better satisfied with that statement might, if disposed, increase their subscriptions.

(Mr. Cobden said, if before the meeting terminated 69,000*l.* could be announced as subscribed, that would settle the end of monopoly, not only in this country but in many others.)

JOHN BRIGHT, Esq., M.P., then rose at the call of the meeting, and was received with enthusiastic cheering. He said he could not command words to express the delight he felt at the event which had that morning taken place. He was surrounded by gentlemen, some of whom had attended meetings in Manchester for the last 30 or 40 years, but they had never met in their experience with any circumstance of a public character in this town at all to be compared with that to which they had just been witness. No man would now say that there was anything unsubstantial, anything insincere in the character of the great movement with which they were connected. The past meetings had demonstrated that the supporters of the League were in earnest; but this meeting, if any confirmation were wanting, furnished that confirmation; and he was confident that this subscription would have a most powerful effect upon public opinion, and also upon the decision at which the now forming cabinet must speedily arrive. (Hear, hear, and applause.) They had told the world that the trade of this district was resolved no longer to work in fetters, that they were determined to emancipate their industry and themselves. (Hear, hear.) They had been held to be valuable as creators of wealth, and especially valuable by the most powerful class in this kingdom, so long as they would create wealth for that class to enjoy, (hear, hear); but the moment they raised themselves, and endeavoured to look up from the circumstances of suffering and oppression in which they had been placed, then that class and its organs in the press heaped slander and obloquy upon every person connected with the manufactures of this part of the country. (Hear, hear.) He had in his hand two extracts, which he would read to the meeting, to show what were the feelings with which they were regarded by that class with whom they were now coming into this serious conflict. On the 16th inst. there was published in a paper, assuming to be to some extent the organ of the late ministry, and hoping, he presumed, to be the organ of the present Government, this paragraph:—

"It may be, however, that Sir Robert Peel meditates the accompaniment of a modification of the Corn Laws by a repeal of the malt and hop duties, an assignment of county rates to the consolidated fund, and a more just and equal distribution of poor rates between the agriculturists who produce and mature the labouring poor, and the manufacturers who kill them or convert them into helpless paupers; changes that ought to be made without any reference to change in the Corn Laws."

On the 20th of this month, the same paper has this paragraph. After speaking of the effects of the repeal of the Corn Laws in stimulating manufactures, it said:

"This would, of course, stimulate the manufacturing system; but we are not afraid or ashamed to avow, that we should regard any important increase of our present manufacturing system with serious suspicion and alarm. We cannot believe that any good man would wish to see such a system aggravated. It is a system full of danger to the State. We are aware of its vital importance as the creator of wealth; but we also know how very easily such a system is thrown into disturbance; how very much our manufacturing population is already out of all proportion to the population and extent of the entire country. Neither can we leave out of the account those moral and religious considerations which do indeed present an awful and tremendous idea to the mind of every pious and honest man."

(Laughter.) These were two paragraphs out of several others of a similar character, which had been published in the Morning Herald during the present month. Now it came simply to this, that the people in these districts were a very good sort of people so long as they worked, got money, paid taxes, and bought the Duke of Richmond's dear corn. (Hear, hear, and cheers.) So long as they did all that without grumbling, they were a class to be cherished and thought well of; but the moment they looked up, and said that justice should be done to those who obeyed the laws as well as to that class by whom those laws were made, then there was no form of speech, no foul slander, which was too bad to be heaped upon the industrious and honourable population of this country. The monopolists had hated us all along, and had oppressed us; they would hate us still; but the result of this resolution enabled him (Mr. Bright) to promise that at any rate they should not oppress us much longer. Some persons thought this 250,000*l.* subscription a large sum, and compared with previous subscriptions it was a large sum, but every person in the room acquainted with the trade of Lancashire, knew that since the harvest was declared deficient, and since the potato failure became known, the cotton district alone had lost many times over 250,000*l.* by the depression in trade. (Hear, hear.) He was making a calculation the other day which would put this matter in a clear light. A gentleman connected with the manufacture of printing cloth told him that a certain description of printing cloth was selling at 6*s.* 6*d.* per piece three or four months ago. Wheat at that time was selling at 4*s.* 6*d.* a quarter, and it then required seven pieces of cloth to make up the price of one quarter of wheat; but when the Corn Law kept out foreign supplies, the price of wheat rose to 8*s.* and the price of a piece of this printing cloth fell to 5*s.* 6*d.* (Hear, hear.) Thus, if the manufacturer wanted to exchange his cloth for a quarter of wheat, instead of giving seven pieces, which he would have had to give four or five months ago, he must give not less than twelve pieces—(hear, hear); and if the manufacturer must do this, his profit of course would be swept away, together with the wages of those whom he employed; for if the manufacturer was compelled to give twelve pieces of cloth for the same quantity of food which he could before purchase for seven pieces, the operative would be compelled to give twelve days' labour for the same quantity of food which he could formerly obtain for seven days' labour. (Hear, hear.) If they had not been wrong from the beginning of this agitation, the gloom now hanging over this district could only be rendered temporary by one of two things, either by the abolition of the Corn Law in the coming session of Parliament, or by that which was an entire accident,—a very extraordinary harvest in 1846. (Hear, hear.) If the next harvest should be no better than the last (and we know that two or three good and two or three bad harvests generally come together), he had no doubt that the latter end of 1846 would be far worse for his district than the latter end of 1845; and we might look for an aggravation of all the horrors in which this district was wrapped some four or five years ago; but from what was seen throughout the country, from the terror which had been struck into the monopolist camp, from the dislocated position of political parties, from this glorious, this unequalled meeting, he came to the conclusion that they saw land, at last, after the stormy and tempestuous passage of the League; and he believed that in the coming Session of Parliament, if the men who now surrounded them would do their duty, and if their fellow-countrymen in other districts would do theirs as their friends here were doing, that were the prime minister more necessary to his party than he was, and were his party more powerful and were they united without one particle of discordant element amongst them—nay, were both Houses of Parliament on their bended knees to swear that this Corn Law should be maintained, he would yet stake heavy odds that the cause of justice would prevail. (Great applause.) Bear in mind, that in this district there was no discordancy now. (Hear.) Capital was assembled in that room to an amount never before equalled in this kingdom. (Hear, hear.) The natural representatives and leaders of an enlightened and industrious population were there gathered together; that room would not hold them; no room would hold them all; and if this question should remain unsettled, if this monopoly should be continued, he did not say too much when he said that nine-tenths of the capitalists of this country would be glad to unite with those whom they employed, and in some space beneath the wide canopy of heaven they would declare in the face of the country and of the world that this most odious oppression should be at once and for ever abolished. (Great applause.)

JAMES HEYWOOD, Esq., F.R.S., said, he believed there was a more friendly spirit in the agricultural districts than Mr. Bright represented. He found the country gentlemen manifesting a friendly interest in the success of our trade, and inquiring always how trade was here. His own opinion was, that by a concession to the agricultural interest—(No, no.) It was a question of time, and if some moderate concession were made (no, no, and some hisses); he believed the question might be settled this year or the next, instead of being prolonged for many years to come. (No compromise.) He believed they were all of the same mind, that the Corn Law ought to be totally and immediately abolished. (No compromise.) A gentleman said "no compromise." Did he think that the landlords did not gain by the present system? (No.) Would the country gentlemen of England band themselves as they did, to gain nothing at all? He asked a gentleman whom he met last winter on the Rhine, "Do you think it would be a good thing for the landowners of Germany, if the Corn Laws were repealed?" His reply was:—"Indeed, I do not know. When the sliding scale allows corn to enter your ports from Germany, our profits are so large, that it is very likely just as advantageous for us as if we had a regular trade in corn." He (Mr. Heywood) believed that the same thing would equally apply to the English country gentlemen. The Duke of Northumberland, and many other large landowners, did gain by the present system; and he believed many of the aristocracy would lose money by it if it were altered, and it seemed to him that in firmness some concession should be made. (Disapprobation, and loud cries of No, no.) It was, he thought, quite right to take high ground, as they had done this morning, by raising 60,000*l.*; and with that high ground they could afford to the generous. (No, no.) He would say, be just and generous. The concessions he had heard talked of were a reduction of the malt duty, a reduction of the duty of French wines (laughter), and some arrangement with respect to the county rates. (Laughter.) He believed all those matters would be brought before Parliament in the coming session, and that their valued friends, Mr. Cobden and Mr. Bright, would have to discuss them night after night; and as to saying they would not consider them, they must consider them. He looked on it as so good a point to abolish the Corn Laws as speedily as possible, that he was desirous to effect that object; and in his opinion it would be accomplished much more speedily by some moderate consideration of other people's interests. (No, no.)

MR. COBDEN was quite sure they would be disposed to hear with very great forbearance any little remarks made by their friend who had just put his name down for the very liberal sum of 500*l.* to abolish the Corn Laws, and he was sure Mr. Heywood's view of the case arose from the extreme generosity and kindness of his nature; but when he talked of making concessions to the landowners, we might say in reply, what Sir James Graham said in an unhappy moment (what he afterwards recalled) in reference to Ireland, that "concession had reached its utmost limits." (Hear and cheers.) Their good friend had asked whether they did not admit that the Corn Laws had put money into the pockets of the landowners? He (Mr. Cobden) did admit it; but he thought they might have put money into their pockets by a more honourable process. (Hear, hear.) There were two ways of growing rich—by honest industry, and by appropriating to yourself what belongs to others. (Hear and cheers.) He thought after having handed in the subscription of Lord Ducie, one of the most enthusiastic farmers he knew, the Anti-Corn Law League might fairly be exempted from entertaining any wish to injure the landowners. His friend had quoted the Duke of Northumberland, and could not have named a worse case; for his land was badly farmed and badly managed. Lord Ducie's land was much better managed. Lord Grey's land, in the neighbourhood of the Duke of Northumberland's, was well managed: his were good leases, the best in the kingdom; and the contrast between the lands of the two was so striking, as to be seen in passing along the road outside a coach. (Hear, hear.) We say to the Duke of Northumberland, "Do as Lord Ducie does, and as Lord Grey does, and you will be as rich without the Corn Laws as you are with them." (Hear, and cheers.) He (Mr. Cobden) lately went over Lord Ducie's farm with him; and his lordship showed him one cow worth 230*l.*, and one calf valued at 100 guineas; and he said to his lordship, "Why you ought to have been a manufacturer; for you treat your cattle and your land precisely as we do our manufactures; and that is the way to make farming profitable." (Cheers.) As regards the malt-tax, and the duty on French wines, we pay the taxes in towns on both beer and French wines; but if Sir Robert Peel could show that by abolishing the malt-tax, and putting that amount of taxation equitably upon all classes instead, he (Mr. Cobden) had no particular affection for the malt-tax; and as to French wines, why, it would be a very good thing to get them cheaper than they now are. (Laughter and cheers.)

MR. BROTHERTON, M.P., said that this meeting would inspire hope in the heart of every real Free Trader, and produce dismay amongst the monopolists, showing that they were not Free Traders, in the abstract, but that they were in earnest, that they were determined to carry out their principles, and certainly they would succeed. (Cheers.) He had always opposed the Corn Laws because they were unjust; and what they believed to be unjust, could not be compromised. (Hear, hear.) If it were a matter of bargain a negotiation might be entered into; but here the act was believed to be unjust, and it was their duty to repeal it if possible, and he had no doubt that with the united energy of the people it would be accomplished. The landowners had misconceived their own interests in supporting the Corn Laws, for the prosperity of their customers was identified with their own interests. With respect to what Mr. Heywood had said as to the urbanity and kindness of the agricultural interest, the landlords had often come to him in the House of Commons inquiring how matters were going on in Manchester, and expressed their delight to find trade was good. But this was only that the manufacturing districts might bear the burden—(hear, hear);—for if things were not in a prosperous state they knew the treasury must suffer. He (Mr. Brotherton) was not able to contribute so munificently as some individuals, but his heart was with them. (Cheers.) This meeting had given a support to the League which would never be forgotten; it had strengthened the hands of Members of Parliament, and they might be assured that no compromise would be consented to, but that this most unjust, inhuman, and oppressive of laws should be for ever removed from the statute book. (Great applause.)

MR. WYLIE, of Liverpool, being called on by the chairman, briefly addressed the meeting. It would be a curious calculation to inquire how much property in this district had deteriorated within a few weeks. Last Tuesday on 'Change here, a gentleman, when asked what was doing, replied, "Literally nothing;"—a reply which had not been out of his head since; a very serious reply, as respected the labour market of Lancashire. In the money market we found destruction; in Mining-lane we found loss; and in Mark-lane there was nothing doing; all was stagnation. It might be said that wild and reckless speculations had produced this; but what had produced that speculation but the mischievous working of those laws which took that trade, on which depends all others, out of the hands of merchants and gave it to speculators. (Hear.) He felt sanguine that Sir R. Peel, who, he presumed, was now again at the head of affairs, would do something greatly to further the trade of the country; for it was utterly impossible that a man, who for the last two years had enunciated so clearly and distinctly the principles of Free Trade, could stop there. His success in the experiments he had already made in the tariff, must produce conviction, and conviction and experience must urge him on. Why had we been looking with such eagerness for the president's message, received that morning? Why, instead of receiving such a message as might be expected from a country whose people were identified with us in origin and language, had we received what was at least an angry message? Because the political affairs between the two countries were not in a satisfactory state. Why? Because commerce between them was not in a satisfactory state. If any one would look at our imports from the United States, they would see how very small a proportion of the produce of that country came here in any other shape than that of tobacco and cotton, or he might say cotton alone, for 85 per cent. of the exports of the United States to this country were in cotton alone. It was utterly impossible to conceive the feelings of the enormous western states, but yesterday lying idle, and now peopled by eight millions of inhabitants, where corn was in such plenty as to be at no price, and where a late writer said that he had seen a half-naked American with two bushels of corn on his head, and that he had seen here a starving Englishman with two coats on his back. (Hear.) He (Mr. Wylie) was sanguine in his hope of a better state of things: the demonstration of that day had, in his opinion, decided the question, which indeed was pretty nearly decided before. The president closed his message with some valuable paragraphs, laying down a strong distinction between revenue and protection; for he recommended strongly to the consideration of congress the adoption of a minimum tariff for revenue, and absolutely scouted the idea of protection. He (Mr. Wylie) did not mean to say that Sir R. Peel's Free Trade measures in this country had produced a corresponding feeling in the United States; but he would say that they had not been without their effect in doing so. But he would not give to Sir R. Peel all the praise; but give it much more to the League and the Free Traders, for it is not only the feeling in but out of Parliament that was important; for it was the conviction in America that there was here the disposition to reciprocate or even to take the lead, and that they must now follow. He concluded by exhorting every one who had a vote, to regard the disposal of that vote as important a duty as if he were giving it in either House of Parliament; for that vote belonged to his country, and must not be given lightly. (Hear, and applause.)

He said it was only due to his brother-in-law, Mr. Mark Philips, M.P. to state that he was, with his brother, in Paris; and he (the chairman) had written to him, but not having yet received any answer, he believed he was on his way home. But they might depend that Mr. Munn and the house of Philips and Co. would do their duty. (Applause.) He then announced the total amount that had been received as fifty-nine thousand one hundred and sixty-five pounds—(great cheering),—so that with the two names he had mentioned, he might say that the subscriptions amounted to 60,000*l.* (Cheers.)

W. B. WATKINS, Esq. (the mayor), then took the chair, and Mr. Wm. RAWSON proposed a vote of thanks to R. H. Greg, Esq., for his conduct in the chair, saying he was always at his post on any occasion of emergency. Mr. JOHN WHITAKER, of Hurst, seconded the resolution, which was then put from the chair, and carried by acclamation. Mr. GREG, in returning thanks, said he was sure no chairman had ever been so supported. The proceedings then terminated, a few minutes before three o'clock.

Since the meeting, a number of additional subscriptions have been sent, by letter and otherwise, to the offices of the League, viz.,

Edmund Howard, ditto	100
J. Marshall, Horsforth Hall, near Leeds	100
Matthew Burton, Pool Fold, ditto	100
R. Heywood, Bolton	100
Peter Martin, ditto	100
Josh. Kaye, Huddersfield	100
T. P. Crosland, ditto	100

J. A. and T. Simpson, Manchester	100
John Keighley and Brors, High-st., ditto	100
S. D. Darbishire, Manchester	100
J. Pender and Co.	100
Yates and Williams	100
John Gully, Aokworth Park, Pontefract	100
John Stagg, Manchester	100
Wm. Collier and Co.	100
Wm. Williams, Huddersfield	60
Benj. Goodfellow, Hyde	50
Ellis Cumfelle, ditto	50
Henry Hollins, jun., Bolton	50
A Friend per Geo. Senior of Bury	50
A Friend per Mr. Crofton, Mosley-st., Manstr.	50
J. A. Heape, Huddersfield	50
Foster Shaw, ditto	50
C. H. Jones, ditto	50
Thomas Cooke and Sons, Ashton	50
J. and B. Pearson, Manchester	50
W. White, jun., London	50
John Chadwick and Son, Manchester	50
Vernon, Marchant, and Edge, Manchester	50
Neil Banmatyue	50
John Kershaw, Glossop	50
Robt. Herve and Co., Manchester	50
R. R. Moore	50
Abm. Lees, Blackfriars, Manchester	50
John Openshaw, Bolton-street, Bury	50
J. L. per Mr. Roberts	50
Hadfield and Rumney, Ardwick, Manchestr.	40
Robt. Welsh, Huddersfield	40
R. Dewhurst, ditto	40
Henry Bullock, Wigan	40
Workpeople at Haigh Foundry, nr. Manchestr.	33
Jonah Andrew, Medlock Vale, Manchester	30
James Kershaw, ditto	30
Evan Leigh, Ashton	30
George Branson, Manchester	30
W. Williamson, Stockport	25
J. and E. Waters, Manchester	25
Wm. Mc Cartney, ditto	25
Jas. Smith, Timber Merchant, Liverpool	25
Silas Leigh, Worsley, near Manchester	25
Lord, Brothers, Todmorden	25
L. Wilson, ditto	25
C. J. Darbishire, Bolton	25
Josh. Crosland, ditto	25
Charles Littlewood, Rochdale	25
R. Taylor, Heap, near Rochdale	25
John Cropp, London	25
John Aspinall, Wigan	25
John Acton, ditto	25
Josh. Aspinall, ditto	25
Thomas Cook, ditto	25
Wm. Park and Co., ditto	25
John Hampson, Stockport	25
David Morris, Chorlton-on-Medlock, Manstr.	25
Boulton Molincaux, Warrington	25
R. A. per J. G. Mc Minnies, ditto	25
E. A. per J. E. Royle, Manchester	25
Charles Duffield, ditto	25
John Hadfield, Glossop	25
Josh. Rushton, Tith-street, Manchester	25
Workpeople of Henry Woods, Wigan	21 5
Samuel Hewitt, Mosley-st., Manchester	20
Thos. Johnson, Hanging Ditch, ditto	20
A Friend per Thomas Johnson	20
Robt. Owen, Manchester	20
J. and W. Fielden, Todmorden	20

Making with other sums, which we are this week compelled to omit, a grand total, subscribed during a few hours on Tuesday, of nearly SIXTY-TWO THOUSAND POUNDS!

CONTRIBUTIONS TO THE LEAGUE FUND.

Subscriptions received during the week ending Wednesday, Dec. 24, 1845.

N.B.—As the Subscription List is made up from Wednesday to Wednesday, contributions received on Thursdays and Fridays are not published in the LEAGUE of the Saturday immediately succeeding, but are included in the list of the week following.

Grey, Samuel, and Co., Manchester	£235 0 0
Homer, P. T., Boston, U.S.	10 0 0
White, W., jun., 108, Cheapside, London	10 0 0
Hewitt, Samuel, 40, Mosley-street, Manchester	10 0 0
Newman, Francis W., 40, Cavendish-place, ditto	6 0 0
Oocleshaw, W., lead merchant, Piccadilly, ditto	5 0 0
Tomlinson, W., Hodge, Mottram	5 0 0
Nicholson, Dr., Penrith	2 0 0
Lacy, Jonas, Whitehall, near Rochdale	2 0 0
Choetham, Daken, Staley Bridge	1 0 0
Dowse, Samuel, Marsden, near Huddersfield	1 0 0
Hodgkinson, Samuel, Moss Mill, near Rochdale	1 0 0
Smith, John, North-street, Todmorden	1 0 0
Thornley, James, New Engley Mills, near Bolton	1 0 0
Brook, W. S., Milns Bridge, near Huddersfield	1 0 0
Barnes, Wm., Box 603, Post Office, Manchester	1 0 0
Boond, Wm., 38, Faulkner-street, ditto	1 0 0
Entwistle, J., Sand Lane, near ditto	1 0 0
Robinson, S., 38, Ancoats-street ditto	1 0 0
Wilson, John, George Inn, Rochdale Road ditto	1 0 0
Aspell, J., Waggon & Horses, Thomas-st., ditto	1 0 0
Taylor, T. S., Mason-street ditto	1 0 0
White, W., Railway Inn, 201, Deansgate ditto	1 0 0
Marsland, W., Lancaster	1 0 0
Verity, Henry ditto	1 0 0
Dunn, Richard ditto	1 0 0
Jackson, Geo. ditto	1 0 0
Heald, John ditto	1 0 0
Welsh, H., Cheapside ditto	1 0 0
McRath, Hamilton, draper, ditto	1 0 0
Bathgate, James ditto	1 0 0
Milner, Anthony ditto	1 0 0
Turner, William, 19, Camden-street, Liverpool	1 0 0
Johnson, J. B., 37, Scotland Road ditto	1 0 0
Macintyre, James, 13, Washington-street, ditto	1 0 0
Dorning, John, Mount Vernon ditto	1 0 0
Fisher, James, 38, Mill-street ditto	1 0 0
Fisher, Joshua, 5, Faulkner-terrace, Upper Parliament-street, ditto	1 0 0
Seddon, James, 5, Dauby-street ditto	1 0 0
Maxwell, John, Mack Woolton, near ditto	1 0 0
Owen, James, 68, Byrom-street ditto	1 0 0
Taylor, James, Marsden, near Huddersfield	1 0 0
Hirst, James ditto	1 0 0
Taylor, Robert ditto	1 0 0
Robinson, James ditto	1 0 0
Bower, Samuel ditto	1 0 0
Kinder, William ditto	1 0 0
Johnston, Wm. ditto	1 0 0
Hellawell, Eli ditto	1 0 0
Boucher, Wm., Denmark Hill, Camberwell	5 0 0
Finch, John, 47, Cambridge-terrace, Hyde Park	5 0 0
Johnson, J. W., 14, Serle-street, Lincoln's Inn	5 0 0
Merrick, John, 60, Watling-street	5 0 0
Dressler, G., 22, Upper Islington-terrace	2 0 0
Sichel, S. E., Bradford, Yorkshire	2 0 0
Solter, Edward, Sheffield	1 0 0
Johnson, W., Richmond Hill, Stratford New Road, Manchester	1 0 0
Farr, H., at Asion Tavern, High-street, Gravesend	1 0 0
Gibbs, John, Walton House, Aylesbury	1 0 0
Mullah, Robert Berners-street, Oxford-street	1 0 0

"A Cobdenite"	1 0 0
*Rawson, Benj., 3, Hawley-terrace, Camden Town	1 0 0
*Glanvill, G., Coach and Horses, North-st., Westminster	1 0 0
Snelling, John, New Red Lion, Harrow-rd., Paddington	1 0 0
A Friend, Claremont-square, Islington, per Mr. Hutchinson	1 0 0
Weightman, W., Spelthorne Grove, Sunbury, Middlesex	1 0 0
*Kennedy, Hartley, 10, Manchester-square	1 0 0
*Price, David, 3, Huggin-lane, Wood-street	1 0 0
*Wright, W. C., Springfield, Upper Clapham	1 0 0
*Birch, Baynes, 65, Fetter-lane	1 0 0
*Engleburtt, Wm., Elizabeth-street, Hackney-road	1 0 0
*Walsh, James, 50, Old Change, Cheapside	1 0 0
*De Sussex, F. S. M., 1, Tredegar-place, Bow-road	1 0 0
*Thompson, J. R., 9, George-street, Minorities	1 0 0
*Winter, James, Wardour-street, Soho	1 0 0
Bassett, J., 32, Gt. Queen-st., Lincoln's Inn Fields	1 0 0
*How, John, 21, Newcastle-street, Bethnal Green	1 0 0
*Skellon, Wm., 88, Great Portland-street	1 0 0
*Kendall, C. H., merchant, Mark-lane	1 0 0
Walker, J. G., Grecian Chambers, Devereux-ct., Strand	1 0 0
*Timothy, W., Shoreditch	1 0 0
Powell, Wm., Russell-street, Bernondsey	1 0 0
A. B.	1 0 0
"Pro Libertate Patrie"	1 0 0
W. M., Bedford-street, Bedford-row	1 0 0
*Corcoran, B., 36, Mark-lane	1 0 0
*Higinbotham, Charles, Mark-lane	1 0 0
*Hardman, J., Upper Philimore-place, Kensington	1 0 0
*Marshall, Thomas, Heston, near Hounslow	1 0 0
*Prest, Thomas, Chigwell-row, Essex	1 0 0
*Duvall, Wm., 61, Holland-street	1 0 0
Wentner, Thomas, 17, Tibberton-square, Islington	1 0 0
Avens, Wm., Founders Hall, Louthbury	1 0 0
Beasley, Joseph, 5, Sylvanus-row, Hornsey Road	1 0 0
*Murdoch, H. H., 2, Rodney-ter., West, Mile End Road	1 0 0
*Tucker, James, 10, Noble-street, Falcon-square	1 0 0
*Enxwistle, R. H., Pollard-row, Bethnal Green	1 0 0
*Davies, J., 25, Berwick-street, Soho	1 0 0
*Bernard, T. V., 4, Counter Hill Terrace, Lewisham Road, Deptford	1 0 0
*Osborne, Thomas, 13, Sidmouth-street, Gray's Inn Rd.	1 0 0
*Margatson, Paul, New Weston-street, Bernondsey	1 0 0
Whitaker, John, 9, Carbarton-street, Marylebone	1 0 0
*Lewis, G. C., 1, Lowndes-terrace, Knightsbridge	1 0 0
Hook, Henry, 7, Newgate-street	1 0 0
*Wentworth, James, Wandsworth	1 0 0
Aiken, J., Newton Farm, by Markinch, Fife	1 0 0
*Tibbets, W. B., Braunton, near Davenport	1 0 0
Pocock, R., North Curry, Taunton	1 0 0
*Jones, Henry, 81, Great Homer-street, Liverpool	1 0 0
*Burgess, J., 19, Sir Thomas's Buildings, ditto	1 0 0
*Thomas, Edward, Portland-street, Swansea	1 0 0
*Harwood, W. Hill Ridware, Lichfield	1 0 0
*Booth, Thomas, at Mr. Marshall's, Burnley	1 0 0
*Higham, James, Springgarden, Doncaster	1 0 0
*Thomson, James, Dunse	1 0 0
*Darling, Andrew, ditto	1 0 0
*Deacon, John, Russell Tavern, Leicester	1 0 0
*Wrigley, Watts, Malton	1 0 0
*Lewarn, T. S., St. Austell, Cornwall	1 0 0
*Nicholson, J., A. 2, Stephen's Green, Dublin	1 0 0
Naish, A., Montpelier, near Bristol	1 0 0
*Rowntree, Wm., Scarborough	1 0 0
*Jack, W. J., Brompton, Kent	1 0 0
Hayward, R., Melksham	1 0 0
*Tribbe, J. S., 137, Chatham	1 0 0
*Shirley, W. P., Somersfield, Maidstone	1 0 0
*Borton, W. D., Horsemarket, Northampton	1 0 0
*Christie, James, Shanford, by Brechin	1 0 0
*Peacock, Wm., Perth	1 0 0
*Peacock, John, ditto	1 0 0
*Brown, John, shipowner, Dundee	1 0 0
Hibbert, John, Bridgend, Glamorgan	1 0 0
*Bowman, Thomas, Calne	1 0 0
*Waytes, John, ditto	1 0 0
*Shrewsbury, Rev. W. J., Redford, Notts	1 0 0
*Crick, Wm., Maldon, Essex	1 0 0
*Butcher, J., Newmarket Road, Norwich	1 0 0
Pritchard, Joseph, Wigan	1 0 0
Montgomey and Manne, 18, Rue Vivienne, Paris	1 0 0
*Grundy, Thomas, Victoria Place, Northampton	1 0 0
Clark, S. P., Princes Risborough, Bucks	1 0 0
*Briggs and Co.	2 0 0
*Mason, George, 82, Wellington-street	1 0 0
*Hurtley, Thomas, 3, Bridge	1 0 0
*Pint, Thomas, 187, Wellington-road	1 0 0
*Craig, Robert, 98, Briggate	1 0 0
*Foster, George, 6, Providence-row	1 0 0
*Asquith, John, Bagbie, near	1 0 0
*Baynes, W., Li ac Cottage	1 0 0
*Hutton, Samuel, Meadow-lane	1 0 0
*Curtis, Thomas, 4, Park-buildings, Wellington-street	1 0 0
*Thompson, M., Old Paradise, Hunslet	1 0 0
*Twigg, Joseph, New Sneddon-street	2 0 0
*Ross and Duncan	1 0 0
*Barr, David, dyer, Marshal's-lane	1 0 0
*Coats, Bailie	1 0 0
*Smith, John, Causeyside	1 0 0
Whyte, James, jun., ditto	1 0 0
*McFarlane, T. H., Lady-lane	1 0 0
Ronald, John, 7, St. Mirren-street	1 0 0
*McArthur, James, Campbell	1 0 0
*Brown, John, Queen-street	1 0 0
Brown, J. S., Hospital	1 0 0
*Winstanley, Robert, Sankey-street	1 0 0
*Grice, J. S., Bewsey-street	1 0 0
*Peers, Richard, Bath-buildings, ditto	1 0 0
*Peers, John R., ditto	1 0 0
*West, Edward, Sankey-street	1 0 0
*Robinson, John, Latchford, near	1 0 0
*Morgan, Nathaniel	1 0 0
*Smith, James	1 0 0
*Sanders, Ellis Lee	1 0 0
*Spencer, Henry	1 0 0
*Wall, Samuel	1 0 0
*Hutchinson, John, Sunderland street	1 0 0
*Backhouse, T. J., Fawcett-street	1 0 0
*Harrison, G. jun., Frederick-street	1 0 0
*Robson, E. C., Frederick-st., Bishops-wearmouth	1 0 0
*Edwards, John, High-street	1 0 0
*Vickerman, John	1 0 0
*Naylor, Bethel	1 0 0
*Wilson, Joseph, 13, Old Market Place	1 0 0
*Martin, J.	1 0 0
*Martin, J., jun.	1 0 0
*Fletcher, J. K., Tain Bank	1 0 0
Small Subscriptions	12 6
Macdonald, W., Monningtutnie House, Cupar, Fife	0 5 0
Winter, F. S., St. Marylebone Infirmary, New Road	0 2 6
Cokerell, Wm., Fitzwilliam-street, Cambridge	0 2 6
Corbyn, Capt., Royal Hospital, Greenwich	0 2 6
Raffay, Mr.	0 2 6
Savage, Mr.	0 2 6
Schroder, Mr.	0 2 6
Heap, Mr.	0 2 6
French, Mr.	0 2 6
Walsh, Mr.	0 2 6
Melvin, Mr.	0 2 6
Const, Mr.	0 2 6
Weselson, Mr.	0 2 6
Peance, Mr.	0 2 6
Evans, Mr.	0 2 6
Barton, Mr.	0 2 6

* Those names marked with an asterisk are renewed subscriptions.

ERATUM.—In LEAGUE, No. 117, for Richard Ransom, Wigan, £1 0 0, read £1 1 0.

LETTERS ON THE CORN LAWS, No. LIX.

TO THE PEOPLE OF ENGLAND.

If there was occasion to say to you, a month ago, "rely on yourselves," not less occasion is there now to repeat and urge that admonition.

Whatever else may have been the occupation of those who govern, or who might, could, or should govern the country, they have hitherto done nothing for you. The precious weeks of preparation for encountering the coming evil have been wasted in squabbles, of which we know little more than the nothingness of their result. We have had two Prime Ministers in posse, and not one in esse. Between the party leaders and their adherents, there have been many "interviews," but neither has faced the perils of the country. One day we have been told of the obstinacy of this great man, and the next of the crotchettiness of that great man; and still the ports remain closed, and the Parliament not assembled. People of England, you are trifled with; egregiously trifled with! Your public servants have been playing tricks with each other, when they should have been securing your interests. You might have been helped, and you are not helped. All the explanations in the world cannot explain away that fact. Time is lost, and the work of the time is not done. Nor is it yet to be done. Parliament was to have met on Tuesday, and is prolonged for three weeks longer. Within those three weeks, the Corn Laws might have become a non-entity. The strength of your determination is not yet recognised. You must speak out, plainer and louder.

The delay gives time for monopoly to rally its forces. Landlords are calling to the tenantry they have cajoled, and whom they can coerce as the power of cajolery passes away. You have now to do with men who have outlived argument, and who are simply in the field for a sordid interest, which they are resolved to defend to the last.

There is no mistake. Reasonings, sufferings, impending calamity, move them not. They will have their bond—"the law allows it;" though the knife cut "nearest the heart" of industry and poverty. Economists argue in vain; prudence warns in vain; wretchedness weeps in vain; and statesmen remonstrate in vain. They defy all power but yours. They have braved that hitherto with insolence, real or affected. We must fight out this challenge.

Lord John Russell declines to be your Minister for the Governmental proposition of Corn Law repeal. He will support it; we may, after his letter safely rely upon him for that. His inducements to stop at that point will be judged when they are authentically known. Thus much is plain: the outburst of enthusiastic confidence which hailed his understood acceptance of office as the Free Trade Minister was not a sufficient power in his estimation to overbear the obstacles in his way. That ready and prospective popularity was not enough; not, though backed by all the electoral advantages recently obtained in the registration. The full significance of this insufficiency (to his perception) remains to be ascertained. Prejudice nothing. Only take this inference to yourselves; the steam is not so up as to carry the train to its destination. What is it that politicians would have the people do? When will they be satisfied with your demonstrations? Must they have monster meetings? Must they have millions subscribed? Must they—all will come in time; but it were well to supersede the necessity.

You are again waiting the mysterious budget of Sir Robert Peel. He avoids now, as formerly, subjecting his measures to previous discussion. Surprise is his delight; and in matters that require deliberation, surprise is usually sought for the purpose of delusion. "Open your mouth, and shut your eyes" may do for times of sport, but not for times of scarcity. All mankind agree that Sir Robert Peel is not to be trusted. The monopolists felt that long ago, but were content that he should play the rogue for them, so that he did not play the rogue, or worse, with them. You require to be served straightforwardly. The choice is with himself. We cannot hope much, or he would not only have made it, but made it known. Perhaps he will produce some concatenation of measure—a Chinese puzzle-box instead of a loaf. Be prepared for any trick, and stick to your demand of repeal—simple, total, and immediate.

An extraordinary suggestion is abroad, of giving something to the class which has mulcted you so long under the name of "Compensation." Your freedom from bread tax to be purchased of the landowners, like negro emancipation of the slaveowners, by public money! This would be distinctly treating you as slaves, whose industry is the property of the landed aristocracy. A fee-simple in your food is substantially the same thing as a fee-simple in your bones and muscles. You are the parties to be compensated. Past robbery is a bad pretext for future spoliation.

Whether a brief and fierce struggle, or a protracted agitation, is before us, cannot yet be told. For either, Manchester has given the signal of preparation. The meeting at which 60,000% was subscribed towards the quarter of a million fund, indignantly scouted the notion of compromise. We must have repeal, total repeal, and nothing but repeal. No Siamese twins, one holding a loaf for the poor, and the other a tax-paper for the advantage of the wealthy! No more of Peel's mixtures, mutually neutralising measures! making a compound which is neither food nor physic. Untax our provisions; that is the single act which Parliament has to accomplish, and for which agitation will wax stronger and stronger until it be accomplished. We rely on no statesman or partizans. There is a power to which that of Peel and Russell, of statesmen and nobles, of wealthy classes and legislation houses, is but as the dust of the earth; and that Power helps those that help themselves.

A NORWICH WEAVER BOY.

A WEEK IN THE WEST.

REMARKS ON THE HINDRANCES OF AGRICULTURE.

I found the following in an old parish record in the county of Hereford a few days ago :

"It hath been ye custom from time immemorial, now gone in part into disuse, to take ye boys in need of ye flogging to ye boundaries of ye parochial on perambulation day, Holy Thursday, and flog them as ye procession went round ye bounds, that it might so be in after-time to come, ye boys being men, would remember ye marches of ye parish."

It appears also, that in these perambulations certain mystic services were performed at the boundaries of farms and estates, "for the good of the harvest." Probably this was the agricultural protection of those days; and doubtless the farmers paid for it as they do now. Now-a-days, the boys are emancipated from the infliction of the rod at the parish boundaries; and there is no reason to suppose that they forget or neglect to care for the good of the parish because they are emancipated. They live in an age that rejoices to call itself civilised, when, to carry staves in procession round the parish would not be deemed a protection to the harvest against "the enemy;" when a flogging, as the procession walked along, would not be necessary to make wayward boys mend their ways and be good parishioners.

But if the boys have been emancipated from such hard management, many of the men have not, civilised though this age is called. There are certain things to be done "for the good of the harvest" with as little reason to justify them, and as much hardship in them as there was in the old perambulations and the flogging of the boys.

In the same parish where I saw the old record, and to which it refers—namely, the parish of Ross, in the county of Hereford, the following case occurred within the last two years. It only needs to be put into words a little antiquated to make it appear a specimen of the times of the flogging of boys round the parish to make them in after-time remember the marches.

There hath lived in this parish, in all grace and honesty, a worthy man, for many years, by name Joseph Cross; and he hath one farm of 200 acres, and more, and payeth ye rent thereof to his landlord, the Lord Alexander Baring, of Ashburton; who, being careful for the good of the harvest, doth perambulate ye acres, and mark out ye bounds which ye tenants must walk on, and no other; for if they walk not unto ye marks laid down to them by ye said Lord Alexander Baring, of Ashburton, and other noble lords and gentlemen, they will be punished, and made to remember it in after times to come. And it so fell out that Mr. Joseph Cross did plant of potatoes one half acre of land less in the year 1843 than he was in power to do by permission of ye said Lord Alexander Baring. And also, it fell out that in ye year 1844, ye said Joseph Cross did plant one half acre of potatoes more than ye said Lord permitted to be done, thinking thereby to make even with ye time when he did not plant so much. But ye said Lord did hear thereof, and did say that his tenant must pay 800 shillings for not abiding within ye rules laid down at ye time of marking ye boundaries by which he was to walk; at which time also ye said Lord Alexander Baring did say all his care was for ye tenant-farmers, and all his services were for their protection. And ye said Mr. Joseph Cross did take out of his pocket forty pounds, being 800 shillings, and did count it over to ye said Lord Alexander, who put it in his own breeches' pocket, did button ye same and walk away.

And Mr. Joseph Cross did suffer this punishment when ye parish was perambulated for protection to ye farmers, and for good of ye harvest, inasmuch as that he did first walk within and next without ye lord's boundary.

It is not necessary to adduce new arguments in this paper to prove, that wherever there is the worst cultivation, the poorest farmers, and the worst conditioned labourers, there we shall find the most stringent covenants existing between tenant and landlord.

I was lately on the estate of a gentleman not unknown to fame in the proceedings of agricultural protection societies—Sir Alexander Hood. This landowner is a great stickler for the Corn Law, for the sake of the tenant farmers, and especially the labourers. As to the labourers, it may be enough to say that their wages in full employment, including harvest, does not average over 7s. 6d. a-week; that 1s. and 1s. 6d. a-week is paid for house rent; and that for years past their daily diet is potatoes for breakfast, dinner, and supper, and potatoes only. This year they are not living on potatoes, because they have none. In the county of Somerset, everywhere the potatoes are lost, with few left for seed. In the neighbourhood of Glastonbury, Sir Alexander Hood's country, they are utterly lost—seed and all; and the wretched farm workers are now existing on half diet, made of barley meal, turnips, cabbages, and such small allowance of bread as small wages will procure. No advance of wages has accompanied the advance in the price of bread. So much for Alexander Hood's labourers, and the benefit they derive from protection to agriculture. And it should be added also, that there is only wages paid at the rate of one man at 7s. 6d., and one boy at 3s., to each hundred acres of land. A great deal of the land lies in grass; it all wants draining.

And now for the tenant farmers. One of them taking a lead among the rest, the rest intending to follow, or promising to follow, made an attempt to drain and cultivate a portion of his farm, only a few acres out of several hundreds, so that he might grow some more winter feeding for his cattle, employ two or three more men, and thus lessen the parish rates. But he was proceeded against for penalties; was forced into litigation; was sold up, expelled the farm, beggared, and made an example of to deter others from daring to attempt to cultivate their land as they might think best.

Not long ago Sir Alexander Hood was at Wells. He was making a speech about protection being requisite to save the farmers from ruin. "Look at this man," cried some daring citizen of Wells, who taking the ruined farmer by the hand, presented him in front of the platform. Sir Alexander had the virtue of being ashamed; he turned and addressed that part of the meeting on his right. But, in a few minutes, the remnant of his ruined tenant, led by the daring citizen, appeared there; and again the latter said, "Look at this man!" Sir Alexander turned to the left, and spoke, with his face in that direction, of his advocacy of protection for the benefit of labourers and tenant farmers. But again there came before him the same couple of tormentors, the one the picture of ruin, staring him in the face, and the other calling, "Look at this man!" He drew his speech to an abrupt conclusion and retired.

The worst part of all this mismanagement of land by landlords is, that many good men do so conscientiously. Sir Alexander Hood is less of a fool and more of a—something else than most men of his country. But in his country are many excellent men who cling to this illusory shadow of protection, believing that such cultivation as they have on their soils of middling quality (much of Somerset is of that character) would cease. The bugbear that inferior lands would go out of cultivation by the abolition of the Corn Laws is constantly frightening them. I saw an excellent letter in the Times the other day, written by Lord Kinnaid, showing that the inferior soils now in cultivation would not be abandoned, but that Free Trade would improve them. To this I add my humble but emphatic testimony of affirmation.

The first practical operation of Free Trade on the middling and inferior qualities of soil now under cultivation would be to increase their fertility and productiveness. It is an expensive and profitless way to fertilise such soils by the purchase of guano, and other manures not made on them. But it is a cheap way to fertilise them by purchasing low-priced oats, beans, linseed, maize, and barley, to feed cattle and sheep, mingled with the straw and chaff, and the root produce, turnips, carrots, clover, &c., grown at home. The cattle and sheep will pay for their provender, and the best of all manures will be on the farms free of price. More acres must then be under turnips and other root crops than now on each farm, which increase will be practicable because of the increase of manure. This will augment labour. Fewer acres on each farm will be in wheat, but superior fertility will give a larger crop of wheat. The cost of its production will be less than now; the amount of its produce more than now.

The first principles of successful agriculture are security of tenure, regularity of price, and cheap fertility. The first of these might co-exist with a Corn Law; it does not. The other two cannot exist with a Corn Law, and never will come into operation until agriculture is free.

At this period of our crisis, when matter crowds upon the printer, I must be brief, and not wasteful of space. But, perhaps, one other extract from the antiquities of Herefordshire will be pardoned; it is also from Lord Ashburton's parish, and is a continuation of the history of the perambulation day, when the boys were flogged to make them remember the parish boundaries; and when the people carried staves and crosses, and made use of mystic words "for ye good of ye harvest." The records go on to say that after the perambulators returned, the backs of the boys still smarting, I suppose,

"They did all of them go into ye church after dinner, and there being a figure of ye devil made of wood, it was placed upon ye altar. They did then, with a rope upon its neck, lift it up clean out of sight; wherefore they did let the rope slip, and ye devil made of wood fell down, and was broken in many pieces by ye boys falling upon it with shouting and joy and much loud noise."

It is not recorded of the boys whether they were so delighted with breaking this wooden devil to pieces "after dinner" as to forget the smarting of the forenoon floggings. Nor is it quite clear whether the chastised tenantry of the Sir Alexander Hood and the Lord Ashburton, who, after dinner, at agricultural meetings, shout and knock to pieces the made-up images of the evening, forget their previous chastisements, or have no fear for the next perambulation day. But it may be assumed, that the joy of demolishing a wooden devil would evaporate when the boys coolly reflected that the real devil was not dead, and felt the stripes of perambulation day upon their backs. So also, I presume, will those grown-up men, who in this age of civilisation are treated as the boys used to be in the half barbarous ages; they will feel their stripes, and have an unhappy certainty that the real enemy of agriculture is alive, even though they shouted and demolished some bogle made up for the purpose at a protection society's dinner.

ONE WHO HAS WHISTLED AT THE PLOUGH.

P.S. Those who are curious about the ancient customs here referred to, and have the opportunity, may consult "Popular Antiquities of Hereford," "Popular Superstitions," "The Lansdown Manuscripts," "A Guide to the Wye," &c. &c. The modern customs to which they may be compared will be found in the Hereford Journal, Sherborne Mercury, Morning Post, Herald, &c. &c. But to understand the modern custom of wooden devil killing, as reported in these papers of record, you must go on the ground, and witness the perambulations of the landlords, and the punishments of the tenants. The records of the agriculturists are not so careful to relate all they know as are the records of the antiquarians.

THE POTATO DISEASE.—Our grain markets continue to decline under the combined operation of the ministerial crisis and the limitation of discounts by the banks. The prices of pigs and potatoes are also lower; but nevertheless, the reports of the state of the potato crop in most districts are still very unfavourable. As the winter advances, the remnant of the crop is rapidly lessening, from the effects of the blight. No doubt a considerable proportion of the crop continues comparatively sound, but so much has been lost already, with the disease still existing, that a scarcity of food for millions of our population must be inevitable early in the spring unless effectual measures shall be adopted to prevent such a calamity.—Correspondent of the Morning Chronicle.

THE FEVER QUESTION.—In consequence of a communication from the Lords of her Majesty's Council, the Custom authorities have directed the form of Bill of Fale to be amended by the insertion of the words, "An in hoc regno," after the words "in hac dicta civitate," in der that it may be certified that no infectious disease existeth in the port from which the vessel sails, or in this kingdom, and a notice to that effect has been forwarded to several ports throughout the kingdom for the information and government of all parties concerned. This alteration has been made in consequence, it is presumed, of the incovenience which was recently experienced by the shipping interest in the instance of vessels proceeding on voyages to South of Europe and other parts, and which were subject to quarantine for fear of fever existing in this country and was, therefore, under the circumstances deemed requisite to prevent a recurrence of the same.

AGRICULTURE.

THE HERTFORDSHIRE MONOPOLISTS.

The landed magnates of this county, who tax the poor man's bread to increase their own rents, have drawn from his native obscurity a juvenile 'squire of the name of Halsey, as "curry-powder" candidate for the vacant representation of the county. Whether the state of the registration may be such as to induce the Free Traders to permit this gentleman to walk over the course, we know not; but we think the farmers and tradesmen of the county must be heartily ashamed of such a member. Questioned by Mr. Lattimore, at Hemel-Hempstead, he shuffled and equivocated with all the tortuousness, but with none of the ingenuity of a Peel. At Stortford, having been informed that Mr. Ward, the member for Sheffield, had come prepared to ask him a few plain questions, he declined to make any public address whatever!! At Hertford, however, Mr. Ward was more successful in drawing out this retiring aspirant of the rotten potato interest; for Mr. Halsey made a long speech—if his jumble of unconnected sentences deserves that name—and pledged himself to maintain bad farming and high rents at all hazards. That this pledge is not altogether satisfactory to the game-ridden tenantry of Hertfordshire, is clear from the fact that Mr. Ward proposed and carried the following resolution: "That, in the opinion of this meeting, it is the interest of the tenant-farmer, the labourer, and the landlord, that the Corn Law question should be promptly and permanently settled, the experience of the last thirty years having proved that protection drives capital from land, narrows the home market by crippling foreign trade, and injures all classes periodically by ruinous fluctuations."

The chairman, Sir Minto Farquhar, tried to shirk a division; and another monopolist insisted that the question should be determined by electors only. The votes of the electors present were alone taken, and the Free Trade resolution was carried by thirty-eight against thirty-six votes, in a meeting called by Mr. Halsey and his patrons.

WHAT ARE OUR COLOURS?

At an agricultural dinner at Lewes, in Sussex, which took place last week, a somewhat ludicrous exhibition of protectionist weakness occurred. The Earl of Chichester presided. The Duke of Richmond supported him, and a goodly complement of landed baronets and squires graced the cross table. So long as the big-wigs tarried, the meeting was dull and decorous. The only speakers were the grandees; and they talked about oxen and sheep, themselves, their gratitude, and their services. There were literally "no politics." The nearest approach was that of the Duke of Richmond, who talked of the "principle of our great constitution—a principle which I hope the theories of modern days will never shake." Nobody could have suspected that a "Ministerial crisis" existed; much less could it have been guessed that an Administration had been brokered up upon the question of Free Trade, from anything that fell from the self-styled "farmers' friends." After the loud, though vague, alarms of ruin to farmers, lately uttered by the Duke of Richmond and his brother monopolists, it might have been expected that he would not have missed such an opportunity of arousing a party of farmers to a sense of the situation. But the Duke of Richmond is both "valorous and sage." He can talk big and bluster at the "room in Bond-street," where he knows he has a packed audience of monopolists; but he is shy of encountering a mixed assembly, even of farmers! He knows that there is much difference of opinion on the Corn Law question in the rural districts; and he does not forget the proposition made last year at an agricultural meeting in Sussex, to toast the labourers in cold water as the only appropriate beverage. And yet, are these agricultural meetings not political? The Lewes Fat Stock show was admitted to be at low water, for most of the speakers bewailed the paucity of stock exhibited, and the "sad want of the sinews of war."

This marks the character of the gathering. In fact, there is scarcely one in twenty of these societies which are genuine cattle shows. They are kept up by the landocracy, as convenient means of dosing the "agricultural mind," whenever some purpose of landlordism is to be served. The only real agricultural societies are those which extend over a very wide district, as the Highland, the Yorkshire, and so forth, and those in which the tenant farmers obtain the upper hand.

So was it at Lewes. No sooner had the duke, earl, baronet, and major squires departed, than Mr. John Ellman, who is a sort of political "little John" of the duke's in Sussex let loose, talked of the "momentous crisis," and proposed as a toast, "May the Sussex farmers stick to their colours." Whereupon Mr. Hallett, who stated he was the occupier of 500 acres of land, inquired "what was the particular crisis referred to; and what the colours were to which the Sussex farmers were called upon to stick?" Mr. Hallett, like a rational man, wished to know those colours when he saw them. From that moment a scene of confusion ensued which baffles description; but inasmuch as Mr. Hallett continued to maintain the ascendancy in the palaver, it is obvious his question was a very interesting one to many farmers present. Moreover, it was not a little puzzling to the duke's lieutenant. What Mr. Ellman really meant by asking the Sussex farmers to stick to their colours, was to stick to the Duke of Richmond; to vote through thick and thin for his nominees. But it would not do to say so. Even the Sussex farmers are got beyond that. Loyalty to a lord won't do, even for bad farmers, at this day. There must be some pretence raised of advantage to themselves and their class to keep them to landlord's standard. Their loyalty to landlordism must be sought under cover of some subterfuge or falsehood.

Accordingly, we find Mr. Ellman, in answer to the question, saying, "I consider those colours to be those opinions which Sir Robert Peel entertained when we placed him in Parliament with a majority of one hundred at his back;" which is a paraphrase for "the Richmond livery." He then "denounced Sir Robert Peel as a renegade and deserter from their cause." Now this Mr. Ellman's patron, the Duke of Richmond, did in 1842, and has since, quietly quartered his poor relations on the public through Sir Robert Peel's influence. Perhaps the Duke's deputy is seeking to do a small stroke of business in the same way on his own account. Then Mr. Ellman proceeded—hazardous task for a monopolist—to prophesy, saying, he believed Lord John Russell would not form an administration, and that a Government as favourable to protection as that of 1842 would be formed; and he referred—don't laugh, reader—to Mr. Sidney Herbert as the "firm and eloquent" champion of protection, who was to lead for the curry-powder interest in the House of Commons!!

All this passed in a perfect hubbub; yet in the midst of it he was asked, with considerable applause, whether "We can't compete with foreign countries in the progress of agriculture, if we have a fair field?" And he finally pinned Mr. Ellman to a more precise answer to the question of "What are our colours?" but he only succeeded in obtaining this Bond-street formula, "We will maintain the protection at present existing to agriculture."

Now, let every farmer ask himself, soberly and calmly, the question propounded at Lewes, "What are our colours?" Suppose him to be still labouring under the delusion that "protection" is a benefit to agriculture, and he desires to maintain the existing Corn Laws, for whom will he vote at the coming election? Look amongst the politicians; the Whigs and Liberals have abandoned utterly and for ever Sir Robert Peel; and the rational Conservatives are entirely convinced that "protection" is no longer tenable. Amongst the great body of merchants, manufacturers, and capitalists of the country, there is not one in fifty who is not anxious, upon both public and personal grounds, for the abolition of the Corn Laws; and the middle and working-classes, with the exception of the farmers, are almost unanimous for Free Trade.

Against this overwhelming force of action and intelligent public opinion, what is there opposed? Out of doors there is an inert body of farmers, who entertain vague and undefined fear that Free Trade may lower prices, and place them, even more than at present, in the power of their landlords. But they have no faith in their opinion, if opinion such unsettled notions can be called; and they feel bitterly that protection has not made them prosperous or independent. They imagine that the Free Traders must have some objects exclusive and selfish in agitating the question, because the farmers are well aware that their agitators, the landowners, are actuated solely by the desire to keep up rents; and then they know that in struggling to maintain the Corn Laws, they are struggling also to maintain game and the Game Laws, yearly tenancies, and the rest of the feudal burthens of landlordism. Does any one imagine that any active energetic efforts can come from such a body? The Free Traders throughout the country are volunteers, actuated by sound principles, animated by constantly-increased success, led on by the best talent and intellect of the day; the farmers on the other hand, are conscripts, pressed men, distrusting or despising their leaders, and who have seen all the loud promises to uphold protection end in disgraceful surrender, or more discreditable and fruitless opposition. Then what figure do the monopolists make in Parliament? The lords are privileged men; and their effusions are not much regarded by the active public men of the country. Then, in the Commons, who are the protectionist leaders? Tyrrell, Miles, Bankes, Bramston, and men of that sort—men who have not sense or sensitiveness enough to know when they are ridiculous—form the material of which a Richmond Administration must be composed. And let it not be forgotten, that in order to maintain "the protection at present existing," the protectionists must bring into power a Richmond Administration. Now, so wild a scheme has never entered into the head of the most rabid monopolist. Even the Morning Post, which has done so much service to the Free Trade cause, by reducing protectionist arguments to absurdities, has never ventured to advise such a sublime burlesque. In the words of one worthy of all honour, an attempt to form a Richmond and Buckingham Administration, "would place the aristocracy in a situation at once pitiable and perilous." What, then, should be the farmer's colours? He has, as a rational man, the only alternative of going for the Free Trade candidate, or giving no vote.

MONOPOLY NOT PROFITABLE.

When a vicious system is profitable, its abrogation is always difficult. Thus the great nay, the only obstacle to the abolition of the slave trade, arises from the circumstance that the profits of that horrid traffic are enormous. Now, this cannot be said of the Corn Laws. The monopoly of food in this country has certainly not been profitable to the growers of corn, for whose benefit it was professedly established. Farmers, as a class, have not thriven under legislative protection; and they form the only capitalists in this country to whom the merest tyro can say without contradiction, "You have not made half as much of your capital as you might have done." Neither have landowners gained much by the Corn Laws. At all events, their property has not been permanently enhanced in value by monopoly. What they have gained in one way, they have lost in another. They have got high rents—rents high, when compared with the actual state of their land—out of their tenant's capital, but the punctual payment of those rents has been made dependent upon scarcity and the access of national distress. And with the exception of the very ignorant of the landed interest, the lard and grease section of the monopolists, these facts are not unknown to protectionist landlords. Why, then, do they struggle so desperately to uphold the Corn Laws? Why do the Wellington and the Stanleys, the impersonations of oligarchy, risk the very existence of their Ministry, rather than grant unrestricted trade to a commercial people? A writer in the Morning Post supplies the answer; and to farmers in particular, that answer is most instructive. The writer, who is obviously one of the establishment, his lucubrations always appearing in the largest type, sometimes signs himself "Anti-Leaguer," but now, "Anti-Peel." Under the latter signature on Tuesday se'night, he roundly rated the landowners for their submissive following of Sir Robert Peel in a partial relaxation of the restrictive system, and said :

"A third class of Parliamentary landowners dream of an indefinite rise in the exchangeable value of land, as soon as "scientific farming" shall be brought fully into play. These men believe, that if deep draining and guano shall lead, in a few years, to a duplication of the crops now raised from the soil of England, a duplication of rent must follow as a matter of course. Nor do they boggle now, so much as they were wont to do, at the mention of long leases; for they begin to recollect that, in Scotland, where long leases prevail, rents are, proportionally, far higher than in England."

And somewhat sensible "dreamers" they must be, for their "dreams" have a very practical and business-like aspect.

"The long-lease system, however, you, Sir, know well, is not designed for the present race of occupiers. No; they are regarded by the League, and by the League-tainted landowners, as men devoid equally of science, of energy, and of capital. The long-lease system is designed to be brought into play for the benefit of a new class of cultivators—for the benefit of a race of men who, possessing large pecuniary resources, shall require security for the safe investment of these in land the property of others. It is assumed by Leaguers, and by avaricious landowners, that such a race of men will be found, willing to cultivate the soil of England under a system of Free Trade in corn, and willing, moreover, to pay high rents while they receive low prices for their produce."

"The long-lease system to which capitalists are assumed to be parties, as occupiers, would involve, as a matter of course, the utter extinction of that political influence which has for ages attached to the territorial aristocracy of England. Landowners might, under such a system of long leases, remain masters of their own votes, but over the votes of the occupiers of their land they would retain not the slightest measure of control."

Here, then, we have a distinct avowal that scientific farming, the application of capital to land, and long leases, are not to be thought of by the landocracy, because, though landlordism may advance its rents, it will lose the power of controlling the votes of tenant-farmers. Hear this, ye shouters at protectionist societies! Hear this, ye followers of Miles, Bankes, Richmond, and Co., of 17, Bond-street!! There is one error of fact made by the too ingenuous monopolist writer—who really ought not to have blurted out so plainly the private notions of his employers—when he says, the present race of farmers must be superseded. Nothing is further from the truth. In nine cases out of ten, the present race of average farmers, with fair leases and freedom from the special burdens of landlordism, would be able to obtain and use all the capital necessary for improved farming. Why, a long lease in the hands of an industrious farmer is at once a security for a loan, whether he can actually transfer his interest in the lease or not. But when landlords ask the farmers to uphold the Corn Laws, can they say farming under the protective system has been a profitable business? On the contrary, all are agreed, that for the last 30 years there is no other occupation which has been so generally unprofitable. And wherever farmers have made reasonable profits, it has been by pursuing a system contrary to that the Corn Laws dictate. And farmers need only analyse their own outlay, and examine the facts presented by their own business, to comprehend perfectly why their monopoly has proved so unprofitable. We have before referred to the admirable and conclusive tract of Messrs. Morton and Trimmer; and we have stated the substance of their demonstration, that an average Norfolk farmer is a considerable loser by protection. We shall again and again recur to that work, strongly recommending, however, every farmer to possess himself of a copy to test its statements and calculations by his own expenditure and receipts.

This has been done by Mr. C. H. Lattimore, who has stated the result in a letter addressed to the editor of the Mark Lane Express. Upon his own farm the direct loss by protection has amounted to 15s. 8d. per acre; or, as he says, "nearly double the rent paid for the same land 55 years ago." His statement is so conclusive, and will be so generally interesting to our agricultural readers, that we make no apology for inserting it at length :

Account of Corn Crops grown upon, and sold off Wheat-hamstead Farm, in 1844—consisting of 250 acres arable, and 21 acres of grass land. Total, 271 acres.

	£	s.	d.
Wheat, 181 qrs. 6 bush. (average price, 2l. 11s. per qr.)	461	0	6
Barley, 200 qrs. 6 bush. (average price, 1l. 11s. 2d. per qr.)	343	15	0
Peas, 38 qrs. 6 bush., consumed on the farm	—	—	—
Hay, &c., consumed on the farm	—	—	—
Turnips, consumed on the farm	—	—	—

Total amount of produce sold .. 804 15 6

Amount received from protecting duties on the sale of the above-named produce.

Wheat, 181 qrs. 6 bush., at 5s. 6d. per qr.	49	19	4½
Barley, 200 qrs. 6 bush., at 4s. 8d. per qr.	46	16	10
Peas, &c., consumed	—	—	—
Wool, no duty	—	—	—

96 16 2½

Amount of linseed, cakes, beans, peas, bran, pollard, malt-dust, &c., purchased for stock, &c., on the above farm—from 1st of August, 1844, to 1st of August, 1845.

	£	s.	d.
Linseed cakes, 26 tons 10 cwt. (average price 8l. 13s. per ton)	229	18	9
Old beans, 74 qrs. 3 bush. (average price, 2l. 2s. per qr.)	156	3	9
Peas, 64 qrs. (average price, 2l. per qr.)	128	0	0
Barley, 47 qrs., ground for pigs, at 1l. 10s. per qr.	70	10	0
Oats, 83 qrs. 4 bush., ground for sheep and lambs, at 1l. 4s. per qr.	100	4	0
Do., 102 qrs. 3 bush. 7 pecks weekly, for nine farm horses, at 1l. 4s. per qr.	122	14	0
Grains, 300 qrs. per annum, at 2s. per qr.	30	0	0
Seed wheat, 16 qrs. 4 bush., sown at 2l. 11s. per qr.	39	19	6
Seed barley, 25 qrs., sown at 1l. 14s. per qr.	42	10	0
Seed peas, 6 qrs., sown at 2l. per qr.	12	0	0
Malt, 10 qrs., for use of labourers, at 3l. per qr.	30	0	0
Hops (say) 1 cwt., for use of labourers, at 8l. per cwt.	8	0	0
Clover seed, 4 cwt., averaged at 3l. per cwt.	12	0	0
Paid bills for pollard, bran, and malt-dust	66	0	0
Paid bills for hay, turnips, and grass	67	10	6

Total amount of produce purchased .. 1115 1 6

It will appear that the amount of produce purchased is equal to 138 per cent. upon the total sale of grain of that year. The extra cost of protecting duties upon the above stock-food will stand thus for one year:—

	£	s.	d.
Linseed cakes, 26 tons 10 cwt., at 2l. per ton	53	0	0
Old beans, 74 qrs. 3 bush., at 6s. 11d. per qr.	25	14	5
Peas, 64 qrs., at 5s. 10d. per qr.	18	13	4
Barley, 47 qrs., at 4s. 8d. per qr.	10	19	4
Oats, 83 qrs. 4 bush., at 6s. 6d. per qr.	27	2	9
Oats, 102 qrs. 3 bush., at 6s. 6d. per qr.	33	5	6
Grains, 300 qrs., at 10 per cent.	3	0	0
Seed wheat, 16 qrs. 4 bush., at 5s. 6d. per qr.	4	5	3
Seed barley, 25 qrs., at 4s. 8d. per qr.	5	16	8
Seed peas, 6 qrs., at 5s. 10d. per qr.	1	15	0
Malt, 10 qrs., at 4s. 8d. per qr.	2	6	8
Hops, 1 cwt., at 3l. 11s. 4d. per cwt.	3	11	4
Clover seeds, 4 cwt., averaged at 10s. per cwt.	2	0	0
Say 10 per cent. on pollard, bran, &c.	6	12	0
Do. 10 per cent. on hay, turnips, &c.	6	15	0

Cost of protective duties on cattle-food for one year .. 204 17 8

RECAPITULATION.

Taking the mean estimate of the consumption of the Norfolk labourer (par. 53), which gives the extra cost of protection upon his food at 2l. 7s. 8d. per annum, it will amount to:—

	£	s.	d.
For 18 labourers, not boarded, at 2l. 7s. 8d.	42	18	0
Allow 2 labourers extra for harvest work, at 2l. 7s. 8d.	4	15	4
Do. 10 per cent. on tradesmen's bills (65l.)	6	10	0
Do. 10 per cent. on household expenses (say 300l.)	30	0	0
Do. for rent, tithes, and rates, increased by protection, say	20	0	0
Cost of protective duties on cattle-food, brought forward	204	17	3

Total cost of protective duties .. 309 0 7
Deduct enhanced value of ditto .. 96 16 2½

Amount of loss from protection .. 212 4 4½

Thus, it appears that the loss upon 271 acres of land in one year from protection amounted to the sum of 212l. 4s. 4½d., or 15s. 8d. per acre, or nearly double the rent paid for that description of soil 55 years ago. I anticipate that it will be said to show an unusual consumption of cattle food upon 271 acres of land; that the drought of 1844 seriously affected the corn and other crops upon all gravelly soils, and cannot be taken as a fair average of the produce—both which objections are frankly admitted: still it is a correct statement of facts; and upon the system of stock-feeding pursued upon this farm, the purchases for stock and cattle-food, taking an average of years, have considerably exceeded the amount realised from the sales of corn produced from the farm.

And Mr. Lattimore adds, "That the worst farmers buy the least and sell the largest amount in proportion to their agricultural produce; and consequently the loudest clamour for protection is raised by this description of farmer." It is plain that the Corn Laws are protective of British indolence, not of British agriculture; and that the Central Protection Society ought to inscribe over the door of their room at 17, Bond-street, "Let bad farming be perpetual."

THE PERSECUTED WILTSHIRE LABOURERS.

The case of these poor men still continues to attract the sympathy of Free Traders, as will appear by the following letter. The money has been forwarded to Mr. Day on behalf of Bullock and Pearce.

To the Editor of THE LEAGUE.

Kennington Street, Dec. 13, 1845.

"Sir,—Fearing lest those unlucky labourers of Beckhampton, in Wiltshire, Bullock and Pearce, may not have wherewithal to buy a pinch of 'curry powder' for the warm water, I beg you will be good enough to send them the enclosed sovereign."

"I have the honour to be, your obedient servant,

T. W. THORNTON."

To the Editor of THE LEAGUE.

Maribro', 19th Dec. 1845.

"Dear Sir,—I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 17th instant, enclosing 1l. for the benefit of Bullock and Pearce: this is the third 1l. I have received for them."

"I am pleased to inform you that Messrs. Hodgson & Co. of Toxteth dock, Liverpool, have kindly offered the poor fellows employment at 16s. per week, which they have gladly accepted. The farmers in the parish have all declined to employ them; and they had nothing but the union house in prospect for the winter months. They will leave Beckhampton for Liverpool in a few days.

"An unknown friend, with the signature 'Edinburgenses' has also forwarded to me five dozen penny postage stamps, and requests me to give half-a-crown to each of the persecuted Wiltshire labourers, Bullock and Pearce. Will you say, through the LEAGUE, that they have been received, and that my correspondent's request shall be complied with?"

"In haste, yours truly,
"CHRIS. DAY."

AGRICULTURAL CORRESPONDENCE.

To the Editor of THE LEAGUE.

Cotfield House, Battle, 18th Dec. 1845.

Sir,—The claims upon your columns for the insertion of more important matter at this critical juncture, are urgent and numerous, and may not permit of your giving place to this communication in your early Numbers, and therefore, I leave it entirely at your disposal, having no further wish than to impart the information at a convenient opportunity.

Adverting to my former letters on the subject of growing wheat alternately with green crops, and the use of guano, I submit to my brother agriculturists, with much confidence, one of my last experiments in this system of cropping.

A field of nine acres yielded 4 quarters and 2 bushels per acre in the summer of 1844. The field was drilled with 2 bushels of seed per acre in the preceding October, and 3 hundred weight of guano per acre were distributed broadcast, and harrowed in with the seed.

The land was ploughed in May; and on the 12th and 13th of the month, the field was drilled with purple-top Swede turnip-seed, at 18 inches between the rows, and 6 cwt. of guano, at 7s. 6d. per cwt., were distributed, broadcast, and harrowed in with the seed. The plants came up in a week, and grew vigorously. They were hoed and kept clean as long as the work could be done without injuring the leaves; there was no failure of plant, and no injury from fly or worm. The crop has been taken off, topped, and tailed, and laid up in ridges. The turnips were pulled up by the bushel, and an accurate account kept by my bailiff, who weighed different parcels, from which a result was obtained of 15 tons, 9 cwt., 4 qr., 14lbs. per acre. The roots command freely 20s. per ton.

The above produce is very little inferior to the best yield produced from bones dissolved in sulphuric acid, (costs 1l. 19s. per acre) deposited in the rows with the seed; but the land is more equally enriched by the broadcast distribution of the manure, and of course in better condition to receive the following corn crop.

The field has been again ploughed, and will be sown with wheat before Christmas, weather permitting; and if not, early in spring, receiving a sprinkling of guano.

I am, sir, your most obedient servant,
S. H. WILLIAMS, Colonel, &c. &c. &c.

DISTRIBUTION OF BEDS TO AGRICULTURAL LABOURERS.

To the Editor of THE LEAGUE.

SIR,—I, William Ferguson, minister of the congregational church, Bicester, Oxfordshire, do hereby certify that I have forwarded to you for publication 36 pictures of human misery, such as neither the Times commissioner nor Punch's pencil can excel. Publish them, and let the world read them and judge for itself.

The following are the families who have received the beds, &c., forwarded to me for distribution by the "Council of the National Anti-Corn-Law League."

BICESTER, OXFORDSHIRE.—1. John Ormsby has a wife and a number of children dependent upon him, and upon begging together, for support. His wages are 6s. per week; house rent, 1s. 6d. There was not a single bed in the house when I examined it. The wretched family, eight in number, including his daughter's child, all slept in one room, upon some old sacking filled with straw. They have no potatoes; and when they buy any coals, they pay, this season of the year, at the rate of 1s. 8d. per cwt. for them. There is not a single pane of glass in any of the windows. This is the man (and this is his cottage) who was engaged to act, and who did act, the fool, for the Duke of Buckingham, when the Marquis of Chandos became of age. Why did not the Duke present this wretched family with a bed?

2. John Miller has a wife and 6 children. Wages: father, 8s. per week; son, 2s. 6d.; house-rent, 1s. 2d.; coals, 1s. 8d. per cwt; no potatoes. Eight sleep in one room, in two wretched beds.

3. John Coxil has a wife and four children. Father has no work; son earns 3s. per week; rent, 1s. per week. Two poor beds, made up of many rags and patches. All sleep in one room.

4. George Blencowe has a wife and nine children. No employment. Two boys in work; one earns 5s.; the other 2s. 6d. per week; one girl makes a little lace. Rent, 1s. 3d. per week. Three ragged and torn beds in one small room in which 11 sleep.

5. John Berry has a wife and four children. Wages, 9s. per week, when in work; rent 1s. 3d. Two wretched beds, one straw and one chaff, in one small room.

6. Thomas Birt has a wife and four children. No employment. Two boys at work; one earns 2s. 6d., the other 3s. per week. Rent 1s. 6d. Three wretched huts, one of which is chaff.

7. John Aris has a wife and five children; no employment. Rent 1s. 6d. Son earns 2s. per week. Only one wretched bed for seven.

8. George Trender has a wife and five children; being ill, is kept by the parish; allowed 6s. per week, and seven loaves. Rent 1s. 3d. No potatoes.

9. Thomas Barrel has a wife and four children; one straw bed. The children sleep on two old sacks in the same room. Wages 8s. per week. House-rent, 1s. 3d.

10. John Grace has a wife and six children. Wages 9s. per week. Rent 1s. 9d. per week. Coals 1s. 8d. per cwt. No potatoes. Eight sleep in one room on two beds of straw.

11. Joseph Baldwin has a wife and six children. Wages, 9s. a week. Boy earns 1s. 6d. Rent 1s. Wife very near her confinement. They have one chaff bed, and another made up of rags and flocks. I have never seen such beds before in either England or Scotland. No potatoes. Coals 1s. 8d. per cwt.

12. W. Westbury, widower, has three sons, who bring him in 8s. per week, but has no employment for himself.

Rent 1s. per week. Potatoes rotten, and nearly all gone. One straw bed, on which the father and three grown-up sons sleep, two at the head and two at the foot of the bed.

13. John Adams, a poor shoemaker, who, in consequence of the poverty of the working-classes, has next to no employment at his trade. He has a wife and two children at home. They have but one straw bed for the family. No potatoes, and are in great distress.

BRILL, BUCKINGHAMSHIRE.—14. Thomas Goddard. Wages 8s. per week; scarcely any beds or bedding. Several children at home, and all dependent.

15. Joseph Harris has a wife and six children, all at home and dependent. Works on the roads. Wages 8s. per week. Rent 9d. per week for a miserable hovel; coals 22s. per cwt. "How they can manage to live," says the dissenting minister of Brill, "I cannot tell." They have no potatoes, and they are badly off for beds and bedding. The woman is a clever and contriving person, but her husband is a victim to the Game Laws.

16. J. Mapping has a wife and six children all dependent upon him for support. He has to go five miles to his work. Wages, 8s. per week. Rent, 1s. 2d. per week. Eldest boy, aged 14 years, is ill, and is allowed five loaves per week; very badly off for bedding, and no potatoes. Though he wishes to attend a place of worship he cannot for want of clothes.

17. Charles Smith has a wife and eight children all dependent upon him for support; one girl makes a little lace. Total income, 11s. per week. Very badly off for clothes; their stock of potatoes, between 30 and 40 bushels, all spoiled. Having so large a family, he can hardly contrive to find anything for some of them in the shape of beds or bedding. The mother, in order to get necessities, is obliged to neglect her family; she works at the lace pillow.

18. William Verney, day labourer, has a wife and six young children, who suffered much in the summer while he was away seeking work. He earns 10s. per week at the stone pit; pays 1s. per week rent, and 1s. 10d. per cwt. for coals. Very badly off for beds and bedding. His wife is an industrious woman, and has to deprive herself of necessities to keep her club paid up for a few clothes.

19. Joseph Watson, a shoemaker, has a wife and three children; cannot get any work at his trade, the number in it in the neighbourhood being so great, and the people too poor to employ them. As he follows a trade, no one will employ him; no, not the road surveyors. His eldest son earns 2s. per week, one of which goes to pay house-rent for a miserable hovel, having only two rooms, one above and one below, about seven feet square. They have two wretchedly poor beds, one of which is made of straw and nearly all to pieces. They all sleep in the same room. They have no potatoes. "How they live," writes the dissenting minister of Brill, "I cannot say; but with all they prefer home to the union."

LAUNTON OXON.—20. James Jones has a wife and five children dependent upon him for support. Earns 7s. per week at the stone pits; rent, 1s. per week; coals, 1s. 6d. per cwt.; one girl earns about 1s. 3d. per week at the lace pillow; one very poor flock bed and some straw in old sack; seven sleep in one small room.

21. John Butler has a wife and four children dependent upon him for support. Rent, 1s. per week; earns 7s. per week at the stone pit; beds and bedding very bad; seven sleep in one small room.

22. John Cartwright has a wife and seven children. Wages 9s. per week. Boy earns 2s. per week. Rent, 1s. per week; coals 1s. 6d. per cwt. Three wretched beds in one small room, in which nine persons sleep.

23. Thomas Smith has a wife and six children. Wages, 8s. Boy, 2s. per week. Two bedsteads (but I cannot say anything about the beds) on the same damp floor on which the family live and starve.

24. Thomas Sansom has a wife and seven children. Wages, 8s. per week. Two very poor beds. Potatoes destroyed.

25. Ann Evans has a son 18 years of age. Wages, 4s. per week. She is allowed 2s. and a loaf weekly by the parish, out of which she has to support a grand-child. Neither her hovel nor her beds can be described.

UPPER ARNCOTT, OXON.—26. Richard Savage has a wife and five children. No work. About five acres of land. Two miserable beds: seven sleep in one room. One boy at work for 2s. per week. Coals, 1s. 6d. per cwt.

27. W. Massey has a wife and three children. No employment at present. No potatoes, except a few saved for seed. Two wretched beds in one room.

28. Richard Cole has a wife and two children. One poor bed. Wages, 9s. per week.

29. W. Hejcroft has a wife and five children at home. Wages, 9s. per week. Two poor beds in one room.

BLACKTHORNE, OXON.—30. William Penn has a wife and five children. Wages, 8s. per week. No potatoes; coals, 1s. per cwt. Two poor beds, one flock and one chaff, in one room.

31. John Mumford has a wife and five children. Wages, 8s. per week; boy, 2s. 6d. The beds are made up of chaff and rags. All sleep in one room. No potatoes.

32. Thomas Eustace has a wife and seven children; is out of health; and has 4s. and nine loaves per week allowed him by the parish. Has a few potatoes. Has one flock bed and one bed and one chaff; all nine sleep in one small room.

33. W. Walker has a wife and five children. No potatoes; is out of health; has seven loaves and 5s. per week from the parish; has two miserably poor beds.

MARSH GIBBON, BUCKS.—34. W. White has a wife and four children. No potatoes. Has two chaff beds; only one room in the hovel. Wages, 9s. per week; rent, 2l. per ann.

35. John Roberts has a wife and four children. Total income, 10s. per week. Rent, 2l. per annum. Two beds, one of which is a chaff bed. All sleep in one room.

36. Gabriel Allen has a wife and five children; they are poor and wretched.

Sir,—The above facts are more than sufficient to demonstrate the extent to which the peasantry of Oxfordshire and Buckinghamshire have been reduced and degraded by Corn and Provision Laws, yearly tenancy, and low wages. Your readers may fully rely on the accuracy of the whole of my statements. 27 of the families who have received the beds have been examined by myself, and the other nine have been examined, at my request, by the dissenting minister at Brill, and a respectable inhabitant of Marsh Gibbon. I can assure both you and your readers that my task has been an arduous and trying one. It has been trying to both body and mind. I have had to walk from house to house, from village to village, for several days, under a pelting rain, up to the ankles in mud and water, and wet through from head to foot, searching out the most needy and deserving objects of charity. The nakedness, afflictions, and poverty which I have witnessed during my investigation of the present state of so many of my fellow-men in the neighbourhood of Bicester, have been such as I cannot describe. At this moment there are many of the peasantry in our province living upon Swedes, and a scanty share of THAT BREAD for which they have toiled and laboured. There they are, huddled together, male and female, in numbers from five to ten, or even eleven, in one small room over the damp and fireless room in which they suffer, pine, and die! No intelligent person can wonder that too many of the field-labourers are immoral, dishonest, and ruined. O that some wealthy and benevolent person who may happen to read my statistics would put it into my power to purchase 40 or 50 smock-frocks, of different sizes, for the most naked and degraded of the peasantry in our neighbourhood. A good smock frock would be a handsome New Year's gift to a poor field labourer. If I had the money I could buy the frocks in Bicester. I have not thrown out this hint to others until I have, for the time being, beggared myself. I am still at work searching for the most wretched of the labouring classes of our own locality, and thus distributing the beds which I have in hand. I am very anxious to have the whole of the beds promised to me; and hope you will forward them as soon as convenient, that I may dispose of them at once. I shall not trouble you, sir, with any additional facts for publication. Not, however, because I have no more particulars of a soul-harrowing nature to communicate, but because the state of things which I have now made known to the public is more than enough to convince the most hardened and sceptical lord of the soil that the peasantry are a degraded and ruined race. I wish it to be distinctly understood that only five of the beds which I have distributed have been given away among the poor of my own congregation. The parties who have received the greater number of the beds are members of the Established Church, and a few of them are Wesleyans. I have described some of the peasantry's beds as flock beds, but strictly speaking, they are not flock beds, but something in the shape of beds made up of pieces of old mops, old carpets, old cloth, and rotten rags; and their bed ticks are a bundle of old patches. In one hovel I found only one bed for seven persons, including husband, wife, and children!! In another hovel, in Upper Arncott, I saw the corpse of a child laid out on a small table at the fire-side. It was laid there because there was no room for it in the place in which the wretched family sleep!! Three men, who have received each a bed, walked five miles to thank me, and to thank the Council of the League for the beds. These men and their families can now rest on comfortable beds, and consequently they will be better able to cultivate that portion of land in Buckinghamshire on which they toil and starve.

Praying for the prosperity of the League, and with many heartfelt thanks to all those who have put it into my power to show so great an act of kindness to the poor in the land, I am, Sir, yours very respectfully, WILLIAM FERGUSON. King's End, 23d Dec., 1845.

(From a Correspondent.)

The following is an account of some of the cases in Gillingham and its neighbourhood, who were supplied with beds through the instrumentality of the Anti-Corn-Law League:—

GILLINGHAM.—John Fricker and his wife, elderly persons, destitute of bed and bedding; had slept for some time on the floor of their dwelling. They had stuffed an old sack as a substitute for a bed, and used as covering a tattered great coat, and part of an old sheet.

A widow, named Read, and four children. I visited one of the daughters of this woman in dying circumstances; in the early part of her illness she had no bed, and was laid on the floor.

Another family named Read, consisting of a man, his wife, and four children, only possessing one bed.

There were other families in this place miserably supplied with bedding.—The men being labourers earning 6s. or 7s. per week, were unable, as the family increased, to provide an additional bed.

In the hamlet of Langham, three miles from Gillingham, four families have been assisted. In one case, the family, consisting of a man, his wife, and five children, depended on earnings of 7s. per week; the father a sickly man, not always able to work. There was also another family relieved where there were eight or nine children.

EAST STOUR, and ON STOUR COMMON.—A very cleanly hard working family, named Steel, much distressed from the failure of their potato crop. Rent of land, purchase of seed, potato, and labour, had cost this industrious family six pounds, but their crop had so far failed, that they had only six sacks of good potatoes, and it is doubtful whether these will be preserved. They were much distressed for want of bedding; and the grant was received with much gratitude.

A family named Francis, a man, his wife, with several children living in a hut without a glass window, the door continually open to admit the light; this family had one bed; on this the eldest daughter was lying dangerously ill, so that the father, mother, and the poor children appeared to have nothing but a little straw to lie on. On my first visit to them after they had received the bed and bedding, the afflicted daughter (who appears to be a hopefully serious young person) was laid on the clean new bed, and I can hardly describe the thankfulness of this poor creature for so great a comfort in what seemed likely to be her last sickness.

A labourer and his wife, named Maidment, with I think three children—the man at home, afflicted with rheumatism—living in a hut with a floor of earth, and covered with old thatch, ready to fall in on their heads. They had one wretched bed. This family seemed to esteem the gift of a bed as a greater blessing than some persons would have esteemed a gift of a thousand pounds.

I shall only mention one case more, that of a family in the hamlet of Matson, named Hull. The wife was the daughter of a respectable farmer, and they had seen better days; but were now reduced, they had ten children, and only one bed. I felt much for this poor man; his scanty earnings were very inadequate to support his family, or to procure anything for himself.

I can only unite with these poor people in praying for you that you may never need comfort. God has said "Blessed is he that considereth the poor; the Lord shall bless him in the time of trouble."

We rejoice indeed to find that God is crowning your great and persevering efforts for the abrogation of the Corn Laws with success.

(From another Correspondent.)

Joseph Russell, carter to Richard Holman, Esq., has 7s. 6d. per week, the eldest boy of six children has 2s. per week, being 9s. 6d. per week to support man, wife, and six children; a steady, honest, and industrious man.

Charles Vincent works for the Hon. and Rev. George Neville Grenville; has a wife and four small children, has 8s. per week, has but one bed and scarcely any furniture in the house; a steady and industrious man.

Charles Blacher works for the above G. N. Grenville; has a wife and two children, daily expecting another; has 8s. per week; a steady and industrious man.

James Oldis works for the above G. N. Grenville; has an unhealthy wife and family; his labour is getting done; has 7s. per week; a steady and industrious man.

James Lye works for Mrs. Welmont; has a wife and three small children, buried two, wages 8s. per week; a steady and industrious man.

George Craft works for Mr. Cades, has a wife and very unhealthy family, three dependent on his labour; wages 8s. per week; a steady and industrious man.

Robert Stride works for Mr. Harbridge; has a wife and four children to support with 8s. per week.

William Higgins works for Mr. Bartlett; has a wife and six children, three of them dependent on his labour; has had 8s. per week, but is to have only 7s. the remaining part of the winter.

The Hon. and Rev. George Neville Grenville, a country magistrate, and rector of the village of Butleigh, is owner of nearly all the property in the village, except the land owned and occupied by Richard Holman, Esq., who is a violent opponent to the Repeal of the Corn Laws. G. N. Grenville has very extensive game preserves in the parish, and sells by far the greater part of it to the dealers in Bath, &c., consequently two of his farms are in hand, and another of his largest tenants is leaving in the spring, because, as they say, they cannot afford to pay him the rent of land which he stocks with game.

On the 13th November, on the occasion of his eldest son, the Hon. Ralph Grenville, the member for Windsor, bringing home his bride, he was met by a number of the peasantry about a mile from Butleigh-house, the horses taken from his carriage, and he was drawn by them to the house; where to reward them and all others who chose to partake, two or three hogsheds of beer were taken into the park, and it was given away to any who could find a vessel of any sort to drink it from: the consequence, as might be expected, was one of the most disgraceful scenes of drunkenness with which any neighbourhood can be cursed. Numbers of men, women, and children were rolling about in a helpless state of drunkenness in the park, and one of the sons of the rev. gentleman, assisted by some of the work people, wheeled them in wheelbarrows into the stable, and littered them up in the straw for the night. A week or so before, the same rev. gentleman, in his capacity as magistrate, fined a poor man 18s. including costs, for being drunk and making some little disturbance.

If any further particulars are required of the state of the poor in this neighbourhood, I shall be glad to furnish them.

(From another Correspondent.)

Joseph King, four children, the man and his wife, with only one bed, and a small dust bed; works for George Fry, 7s. a-week.

Joseph Richards, a wife with four children and one bed; works principally on the highways, 7s. per week.

John Godfrey and wife; seven children; only two beds; works for Thomas Bath.

John Baker and wife; eight children; three very poor beds. Works for Joseph Gould; 7s. per week; and the wife expecting to be confined with their eleventh child.

George Baker and wife; five children; only one bed, and a small dust one. Works for Joseph White, at 7s. a-week; the wife afflicted with the evil.

Henry Marsh and wife; five children, and only dust beds to lie on. Works for Thos. Vogue for 7s. a-week.

All in the parish of Street, in the county of Somersetshire.

What is the cry of "No surrender?" The state of the country is becoming critical. Trade is falling off; manufactures are stopping; artisans are thrown out of employment, and the poor are lacking food;—and "No surrender" means no yielding to the clamours of a hungry people. Children may cry for food; parents, tempted by poverty, may put forth their hands to steal; gaols and workhouses may swarm;—and "No surrender" means, no pity, no bowels of compassion, no relaxation in the grasp of monopoly to mitigate or remove the sufferings of the people.—Derby Reporter.

NENAGH, DEC. 16.—From personal observation throughout a wide district of country, during the present week, we regret greatly having to announce that the ravages of the potato disease have given serious cause for well grounded alarm in certain districts. We do not mean to say that the disease is at present progressing; but where it has appeared in some places, ruin and devastation and impending famine are dreaded. Some instances of suffering have been imparted to us which are really heart-rending.—Tipperary Vindicator.

CASTLEBAR, DEC. 16.—We have, since our last publication, heard gentlemen who are as well qualified as any others in the country to give an accurate opinion on the subject, say that vast numbers of the people will not have a potato to eat in a month or six weeks, though, but for the disease, they would have enough till the coming of the next crop. This is a frightful prospect. There has been a fall in the grain markets in this country, during the last seven or eight days, owing, we believe, to the rumour that the Corn Laws would be repealed, or the ports thrown open by an order in council. Oats have fallen to 6s. 6d. per cwt., from 8s. Potatoes have also come down. They were sold on Saturday last at 2d. a stone. It is said that the country people are bringing them into the market, to get rid of them at any price, as the disease is progressing in them, and threatens to render them totally unfit for food.—Mayo Constitution.

REVIEW.

Rambles in the United States and Canada during the Summer of 1845, by Rubio. London: Clarke.

One great merit of this work is its brevity; the author has been more anxious to convey information than to make a book; he gives the impressions derived from a hasty visit just as they were suggested to his mind by surrounding circumstances. His observations are more distinguished for graphic liveliness than philosophic depth; he writes like a practical man of business, not much accustomed to habits of literary composition. His judgment of the Americans is rather unfavourable; he speaks in very disparaging terms of the climate, the soil, and the people; but, from some incidental hints scattered through the volume, we should be disposed to infer that some disappointments of a pecuniary nature led him to take a more gloomy view of society than he would have done under more favourable circumstances. Rubio is a thorough Free Trader; and the existence of a protective tariff in a land claiming for itself the exclusive possession of liberty is an intolerable and disgraceful anomaly. But though not destitute of prejudices, Rubio is not slow in conceding praise to what he finds really valuable in America; his account of the New York pilots is very gratifying:

"A pretty little schooner, having a large painted distinguishing mark in her sails, came very near to us in a rough and stormy sea, and we backed the head-sails whilst the pilot came on board in a little cockle-shell of a dingy, that you could almost carry under your arm. We were very glad to get him on board; and, after admiring the elegant and fairy-like proportions of his watery home, the schooner shoved off, and we began to ask the news. The pilot service of the port of New York may be considered as nearly perfect; it consists of thirteen schooners, of about sixty, seventy, up to ninety tons burthen, and costing six and seven thousand dollars each.

"There are seventy pilots, all middle-aged men, and none are eligible except total abstinence men; therefore vessels are never lost owing to drunken pilots; this is impossible. The English might here borrow a leaf out of the American book. It frequently happens, on arriving in the English channel, that the pilot who boards you is a man of seventy years of age, and I have known him hoisted up with a tackle, because he was too infirm for climbing up the side-ladder; but an important service like that of pilots should be limited to the ages between thirty and sixty. And, moreover, the first thing an English pilot asks for, is a glass of grog; whilst the New York pilot who boarded us, a hundred miles from the port, in common with the other sixty-nine of the fraternity, are pledged to drink nothing stronger than tea or coffee, or they would be refused a license.

"We were very much amused with the variety of fresh newspapers which the pilot kept pulling out of his pockets, large and close-printed, the size of the 'Morning Advertiser' in London, and published at a halfpenny each! True they were on inferior paper, badly printed, with worn-out type, with violent language, personalities, and party politics, for the stock in trade of the editor. 'Ah,' said the pilot, 'it is party that is killing our country!'

Removals in New York are of such a singular nature, that we must extract the description:

"One need not walk through many streets in New York without witnessing in one of them a removal or lifting up of a house; this is almost peculiar to American mechanics, and I was never tired of looking at it. The practice has contributed very much to the straightness and uniformity of the streets, and so perfectly at home are they at it, that if an advertisement were to appear in the 'Sun,' the 'Herald,' or the 'Tribune,' to remove the London Mansion House to Hampstead Heath, there would be several offers for the job. As for the north side of Middle-row, they would think nothing of removing it bodily at once to the Model Prison at Clerkenwell, without any of the young misses of the family being in the slightest degree interrupted in their usual avocations. As for the everlasting and dangerous nuisance of Holborn Hill, which I have been looking at more in sorrow than in anger for these forty years, in New York it would be levelled in a week. A worthy tradesman in the city of Brooklyn, opposite New York, wanted to convert his two parlour windows into a shop-front; 'No, no,' said the builder, 'don't throw away your parlour, I will lift the house up, and build you a much better, loftier, and more spacious shop, where the parlour now stands. The screws and timbers were accordingly brought, and I saw the two-story brick house go up slowly and imperceptibly, whilst the daughters were looking out of window, as if nothing was going on more than usual. I watched the alteration every time I crossed the ferry to Brooklyn, and in the course of two or three weeks the tradesman was occupying his new and handsome store, as the shops are called."

His remarks on the prohibitory, or virtually prohibitory duties in the American tariff, display sound sense and practical knowledge:

"I could not spare the time to go over to Lowell, alike celebrated for its factory girls and their parasols. This is no doubt a very desirable state of things, but I am afraid it is merely accidental and temporary, and rather an episode in the history of the manufactures of the New England States, than to be regarded as the natural superiority of the American factories over those of Lancashire. The day is coming when the workers of cotton in Lowell will be no better off than the workers in shoes in Lynn, or the cunning in clocks. The parasols will have to be furled and left at home. The unnatural propping up of the manufacturing system through the silly tariff of 1842 has made many fortunes, especially in the New England States; but the repeal of said act, which is certain, sooner or later, and perhaps the very session now commencing, will make as many bankrupts. The cotton-trade will be as good after the repeal of the tariff as it is now, but those who have been leaning on the support of those prohibitory duties will find, as soon as such support is withdrawn, that they must become insolvent, unless they evince the energy of humber manufacturers in other departments, and are determined to undersell the world; for, with unlimited water-power, the raw material at their door, and bread and meat for next to nothing, who can beat a Bostonian at making calico? So that, after all, we see that these Lowell parasols have been paid for by the agricultural states, by the gallants of the southern and western country, without their knowing it, and without acknowledgement on the part of the young ladies of the factories. But all that must be changed; it is absurd to suppose that the planters of New Orleans and Mobile should have to contribute in every article they require at the store to the already overgrown fortunes of the New England manufacturers, who have been boasting, the last three years and upwards, that they have been clearing twenty-five per cent. profit on their capitals employed, whilst all the articles produced by the planters, particularly cotton, have been gradually getting lower and lower in price; and even yet, cotton has not seen its lowest. So that it will be one good thing done by southern preponderance in the national councils of the Union, that the tariff is to be reduced to a revenue standard.

"The American legislators should observe, that every session the Parliament of Great Britain is advancing in the Free Trade principle by removing duties on imports; and they should recollect that it is now well established, that it is an unchangeable law of human nature that the real interests of all nations are identical. No manufacturing country wants paupers for customers: but, on the contrary, all nations find it for their advantage that all the others should flourish—all derive benefit from unrestricted intercourse, free exchange, peace, and justice."

But while the monopolies of the United States are condemned, Rubio feels that England set the evil example of the protective system, which he very forcibly exposes:

"Before leaving the immense valley of the Mississippi, where the cheapness and abundance of bread and meat is truly astonishing, one cannot help casting a thought across the Atlantic, to that dear island of Great Britain, where the people are so much in want of both, but who, through mistaken views of policy, have passed laws to exclude them.

"I inquired how it was possible for the farmers to sell their wheat at two shillings per bushel, and their maize, rye, barley, and oats, at eightpence? 'Why, sir, my friend—', in Indiana, has got this year 2000 acres of wheat in one patch, which, at twenty-five bushels to the acre, amounts to 50,000 bushels. The thrashing by our simple machines, and the cradling at harvest-time, enables him to get through the work much quicker than is done in Europe, and in this poor country 25,000 dollars is a large sum to receive in a heap for his crop of wheat; and as carriage is nothing on our rivers, or next to nothing, there are few deductions. There is always sufficient solar heat to insure good crops, the only danger being from drought, but there has never been a failure since I have been in the country. Now you see how we can grow wheat to pay us at two shillings per bushel, or, as you say in England, sixteen shillings per quarter, and it is never likely to be dearer!'

"The entire removal of the duty on bread-corn, imported in British ships, leaving the manufactured articles of flour, biscuit, &c., as they stand, or at a fixed duty, would be better than going to war respecting Oregon, and filling up the channel of the great river between the Belize and St. Felipe, and would induce the American Government to lower their duties on some staple articles of British manufacture.

"The articles of beef and pork are not of so much consequence. Englishmen have a very natural repugnance for salted meat; and therefore, although the entire duty were removed from those articles, they would not enter very largely into the consumption of the English people; but surely the expenses and risk of shipping live cattle, freight, fodder, water, and attendance during the voyage, are sufficiently heavy to protect the English graziers; and the twenty-shilling duty on foreign oxen ought to be repealed, and the duty on foreign butter and cheese reduced one-half. A tariff, according to Mr. Polk, to be just and equitable, should have no reference to any sectional interests, but merely look to revenue; and if the English Chancellor of the Exchequer cannot afford to forego these various items, let him make good the loss by laying an additional shilling duty on malt, and raise the annual licence for first-class gin-palaces to 50*l.*, and for the second-classes, 30*l.*; which is the exact tax of our Australian colonies. To transfer the tax from bread to poison, ought to displease nobody."

A large proportion of this little volume is devoted to an account of the disputed Oregon territory; and it tends to show that a more worthless possession was never made the subject of diplomatic controversy between two nations. We doubt the sincerity of the newspaper clamour that has been raised on the subject in America. We believe that our brethren of the States are not disposed to indulge in the madness and wickedness of war for the sake of a territory not worth the expenses of a week of hostilities. For our own countrymen we can answer with confidence; there is no popular feeling adverse to America in this country. On the contrary, most Englishmen of every party are anxious that the bonds of brotherhood derived from a common origin should be strengthened and drawn tighter by the mutuality of interest which increased commercial intercourse would create. The farmers of the Far West are able to supply us with the food of which we are in need, and to receive our manufactures in payment. An exchange founded on mutual wants must be productive of mutual advantages, and thus afford the most perfect security for the continuance of amity.

YEADON.—A meeting of the parishioners of Guisely was held at Yeaddon, on Wednesday evening last, in the British School Room. The place of meeting was crowded to excess, there not being less probably than 1000 persons present. The chair was occupied by Mr. Joseph Dawson, woolstapler. The characteristic features of the meeting were its great spirit and enthusiasm. The movers and seconders of the resolutions were Mr. G. Kenion, Mr. Forbes, of Summerhill; Mr. Yewdall, of Leeds; Mr. Hatton Stanfield, of Leeds; Mr. Samuel Clapham, of Esholt; Mr. Byles, of Bradford; and Mr. Plint, of Leeds. A spirited memorial to the Government was adopted, and signed by the chairman, and after the usual vote of thanks to the chairman the meeting dispersed.

MERE PARTY CRIES WILL NOT DO NOW.

Time was when elections were contested not on the merits of rival candidates, nor on the truthfulness or otherwise of antagonistic principles, and when a rallying cry would serve in the place of well defined opinions and enlarged and statesmanlike views. A candidate who could vociferate "Church and King" was regarded as the personification of all that was loyal towards the monarch, and dutiful to Mother Church; whilst at the same time, through ignorance or sheer stupidity, he might entertain sentiments inimical to the just prerogative of the Crown, and injurious to the best interests of the ecclesiastical system he might desire to uphold. How many elections have been won by the utterance of the talismanic phrase, "Protection to agriculture!" These magic words have been the "Open sesame" which has gained admittance to many a farmer's heart; and yet those who have been foremost to use this cry, have held principles destructive to the class who were tickled by its sound. But this state of things is fast passing away. Candidates that now present themselves before constituencies must have something better to recommend them than unmeaning phrases. The understandings as well as the ears of electors must now be appealed to, and constituencies will require that those who present themselves as candidates before them should possess sound and definite views on all subjects upon which they are to legislate.

The inquiring spirit of the age, which has so successfully penetrated the arcana of science, and converted the elements of nature into the means of advancing the social condition of man, has now turned its prying eye to politics and legislation. Commercial crises and periods of national distress are now discovered to be the result of irrational human laws, and not the effect of inefficiency in the Divine legislation. Human laws proceed from human law makers. If the constituencies of this country return to Parliament men of comprehensive views and holding definite and sound principles, they may expect to reap their reward in the blessings of wise statutes and consequent prosperity; but on the contrary, if they choose men to make their laws who from either ignorance or selfishness hold false principles, or who have no settled principles at all, they may expect in return a plentiful crop of bad legislation, fatal to the true interests of the country. We cannot gather grapes of thorns, nor figs of thistles.—Derby Reporter.

TO THE FREE TRADERS OF GREAT BRITAIN.

Some time ago, a project was set on foot which had for its aim the diffusion, in foreign countries, of information on subjects connected with the science of Political Economy, and the means made choice of for this purpose was the gratuitous circulation abroad of the Economist Newspaper, to such public News Rooms, Reading Societies, Editors of influential Journals, leading Statesmen, &c., as might be thought suitable.

Through the aid of friends to the undertaking, it has been so far put into execution that a circulation on the above plan is now in operation to the extent of 230 copies weekly in Europe and America; a circulation which it is highly desirable to maintain and extend. With this view, therefore, an appeal is now made to all those who think it important that Free Trade principles should prevail in the commercial world, for support to a means of spreading information, which, there is every reason to believe, has had already considerable effect in softening prejudice, and inculcating right commercial views.

The appeal is made at the present time with more confidence of its being liberally responded to from these circumstances:

That, owing to the unwise commercial regulations of most of the European countries, which, by interfering with the natural operations of trade in the articles of human food, have prevented that prudent provision against seasons of scarcity, which those operations (in all cases where they are left unshackled) so beneficially secure, the British, and many of the Continental nations, are, on occasion of a very general failure of their crops, threatened with an almost certain prospect of having to endure all the horrors of famine until another harvest shall again give plenty; and men are, therefore, at this time, peculiarly well prepared to listen to the teachings of a science which professes to point out the best methods of avoiding, or, at least, greatly mitigating the pressure of such evils.

That there never was a time when the economical arrangements of all civilised countries were receiving more attention, when, in many of those countries, false commercial principles were becoming more generally acted upon, and their advocates more active in their propagation than is the case at present; and when, therefore, it was more incumbent on those who feel conscious of the possession of sounder principles, to strive to procure for those principles their proper influence; and

That the present position of the Tariff question, in the United States, (a country which has the special attention of the undertaking,) is such as to call for every possible effort, in order to strengthen the hands of that party, in their national councils, who would liberalise their commercial system, in opposition to those who would uphold the present highly restrictive regulations; and, as the issue of the struggle, which will take place between these two parties in the next session of congress, will probably decide on which principle their Tariff will for some years, at least, be based, it becomes of the greatest importance that the cause of freedom there should be furnished with every weapon of reason and argument that can be placed in its hands; and it will be certainly admitted that the articles which appear, from time to time, in the pages of the Economist, bearing directly on the point in question, are eminently calculated by the good spirit and talent which distinguish them to answer that purpose.

We should also not lose sight of the fact as an encouragement to exertion in the manner proposed, that in combating the restrictive systems of most foreign countries, we have not the sinister interests of the governing classes to contend against, as is unhappily the case in our own country, and that, consequently, as soon as the great body of consumers become aware of the real effects of monopolies and restrictions, and call upon their Governments to abolish them, this obstacle so formidable to us will not stand in the way.

That the practical triumph of Free Trade principles in this country appears, comparatively, near at hand, is a motive rather to increase than to diminish our exertions to persuade other nations to follow in our footsteps, for our tariff is already so far improved, that we can take from them almost as much as they are willing to take from us, which, even under perfect freedom, must always be the limit of our transactions, so that to induce them to relax their restrictions, is directly to increase our own power both of export and import.

It will, however, be urged that, as soon as foreign nations shall see us prospering under a perfectly free system, they will follow our example, which assertion is nevertheless directly at variance with everything that history and our own experience tell us of the tenacity with which the vested interests of monopolists have ever been clung to, when they have once got the ear of the ruling power; and as for the lessons of example and experience, their value depends entirely on their being rightly understood, of which we need not look far for a striking instance; for we do not find in this country farmers and farm labourers enough now, after 30 years' bitter experience of the delusive working of the protective system, still clamouring for the sliding scale among the rocks and shoals of which they have so often had to hoist the signal of distress, and it may safely be affirmed, that they have learned more in a few years, under the schoolmaster-ship of the League, than a century of unexplained experience and example merely would have taught them.

From these considerations, therefore, it is hoped that the project here advocated will meet with the support of which it stands in need.

The following gentlemen have undertaken to receive contributions:

John Biggs, Esq.	Leicester
William Blackburn, Esq.	Glasgow
William Fisher and Sons	Sheffield
Robert Gardner, Esq.	Manchester
Charles Geach, Esq.	Birmingham
Laurence Heyworth, Esq.	Liverpool
Secretary of Free Trade Club	London
Joseph Jones, Esq.	Hull
James McLaren, Esq.	Edinburgh
F. Schwann, Esq.	Huddersfield
Hamer Stansfeld, Esq.	Leeds

The following subscriptions have been received:—

	£	s.	d.
The Right Hon. Earl Radnor	10	0	0
A Friend of Earl Radnor	10	0	0
James Garth Marshall, Esq.	10	10	0
Laurence Heyworth, Esq.	10	0	0
Joseph Travis Clay, Esq.	10	0	0
George Moffat, Esq., M.P. (annually)	6	5	0
Sir John J. Guest, Bart., M.P.	5	0	0
W. R. C. Stansfeld, Esq., M.P.	5	0	0
Walter Fletcher, Esq., Brighton	1	0	0
John Wilkinson, Esq., Leeds	1	0	0
F. Schwann, Esq., Huddersfield	5	5	0
S. C. Kell, Huddersfield (annually)	5	5	0

Huddersfield, December, 1845. S. C. Kell, Sec.

CORN LAW DIVISIONS.

(From the Glasgow Constitutional.)

In the belief that, at a moment like this, when the Corn Laws are the all-engrossing topic of political interest, a sketch of the recent history of the legislative discussion of the question will not be without interest to our readers—we have compiled the following chronological summary of the chief divisions which have taken place upon the subject in either House of Parliament during the last twelve years. We begin with the Parliament of 1833 as being the first which was elected under the provisions of the Reform Act.

1833.

May 14.—Earl Fitzwilliam's resolutions for the revision of the Corn Laws, with a view to their repeal, were negatived, seriatim, without a division.

May 17.—Mr. Whitmore's motion for an alteration in the principle of the Corn Laws, to one of a moderate fixed duty, was negatived by 305 to 106; majority 199.

June 17.—Mr. Fryer's motion for leave to bring in a bill to alter the Corn Act of 1828, with a view of admitting colonial grain free of duty, was negatived by 72 to 47; majority 25.

1834.

February 4.—Lord Grey's ministry announced, through Lord Althorp, that it was not their intention to bring forward any measure for the alteration of the Corn Laws, nor to support such a measure if introduced by others.

March 5.—Mr. Hume's motion for a Committee to consider the propriety of a moderate fixed duty was rejected by 311 to 155; majority 157. All the members of Lord Grey's cabinet who were in the House of Commons, spoke and voted in the majority.

1835.

The subject does not seem to have come before either House.

1836.

No trace of the question having been moved appears in the votes of either the Lords or Commons.

1837.

March 16.—Mr. Clay's motion for a Committee to consider the propriety of a fixed duty on the importation of foreign corn was negatived by 223 to 89; majority 134.

May 3.—Mr. Robinson's resolution against the tendency of the Corn Laws was rejected by 108 to 42; majority, 66.

1838.

March 15.—Mr. Villier's motion for a Committee to consider the operation of the Corn Act of 1828 was rejected by 300 to 95; majority, 205.

1839.

February 18.—Lord Brougham's motion, that evidence against the Corn Laws be heard at the bar, was opposed by Lord Melbourne, and rejected without a division.

February 18.—Mr. Villier's motion to the same effect, in the House of Commons, was opposed by Lord John Russell, Lord Howick, Sir Robert Peel, and others, and negatived by 361 to 172; majority, 189.

March 11.—Mr. Villier's motion for a Committee to consider the operation of the Corn Act of 1828 was rejected, after a five days' debate, by 342 to 195; majority, 147.

March 14.—Lord Fitzwilliam's motion, condemning the operation of the Corn Laws, was opposed by Lord Melbourne, and negatived by 224 to 20; majority, 304.

1840.

April 1-3.—Mr. Villier's motion for a committee to consider the operation of the Corn Act of 1828 was adjourned sine die, by 227 to 131; majority 86.

May 26.—Mr. Villier's motion for a committee to consider the operation of the Corn Act of 1838 was rejected by 300 to 177; majority 123.

June 11.—Earl Fitzwilliam's resolution, that it is expedient to consider the laws relating to the importation of foreign corn, was rejected by 142 to 42; majority 100.

1841.

May 17-18.—The budget of Lord Melbourne's ministry embracing a proposal to substitute a fixed duty of 8s. a quarter on foreign wheat (with corresponding rates on other kinds of grain), in place of the then existing Corn Law, was rejected by 317 to 281; majority 36.

A dissolution of the Parliament soon after ensued; and, in the months of June and July the present House of Commons was elected.

August 24.—An amendment on the ministerial address, in answer to the Queen's speech (which recommended a revision of the Corn Laws), was carried in the House of Lords by 168 to 95; majority 72.

August 24.—A similar amendment in the House of Commons was carried by 360 to 269; majority 91.

1842.

February 6.—Lord John Russell's resolution against the alteration in the Corn Laws proposed by Sir Robert Peel, as not being calculated to remove the evils of the former law, was rejected by 349 to 226; majority 123.

Feb. 24.—Mr. Villier's motion for a total repeal of the Corn Laws was rejected by 303 to 90; majority 213.

Feb. 25.—Mr. Christopher's amendment for increasing the duties proposed in Sir Robert Peel's new Corn Law Bill was rejected by 306 to 103; majority 203.

April 18.—Earl Stanhope's motion that the new Corn Law Bill proposed by Ministers should be read a second time that day six months, was rejected by 119 to 17; majority 102. Lord Brougham's amendment to Lord Stanhope's motion, that no duty shall be imposed on foreign grain, was negatived by 109 to 5; majority 104.

April 19.—Lord Melbourne's amendment in favour of a fixed duty was rejected by 117 to 49; majority 68. Lord Brougham's resolutions against all duties on foreign grain, were rejected by 87 to 6; majority 81.

May 29.—Mr. Miles's amendment, for increasing the new tariff duties on the importation of foreign cattle, was rejected by 380 to 113; majority 267.

May 24.—Mr. Villier's motion, that the duty should be reduced to 1s. a head, was negatived by 209 to 44; majority, 165.

July 11.—Mr. Villier's motion for a committee to consider the operation of the Corn Laws, was rejected by 231 to 117; majority 114.

1843.

February 3.—Sir Robert Peel stated that his experience of the present Corn Law had not been such as to induce him to propose further change at present. He had heard nothing to induce him to prefer a fixed duty to a sliding scale.

February 17.—Lord Howick's motion for a committee on the commercial policy of the country was negatived by 306 to 191; majority 115. In the course of the debate, Sir James Graham said that there was not much difference of opinion about the principles of Free Trade; and England being no longer an agricultural country, the field of our commerce must be enlarged for the benefit of the agricultural as well as of the commercial body; and these, he added, were opinions now recognised by every man of common sense. But then, he argued, there was the danger of injuring agriculture in the attempt to relieve manufactures. Mr. Gladstone (then a Cabinet Minister) admitted that exports would be increased in a degree corresponding to the relaxation of restrictions on imports; that if an increased importation of foreign corn took place, and if that importation of foreign corn were to be paid for in British goods, it would be taking a most shortsighted and false view of the interests of British agriculture to view that importation of foreign corn as so much displacement of British agricultural commerce.

March 14.—Lord Montague's motion for a committee to inquire into the operation of the existing Corn Laws, was negatived by 250 to 78; majority, 172.

May 15.—Mr. Villier's motion for an immediate and total repeal of the Corn Laws, was rejected by 381 to 125; majority, 256.

May 19.—Resolutions to serve as a basis for the Canadian Corn Bill, were carried by 344 to 156; majority, 188.

June 2.—The Canadian Corn Bill was read a second time, by 209 to 109; majority, 100.

June 13.—Lord John Russell's motion for a Committee to consider the propriety of a moderate fixed duty on foreign grain was rejected by 244 to 145; majority, 99. In the course of the debate, Sir R. Peel said that the Corn Law of 1842 was a compromise, assented to by the agriculturists, on the understanding that it was to be maintained. Under it, prices had been steady, and he declared his determination of abiding by the existing law.

1844.

March 12.—Mr. Cobden's motion for a Committee on the effects of the corn laws was negatived by 224 to 133; majority, 91.

March 26.—Mr. Hutt's motion for a committee to consider the propriety of admitting corn the produce of British possessions in South Africa, India, and Australasia, at the same rate of duty as that levied on Canadian grain, was rejected by 119 to 49; majority, 70. Mr. Gladstone and Lord Stanley opposed the motion, as having a tendency to produce, with more or less reason, an agricultural panic.

June 26.—Mr. Villier's resolution for a repeal of the Corn Law, was rejected by 328 to 124; majority, 204. In the course of the debate, Lord John Russell wished that a compromise might be effected, and expressed his apprehension that a sudden repeal of the corn laws would affect the employment of capital in agriculture, and that a greater importation would take place than was consistent with the profits of the importing merchant, or the security of the home cultivator. Lord Howick proclaimed himself ready to vote for a total repeal.

1845.

March 13.—Mr. Cobden's motion for a committee on the effects of the Corn Laws was negatived by 213 to 121; majority, 92.

May 8.—Mr. Hutt's motion for admitting wheat from Australia on the same terms as from Canada, was negatived by 147 to 93; majority, 54.

May 28.—Lord John Russell's resolutions, embracing a proposal for remodelling the Corn Laws, by substituting a fixed duty of from 4s. to 6s., were rejected by 182 to 104; majority, 78.

June 10.—Mr. Villier's annual motion for the immediate repeal of the Corn Laws, was negatived by 254 to 122; majority, 132. The measure was opposed by Sir Robert Peel and Sir James Graham, in speeches of which Lord Howick remarked, that both would have been unanswerable in favour of the motion had that been for a gradual repeal of the existing laws.

In the House of Lords, the highest number of votes that have been recorded in favour of a total and immediate repeal of the Corn Laws is no more than 6. The proposition even to entertain the question of a moderate fixed duty has never received more than 96 votes; and this was on an occasion which involved at the same time the very existence of the Whig administration.

QUALIFY! QUALIFY! QUALIFY!

THE Friends of FREE TRADE residing in the Northern or Midland Counties, desirous of purchasing Freeholds in any of the undermentioned Counties, are requested to apply to the Secretary of the League, Newall's Buildings Manchester.

North Lancashire	North Derbyshire
South Lancashire	South Derbyshire
North Cheshire	North Durham
West Riding of York	East Cumberland
South Stafford	West Cumberland
North Stafford	South Northumberland
South Cheshire

Each applicant is requested to give his name and residence at full length.

By Order of the Council,

JOSEPH HICKIN, Secretary.

QUALIFY! QUALIFY! QUALIFY!

FREE TRADERS desirous of purchasing Freeholds for Middlesex, East Surrey, West Kent, South Essex, East Sussex, and South Hants, are requested to send their applications, with name and address in full, to the League Offices, 67, Fleet-street, London.

By Order of the Council,

JOSEPH HICKIN, Secretary.

BOROUGH OF LAMBETH.—REPEAL OF THE CORN LAWS.—A PUBLIC MEETING will be held on Tuesday Evening, Dec. 30, 1845, at the Horns Tavern, Kennington. The Members for the Borough, the Right Hon. Tennyson D'Eyncourt, and Benjamin Hawes, Esq., will attend. The Chair to be taken at Seven o'clock precisely.

J. DONKIN, C.E., Old Kent Road,

J. A. LYON, ditto,

Secretaries for the Meeting.

THE SOUTH LONDON NEWS AND SURREY COUNTY ADVERTISER.

On Saturday, 3d January, 1846, will be published, the first Number of THE SOUTH LONDON NEWS AND SURREY COUNTY ADVERTISER. Its columns will evince an untiring advocacy of all Local Improvements, and the firmest opposition to every Local Abuse; the most ample and faithful reports of the Commercial Markets, of general and parochial Public Meetings, of the Police Courts, of the transactions of Poor Law Guardians, and of all other Local Boards; regular analysis of Literary, Scientific, and other Instructive and Entertaining subjects, delivered in the neighbourhood; with the usual Reviews, Notices of Public Amusements, and other miscellaneous information; and the propagation and maintenance of Liberal Political Principles, in their fullest sense, inclusive of Free Trade in its most extensive signification. So that, whilst this journal will be sufficiently competitive with its metropolitan contemporaries, in the publication of events of general interest, it will be more prominently devoted to what is locally important. It will be the paper of Southwark, Lambeth, and their Vicinities—their record of news—their public exponent—their advertising medium—it will be, in every sense, of them and for them.

THE SOUTH LONDON NEWS AND SURREY COUNTY ADVERTISER, will be printed on a large double sheet, and published every Saturday, precisely at 2 o'clock, price Fivepence.

Advertisements will be received at the office, and by all Advertising and News Agents, (to whom a liberal commission will be allowed,) at a charge of Five Shillings for the first five lines, and Sixpence per line beyond that number; subject to a reduction of 10 per cent. upon at least six insertions. Notices of persons seeking employment, in whatever capacity, at half-price.

Communications to be addressed to the Editor, and any further information to be obtained from the Publisher, at the Office of the "South London News and Surrey County Advertiser" Office, 3, King-street, Borough.

POSTSCRIPT.

LONDON, Saturday Morning, December 27, 1845.

Christmas has been from time immemorial the season of pantomime; but the changes and transformations effected by Harlequin's magical sword have scarcely been more rapid, and certainly not more surprising, than the ministerial vicissitudes with which the political world has been amazed, if not amused, within the last few days. Even now it is very doubtful whether the last experiment in cabinet-patching will lead to any permanent result. The sponsor for the Corn Laws, he who in 1815 as Mr. F. Robinson promised and vowed so many things in their name, which they, even at the mature age of thirty, have not been held bound to perform,—he against whose household two verdicts of wilful murder were registered, because it was part of the ministerial policy of that day to exhibit bullets as a substitute for bread, and to show that gunpowder was more efficient than curry-powder, in stilling the demands of hunger; he, the head and front of the old starvation-phalanx, has resumed his place and his power without its being known whether Ripon has succumbed to Peel, or Peel to Ripon. The present arrangements have every appearance of being purely provisional; the showman has taken back his old puppets, but apparently only for the time necessary to prepare a new set for the wires. But to the real issue before the country, the Cabinet pantomime and the ministerial fantoccini are not of one whit greater importance than the performances at Drury Lane, or the antiquated jokes of Punch and Judy. The real issue is not between ministers, or between parties, but between a selfish class, and an outraged nation. Whoever may stand as minister before the Parliament, it is the people that will appear in the presence of the Legislature. Lords and squires may fawn or may bully; dukes may threaten to form or to dissolve ministries; the Carlton Club may bluster at one hour, and lick the dust at another; but it is with the nation that the minister must reckon—it is to the people that the Premier will be responsible for his course in this perilous crisis.

The comparative apathy with which the recent changes have been viewed by the great body of the people, and the utter disregard with which the structure of the existing cabinet is viewed, clearly proves that the people look more to the work that is to be done than to the persons by whom it is to be accomplished. This is the right spirit, and it is the duty of Free Traders to keep it animated to its highest intensity. The repeal of the Corn Laws can only be accomplished by the people. In every great crisis there will be found a large party similar to the "waiters on Providence" in the days of the Commonwealth, ready to bring large contingents to the party which has the greatest appearance of strength and determination. The strength unquestionably rests with the people, but the resolute energies necessary to give that strength practical efficiency must not be wanting, and, still more, must not be latent. Every weapon which the constitutional armoury supplies to the nation must be brought into active service; qualification and registration must be employed with increased vigour; meetings must be held in every parish, in every wardmote, in every electoral district, and in every municipality. The glorious example of Manchester in its magnificent contributions to the League fund must be emulated through the length and breadth of the land; the proceedings of our adversaries must be closely watched, their frauds exposed, their delusions manifested, and their artifices detected. No ministerial soothing—no whispers of the benevolent intentions of a Premier, or the increasing wisdom of an aged statesman, must be permitted to abate our vigilance, or to diminish our exertions. The battle is for the people, and it must be fought by the people. In such a conflict our best security is to "Trust ourselves alone." Delegates may prove false to their trust—champions may be cloven down—mercenaries may be false or faint-hearted—but destiny never yet proved false to a nation until that nation proved false to its own destiny.

It is only now that the monopolists have begun to discover that a serious contest is impending; Rigby has furnished up all the shattered sophistry of the last thirty years, for a characteristic article in the Quarterly Review. Mrs. Harris and Mrs. Gamp have taken new draughts from the classic fountains of Billingsgate, and produced articles of such idiotic fury, that they seem to have been written under the strongest inspiration of gin; the Morning Post has gone beyond the delicate anger of the "waiting gentlewoman," and taken up the tone of a seold in the servants' hall; and all have put together a mass of contradictions and inconsistencies which could only be the result of a complete and perplexing panic. We only refer to these disorganised organs of monopolist opinion to show the confusion which the presence of the nation, approaching in all the might and majesty of united strength and firm determination, has produced in the hostile camp. So long as the people stand firm in presence, there will be no rallying for the craven plunderers of the poor. But if our efforts are relaxed for a moment, if our zeal should seem to wax cold, and our high resolution to waver, sordid instincts will work after their kind, and suggest new efforts to secure the continuance of the profits of rapacity.

We stop not to discuss the paltry, peddling, and quibbling respecting the amount of our present supplies. A Peel may guage stomachs, a Gladstone may measure appetites, and a Goulburn calculate to what extent the infliction of starvation may be consistent with the professions of piety. We take our stand on the admitted facts, that scarcity is felt now, and that we have no security against what all will admit to be the probable chances of famine. There is no statesman whose word can be taken in such a contingency, for there is no one who could ensure us from a second bad harvest. A people demands to be confided to the care of Providence; the resistance to such a demand is an act of monstrous impiety as well as of monstrous injustice. At this solemn season the services appropriated to the festival are full of suggestions as to the course which we ought to pursue; for "Unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given, and the government shall be upon His shoulders, and his name shall be called Wonderful, Counsellor, the Mighty God, the Everlasting Father, the Prince of Peace." It is to restore this holy government, to vindicate this divine administration from the unhallowed interference of human artifice, that the English people now stands erect in the presence of its rulers, trusting in that Providence which promised food when it enjoined labour, firm in its resolve not to recede a step, not to withdraw for an instant until the idols set up by monopoly be shivered to dust, until Dagon be prostrated before the Ark of the Covenant, until perfect freedom of trade prepares and secures the rule of "Peace upon earth, goodwill towards men."

THE FUNDS.

	SAT. Dec. 20	MON. Dec. 22	TUES. Dec. 23	WED. Dec. 24	THUR. Dec. 25	FRI. Dec. 26
Bank Stock	200	202	201½	204
3 per Ct. Red. Ann. ..	92½	93½	94½	94½	..	94
3 per Ct. Con. Ann. ..	94	95½	96½	97	..	97
3 per Ct. Red. Ann. ..	103	10	10½	10½
Long. An. Ex. 1860 ..	92½	93½	94	94½	..	95½
Cons. for Acct.	18	18.21	20.22	21.25	35	..
Exc. Bills, pm.	33	35
Ind. Bds. un. 1000l.	263
India Stock
Austrian
Belgian Bonds	79½	..	79
Brazilian 5 per Ct. ..	52½	53½
Chilian	17½	..
Columb. ex. Venez. ..	93	94	94	94½	..	94
Danish	60½	61	61	61½	..	61½
Dutch 4 per Cent. ..	30	30½	..	31½
Dutch 2½ per Cent. ..	41	42	..	41
Mexican
Peruvian	113	113½
Portug. conv.	28½	28½	..	30	..	29½
Russian 5 per Cent.	39½	..	40½	..	40½
Spanish 5 per Ct.
Do. 3 per Ct. ex. dv.

MARKETS.

CORN MARKET.

MONDAY, DEC. 22.—The supplies of wheat and barley have been moderate, and of oats considerable, during the past week. To-day the show of wheat samples fresh up is very scanty, and of barley and oats fair; the former were cleared off early, at about 1s. over last Monday's price. Free Foreign and Bonded remain the same as on that day. Barley excites little attention. The oat trade is rather firmer than on Friday, but the sales made are on barely so good terms as on this day week. On the whole there seems to be rather a better feeling in the trade; and though the demand for every kind of corn is still limited, holders appear determined not to make a further sacrifice. In beans and peas there is no alteration to notice. We refer you to the current prices of this day.

S. H. LUCAS.

BRITISH.		Per Imperial Quarter.
Wheat, Essex,	Red 50 to 60	White 58 to 68
Kent, & Suffolk	49	58	56 64
Lincolnshire & Yorkshire ..	47	54	54 62
Scotch
Oats, Lincolnshire & Yorkshire Feed	23 25
Ditto	Polands	New 24	26
Scotch Feed	25	26	Potato 28 29
Limerick	23 25
Ditto	Fine New 26	28	Old Fine none
Cork
Waterford, Youghal, & Cork Black	21 23
Sligo	22 24
Galway	21 23
Barley, Mazon	New 32	34	..
Beans, Mazagan	38	42	Old 40 44
Harrow	40	44	..
Small
Peas, White	Boilers	54 56
Grey	34, 48	Maple	38 40
Flour, Town-made	per sack of 280 lbs.	..	45 57
Norfolk and Suffolk	43 46

FOREIGN.		FREE. IN BOND.
Wheat, Dantzic, high mixed	Per Imperial Quarter.	..
Rostock	58 to 66	46	52
Stettin	56	60	44
Hamburg	54	60	43
Hamburg	52	57	42
Odesa	46	50	40
Odesa Polish	48	56	40
Russian	48	57	..
Ditto	soft
Spanish	hard	46	55
Ditto
Australian	White	60	69
Barley, Grinding	27	30
Distilling	30	32
Oats, Archangel	25	26
Danish	26	22
Swedish	24	25
Stralsund	22	23
Dutch Feed	25	28
Brew	23	25
Polands	29	26
Beans, Egyptian	40	41
Peas, White	41	39
Ditto Boilers
Flour, Canada, fresh, per barrel of 199 lbs.	..	34	35

United States	32	35
Dantzic
Australian, per sack of 280 lbs.
Account of CORN, &c., arrived in the Port of London, from Dec. 15 to Dec. 20, 1845, both days inclusive.
	Wheat.	Barley.	Oats.	Beans.	Peas
English.....	7221	9203	3352	1091	1539
Scotch.....	17	2721	656	20	..
Irish.....			19819		..
Foreign.....	26725	2870	5565	1306	1201
Flour, 6687 sacks; 6594 barrels.

FRIDAY, DEC. 26.—There are very few fresh arrivals of any consequence since Monday, except a large supply of Irish oats. This, with what are still left unsold from the late considerable supplies, makes a plentiful show of samples of this article. The wheat trade is 1s. dearer than Monday, for all descriptions. The new barley comes in bad condition, and prices tend rather downwards. In beans and peas, we have no alteration to notice. Notwithstanding the quantity of Oats on sale, mentioned above, the trade is firm, and Monday's prices are fully maintained. The amount of business transacted here to-day, as usual at this season of the year, is extremely limited. The duties rose 1s. on Oats and 6d. on Beans yesterday.

S. H. LUCAS.

Account of CORN, &c., arrived in the Port of London, from the 19th of December to the 26th of December, both inclusive.
Wheat	English	Irish	Foreign
Barley	540	..	5280
Oats	1830	900	740
..	1410	24870	3550
Flour, 2830 sacks.

LONDON AVERAGES for the Week ending Dec. 23, 1845.
Wheat	Qrs.	Price.	Qrs.
Barley	6378	61s. 4d.	Rye
Oats	4340	33s. 6d.	Beans
..	13805	25s. 4d.	Peas

IMPERIAL AVERAGES, Weeks ending
Wheat	Barley	Oats	Beans
..
15th Nov.	58	6.35	0.26
22d "	57	11.34	1.25
29th "	58	2.33	2.25
6th Dec.	59	0.32	10.24
13th "	59	4.32	9.24
20th "	57	11.32	7.23
Aggregate Average of the Six Weeks. Wheat, 58s. 6d.; Barley, 33s. 5d.; Oats, 24s. 10d.; Rye, 36s. 1d.; Beans, 41s. 11d.; Peas, 44s. 4d.

Duty. Wheat, 14s. 0d.; Barley, 5s. 0d.; Oats, 4s. 0d.; Rye, 6s. 6d.; Beans, 1s. 6d.; Peas, 1s. 0d.

Stock of Corn in Bond, Nov. 5, 1845.
Wheat	Barley	Oats	Beans
..
In London, 279040	10900	56942	..
Unit. King. 667773	59477	107219	..

MEAT MARKET.

The trade was remarkably dull, as might be expected at this time, the day after Christmas Day.
PER STONE OF 8 LBS. BY THE CARCASE.
Prime Beef .. 3s 6d to 3s 8d
Middling do. 3s 2d to 3s 4d
Plain, or inferior Beef .. 2s 4d to 2s 8d
Prime Mutton 4s 0d to 4s 2d
Mutton 3s 6d to 3s 8d
Veal, from .. 4s 0d to 4s 8d
Small Pork .. 4s 6d to 5s 0d
Large, or inferior Pork .. 3s 4d to 3s 8d

THE LONDON GAZETTE.

FRIDAY, DEC. 19.

BANKRUPTS.

J. JESSUP, Notting Hill, and W. JOHNSON, Holloway, builders. [Mr. T. D. Keighley, Basinghall-street.
G. GRAHAM, T. ADAMS, and M. B. MACFARLANE, Cheap-side, calico-printers. [Mr. Brace, Surrey Street, Strand.
G. CRAFT, Hitchin, Hertfordshire, baker. [Mr. Chappell, Quality Court.
J. LEADBEATER, Manchester, merchant. [Mr. Abbott, Charlotte Street, Bedford Square.
H. CHARLES, Manchester, commission-agent. [Mr. Fearnhead, Clifford's Inn.
J. KELSEY, Manchester, joiner. [Mr. Fearnhead, Clifford's Inn.
J. COLLINS, Salford, Lancashire, common-brewer. [Messrs. Gregory, Faulkner, Gregory, and Skirrow, Bedford Row.
T. FINDLEY, Manchester, plasterer. [Mr. Fearnhead, Clifford's Inn.
J. HOWE, West Bromwich, Staffordshire, linen-draper. [Mr. Lloyd, Milk Street, Cheapside.
J. LEWIS, Tipton, Staffordshire, grocer. [Messrs. Motteram and Knowles, Birmingham.

TUESDAY, DEC. 23.

BANKRUPTS.

T. WINSTON, Copthall Buildings, merchant. [Messrs. Crowder and Maynard, Coleman Street.
E. and T. ROLPH, Shepherd's Court, Grosvenor Square, builders. [Mr. Huson, Ironmonger Lane.
F. HERPERT, Sherrard Street, Golden Square, warehouseman. [Mr. Raw, Furnival's Inn.
J. H. RAND, Westminster Bridge Road, glass-dealer. [Mr. Buchanan, Basinghall Street.
J. MILLER, Southampton, cordwainer. [Messrs. Overton and Hughes, Old Jewry.
T. BROWN, Connaught Terrace, Edgeware Road, bootmaker. [Mr. Buchanan, Basinghall Street.
S. C. FRY, Margate, stationer. [Mr. Fisher, Verulam Buildings, Gray's Inn.
E. SMITH, Southwell, Nottinghamshire, innkeeper. [Messrs. Shilton and Son, Nottingham.
C. HYDE, Loughborough, apothecary. [Mr. Inglesant, Loughborough.
W. BROWN, Atherstone, Warwickshire, ironmonger. [Messrs. Chilton and Co., Chancery Lane.
J. SIER, Cheltenham, baker. [Messrs. Oliver and Co., Moor-gate-street.
G. SMITH, Manchester, bill-broker. [Mr. Fox, Finsbury Circus.
J. CHATTERTON, Pendleton, Lancashire, licensed victualler [Messrs. Johnson, Son, and Weatherall, Temple.
W. WINGFIELD, Rotherham, Yorkshire, common brewer. [Mr. Hudson, Bucklersbury.
J. COLLINSON, Bradford, Yorkshire, worsted-spinner. [Mr. Scargill, Threadneedle Street.

FREE TRADE INVESTMENT ASSOCIATION.

DIRECTORS.
A. W. Paulton, Esq., 67, Fleet-street.
George Thompson, Esq., 6, Waterloo-place.
Wm. Leaver, Esq., 5, Park-street, Islington.
Josh. Ivimey, Esq., 26, Chancery-lane.
Wm. Wilson, Esq., 122, Long-lane, Bermondsey.
G. T. Kemp, Esq., 35, Spital-square.
John Gadsby, Esq., Boniverie-street, Fleet-street.
A. L. Saul, Esq., 67, Fleet-street.
John Lowe, Esq., 66, Fleet-street.
Frederick Farraud, Esq., Bermondsey.
In consequence of earnest and repeated applications made to some of the gentlemen whose names appear in the above directory, an Investment Association is about to be formed. Its object will be principally to afford to persons of limited means, facilities for purchasing freeholds, &c. In addition, it will serve all the purposes of a general Investment Society, and will be established on the most approved plan. A prospectus, with full particulars, will be published shortly.

THE LEAGUE.

No. 119.—VOL. III.]

SATURDAY, JANUARY 3, 1846.

[3d.]

NOTICE TO THE PUBLIC.

LEAGUE FUND.

All Subscribers of £1 and upwards to the LEAGUE FUND will be entitled to, and receive, a copy weekly of this publication for twelve months from the date of the receipt of their subscription.

Subscribers of half-a-crown, and under £1, will have forwarded to them a copy of THE LEAGUE, containing an acknowledgment of their subscription; and it is requested that all subscribers will be kind enough to send their names and addresses to the offices of THE LEAGUE, Newall's-buildings, Manchester, or 67, Fleet-street, London.

N.B. As there is considerable risk in the transmission of gold and silver by post, parties wishing to forward small contributions to THE LEAGUE FUND are particularly requested to make their remittances by post-office orders.

The Council of the League would also suggest to their friends in the country the importance of transmitting their copies of THE LEAGUE newspaper, after perusal, to such parties (more especially farmers) as may be either hostile or indifferent to the question of Free Trade.

By order of the Council,

JOSEPH HICKIN, Secretary.

THE QUALIFICATION MOVEMENT.—HOW TO WORK IT.

After all that we have written, week by week, for the last two months, we have little or nothing further to say to our readers, by way of urging the paramount importance and necessity of WINNING COUNTIES. We are satisfied that this is both understood and felt. Those labours of Mr. Cobden and Mr. Bright, on which we have supplied a weekly commentary, have borne their fruit, so far as regards their intended effect on the public mind. People are by this time really and heartily interested in the matter. There is no lack either of intelligence or of zeal. What we are anxious for now, is to see this intelligence and zeal organise and shape themselves into ACTION. We want to see the subject everywhere dealt with as a matter of business.

It is a matter of business, and must be done in a business-like way—with the promptitude, alacrity, and exact attention to details, which constitute the business habits and character of Englishmen. Our qualification movement is not self-acting. Like all other public movements, it depends on individuals—on individual activity, energy, and devotedness. Public business does not work itself, any more than private business. "Everybody's business" is proverbially ill done, unless everybody does his share of it. The labours of public bodies require, for their efficiency and success, exactly the same sort of careful and active management as the affairs of private persons. As a public, general question, this of qualifying for counties is very sufficiently understood; but it remains for local and individual exertions to educe practical results. We now offer a few suggestions as to the mode of proceeding, which we would most earnestly press on the immediate attention of the Free Traders of every county in England.

The first thing to be done, in every instance, is to form, in each town or district, a QUALIFICATION COMMITTEE of real working Leaguers—men able and willing to find, or make, time for giving the matter that sort of practical, business-like attention which they give to the concerns of their farms, factories, or shops. This committee should sit daily, from now till the thirtieth of this month of January, at a stated time and place, to which the utmost possible publicity ought to be given, by advertisements in the local Free Trade newspapers, and by placards and handbills. They should have a regular qualification office, and a secretary ready waiting at his post, at all hours, to receive and give information.

The duty of this Qualification Committee will be, first of all, to make an active and thorough canvass of their town or district, for the purpose of inviting and urging people individually to arm themselves with the franchise by the purchase of freeholds. It will likewise be their business to collect and bring to a focus as much information as possible with respect to all freehold property in the neighbourhood that may be for sale, or on which the proprietors may be disposed to grant rent charges. They will thus bring sellers into immediate contact with buyers, and save the latter an expense of time and trouble which very few persons are at once able and willing to incur in a public cause. This is a point of the utmost importance. For one man, who will, or can, put himself to the pains of originating and managing the affair for himself, there are at least a dozen who will most gladly assent to its being managed for them, and who will accept the franchise with delight, if they have nothing to do but say "yes" to a canvassing Committee, and hand over the money when the conveyance is executed.

The co-operation of Free Trade lawyers should everywhere be sought. Solicitors have the best opportunities of knowing when and where freehold property is for sale; and, if interested in the object, will render the most valuable aid in facilitating, expediting, and cheapening the transfer of it to purchasers. In a case in which dispatch and economy are so essential, no lawyer should be employed who is not earnestly and heartily devoted to the cause.

We have recommended publicity. We would say, the whole thing should be made in every way as public as possible. Some persons, we are aware, are a little uneasy on this point. They are apprehensive, lest publicity should stimulate rivalry, and induce the monopolists to imitate our example, and get up a qualification movement of their own. An idler apprehension there could not be. Rivalry is a thing entirely out of the question. Monopolists cannot "qualify, qualify, qualify." They are all qualified long ago. By the aid of the Chandos clause of the Reform Act, and fictitious splitting of farm tenancies, they have already done their worst in the counties, and won them. They are powerless in this work, for lack of materials to work with—unless, indeed, they think fit to give freeholds to their labourers. Nothing is to be feared from publicity. The more publicity, the better. We should like that every town in the kingdom should have an office in the most conspicuous part of its best street, with an inscription in large letters over the door—"OFFICE OF THE COUNTY FREE TRADE QUALIFICATION COMMITTEE."

We entreat our friends to remember that the time is short. Four weeks more—and the books are closed for this year. Yet it is long enough for doing a work that will make the rashest of monopolists tremble, and decide the doubts of the most equivocal and hesitating of Free Trade politicians. Our opponents themselves point the way, and invite us to walk in it. The extreme soreness they betray, at all their protectionist gatherings, against the "unconstitutional" proceeding of a systematic and organised attempt to acquire the oldest of constitutional franchises, shows us where they are hurt. They "cannot contemplate with indifference," as they told us the other day in Hertfordshire, such an "attack upon our most valued institutions," as is implied in this endeavour to turn the fiction of popular representation in counties into a great fact. They are perfectly right. This good old 40s. freehold franchise really is, as they say, a "tremendous engine." WORK IT WELL. Protectionists themselves are giving us the broadest hints to go on, and

QUALIFY, QUALIFY, QUALIFY.

THE PROTECTIONIST "DEMONSTRATIONS."

The "agricultural mind" is all on the fret just now. There is a wonderful stir and ferment among the protection societies. Morning after morning, the Herald and Post deluge our breakfast tables with oceans of passionate landlord eloquence—poured forth to "numerous and respectable" agricultural auditories, in the "large rooms" of respectable country-town inns. What with Peel, and Poland, and the League, and the forty-shilling freeholders, landlordism is perfectly beside itself with wrath and terror. The only thing which it seems to take coolly is the "famine panic," which is universally voted "false and fraudulent"—a thing "got up" for selfish and party purposes.

If interminable columns of printed talk could make an "agitation," we should certainly feel constrained to confess, that, however open the landlord logic and rhetoric may be to criticism, here is an agitation of a rather formidable character. We should be disposed even to share the apprehensions of those timid folks who contemplate "collision and violence" as a possible result of so fervid and furious an antagonism. We may, however, venture to assure our friends and the public in general, that nothing of the sort is to be feared. The peace of the country is perfectly safe. Never was there a more harmless agitation. The hubbub is in no way menacing to law and order. There will be no collision, for the elements of a collision do not exist. The people cannot fight, for want of a visible enemy. This protectionist agitation exists only on paper. It is a thing we read of—those of us who have a great deal of spare time—but we neither see nor hear it. The Herald's and Post's own leaders could not be more devoid of mischief than are the columns and pages of angry oratorical drivelling with which they daily amuse the idle portion of the public. The whole thing goes on quite quietly within doors.

This is really a significant feature of the present protectionist commotion. The affair is purely factitious. The monopolists are literally without one particle of popular support. Everywhere they keep themselves to themselves, and let the public alone. They hire rooms, and talk, and let reporters take down their talk and get it printed—and that is all. They have nothing to say to the people, nor the people to them. With one solitary exception—and that of a kind which will probably be regarded as proving and justifying the rule of privacy—they have not dared to submit their case to a public meeting in any town in the kingdom.

The exception is worthy of attention. In one memorable instance, landlordism has tried the experiment of a real public meeting. It was in the little town of Bury St. Edmund's, in the heart of the purely agricultural district of West Suffolk. On Friday, the 26th inst., in pursuance of a requisition signed almost exclusively by protectionists, the Mayor of this agricultural town convened a meeting of the inhabitants, in the Guildhall, to take into consideration, "the present question of a Free Trade in corn, more especially as it affects this agricultural district." The question was considered; and after a very full discussion, the result of such consideration was, that a FREE TRADE AMENDMENT, affirming "that the experience of the last thirty years has proved that protection drives capital from the land, narrows the home market by crippling the foreign trade, and is INJURIOUS TO ALL CLASSES," was carried by "a majority of at least TWENTY TO ONE." We shall add, that the League had nothing to do with this meeting. It was simply and exclusively an expression of local feeling and opinion.

We have no other triumph of this kind to record;

nor do we expect another. The experiment will scarcely be repeated elsewhere. Landlordism will let well, or ill, alone, and prefer the safe, though inglorious, unanimity of special general meetings of district protection societies to the hazards of popular debate and discussion. As it cannot have the people, it will do as well as it can without the people.

This complete destitution of popular support is almost a novelty in the history of political movements in this country. The boroughmongers, in the days of "the Bill," kept pretty clear of calling public meetings, so far as we recollect; but with that exception, there have usually been two sides to great national questions. The cause of Catholic emancipation, for example, had to contend, to the very last, with a strong popular opposition; and political "Protestantism" could hold its public meetings, and, in many cases, pass its resolutions with triumphant success. Everybody remembers the great Penenden Heath meeting, at which Mr. Sheil was refused even a hearing when he sought to plead the claims of his brother religionists and fellow-countrymen. Monopoly ventures on nothing of that sort. Monopoly has no fancy for open-air meetings in general, or Penenden Heath meetings in particular. It is not forgotten, that on this same Penenden Heath, Mr. Cobden carried, but a year ago, in the midst of thousands of Kentish men, a resolution for the total and immediate repeal of the Corn Laws.

We take this careful avoidance of public meetings—and the country will so take it—to be perfectly conclusive of the utter feebleness, helplessness, and hollowness of the protectionist cause. All the recent landlord "demonstrations" demonstrate nothing but that landlordism is friendless and forlorn. The more they try to agitate, the more they show the world what a pitiful make-believe of an agitation it is. They talk largely about "the public" and "the country," and, wherever they go, freely credit themselves with the support of "the inhabitants;" but they never venture to ask the said inhabitants to speak for themselves. At the late meeting, for instance, of the Essex Protection Society, at Colchester, Mr. Wotton, the mayor, took it upon him to say, that "a very great proportion of the inhabitants of Colchester were decidedly of opinion that agriculture should continue to receive its present amount of protection." Then why not ask the inhabitants? Why keep out of the way of the inhabitants? Why not have a public meeting of the inhabitants in the Town Hall, and verify this easy and agreeable faith? The vote of one town's meeting, in favour of protection, would be worth more to the cause than cart-loads of ranting oratory, and thousands of hole-and-corner gatherings like that at which the mayor of Colchester thus libelled the intelligence of his townsmen. If Mr. Wotton declines this experiment on the opinions of the inhabitants of Colchester, suppose the League send down a lecturer on a commission of inquiry?

At the East Lothian Agricultural Protection Society's Meeting, a Mr. Aitchison was very bold on the subject of "the voice of the country:"—

"Let us buckle on our armour, and meet the enemy with undaunted firmness, but above all with active energy. (Loud cheers.) The battle has still to be fought—the victory is yet to be won. The voice of the country is in our favour. (Hear, hear.)"

Big words these, for a snug, private party of squires, and squires' dupes and dependents! But suppose Mr. Aitchison were first to ask the country for its "voice," instead of taking it for granted. It would be a very simple business. Mr. Aitchison was speaking in Haddington, the county town of the purely agricultural district of East Lothian. Now, if Mr. Aitchison would only get up a requisition for a public meeting of the inhabitants of Haddington, to be held in some place large enough to accommodate all comers, with a week's previous notice of the day and hour, he would learn the "voice" of one important part of the country with extreme facility and precision. We will subscribe a thousand pounds to the funds of the East Lothian Protection Society, if the voice of Haddington, given under such conditions, go "in favour" of the bread-taxers.

Mr. Scot Skirving, too, at the same meeting (the "Lion-of-England" gentleman), was very strong on this point. "I am convinced," he exclaimed, "in spite of all the noise they have made, that we outnumber the Free Trade party." We only say, Try it, Mr. Skirving. Try it in Haddington. Outnumber us there! Come out of your holes and corners, where your bluster is simply ridiculous. Tell the people of Haddington this to their faces—and then count heads, and let the rules of arithmetic decide.

We are not more certain that we hold a pen, than we are that Mr. Scot Skirving—though his "Lion-of-England" burst does seem to indicate a little hot-headedness—is too prudent a man at bottom to try any experiment of the sort. A secret instinct warns him that it won't do. The whole of this vain and silly agitation is, after all, but skin-deep. The thing is a pretty bubble enough—but not made for handling.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AT HOME.

We had not intended—space and time being valuable—to notice any of the recent protectionist demonstrations very minutely; but, since writing the foregoing, we have had the pleasure of perusing the report of the proceedings of the Sussex Agricultural Protection Society at Chichester, on Wednesday last, which are too deliciously absurd to be passed over in silence, or lumped together with the mass of more ordinary stupidities that we have above disposed of in the gross. The affair was in all respects unique, and deserves to stand by itself. It was not a public meeting, for it was "convened by circular;" nor was it exactly a private meeting, for there were some 2000 persons present—not all of one way of thinking. It cannot be called a landlords' meeting, for a considerable portion of the auditory were "agricultural labourers;"—a circumstance which rather puzzled us, till we came to the Duke of Richmond's satisfactory explanation, that they were prize labourers—"his own friends, whom he had often had the pleasure of meeting at dinner, and to many of whom he had had the pleasure of presenting prizes for their honest and meritorious conduct." There was great variety in the day's business. There was prose by the duke, and original poetry by Lord William Lennox. It began with "thunder and lightning," by the Rev. L. V. Harcourt, and ended in a blaze. The whole was agreeably interspersed with a running commentary of interlocutory and interjectional criticism by the audience, which carry the reader pleasantly on, and completely relieve the affair from all imputation of dullness.

We cannot undertake to reduce these very anomalous and chaotic elements to anything like order; but a few of the more salient beauties of the Richmond and Sussex eloquence, taken as they come, may not be unwelcome to our readers. We may begin with the following description of landlordism, and rationale of protection, from the lips of the Rev. L. V. Harcourt, who presided on the occasion:—

"It was well known that landed proprietors were not, generally speaking, accumulators of wealth; that, for the most part, they live nearly, if not quite, up to their incomes. They could scarcely maintain their station in society on their present incomes. How were they to maintain them when one-fifth part was taken away? He would appeal to professional men, and those who were familiar with the management of landed estates, whether they were not burdened with numerous incumbrances, with mortgages, annuities, life assurances, jointures, and he knew not what, which made it extremely difficult for the owners to maintain their station in society? What then, were they to do? Some people would say, 'Let them retrench their superfluities, abandon their luxuries, adopt a more frugal and economical mode of life.' Suppose they were all such conscientious, self-denying men as to agree at once to make this great sacrifice, what would be the consequence to all the tradesmen whom they had been accustomed to employ—for instance, the silversmith, the watchmaker, the haberdasher, the draper, the coachmaker, the painter, the music-seller, to all who had been accustomed to administer to the luxuries which they enjoyed, or to the arts which they protected? The whole would suffer from the privations of the landowner."

Was there ever anything so cruel as the kindness of this landlord's friend? So the "maintain our station in society" theory of protection is the real thing, after all. The landlords of England are, "generally speaking," a sort of spendthrifts, who produce nothing, and consume all they can lay their hands upon. They are at once desperately lazy, and outrageously ambitious. They aspire to a "station in society" which their income does not justify—and the nation must pay the expense of gratifying their preposterous pretensions. They mortgage their acres to make a show beyond their means,—and then come on us for the interest. They would like to economise, but common humanity forbids it—for what would become of "all the tradesmen?" They do it all for patriotism, and "protection of the arts." They are philanthropically self-indulgent—luxurious and extravagant in principle—and positively make a conscience of spending more than they have got.

This plain, old-fashioned view of "protection," as specially designed for the relief and solace of mortgaged and encumbered landlords, was incidentally confirmed by a Captain Pilkington, who was clearly of opinion that protection is, at all events, not a farmer's question. The farmers have had protection these 30 years past, and not a man of them ever made a penny by it yet. The captain would just like to see a farmer who has made money, as he would like to see a unicorn or a griffin:—"Could they show him a farmer who had made his fortune? No; he was an animal unknown. Were there such a one, Dr. Buckland would soon be down and geologise him, see what stratum he was made of, and send him up to the British Museum in a glass case." The captain is quite sure such relics are not to be found in the protection "formation."

When the great duke rose to speak, he was greeted by salutations, more vivacious and hearty than complimentary, having immediate reference to his well-known commercial eminence in the fish line. An irresistible inclination for "salmon" seemed suddenly to seize and pervade the audience. His grace did not enter at large into this topic; but proceeded, in a brief though suggestive speech, to the more immediate business of the day. The most characteristic portion of his address was the following anecdotal illustration of the "fact" that cheap food is the poor man's bane:

"An Irish labourer who had only recently been transported to London from the Sister Isle, went into a shop in St. Giles's to purchase some eggs. He had only one coin in his possession—sixpence, and for that sum the shopkeeper gave him four eggs. The Irishman complained bitterly of their extravagant price, as he called it, and said that in his own county of Mayo he could purchase two dozen for the same money. The shopkeeper rejoined, 'Then why did you not stay in Mayo?' 'Arrah! by St. Patrick,' said the Irishman; 'I could not get the sixpence to buy the eggs with there.'"

The Hibernicism greatly tickled some sharp-witted wags of the assemblage, who instantly started the puzzling query, "Where did he get the sixpence then?" We could wish that his grace had gone seriously into this question, which has a significance quite irrespective of the mere verbal "bull" which suggested it. Of course the ducal meaning was, that the Irishman came by his sixpence after his arrival in London, though the ducal language fails of conveying that important particular of the story. Well, but why could not the Irishman have earned a sixpence in his own country? What makes the difference between Mayo and Middlesex, that sixpences are easier to be got here than there? Is there less "protection" in Mayo than in Middlesex? And again, why do agriculturists get a better price for their eggs in Middlesex, than in Mayo—the "protection" being identical in both? Perhaps, if the duke had followed up this line of inquiry, he might have lighted on the truth, that labouring men's sixpences are most plentiful, and prices of agricultural produce most "remunerative," in the vicinity of busy and prosperous trade, and of an industrious and thriving town population.

The grand speech of the day was, however, not the duke's, but that of his noble kinsman, Lord William Lennox. His lordship was particularly lively, and gives us at least a dozen absurdities for every one of his grace's. He charged the League with a design "to produce anarchy and confusion"—and immediately went to signalize his own respect for the Queen's peace, by declaring how much "he would like" to see a thousand Sussex labourers "annihilate double their number from the manufacturing districts." He then branched off to potatoes, and administered to the said labourers the somewhat equivocal consolation, that by and by, in the spring, perhaps, "provisions will be cheap"—the head of the House having just before shown that cheap food is about the worst thing that can befall the labourers. From economics, his lordship passed on to politics—described the Premier as a "political ogre"—wondered on which side of the House the ogre would sit in the next session—and recommended that he should “take his seat on the floor, upon an empty English corn sack, supported by two others well filled with American and Polish wheat,”—which irresistibly suggests the idea, that “protection” means having one sack of corn where we might have two. From politics, the transition was easy to poetry; and the noble lord favoured the company, with an elegant extract from a distinguished poet of the last generation, and with some original verses of his own composing:

“In conclusion, I will read to you some lines written by a late president of an agricultural society, Sir John Sinclair, with which I was somewhat amused the other day. They run as follows:

‘Let this be held the farmer’s creed,
For stock seek out the choicest breed,
In peace and plenty let them feed;
Your land sow with the choicest seed;
Let it not dung or dressing need;
Inclose and drain it with all speed;
And you will soon be rich indeed.’

“Now, I have taken the liberty of adding a few lines which I will also read to you. They run thus:

‘Turn out Sir Robert with all speed,
(His Cabinet from Free Trade weed)
Don’t trust to him—a broken reed—
Who’s faithless, both in word and deed,
Protection seek, and thus agreed,
The farmer may be rich indeed.’”

We regret to add that the uncourtly auditory subjected his poetical lordship’s versification to a very short and sharp extemporaneous criticism. One voice ejaculated:

“The worst of verses I ever zeed;”

and another:

“The worst of readers I ever heard read.”

The whole drollery was characteristically wound up with a rather startling practical joke, the particulars of which are thus detailed by the Times reporter:

“Two of the lowest ruffians in Chichester, one of them known at Petworth, had been employed by one of the Duke’s political dirty-work men, the aforesaid Pasco, to bring in and parade before the hustings, just as the proceedings were about to end, a copy of the Times newspaper, at which the Duke’s toadies on the platform looked with ill-disguised astonishment, and cried “Take it away! Down with it!” The display of the broadsheet would have been little understood by the majority of the multitude had it not been for some strips of paper pasted thereon, upon which strips was printed its title, the Times, in large capitals. Upon the name being generally recognised, so many complimentary cheers were given that the chawbatches who surrounded the framework to which it was fastened, looked inquiringly at their fagmen and paymasters on the hustings for the signal which should direct the next part of the performance. This was soon telegraphed, and the paper was instantaneously set on fire and consumed, the noble Duke and his friends feasting their eyes in silence on the flames which spared the framework or gallows, as it was termed, to which the paper had been affixed; a ghastly symbol of the fate which may attend those who follow up this public and authoritative lesson in incendiarism. The landowners and occupiers, one would think, had already experienced enough of the consequence of their labourers learning the use of pocket lucifer-matches without the further instruction and encouragement afforded to them by this glaring act of folly. I have good authority for stating that the majority of the citizens of Chichester regard this as a most contemptible proceeding, and the meeting itself as an insult, as the Duke of Richmond and his friends well know that they do not agree with their opinions on the Corn Laws, but particularly because a large number of agricultural labourers were hired to attend the meeting, and to cheer and hawl at command. Some of them were allowed the full holiday and their day’s pay, and others an extra shilling.”

The discretion and taste of this need no comment. We must, however, do the principal personage of the day the justice of stating, that, “according to one report of the proceedings, although “the joke of course caused much amusement on the platform, the Duke of Richmond appeared somewhat alarmed at the temerity of those engaged in it.” Whether the alarm was taken at the possible moral results of the “public and authoritative lesson in incendiarism,” or whether his grace thought it hardly judicious, in these times, to provoke a gratuitous quarrel with a powerful organ of the press, we are not informed. Either cause of alarm would be perfectly legitimate. Landlordism has no reason to look pleasantly on lucifer matches in labouring men’s hands, and cannot afford just now to insult a journal having the circulation and influence of the Times. That in which the real “temerity” of the proceeding mainly consists, we do not suppose the Duke of Richmond is capable of appreciating. We do not imagine that it once occurred to the ducal mind, that the whole business of the day, from first to last—the prose and the poetry—the “facts” and the logic—the blundering jokes, and the ludicrous solemnity—the drivelling stupidity and the canting philosophy, together with the concluding outrage on common propriety;—are all infinitely better calculated to bring landlordism into contempt, than a whole season of Covent Garden meetings, and only serve to hasten the day when these gentry must either learn to “maintain their station in society,” by behaving themselves like rational and educated men, or else expect to be served with short notice to quit.

THE QUARTER OF A MILLION FUND.

Since the meeting, held at Manchester on Tuesday the 23d ult., the following subscriptions have been handed in:—

Wm. Brown, Liverpool	£1000
J. and N. Phillips and Co., Manchester	1000
Rd. Pennington, Hindley Lodge, near Wigan	£300
John Pennington, ditto	1000
Alfred Pennington, ditto	200
W. Walker, Southport	500
G. Andrew and Son, Compstall Bridge, near Stockport	500
John Leech, Stalybridge	500
Alfred Orrell, Stockport	500
Winkworth and Proctors, Manchester	400
T. and R. Barnes, ditto	300
Sale and Worthington, ditto	250
John Gallimore, ditto	250
R. Benson, 6, Sussex-square, London	200
P. and E. Seville, Lees	200
T. M. Gibson, M.P., London	200
Du Fay and Co., Manchester	150
H. I. Merck and Co., ditto	150
S. and A. Butterworth, ditto	105
R. Potter, St. John’s Wood, London	100
E. D. Davenport, Capesthorpe, Chester	100
Dimmack and Thompson, Manchester	100
F. and G. Wilkinson, Stockport	100
T. Dodgson and Nephews, Manchester	100
Henry Waterhouse, ditto	100
R. Benson, Fairfield	100
J. and S. Alcock, Manchester	100
W. Ackroyd, Altrincham	100
G. Crawshaw, Gateshead	100
J. Rawson, Manchester	100
A. Morse, Swaffham	100
M. Bins, Manchester	100
J. Shawcross, ditto	100
A. Friend per J. Gadsby, ditto	100
D. Ainsworth, ditto	100
J. Walker, Stand, near Manchester	100
W. T. and E. Platt, Hadfield Lodge, near Glossop	50
J. Fawcass, Newcastle-on-Tyne	50
G. M. Ainsworth, Manchester	50
J. Thompson, ditto	50
The Earl of Radnor, Coleshill, Berks	50
R. Bowring, M.P., London	50
J. H. Southam, Ashton-under-Lyne	50
S. Kershaw and Co., Glossop	50
R. Charlton and Sons, Manchester	50
A. Warkin, ditto	50
C. F. Willert, ditto	50
P. F. Henderson, ditto	50
S. C. Kell, Huddersfield	50
J. Kay, Esq., Mayor of Salford	50
J. Richmond, Manchester	25
T. Bateman, ditto	25
W. A. Cunningham, ditto	25
Hugh C. Armstrong, Newcastle-on-Tyne	25
P. Thomson, Manchester	25
E. Shawcross, ditto	25
E. Watkin, Manchester	25
B. E. S. per W. McCartney, ditto	25
T. Molinoux, ditto	25
R. Johnson and Brothers, ditto	25
A. Meatha, ditto	25
H. P. Roe, ditto	25
A. Cairns, ditto	25
R. P. Livingstone, ditto	25
A. Weatherall, ditto	25
A. Friend per Wm. Harvey, ditto	25
John Shield, jun., Newcastle-on-Tyne	21
Thos. Bottomley, ditto	20
John Lacy, ditto	20
Thomas Ainsworth, Eccles, near Manchester	20
Charles Hilton, ditto	20
Josh. Pollock, Barrister, Manchester	20
John Howard	20
Richd. Ranson, Wigan	20
Josh. Yates, Ardwick, Manchester	20
Henry Milnes, 5, Piccadilly, ditto	20
A. Norton and Co., Newton, nr Manchester	20
Benj. Whitworth, ditto	15
W. and C. Chambers, Todmorden	15
Wm. Battye, Audenshaw, near Manchester	10 10
James Thompson, Wray, near Lancaster	10 10
John Bardsley, 28, Mill st., Manchester	10
Gavin Peacock, Hollin’s Vale, Bury	10
Edward West, Warrington	10
James Charlton, Albert-street, Manchester	10
James Nuttall, Todmorden	10
James Stansfield, ditto	10
Edmund Whittaker, ditto	10
David Lacy, ditto	10
Uttley, Brothers, ditto	10
Robt. Waddington, Wigan	10
A. Friend to the Cause, J. B.	10
Rev. J. J. Taylor, Manchester	10
J. Grimston, Neswick, near Driffield	10
J. Watson, Manchester	10
R. Bligh, Ilfracombe	10
Bunyan and Gardner, Market-pl., Manchestr.	5
Edw. Wrigley, 2, Cross-st., ditto	5
James Whiteley, Medlock-st., Hulme, ditto	5
Wm. Tomlinson, Hodge, Mottram	5
J. Oliver, Todmorden	5
A. Friend, ditto	5
John Marshall, ditto	5
Josh. Firth, ditto	5
Richd. Chambers, ditto	5
Wm. Brook, ditto	5
Mr. Sugden, Rochdale	5
Thomas Wall, Wigan	5
Wm. Worthington, ditto	5
Wm. Ramsear, ditto	5
James Fairclough, ditto	5
W. F. Brand, ditto	5
R. C. Brand, ditto	5
James Wood, Southport	5
R. Johnson, Halsall, near Ormskirk	5
Wm. Ashcroft, ditto	5
J. Holmes, 5, Piccadilly, Manchester	5
J. G. Saunders, ditto	5
John Wilson, George Inn, ditto	5
James Aspell, Waggon and Horses, ditto	5
John Armstrong, 5, Piccadilly, ditto	5
— Lamb, Plymouth Grove, Manchester	5
W. I. Bonall, ditto	5
Jas. Dick, Soap Works, Louth	5
E. S. Holmes, Manchester	5
C. Wainwright, ditto	5
F. Booth, ditto	5
— Vickers, ditto	5
Mr. Youill, ditto	5
Sums under 5l. each	42 11

FREE TRADE MEETINGS.

LAMBETH.

On Tuesday evening a meeting of the electors of Lambeth took place at the Horns Tavern, Kennington, for the purpose of taking measures to petition Parliament for the total repeal of the Corn Laws. The large room of the Horns was completely filled. Among the gentlemen on the platform we observed Mr. Hawes, M.P., Mr. T. D’Eyncourt, M.P., Mr. Moffat, M.P., Mr. Wilson, Mr. Watkinson, Mr. Poulter, Mr. J. A. Lyon, Mr. R. S. Dixon, Mr. Cash, Mr. Bone, Mr. Byron, Mr. Renton, Mr. B. Baker, &c. &c.

Mr. RICHARD POPE took the chair and opened the business of the meeting. He appeared before them as what the world called a Conservative, but he could not help taking a part in the Anti-Corn-Law struggle, considering the question to be whether this country was or was not to be starved? (Hear, hear.) He avowed that he had only recently become a Free Trader. (Hear, hear.) He had been much struck by the arguments which he had heard adduced at a recent Anti-Corn-Law meeting in the borough of Lambeth, and a speech of that great man, Mr. Cobden (cheers), which he had had an opportunity of listening to lately at Wakefield, had decided him never, on any future election, to support any but a Free Trader. (Cheers.) The hon. gentleman then proceeded to advert to the failure of the potato crop, and to inquire whether the League did not seem to be in earnest in its proceedings, when they considered the commencement which had been made the other day of the subscription for the gigantic fund which the League had determined to raise. (Cheers.)

Mr. CASH moved the first resolution, to the effect that the deficiency in the harvest, as well as the diseased state of the potato crop, rendered some such measure as the repeal of the Corn Laws absolutely necessary. (Cheers.) He referred to the misery generally existing amid the agricultural population themselves, and on that ground urged the necessity of opening the ports. If the ministry did not repeal the bread-tax of their own good will, they would be forced to do it by the power of the constituencies of the kingdom. (Hear, hear.) Let the people be but true to themselves. If they wished for cheap bread, they could have it. (Cheers.)

Mr. DIXON seconded the resolution, observing that when they reflected upon their isolated situation, and the confined space which they could appropriate to agricultural pursuits, it was evident that they could only exist as a political body by being a great manufacturing and commercial nation. Let them look at our increasing population, and let them say whether it was probable that, supposing the population to go on increasing as it had done, they could be found food by the supplies afforded by this country. From the constitution of Sir Robert Peel’s Government, they had reason to expect that some half-and-half Corn Law measure would be propounded by it. (Hear.) But they would be satisfied with no such attempted settlement of the question. It must be finally and for ever settled by a total repeal of those unjust enactments which taxed a people for the sake of the aristocracy. (Hear.) In Belgium and other Continental nations, everything possible had been done to avert the consequences of the scarcity which threatened Europe. This country alone was apathetic; and he thought that it was high time that they should arise from their mesmeric slumbers, and be up and doing in the great cause of Free Trade. The hon. gentleman concluded by seconding the resolution.

Mr. HAWES, M.P., then came forward amidst loud cheering, and said he felt great pleasure in having the opportunity of meeting the electors of the borough of Lambeth on that occasion. He rejoiced at that opportunity, not from a desire to ascertain their opinion upon the question of the Corn Laws, for he was well aware that they were favourable to the principles of Free Trade, nor from any desire to express his own opinions to them upon that important subject, for the great majority of the electors of Lambeth being Free Traders themselves, well knew that since he had obtained a vote in the House of Commons that vote had always been given in favour of the principles of Free Trade (cheers); but he rejoiced at seeing that meeting assembled on that occasion, as it would enable himself and his honourable colleague to go to Parliament and say that they had been sent there by a constituency who were unanimous as to the expediency of removing the monopoly of the Corn Laws. (Cheers.) For his part, he had seen nothing to change the opinion which he had long before formed, namely, that they had an injurious and mischievous tendency. If there was any individual at the meeting of the inhabitants of the borough who was an advocate of the Corn Laws, he sincerely desired that the individual who held those opinions would come forward and allege some reasons for maintaining his views, for there was nothing so tiresome or tedious as slaying twice and thrice the giant monopoly of the Corn Laws. (Hear.) He had no desire in speaking of that question to appeal to the passions of those around him, or to set one class against another. (Cheers.) No; he would confine himself to reason and argument, in proof of the opinions which he entertained, and which he would show were founded upon just and correct principles. (Cheers.) There were three courses open to her Majesty’s ministers with respect to the Corn Laws. They might either propose to maintain the existing law—but he conceived that to uphold it longer would be impossible; or they might in some shape or form diminish a portion of the protection to agriculture, and in some mysterious manner endeavour to persuade the public that every thing was done which could be done in order to properly arrange the question. If it were proposed, in order to effect that object, that there should be some sort of fixed duty, he for one would take that opportunity of raising his voice against a fixed duty. (Hear, hear.) Now, when it was considered that corn was a prime necessary of life, and when they had been told, upon the authority of ministers of the crown, that at periods when there was an abundance of food there was less crime in the country, and greater prosperity than at other periods, he maintained that it formed a strong argument in favour of putting an end to any legislation which could have the effect of rendering food scarce and dear. He said he was opposed to fixed duty, and he recollected that Sir Robert Peel had expressed himself as opposed to a fixed duty—not that it would form any very potent argument in favour of his always maintaining that opinion. (Laughter and cheers.) He (Mr. Hawes) would maintain that the abolition of the Corn Laws would be of the greatest service to the country, for whatever injured trade would equally affect the landed interest in time, and he believed that a cheap and abundant supply of corn would make the population more happy and contented, and by giving a better field for their industry enable them to be better customers of that which the farmers produce, and thus he would be a partaker of the general prosperity. (Hear, hear.) The landowners, indeed, said that one claim which they had for a peculiar protection to their interest was based upon the fact they had peculiar burdens to sustain, and, in answer to that argument, he (Mr. Hawes) called upon them to prove their case. He invited them to prove before a committee of the House of Commons that they were subjected to peculiar burdens; but until they had proved that fact, he would continue to deny that they had any peculiar burdens to sustain, and consequently to deny the argument in favour of the Corn Laws which was based upon that supposition. Let them prove their case before a committee—let them satisfy the public that they bore an unjust share of the public burdens, and then they might fairly ask for an equivalent, or for the removal of that portion of the taxation of the country which pressed upon them exclusively, and he was sure the public would in such a case cheerfully share in the common burden. (Cheers.) He conceived that the existing law might be looked upon as having been given up, for those who introduced it were now about to relinquish it, although the public had been to the last hour told that it had worked well. (Laughter.) It was now condemned by its own authors, and no argument was required on his part to show that it had not been useful or beneficial to the country. They had now viewed the two courses of maintaining a fixed duty or the present scale, and they next came to the consideration of a duty-free trade in corn. They would, in looking at that question, naturally ask, was a duty-free trade in corn calculated to produce the effect which some of the friends of the Corn Law asserted it would, namely, would it throw the land in this country out of cultivation, and bring ruin upon the agriculturists? It was most important to have that portion of the subject fully understood, and that question perfectly answered, and he (Mr. Hawes) was ready to assign the sound reasons which convinced him that no such effect could follow the abolition of the Corn Laws. What benefit had the agricultural interest received from the Corn Laws? There were about 120 statutes on the statute book, the object of every one of which was to give protection in some shape to agriculture, and every one of those statutes had failed in its avowed object—(hear, hear), and every one which was intended to regulate the supply of corn had been altered or repealed from time to time. In 1773 a law was passed which approached more nearly to Free Trade than any of the others, and it happened singularly enough that the statute of 1773 remained longest upon the statute book. (Cheers.) That law allowed corn to come into our markets at a nominal duty when the price in this country was over 48s., and he could show from excellent authority that 20 years after it passed the condition of the farmers was better than it had since been with a higher protection. (Hear, hear.) A merchant of London, in a publication upon the subject of the currency, published, in 1708 or 1709, charged the country bankers with doing injury by lending money to the farmers to enable them to hold over their stocks of corn; and in reply to that charge, a distinguished man, Sir Francis Baring, made a statement which threw great light upon the condition of the farmers at that period. He said that the general mass of the bankers in the country, instead of lending money to the farmers, looked to them for deposits and support, and that it was rare for the farmers to want to borrow money, whilst the instances were not rare where they even accommodated the landlords with loans. (Cries of hear, hear.) Could that be said in 20 years after the enactment of any of the other laws for the protection of agriculture? (Cries of No, no.) During the French war—partly from the effect of monopoly, partly from the expenses of importation, and partly from bad seasons—prices rose higher, and additional land was put into cultivation; and in 1815, when the peace took place, a law was introduced in order to uphold those high prices and high rents which had been produced during the progress of the war. (Hear, hear, hear.) He was in a condition to prove that the law of 1815 was passed in order to uphold rents and the war prices. (Hear, hear.) The price at which the duty was to be nominal was then fixed at 80s., as it was alleged to meet the increased expenses of agriculture and to give remuneration to the grower. The monopoly was then established by the law of the land; but in 1816 corn was down to 52s. in this country, when it should have been at 80s., if that were to be the remunerating price for the agriculturists. Then there were bad seasons, and prices rose; and then there were committees to inquire into the cause of agricultural distress and manufacturing distress. (Hear, hear.) When the corn was cheap the farmers complained of being distressed for want of remunerating prices, and when corn was high then manufacturers and artisans were distressed. The law of 1815 was found to be too stringent in its character, and in 1822 a new law was proposed and carried; but it was never in operation, for it was enacted that it should not come into operation until corn reached 80s., and as corn never reached 80s. whilst that law was in existence, it never came into operation. (Hear, hear.) From 1822 to 1828, there was a continual shifting and patching of the Corn Law, and at last the bill of 1828 was introduced. In 1815 the growers of corn were to be secured at 80s., but that law failed, and in 1828 the friends of agriculture only asked 64s. In 1830, the King's speech prominently put forth agricultural distress as one of its topics; and in 1833 a committee was appointed to inquire into the cause of that agricultural distress. In 1836 there was another committee to inquire into agricultural distress; so it was apparent that those laws for the protection of agriculture had failed in their object, and were but a delusion, holding out promises to the farmer which they did not realise. (Hear, hear.) The author of the report of the committee of 1836 himself an enlightened agriculturist, called the Corn Law a delusive protection, and stated that the farmers had been for some years sinking under it, and paying their rents out of their capital. The writer to whom he alluded was the right honourable gentleman who now fills the chair of the House of Commons, and who, as he before remarked, was an enlightened agriculturist himself. They next came to the law of 1842, but he would not say anything of that law, as the minister who proposed it was about to give it up, and as it was now, in fact, but the ghost of a Corn Law. (Hear, hear, and laughter.) He believed that he had said enough to show the meeting that these laws for the protection of agriculture had been a delusion, and he, therefore, thought he was right in saying that the best course to pursue would be to do away with protection altogether. (Cheers.) He was, therefore, in favour of the repeal of the Corn Laws, and for a perfect Free Trade in that article. (Cheers.) He was sure that every approach of Free Trade had been opposed by some persons as the signal of the approaching ruin of the agricultural interest, and most of these persons had the colloquy with which Mr. Huskisson was introduced. He had proposed an introduction of the principles of Free Trade. At that time all the interests which were connected with iron, silk, and shipping would be ruined; but what was the fact? Now in 1845, twenty years after Mr. Huskisson brought forward those propositions, those interests which he touched were in a more flourishing state than before. The iron trade and the shipping trade had greatly increased, and experience had shown that the predictions, as regarded those interests, by those who were opposed to the principles of Free Trade, had utterly failed. What had the world and what had they not lost, by not long ago following out those principles? (Cheers.) All the great authorities of the world had been Free Traders. Mr. Pitt was a Free Trader—Lord Grenville declared in his famous protest, that monopoly was the parent of dearth, scarcity, and want. (Cheers.) Then they had Adam Smith, Ricardo, McCulloch, ranged upon their side—a mighty array, in short, of statesmen—of theoretical and practical authorities, all declaring their solemn conviction that the doctrines of Free Trade were those of justice and truth. (Hear.) What had they lost by monopoly? He need not remind them that their North American colonies were sacrificed to its demands, and now they found every nation in Europe copying their bad example—while this country was suffering from the evil precedents which it itself had set. (Hear.) Then look to France, it was a country full of all they most required. But let them remember what an insignificant trade existed between us and our neighbours on the other side of the Channel. (Hear.) Why was it so? why, when our Government pressed for a liberal treaty of commerce they were continually met by taunting allusions to our own monopolist enactments. (Hear.) Again, let them look to the state of America. By opening our markets to the produce of the United States, they would be tending more than by any other means to restore and promote peaceful relations between England and her old colonies (hear); relations, the surest and broadest basis of which must ever be Free Trade. (Cheers.) Free Trade in fact was a kind of hostage for the peace of the world, and it would be well if the people of the different countries of Europe would take a large and enlightened view of their interests—a view which could bring them to no conclusion other than that Free Trade was the best and greatest security for the peace, the civilisation, and the progress of the world. (Cheers.) These were his principles, and he confessed that he should feel fortified in them, and in giving expression to them in the House of Commons, by the general concurrence which they had met with from that large and respectable meeting of his constituents, the inhabitants of the borough of Lambeth. The hon. gentleman resumed his seat amid much loud applause.

Mr. BYRON proposed the next resolution, to the effect that the meeting pledged itself only to support that Government which would propose the total and immediate repeal of the Corn Laws.

Mr. CHRISTIE seconded the resolution, congratulating the meeting upon the conversion to Free Trade principles of their chairman. (Cheers.)

T. D'EYNCOURT, Esq., M.P., then shortly addressed the meeting. He stood in a distinct position from his honourable colleague who had just addressed them. He was a landowner. He enjoyed the signal distinction of being entrusted with their confidence—a confidence which he would ever attempt to merit by being ready, when the time came, to take that course which the public interest indicated. (Hear, hear.) He assured them that he was heart and soul with them and with his honourable colleague (hear, hear), agreeing as he did with him in all the sentiments which he had expressed, and which he perceived they were so eager favourably to entertain. (Cheers.) He had at a former period voted for a fixed duty, to replace the Corn Laws. Let it not be supposed from that moment that he was an advocate of a fixed duty. But he thought that a moderate fixed duty would have had—just as well as Corn Law repeal—the effect of opening the markets of the world; the great desideratum they had to complain of—the great object they had to struggle for. (Hear, hear.) At all events, a fixed duty would have been infinitely better than the present sliding scale. He had often been challenged upon this subject. He had frequently been asked whether he was for a total repeal of the Corn Laws? His reply had always been as it now was. The production of corn was a manufacture—he was a manufacturer of corn. Let them repeal protective duties upon all articles of manufacture, and he would be happy in that case to repeal that upon corn also with the rest. (Hear, hear.) The great apostles of Free Trade seemed now to be agreed upon that point. Let them, then, be agreed as to the repeal of all protecting duties—let them be just to all. He should be satisfied with such an arrangement; and if the landed interest generally were not, they ought to be. (Cheers.) He did not mean to say that this great change could be effected without some mischief to those engaged in agriculture. It was impossible to pursue a fallacious system for a long course of years without some injury accruing from an alteration in it. But this was no reason why such a system should be persevered in; on the contrary, if the interest of the nation required that they should repeal laws which had the effect of benefiting a particular class of the community, they had a right to insist upon such repeal, however influential and however important that class might be. (Hear.) He trusted that such mischief as he had hinted at would only be temporary. He trusted that such a measure as the repeal of the Corn Laws would, in the impulse which it was calculated to give to manufactures, react upon the agricultural interest of the country; but even if these hopes were vain, still he would be bound as their representative, and as an honest man, to take that course which he believed to be beneficial to the country. There might be some poor land thrown out of cultivation by Corn Law repeal. Well, so be it; he was ready to endure it. He would glory in enduring it; trusting that the people of England, who would derive the benefit, would be ready, in case of any revision of the taxes being afterwards considered necessary, cheerfully to take their share in bearing any burden which it might be found equitable and reasonable that all should equally contribute to. (Hear, hear.) He entreated them to remember that a revision of taxation was necessary. Take the Property-tax for example. (Cheers.) That tax was beneficial to the landed interest, and prejudicial to the interest of commerce and industry. (Cheers.) Let them take this view of the case—let them co-operate with him as just, fair, and honest men, in endeavouring to adjust as equitably as possible the balance of the public burdens. Reference had been made as to the course which Sir Robert Peel would probably adopt. He thought it a vain imagination to suppose that the Premier would go for unconditional Free Trade. He thought he would rather take the course which his honourable colleague had hinted at, and would propose some half and half measure. (Cries of "No, no. No half and half measure.") His own disposition distinctly was to oppose any such measure; and then if there should be concluded, as he trusted there would be, a union between the liberals and many gentlemen sitting on the opposite side of the house, which might have the effect, at no distant day, of again ejecting the Tory ministry from office; then there would be an appeal to the people, and he trusted that they would be well prepared for it. (Cheers.)

Mr. WILSON had listened attentively to the speech of their representative, Mr. D'Eyncourt, and he wished to have a more explicit statement from that hon. gentleman as to the course which he intended to take with respect to the Corn Law question in the House of Commons. He was desirous to be informed if the hon. member was prepared to vote for a total and unconditional repeal of the Corn Laws, at the meeting of Parliament. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. D'EYNCOURT said that since he first entered public life, nearly half a century ago, it had been his universal practice never to give a pledge upon any subject. (Cries of hear, hear, mingled with marks of disapprobation.) He had always candidly and fully expressed his opinions, and he had acted consistently and honestly in Parliament, and with regard to pledges, he was confident that his honourable colleague would give the same answer which he had given. He had, on three occasions, brought forward a motion for the reduction of the duration of Parliaments, and yet, if he were asked to pledge himself on any particular vote with respect to that question, he would refuse to give such pledge. His duty, as their representative, was not to give pledges at the call of any individual who chose to jump up and ask him to do so. (Disappointment, mingled with cries of hear.) He repeated, he had given his opinions clearly to them on the subject of the Corn Laws, and he did not see how any individual could misunderstand his views.

Mr. WILSON said he would have put the question to Mr. Hawes, but that his speech was clear and distinct as regarded the subject. He thought it the duty of the meeting plainly to put the question to either of their members, whether he would or would not vote for an abolition of the Corn Laws. (Hear, hear, and cheers.) If the honourable member, having been so many years in the House of Commons, had not made up his mind as yet on the subject of the Corn Laws, it was time for the electors to look for some one who could make up his mind on the subject. A deputation from the constituency of Lambeth, men who co-operated with the League, had waited on the honourable member (Mr. D'Eyncourt) on the subject, and never could get a direct answer from him with respect to it. He was of opinion, that from the position which he held, the honourable member ought to be prepared not only to vote for an abolition of the Corn Law, but to exert himself strenuously to effect that object. (Cheers.) Having put the question to the honourable member, he thought it but fair to adopt a similar course towards his colleague, and he would now ask Mr. Hawes if he was prepared to vote for an entire and unconditional repeal of the Corn Laws in the ensuing Parliament.

Mr. HAWES said he had spoken clearly and at length on the subject, and in the most distinct and unequivocal terms. If they asked him after that declaration of his opinion to go into Parliament, bound hand and foot, under all circumstances, and at all times bound to vote for any particular question, he would sooner fling his seat to the winds than consent to be so bound. Neither his colleague or himself were to be brow-beaten. He had always been the advocate of Free Trade in Parliament, but he would not go to Parliament bound hand and foot. When a man went to the House of Commons in a deliberative character, he ought to listen to argument; but if he went there and said that nothing which he could hear would change his opinion, he must necessarily lose dignity and self-respect.

The CHAIRMAN said that he had pledged himself to vote for no one but a man who would vote for an abolition of the Corn Laws. (Cheers.)

Mr. D'EYNCOURT said that he had repeatedly stated that he considered the repeal of the Corn Laws necessary and beneficial; he had voted repeatedly for Mr. Villiers's motion, but he looked upon a pledge as an unconstitutional proceeding.

The resolution was then unanimously agreed to.

Mr. WILDE proposed a resolution, to the effect that a petition should be adopted, embodying the resolutions, and entrusted to Mr. D'Eyncourt and Mr. Hawes for presentation.

The resolution having been seconded, was unanimously agreed to.

The REV. HENRY RICHARD, in rising to move a vote of thanks to the Council of the League, said—It was not without considerable reluctance that I consented to bear part in the proceedings of this evening; not because I had any doubt as to the justice of the cause we are assembled to promote, nor because I acquiesce at any time in the truth of the maxim which some are very fond of inculcating, that the ministers of religion have no right to interfere in civil or political matters at all. I repudiate the application of that principle to myself. I did not feel, when I assumed the functions of a religious teacher, that I bound myself to be less interested in whatever concerned the social and political well-being of my fellow-men—that I absolved myself from the obligations, or divested myself of the rights and privileges which belong to me as the free citizen of a free state. (Cheers.) But knowing the value of the principle of division of labour, and feeling that there were others who from character and position, from habits and pursuits, were far more competent to discuss such matters than I was, I have hitherto abstained from bearing part publicly in this most righteous agitation. But now, sir, that a crisis has arrived in the social history of our country, now that we can behold the prospect, and that at no very distant day, of scarcity staring us in the face; now that we can already begin to hear the wailing voice of suffering and distress ascending up to heaven from the habitations of the poor; now that by the light of past experience we can discern the inevitable consequences which must ensue from such a state of things, unless a timely remedy is applied, in demoralising the national character, multiplying the temptations to our increasing the amount of crime, and effectually obstructing all efforts that may be made for the moral and religious improvement of a great portion of the community,—seeing all this, I feel that I am bound, not merely as a man, having an interest in whatever affects my fellow-man; not merely as an Englishman, having some stake, however small, in the prosperity of my country—but in my special and distinctive character as a minister of religion, to lift up my voice, in unison with the myriad voices of my countrymen, now indignantly resounding through the land, to demand, that this nefarious system, which can be productive of such consequences as these, should be brought to a speedy and perpetual end. (Loud cheers.) That I am not exaggerating in predicting the approach of such calamities, I have, unhappily, the means of proving. By a singular coincidence, I received this very morning the paper which I hold in my hand. It is a circular from the secretary of one of the religious societies in this metropolis. The object of that society is to send the means of religious instruction to the most neglected parts of our own country, especially the agricultural districts. But the humble and self-denying men who are engaged in this work, feel, of course, great sympathy for the temporal wants and woes of their poor flocks. And this circular contains extracts from the heart-rending accounts which these missionaries have sent of the sufferings and privations which the poor around them are already beginning to endure. (Hear, hear, and cries of "read.") I will read a few extracts from this paper. One of them says—(without further preliminaries, allow me to give you a few cases):

"G. T. is a poor thatcher, an industrious man, and a member of our congregation at O—. He has a family of six children, and very little employment in the winter season. This year he planted an acre and a-half of potatoes, and for the rent of which he has to pay the farmer 13*l.* 10*s.* A fair average crop would have produced about seventy-four sacks, which would have enabled him to sell a sufficient quantity to pay his rent, and the remaining part would have supplied his family through the winter, instead of which he has not more than thirty sacks at all fit for use, and these are fast decaying. How the poor fellow will pay his rent, and support his family, I really do not know." "W. T. is a field labourer. He says he has been obliged to throw large quantities into the river; besides which, he has had 50 sacks not worth more than 6*d.* per sack, (at which price he has sold quantities of them), that would, if fit for use, have been worth 6*s.*" Another says, "What will become of the poor this winter, the Lord only knows. The universal failure of the potato crop is the greatest temporal calamity ever remembered in this country. As in Ireland, so it is here; the poor subsist chiefly on potatoes. In many instances the crop is not worth digging. In the autumn the labourers have been accustomed to have from thirty to forty bags; this season, not more than six or eight; and the quality is such, they are hardly fit for human food. There has not been even a single peck for sale at this market for the last six weeks; and what will render the distress more appalling, bread-corn has advanced full 25 per cent." Another says, "Three sheets would not suffice to tell your committee of the facts illustrative of the present, but much more of the coming distress. I have one poor member of my congregation whose expected crop was sixty bags. He toiled late and early in the field for their proper growth; and when he fully, and at a low calculation, expected 60 bags (of 160*lbs.* weight each) he has now not five bags. I saw all this myself." After mentioning several others, equally distressing, he adds, "These cases are not worse than scores of others I might mention."

Now, sir, if such be the state of things now, what will they be four months hence? (Cheers.) We are told by the poet, that "coming events cast their shadows before." And what grim and hideous figures are these, which are already casting their shadows over the habitations and hearts of the industrious poor of England! Are they not famine, disease, crime, and death? (Loud cheers.) And is it to be borne that a system should be maintained for the aggrandisement of a small class (for I say that the class for whose sake these laws are kept up is small, compared with the great bulk of the community), which keeps out of the country the bread that would feed these poor people that are already on the verge of starvation? (Cries of no, no, and cheers.) And these cases, sir, are from the agricultural districts. Sometimes the landowners have professed themselves greatly scandalised, because they have been charged with selfishness in maintaining these restrictive laws. They assure us that it is nothing of the kind; but pure, simple, disinterested benevolence. It is all for the sake of the agricultural labourer. They uphold these laws, not to increase their own already enormous rents, not to pay the interest of their mortgaged estates, not to enable them to make a provision for their younger sons, or pay large dowries with their daughters. Oh! not at all. But all this cumbrous and complicated machinery, so costly to the country, and so troublesome to the Legislature, is kept up in order to enable them to pay six shillings a week to the agricultural labourer. (Loud laughter and cheers.) Sir, I arraign this law before the bar of public opinion in the name of common sense and common justice. I arraign it for its impious folly, committing as it does a suicide on our national prosperity. I arraign it for its gross injustice, wronging and afflicting myriads of the population for the benefit of a class. I arraign it for its deep immorality, corrupting the character of the people and fostering the growth of crime. I arraign it for its monstrous impiety; for it not only invades the rights of man, but seeks to nullify and repeal the eternal laws of God. (Loud cheers.) But, sir, I must not forget that the resolution I have to move refers to the League. (Cheers.) Some time ago, Lord John Russell said in the House of Commons, that the Government of this country must for the future be a Government of public opinion. I hailed such a distinct recognition and announcement of this great principle on the part of one of our leading statesmen! (Cheers.) The Government of court favour, the Government of political corruption, and the Government of party clique, have been tried long enough in this country; and it is well that we have come to a point, where our statesmen can see that the people must be consulted as to their own Government. It is an omen full of the happiest augury. (Cheers.) And the League is the fullest embodiment and illustration of this sentiment which we have yet seen. What has brought the question of the Corn Laws to the present crisis? The League has done it all. (Loud cheers.) All honour, then, to the men of the League (cheers) for the consummate skill, the practical wisdom, the unswerving firmness, the undaunted perseverance, and, I may add, the triumphant success to which they have conducted this great agitation. (Cheers.) I rejoice in the success which attended their efforts, scarcely more for the prospect it affords of the speedy abatement and abolition of the great nuisance against which they have waged war, than I do for the practical proof which it furnishes of the power which the people of England possess when it is wisely, firmly, manfully, perseveringly employed to make their own will the law of the land. (Cheers.) After what the League has achieved, let no man who has confidence in the truth of his principles despair of success. The legislature may for a while condemn public opinion, as we have had some memorable examples of late (hear, hear, hear); but it will return again and again, and knock at the door of the House of Commons so loudly and significantly, that they must at length yield whether with a good grace or no. (Laughter and tremendous cheers.) Sir, I consider that the men who occupy the proudest position in this country at this moment, are Richard Cobden and John Bright. (Immense cheering.) And it is our unspeakable satisfaction to know, that they are the men of the people, who have sprung from the people, and who by their keen logic, and their admirable common sense, have scattered to the four winds of heaven the whole tribe of miserable sophisms, with which hereditary aristocrats were wont to defend their selfish monopolies. (Loud cheers.) It is meet then, that from you as from any liberal constituency they and their associates should receive the thanks to which they are so well entitled. (Cheers.) And now Sir, there must be no compromise. (Great cheering.) There are some men who have the audacity to talk about compensation to the landlords. The impudence of this claim can be only equalled by its injustice. Why, sir, what did Mr. Deacon Hume prove before the committee of 1840?—that the people of this country are paying to the landlords, in consequence of the increased price in bread and butcher's meat and other agricultural produce, occasioned by these protection laws, no less a sum than thirty-six millions of pounds sterling annually. And after being for years pocketing this enormous plunder, now that they are found out, and the people of England refuse to submit to it any longer, they have the impudence to come round and ask for compensation. (Loud cheering.) I wish before I close, to say a few words on the misunderstanding which has arisen this evening between us and our representatives. I confess that the difficulty which these honourable gentlemen have made (holding the opinion they profess to do) to give the required promise to vote for the immediate and unconditional repeal of the Corn Laws, is a little puzzle to me. It reminds me of a little incident that once happened in a society to which I belonged, which were accustomed to meet for the discussion of literary subjects. Being all of us young men, we sometimes used to play off some foolish tricks upon each other. On one occasion, when something of this sort had been done, the cry was raised of "confess"—that is, each one was required to say whether he had done it or no; so that by this means we hoped to find out the delinquent. But a young Irishman started up and said, "I object to that on principle, just as our members have been saying to-night, 'We object on principle to pledge ourselves.'" (Loud laughter and cheering.) We began to suspect from his vehemence that he really was the delinquent. (Continued laughter and cheering.) But my worthy friend being an Irishman, and not seeing exactly the relation of one thought to another, after eloquently protesting upon principle against confessing, added, very innocently, "Not that I did it." (Loud laughter.) Just so, as it appears to me, have our honourable members been acting to-night. Mr. Hawes, in his opening speech, which was really able and masterly, declared his conviction that the Corn Law was utterly indefensible, and his full intention to vote for its final and unconditional repeal. But when Mr. Wilson, as I thought, rather superfluously, asked him, "Will you promise to do so?" The honourable gentleman said, "No, I won't." (Loud laughter and cheers.) I object on principle to promise to do what I have told you I mean to do. (Continued laughter.) And what was his objection? Why, he thought he might hear arguments in the House of Commons, which might change his opinion; that is to say, on a question, which has been discussed with so much frequency and ability for the last ten years, both in the House and out of it,—a question on which, as Mr. Hawes has acknowledged, there is a perfect unanimity of judgment among all the great writers on political economy, from Adam Smith downwards; a question which has received the deliberate sanction of such practical men of business as Mr. Macgregor, and Mr. Deacon Hume, and Mr. Porter; a question to which, willingly or reluctantly, the suffrage of every man entitled to the name of statesman in both parties, have been added; and a question in which the honourable gentleman has told us, his own mind has been made up for years; with all this enormous mass of argument and authority in its favour, Mr. Hawes is afraid to promise to vote for it, lest he should be hereafter convinced, by the severe logic of Sir Edward Knatchbull, or the brilliant eloquence of Col. Sibthorpe. (Long-continued laughter and cheering.) Now really if Mr. Hawes's reservation means nothing more than this; if it is made only to protect himself from this all but impossible contingency (and I am bound to believe him as an honest man, and do believe him), why then, gentlemen, I think we may say safely and confidently, let him go. (Loud laughter and enthusiastic and long-continued cheers.)

The vote of thanks was then passed to the Council of the League amidst uproarious cheering which lasted for several minutes, after which the meeting separated. It is worthy of remark, as an evidence of the earnest feeling of this meeting, that on passing out of the Horns Tavern, upwards of 1000 persons signed a petition for total repeal, that lay for signature at the doors.

BERMONDSEY.

On Wednesday a public meeting of rate-payers and inhabitants generally was held in the church of St. Mary Magdalene, Bermondsey, to petition her Majesty to issue an order in council for opening the ports for the free admission of all kinds of grain, and also to summon the Parliament forthwith to meet and pass an act for repealing the Corn Laws. Mr. Churchwarden Christie was called to the chair.

Mr. DREW, vestry clerk, having read the notice convening the meeting,

Mr. WILSON rose and said, that if he had been aware of the changes that were contemplated when he gave notice of the motions that would be submitted to them, and which changes had taken place, the wording of his notice would have been very different. (Hear, hear.) They all agreed that the principles involved in that notice were essentially necessary to the welfare of the country. The motion which he had prepared for their adoption stated that the present as well as all previous Corn Laws, failed in attaining the object intended—that they were injurious to the community, and bad in principle, and that they ought to be repealed. (Hear, hear.) They had twenty different kinds of Corn Laws. In 1815, and at the conclusion of a long war, when all the nations of the earth were powerful competitors in commerce and trade, the great change in the Corn Laws took place, to enable, as it was stated, the tenants to pay their high rents. But Providence so ordered it, that at that time the country was blessed with a good and plentiful crop. Few then, and he regretted that even not many now, studied political economy, and hence those who advocated the Corn Laws, imagined that by so doing they were advancing the happiness and prosperity of their country. Many good and many wise men were mistaken, and thus the bill was carried against the sense of the country, and the price of wheat was left to take the range of 80*s.* In 1822 a new bill was passed, limiting it to 64*s.*; but that bill was never put in operation. In 1841, Sir Robert Peel declared a fixed duty to be so monstrous a proposition, that he would not entertain it, and adopted the sliding scale, because he imagined that it would protect the landed proprietors, and benefit the agricultural labourers, but which completely failed in its object. (Hear, hear.) Sir Robert Peel declared that if it did not work well, that he would rather go for their total repeal than for anything else. (Hear, hear.) He (Mr. Wilson) wanted the Conservatives to unite and go with them to Sir Robert Peel, demanding a total repeal of the Corn Laws. The late Mr. Pitt, a man of consummate wisdom, and of the first order of talent, declared that the Corn Laws would be injurious to trade. The then Duke of Buckingham and Chandos, a clever and a high Conservative, signed the protest against them. Sir Robert Peel, father of the Premier, also a high Conservative, spoke like a prophet, and foretold that the Corn Laws would be the ruin of the country. (Hear, hear.) They were told that the present Government would repeal the Corn Laws, or do something like it. (A voice, "Modify.") It was therefore the duty of every county, city, town, parish, and hamlet to strengthen the hands of Government, by petitioning the Queen and Parliament for a repeal. (Hear, hear.) Sir R. Peel was with them; Lord John Russell had made his declaration; and it was therefore for the people to try whether they had the power of converting those large majorities, who last session registered their votes in favour of monopoly. (Hear, hear.) No doubt they had that power if they wished to exercise it. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. CHADWICK moved a resolution, to the effect that the present and all Corn Laws failed in effecting the object intended, and that all such laws were bad in principle, injurious in their operations upon the whole community, and that therefore they ought to be immediately repealed. (Cheers.)

Mr. GEORGE DORRIS, a magistrate of the county, seconded the resolution. He could bear evidence that the Corn Laws were the greatest curse that could be inflicted upon the country. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. ELKINGTON supported the resolution, and said that he greatly regretted that measures had not been long since adopted to equalize the taxation of the country; so that every man should contribute towards it in proportion to his means. He fully concurred with that part of the President's message which said, "The terms 'protection to domestic industry' are of popular import, but they should apply under a just system to all the various branches of industry in our country. The farmer and planter who toil yearly on their fields are engaged in 'domestic industry,' and so are much entitled to have their labour 'protected' as the manufacturer, the man of commerce, the navigator, or the mechanic who are engaged also in 'domestic industry' in their different pursuits. The joint labourers of all these classes constitute the aggregate of 'domestic industry' in the nation, and they are equally entitled to the nation's 'protection.' No one of them can justly claim to be the exclusive recipients of 'protection,' which can only be afforded by increasing burdens on the 'domestic industry' of the others." (Cheers.) How different was it in this country? In the reign of some sovereign the landed proprietors had the land tax fixed at 4*s.*, according to the price that the land then averaged, with a protection against its being raised in proportion as the land increased, and hence it never exceeded 2,000,000*l.* It was subsequently proposed that probate and legacy duties should be imposed upon real and personal property, but the influence of the landed interest had the duty confined to the personal property. (Hear, hear.) He could not see why industry should be so taxed, whilst the Marquis of Westminster, possessing half a million yearly, and others equally wealthy, escaped free of the impost. (Hear, hear.) The Anti-Corn-Law League proved that union was strength, and he trusted that after the League had succeeded in their object, that another League would rise up for the equalisation of all taxes. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. VOUSLEY said that he felt so strongly upon the subject, that he deemed himself in justice bound to express his opinions regarding the Corn Laws, which he deemed to be most unjust and oppressive. It was quite absurd to suppose that the people should be left to starve whilst they were surrounded with countries ready to provide them with the necessities of life. The back settlers of America wanted more clothes for their children, which they would take from us if this country in return took their corn, and they would then grow more corn than their land at present produced, but they exclaimed there was no use in their so doing, as they could find no market for it. (Cries of hear, hear.) There was no proportion in this country between the increase of population and that of cultivation. But even if the land did not increase in proportion to the population, they could, by affording an opportunity for increased trade, secure a supply of food sufficient for that population. (Cries of hear.) Large tracts of land, scarcely inhabited, would soon grow corn, if facility for its sale was afforded. It was therefore stupid—nay, it was unchristian and uncharitable—to impose the Corn Laws, which were only supported for the benefit of the aristocracy. (Hear, hear.) It was said that the Corn Laws were for the benefit of the agricultural labourers. Could that be the fact, when their wages only averaged 8*s.* a week? (Hear.) While the Corn Laws existed, could those labourers or the manufacturers support themselves? If not, why in the name of common sense were they upheld, unless it was to maintain the aristocracy, who hedge in their interests by laws that rendered 500*l.* a necessary qualification for a county, and 300*l.* for a borough member? (Hear, hear.) The Corn Laws were so monstrous, and so opposed to common sense, and their common interests, that it only required a temperate, but firm, determined agitation, to get rid of them. They should attend to measures, and not men. If they did so, they could not fail of success. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. JOHN KIDNER said that the Corn Law supporters argued that the repeal of those laws would diminish the consumption of animal food, whereas facts proved the contrary. The importation of cattle in 1845, as compared with 1843, exceeded the latter by 20,300 cattle, and he found by his own stock-book, that instead of that increase lessening the price of mutton and beef, that of the latter brought 10*d.* a stone more than in 1843. (Hear, hear.) In his opinion, and according to incontestable facts, the repeal of the Corn Laws would cause a regular and steady supply, and an increased consumption. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. JONES said that he was favourable to a repeal of the Corn Laws, but thought that they could not be immediately abolished as the interests of the landlord and tenant should be first consulted before it was achieved.

Mr. VOUSLEY reminded the last speaker that when any great national reform was contemplated, private interests were never considered if they interfered with the public weal.

The resolution was then put and carried nem. con.

Messrs. Kimmsley, Hart, Phillips, and other gentlemen, having addressed the meeting in condemnation of the Corn Laws,

Mr. Wilson moved an adoption of a memorial praying her Majesty to issue an Order in Council for opening the ports, and also that her Majesty be pleased to summon the Parliament instant to meet, that an act may be immediately passed repealing the Corn Laws. (Cheers.)

The motion was carried amidst applause; and thanks having been moved to the chairman, the meeting broke up.

Meetings also addressed by Mr. Moore, were held in London, at the Temperance Hall, Portman Market, on Thursday, and on Friday at the Assembly Rooms, Kentish Town; at both places the audiences were crowded and enthusiastic, and resolved to support the freehold movement in Middlesex and East Surrey.

LEWES.

On Tuesday evening, a public meeting was held in the Theatre of the Mechanics' Institute, Lewes. The theatre will accommodate from three to four hundred persons, and was completely filled. The chair was taken by Mr. H. Brown, a constantly zealous worker in the Free Trade cause. The meeting acquired additional interest from the fact that the first meeting of the Sussex Protectionists had been held at Lewes in the course of the day. The protection meeting was not attended by more than about seventy persons, and excited so little interest that the whole string of resolutions had to be moved by Mr. John Elman, and seconded by Mr. John King. Mr. King was present at the Free Trade meeting in the evening, and was a most attentive listener,—so attentive, indeed, that we cannot but believe he will shortly become a thorough Free Trader. Opponents, or those who had any doubts, were urged to put questions, or to speak in opposition to Free Trade. It was market-day, and several farmers were present, but there was neither questioner nor objector. The meeting throughout was attentive and enthusiastic; and a resolution of thanks to the League for the attention given to the registration generally, of congratulation for the counties won upon the register, and of promise to work the 40s. freehold movement in that district of East Sussex, was carried unanimously. Mr. Moore dwelt upon the old corrupt system of elections at Lewes, and urged them at the next election to redeem themselves from such disgrace, and to make a new name for honesty and independence by returning two Free Traders. This proposal was received with acclamation, and we do hope that the spirit shown at the meeting will be kept alive, and acted upon when the time comes. The meeting broke up with three hearty cheers for the chairman, the League, the borough, and the county.

BRIGHTON.

On Wednesday evening a public meeting was held in the Town Hall, Brighton. The night was unusually wet and stormy; however, the hall was well filled, not fewer than 1000 persons being present. The meeting was presided over by Mr. John Hilton, whose efforts have been incessant to put an end to the one and one system at Brighton, and to have the borough honestly represented by two Liberal Free Traders. There has not before been held so numerous and enthusiastic a meeting in Brighton. The following resolution, moved by Mr. Bass, and seconded by Mr. Wallis, was carried, not merely without one dissentient hand, but with long continued cheers: "That this meeting feels grateful to the council of the League for the attention they have given to the registry throughout the country, cordially congratulate them on the success they have achieved, and pledges itself to use its exertions to qualify freeholders for East Sussex county." It was also resolved,—“That a requisition, signed by the inhabitants of the borough, be presented to the High Constable, to call a meeting to consider the propriety of petitioning Parliament for the entire repeal of the Corn and Provision Laws.” The meeting separated with three cheers for the chairman, and for the counties won, and to be won.

HEREFORD.

We have just received, before going to press, a long report of a public meeting at Hereford on Wednesday last, which we regret we shall not be able to notice at any length this week. The proceedings appear to have been of a most interesting description. Two farmers endeavoured to support the cause of monopoly, and, judging from the report, with much more ability than the titled “farmer's friends” usually display on similar occasions. Mr. Falvey was present on the occasion, in compliance with a requisition signed by several hundred of the inhabitants of Hereford, and replied most ably and effectively to the defenders of the landlords' monopoly. The resolutions were carried by overwhelming majorities; and the meeting separated with several rounds of cheering for Free Trade and the League.

GLOSSOP DALE, DERBYSHIRE.

On Wednesday evening, the 17th ult., a public meeting of the inhabitants of Glossop Dale was held in the Town Hall, to take into consideration the present alarming condition of the country. Mr. John Kershaw, of the Hurst, was in the chair. The meeting was chiefly composed of the working classes, and was ably addressed by Mr. Edmund Potter, of Dinting Vale; the Reverend Thomas Atkin, of Littlemoor; and by Mr. Hartley Hargreaves, of Glossop, and Mr. Turner, from Bolton, both working men. The following resolutions were unanimously passed: 1st. That it is the opinion of this meeting that owing to the deficiency of the harvest and the failure of the potato crop the prospects of this country are very alarming, and that the most speedy and energetic measures ought to be immediately adopted to procure a supply of food from abroad. 2d. That a memorial be sent to the Queen, praying her Majesty to call such men to her counsels as will propose to Parliament the total and immediate abolition of all duties on the importation of foreign corn and provisions into this country.

A memorial in accordance with the above was read and adopted by the meeting, and signed by the Chairman, which was immediately transmitted to Sir James Graham for presentation to her Majesty.

It is very evident, from this meeting, that the working men of Glossop Dale are no longer to be gulled with the fallacy that cheap bread means low wages. Experience has taught them just the reverse.

DEFEAT OF THE PROTECTIONISTS AT BURY ST. EDMUNDS.

A meeting was held at the Guildhall, Bury St. Edmunds, on Friday last, convened by the Mayor (J. Deck, Esq.), in compliance with the following requisition, signed by 60 inhabitants:

“We, the undersigned inhabitants of the town of Bury St. Edmunds, feeling impressed with the importance of the present question of Free Trade in corn, more especially as it affects this agricultural district, hereby request you will, at an early day, convene a public meeting of the inhabitants, to afford them an opportunity of expressing their sentiments where their trade and prosperity are so materially concerned.”

“To John Deck, Esq., Mayor.”

It being known that nearly all of the signatures were those of protectionists, the Free Trade party on Wednesday put out the following handbill:

“Fellow townsmen—The advocates of monopoly and starvation purpose holding a meeting on Friday next, at noon, in the Guildhall, with a view to assist in perpetuating the existence of the present bread tax.

“Those of you who are of opinion that this cruel monopoly ought to cease—that the industry of the country should be free and unrestricted—that the people of England ought no longer to be dictated to by a selfish minority where they shall buy the necessities of life, or dispose of the fruits of their industry—that the poor man ought no longer to be cheated out of a cheap loaf, and compelled to buy a dear one—attend that meeting, and let it be seen that the public mind of this town is in favour of Free Trade, and a cheap and plentiful supply of bread to the poor.

“December 24, 1845.”

At the hour appointed for meeting, the hall was crowded by tradesmen and mechanics, and several of the agriculturists in the surrounding neighbourhood were also present at the proceedings.

The Mayor having taken the chair, the following resolution was proposed by Captain Heigham (a landowner, cultivating his own farm), and seconded by John Worledge, Esq., (an owner and tenant):

“That, in the opinion of this meeting, the adequate protection of British agriculture from foreign competition is essential not only to the prosperity of the classes more intimately connected with it, but to the welfare of the whole population; and this meeting, therefore, most earnestly deprecates any diminution of the protection now enjoyed.”

Upon which Captain Hubbard, R.N., and Mr T. G. Williams, draper, in very argumentative addresses, proposed the following amendment:—

“That, in the opinion of this meeting, it is to the interest of the tenant-farmer, the labourer, and the landlord, that the Corn Law question should be permanently settled, the experience of the last thirty years having proved that protection drives capital from the land, narrows the home market by crippling the foreign trade, and is injurious to all classes.”

R. Bevan, Esq., (banker), having spoken in support of the original motion, he was replied to by a mechanic named Punshon, in most truthful terms.

The question was then put by the Mayor, and the amendment was carried by a majority of at least twenty to one.

Bury St. Edmunds being the centre of the agricultural district of West Suffolk, this demonstration against “protection” speaks volumes.

PROTECTION AND ITS CHAMPIONS.

(From the Times.)

It is impossible not to admire the spirit with which the agriculturists are addressing themselves to this trying emergency. What most demands our respect is the energy and presence of mind with which they can hold meetings, make lengthy orations, rally their scattered forces, and pass the word for victory or death, when there is absolutely nothing to be done. To the outward eye their case is not promising. They have neither the multitude nor the minister on their side. Their cause is one sadly in need of such adventitious help as talent alone can afford. But talent they have none. There is absolutely not one decent headpiece among them—not a man who can speak a word worth listening to for a good cause, much less for a bad one. The protectionist chiefs for whose return thousands of freeholders have repeatedly shed their money, and on whose staunchness and ability the farmer has been taught to repose with the most childlike simplicity, have all turned out helpless idols. The fight is over, the day is lost. Power, credit, and protection are gone. So now the discomfited host assembles here and there, and comforts itself with the gaudy simulation of a martial array. Mighty confabulations are held to discuss the past, and make more suitable comments on historical characters and events. It is unfortunate for such persons that opportunities will not keep, and the world will go on. One morning Charles XII. left his army, rode into Dresden, and made his way into the bed-room of Augustus. He was no particular favourite with that monarch, but was allowed to depart in peace. The next morning Augustus held an extraordinary council. “You see,” said General Renschild, “they are deliberating upon what they should have done yesterday.” Such is the retrospective character of agricultural wisdom. If they had to begin the world again, we cannot doubt they would do a good deal better; but unfortunately they are not allowed the privilege of a second experiment.

When, in the course of events, the “Life and Times of Sir Robert Peel” shall be announced for publication, we recommend the author to apply to Lord Barrington, to Mr. Newdegate, and Sir John Tyrell. Very rich are they in Parliamentary reminiscences and psychological observations. They have made Sir Robert Peel their study. They sit upon his measures and his speeches with as much gravity and inquisitiveness as if they were a college of augurs interpreting the croaking of a raven, or a band of haruspices poring over a dubious lot of entrails. Lord Barrington is perfectly serious. He has every reason to be so, for he considers that “the principle of protection is as important a principle as any man could possibly enunciate.” He has turned his ears this way and that way, and opened them as wide as possible, and appears at odd times to have heard a thing or two which he could not quite make out. So now we have the benefit of his recollections, as far as they go:

“He had certainly heard language fall from Sir Robert Peel's lips in the House of Commons in support of the principle of protection; and although he probably never did pledge himself to all the details of the sliding scale that existed before he became Prime Minister, yet unless his (Lord Barrington's) ears misinformed him, Sir Robert Peel had frequently stated that he did think agriculture entitled to protection.”

If this is all he has heard, we are afraid that, though one of his lordship's organs of hearing is excellent, the other is not quite so perfect. He informs us that he will not believe that Sir Robert has abandoned this most important of principles, “unless he hears it from Sir Robert's own lips.” He intends therefore to listen very hard next session. We would further suggest that he had better try the other ear; his friends will be impatient to learn the result.

Lord Barrington, however, we are concerned to discover, is, after all, not so staunch to his principle as he might be. He has set a very bad example. “Some members of the League had told him—for he was acquainted with some of them, he was sorry to say—that the first people in this country who would look for a repeal of the Corn Laws would be the tenant-farmers.” Lord Barrington should remember betimes the danger of evil communications. His League acquaintance will do him no good. This time next year we shall have him transferring to the League the valuable assistance he now renders to the Berkshire Protection Society—i.e., unless the League has expired for want of an object. He reminds us of a certain divine, now an Archbishop, who, in the course of an Oxford sermon, once started his hearers with—“A friend of mine—an unbeliever—once observed to me, that,” &c. Lord Barrington may perhaps be sure of himself; but he ought to be more careful of the morals of his hearers.

Sir John Tyrell is decided, a prophet of ill omen. He takes the gloomy side of the subject:—

“Since he last had the honour of addressing them at Chelmsford, he must say, that, politically, they were more in the dark, and that the confusion was doubly confounded.”

So he attempts an augury—one from the flight of a bird: “There was a strong circumstance connected with the Government, which he thought would tell the policy that was likely to be pursued—he alluded to the retirement of Lord Stanley.”

We are surprised, however, that Sir John could find heart to congratulate himself on what we should think a rather dreary omen. Not one of Sir Robert Peel's sworn supporters was present.

“It gave him great pleasure to see so much unanimity pervading that meeting. The hon. baronet here alluded to that class of Conservatives who would shrink from doing their duty in support of the Corn Laws merely for the sake of the Minister, but he did not believe there was any of that class in the room.”

But in spite of himself Sir John became more and more gloomy. Images of weakness and defection crowd upon his mind. The poor agriculturists of Sussex were only able to subscribe 250*l.* against the 250,000*l.* of the League, he says. See how poor we are!

“Then, if the Corn Laws must be abolished,” he continues, “why abuse us so hard? He regretted to see but one clergyman there that day, which gave a colour for The Times saying that the clergy were opposed to a continuance of the Corn Laws; but, on the other hand, if they had attended, they would have been called, by the same paper, ‘the black-coated cormorants of the Church.’”

We should think the Rev. John Smythers will be obliged to the worthy baronet for that suggestion. The direst preface of all remains for the climax of these melancholy forebodings. The gaunt form of the new Tariff rises up before Sir John with all its surrounding horrors:

“He perfectly agreed, that if they had Free Trade in corn, they must have Free Trade in everything else. What was the result of the new Tariff? 1200 females, who got their livelihoods by making ladies' shoes, were thrown upon the shirt-market—(laughter); and had to make shirts for five farthings each.”

Alas! for Sir John, not to perceive the pitfall of argument his prophetic soul had stumbled into! You agree, that if we have Free Trade in corn, we must have it in everything else. “What is sauce for a goose,” Sir John—you know the rest. The 1200 females driven to make shirts at five farthings each, whose commercial vicissitudes appear so to excite the agricultural sensibility, will perfectly agree with you, that if we are to have Free Trade in shoemaking, we must have it in corn also.

But Mr. Newdegate goes most to the heart of the matter, and founds his predictions on the most irrefragable arguments. We have not a word to reply. He is undoubtedly right, and we can only congratulate him on having got over the cruel suspense which is consuming the heart and marrow of his agricultural friends. “There was great danger,” he said, “that Sir Robert Peel intended to undermine ‘the protective system.’” Perhaps this is rather too moderately stated, but Mr. Newdegate shows a dawning intelligence:

“When he heard Sir R. Peel and Sir J. Graham last session, he was convinced that both those Ministers entertained Free Trade tendencies. There had been a rupture in the Cabinet. Government had, for a time been thrown into the hands of Lord J. Russell. It had again been replaced in the hands of Sir R. Peel. Would any man see those facts, and tell him there was no danger?”

Certainly the man who should be capable of offering Mr. Newdegate so false a consolation, must either be desperately blind or desperately impudent. We are truly sorry to say that it is not in our power to give this assurance. The Corn Laws will go. If we wanted a proof of it we need not go farther than these agricultural meetings, and see gentlemen of rank and education moping, moaning, doting, and drivelling about Sir Robert Peel, and protection, and the new tariff, and “a determined opposition,” and a “strong front,” and defaulters, and symptoms, and fears, and suspicions, and a lot of other miscellaneous trash worked up into a speech, which merely proves that nothing whatever can be done, and the time is past. If the agriculturists really wished to fight it out, why did they not send to Parliament more sensible and more able representatives?

A STEAMER RUN DOWN IN SEA REACH.—The wind on Tuesday blew a strong gale, veering round occasionally from W.N.W. to W.S.W., and blowing occasionally with terrific fury. The Monkey Government steam-tug, which arrived at Woolwich on Tuesday afternoon, after a tremendous passage from Ostend, brought intelligence of the loss of the Robert Hawkes steam-tug, belonging to the Ship Owner's Towing Company, which was run down in the lower part of Sea Reach by a large bark. The Robert Hawkes was lying at anchor at the time; and was struck twice by the bark, and shortly afterwards sunk in deep water. The Monkey was about to put back to her assistance; but there was a hatch-bout near, which succeeded in saving the crew of the tug. Some blame is said to be attributable to the bark, which might have avoided the collision by backing her foresail. She was outward bound at the time.—Globe.

THE BUSINESS COMMITTEE OF THE EAST SURREY FREE TRADE QUALIFICATION AND REGISTRATION SOCIETY,

TO THE FREE TRADERS OF THE CITIES OF LONDON AND WESTMINSTER AND THE METROPOLITAN BOROUGHS

FELLOW COUNTRYMEN,—We Free Traders in East Surrey want your assistance to drive monopoly out of our division of the county. You gentlemen in the cities and boroughs are too much in the habit of fancying that you have nothing to do with the representation of the counties, and you cannot easily make a more fatal mistake. You are deeply interested in the representation of the metropolitan counties, whose very existence may almost be said to depend on your exertions and your prosperity. You make no secret that you are going to return all Free Traders; but of what avail is it that you do so, if you allow the neighbouring counties to send monopolists into the House of Commons to outnumber and overpower your representatives. You have to do with our representation, and we call upon you to help us to fight the monopolists on their own ground.

At the last contested election (in 1840) we were beaten by 1200 votes. Since then we have tried to better our condition on the register, and have gained about 800 votes, besides what may have resulted from change of opinion during the last five years.

From the day of our defeat we have never lost sight of the register; but we never saw the real strength of our position till we beheld the splendid example of our friends in South Lancashire, which induced us to inquire whether it was unavoidable that East Surrey should continue any longer to be represented by monopolists. We satisfied ourselves that such a degradation need not be endured, and we resolved that it should not outlive the present Parliament. But our friends in the north were not satisfied with victory; they thought they could be better employed than in constantly battling with an opponent whose annihilation could be purchased by a little additional exertion; they set to work to increase their majority to such an extent as to insure them against the expense and annoyance of a contest—and they have made it certain that for years to come Free Traders will walk the course of South Lancashire. The same has been done with North Cheshire, West Yorkshire, and Middlesex, and is being done in many other counties; and with your assistance the same shall be done in East Surrey.

If a general election were to take place immediately, it is believed that two Free Traders would contest East Surrey with a fair prospect of success; but if another registration be given to us before the election, and if you help us, as we expect you will, we shall have done much to induce our opponents not to waste their time and money in contending for a position irretrievably lost to them. But to accomplish this we must do what our opponents throughout the empire have been doing for 10 years, and what our friends in the north did so effectually last year. We must first make votes and then register them; and there is no reason why we should not do so twice as fast as our opponents did. Theirs was a difficult task, for they have never had the people with them. Ours will be easier work, by reason that the great majority of thinking men are now heartily with us, and anxious to help us in our just and humane cause. Look at our position. Just consider for a moment the extent of the means at our disposal. Manchester and a few other towns have won South Lancashire;—Leeds, Wakefield, and some neighbouring towns have put the West Riding of Yorkshire out of danger; and London and Westminster with the metropolitan boroughs have (we hope) secured Middlesex. Is East Surrey then less fortunately situated? Cannot London and Westminster, cannot Marylebone, Finsbury, and the Tower Hamlets, cannot Southwark, Lambeth, and Greenwich;—nay, cannot Middlesex, West Kent, and West Surrey, send as many Free Traders into East Surrey as they now send monopolists? We have no doubt they can and will send twice as many.

But this must be done immediately—now. We have only a few days to complete qualifications in time for the next register, upon which (if not upon the present) the election will certainly take place. There is not a day to spare: every qualification which is not purchased before the last day of this month will be too late for this year's register. We therefore implore you to get freehold qualifications for East Surrey without an hour's unavoidable delay; and let no man content himself with getting his own vote, but let him endeavour to persuade his friends and neighbours to follow his example.

The whole cost of the best sort of qualification (best, because the most secure and least troublesome) is 56*l.*, including all expenses. This is the 40*s.* ground-rent or rent-charge on a freehold estate. Other estates of sufficient value to confer the qualification may frequently be obtained for less; and you can get full information on all points connected with the business by applying to Mr. Paulton, at the offices of the League, 67, Fleet-street, or to Mr. Russell, at the offices of this Society, 82, High-street, Southwark.

In conclusion, we again implore you immediately to attend to this important business. True it is that our cause is espoused by all whose support is worth asking for; but still our greatest work remains to be done. The question, which, as far as opinion goes, is once and for all settled, remains to be decided by the ultimate court of appeal—a general election; and although opinion occupies the judgment seat in that court, it is only qualified and registered opinion that takes part in the decision. Unqualified, or unregistered opinion, goes for nothing there. Can there be a plainer or more imperative duty than that which is imposed upon those who do perceive the injustice and inhumanity of the Corn Laws, now, to make the necessary effort to secure their final abolition? No; the course for every Free Trader who has it in his power to qualify himself to express an opinion at the next general election is clear and unmistakable. He must have his 40*s.* freehold on or before the 30th of this month:—the 31st will be too late.

Signed, by order and on behalf of the Business Committee,
ROBERT RUSSELL, Secretary.
82, High-street, Southwark, 1st Jan., 1846.

A COUNTY MEMBER'S SPEECH.—A SIGN OF THE TIMES.

(From the Times.)
On Saturday last a meeting of the Bedfordshire Agricultural Protection Society was held at the Swan Inn, Bedford. The two county members, Lord Alford and Mr. Astell, were present. After the usual motion, and a quantum suffi. of the customary speechifying in which farmers and their landlords indulge on such occasions, a motion was proposed calling upon the members to state to "the meeting" what they were prepared to do if Sir Robert should propose to repeal or alter the Corn Laws. The seconder of this motion was Mr. W. Bennett, a tenant farmer, who, in the course of his speech, put some very close questions to the hon. members. At the close of his remarks,

Lord ALFORD said, he had great pleasure in meeting so respectable a body of his constituents. He was not, however, quite prepared for Mr. Bennett's question. (A laugh.) With regard to the malt-tax, he begged to say that he never voted, as alleged by Mr. Bennett, for a repeal of the malt-tax. (A cry, "You did, though, for a repeal of half the tax.") It was true he voted for a repeal of half the tax, and at the last election he pledged himself that if the Minister said he could do without the malt-tax, he (Lord Alford) would vote for the repeal. (Loud laughter.) He (Lord Alford) found much difference of opinion, however, even among agriculturists, about its repeal. (Hear, hear.) With regard to the general subject of protection, he felt much flattered by their marks of confidence, by not binding him with a pledge. He thought they had a right to protection, and he confessed that he had been astonished and bewildered, and made angry, by some of the measures of Sir Robert Peel. (Laughter and cheers.) Though he would not go to Parliament bound by a pledge, he thought there ought to be such protection as would prevent the poor lands from going out of cultivation—a diminution of the profits of the farmer—(cheers)—a lessening of the wages of the labourer—(cheers); and, as to the landlord (continued the noble lord), he must take care of himself. (Loud laughter and cheers.) After all, they must look at the crisis of public affairs. Sir Robert Peel had resigned, Lord John Russell had attempted to form an administration and had failed. And now Sir Robert was again in power, surrounded by all those men who from position and education have been able to give this important subject the closest consideration. And did they suppose that the object of these men in any contemplated change was merely to gain some private ends, or was it not right rather to conclude that there were some extraordinary circumstances with which they who were not in power were unacquainted, but which might justify the change? He (Lord Alford) thought, however, that no circumstances would justify Sir Robert Peel in proposing to repeal the Corn Laws. (Cries of hear, hear.) (Here some one in the room called out, "But will you support him if he should?") To this his lordship replied, that he was proud to be their representative; but he would never go into Parliament so pledged that his intended votes might as well be written over the door of the House. (Hear, hear.) The fact was, they were like people who wished to travel by the rail at a rate of 30 miles by the hour; but the engineer had got the steam up to the rate of 60 (loud laughter), and though it was too fast travelling to be comfortable, they could not change their engineer, because he was the only man that could work the engine. (Loud derisive laughter.) Now what he (Lord Alford) complained of was, that the engineer ought not to keep them in the dark, but ought to tell them that the reason was that he was afraid of the train that was coming after them at the rate of 150 miles an hour. (Cheers and loud laughter, amidst which his lordship sat down.) Here some one cried out, "We know no more now than we did before."

MR. ASTELL made a few remarks, pledging himself not to vote for a repeal of the Corn Laws, and the meeting separated.

PROTECTIVE DUTIES VERSUS FREE TRADE.

The following extract, from the Report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the finances of the United States Government, demonstrates the advantages of low duties, and their effects upon the agricultural and commercial interests:

"Soil, climate, and other causes vary very much in different countries; the pursuits which are most profitable in each, and the prosperity of all of them will be best promoted by leaving them, unrestricted by legislation, to exchange with each other those fabrics and products which they severally raise most cheaply. This is clearly illustrated by the perfect Free Trade which exists among all the states of the Union, and by the acknowledged fact that any one of these States would be injured by imposing duties upon the products of the others. It is generally conceded that reciprocal Free Trade among nations would best advance the interest of all. But it is contended that we must meet the tariffs of other nations by countervailing restrictions. That duties upon our exports by foreign nations are prejudicial to us, is conceded; but whilst this injury is slightly felt by the manufacturers, its weight falls most exclusively upon agriculture, commerce, and navigation. If those interests which sustain the loss do not ask countervailing restrictions, it should not be demanded by the manufacturers, who do not feel the injury, and whose fabrics, in fact, are not excluded by the foreign legislation of which they complain. That agriculture, commerce, and navigation are injured by foreign restrictions, constitutes no reason why they should be subjected to still severer treatment, by additional restrictions and countervailing tariffs enacted at home. Commerce, agriculture, and navigation, harassed as they may be by foreign restrictions, diminishing the amount of exchangeable products which they could otherwise purchase abroad, are burdened with heavier impositions at home. Nor will augmented duties here lead to a reduction of foreign tariffs, but the reverse, by furnishing the protected classes there with the identical argument used by the protected classes here against reduction. By countervailing restrictions, we injure our own fellow-citizens much more than the foreign nation at whom we purpose to aim their force; and, in the conflict of opposing tariffs, we sacrifice our own commerce, agriculture, and navigation. As well might we impose monarchical or aristocratic restrictions on our Government or people, because that is the course of foreign legislation. Let our commerce be as free as our political institutions. Let us, with revenue duties only, open our ports to all the world, and nation after nation will soon follow our example. If we reduce our tariff, the party opposed to the Corn Laws of England would soon prevail, and admit all our agricultural products at all times freely into her ports, in exchange for her exports. And if England would now repeal her duties upon our wheat, flour, Indian corn, and other agricultural products, our own restrictive system would certainly be doomed to overthrow. If the question is asked, who shall begin this work of reciprocal reduction, it is answered by the fact, that England has already abated her duties upon most of our exports. She has repealed the duty upon cotton, and greatly reduced the tariff upon our bread-stuffs, provisions, and other articles—and her present bad harvest, accompanied by a reduction of our tariff, would lead to the repeal of her Corn Laws, and the unrestricted admission, at all times, of our agricultural products.

"The true question is, whether the farmer and planter shall, to a great extent, supply our people with cheap manufactures, purchased abroad with their agricultural products, or whether this exchange shall be forbidden by high duties on such manufactures, and their supply thrown, as a monopoly, at large prices, by high tariffs, into the hands of our own manufacturers. The number of manufacturing capitalists, who derive benefit from the heavy taxes extracted by the tariff from twenty millions of people, does not exceed ten thousand. The whole number (including the working classes engaged in our manufactures) deriving any benefit from the tariff, does not exceed 400,000, of whom not more than 40,000 have been brought into this pursuit by the last tariff. But this small number of 40,000 would still have been in the country, consuming our agricultural products; and in the attempt to secure them as purchasers, so small in number, and not consuming one half the supply of many counties, the farmer and planter are asked to sacrifice the markets of the world, containing a population of eight hundred millions, disabled from purchasing our products by our high duties on all they would sell in exchange. The farmer and planter would have the home market without a tariff; and they would have the foreign market also to a much greater extent, but for the total or partial prohibition of the last tariff.

"We have more fertile lands than any other nation, can raise a greater variety of products, and it may be said, could feed and clothe the people of nearly all the world. The home market, of itself, is wholly inadequate for such products. They must have the foreign market, or a large surplus, accompanied by great depression in price, must be the result. The States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, if cultivated to their fullest extent, could of themselves raise more than sufficient food to supply the entire home market. Missouri or Kentucky could more than supply it with hemp; already the State of Mississippi raises more cotton than is sufficient for all the home market; Louisiana is rapidly approaching the same point as to sugar: and there are lands enough adapted to that product in Louisiana, Texas, and Florida, to supply with sugar and molasses nearly all the markets of the world. If cotton is depressed in price by the tariff, the consequence must be a comparative diminution of the product, and the raising in its place, to a great extent, hemp, wheat, corn, stock, and provisions, which otherwise would be supplied by the teeming products of the west. The growing west in a series of years, must be the greatest sufferers by the tariff, in depriving them of the foreign market, and of that of the cotton growing States. We demand, in fact, for our agricultural products, specie from nearly all the world, by heavy taxes upon all their manufactures; and their purchases from us must therefore be limited, as well as their sales to us enhanced in price. Such a demand for specie, which we know in advance cannot be complied with, is nearly equivalent to a decree excluding most of our agricultural products from the foreign markets. Such is the rigour of our restrictions, that nothing short of a famine opens freely the ports of Europe for our bread-stuffs. Agriculture is our chief employment; it is best adapted to our situation; and if not depressed by the tariff, would be the most profitable. We can raise a larger surplus of agricultural products, and a greater variety, than almost any other nation, and at cheaper rates. Remove, then, from agriculture all our restrictions, and, by its own unfettered power, it will break down all foreign restrictions; and, our own being removed, would feed the hungry and clothe the poor of our fellow men throughout all the densely-peopled nations of the world. But now we will take nothing in exchange of these products but specie, except at very high duties; and nothing but a famine breaks down all foreign restrictions, and opens for a time the ports of Europe to our bread-stuffs. If, on a reduction of our duties, England repeals her Corn Laws, nearly all Europe must follow her example, or give to her manufacturers advantages which cannot be successfully encountered in most of the markets of the world. The tariff did not raise the price of our bread-stuffs; but a bad harvest in England does—giving us for the time that foreign market which we would soon have at all times, by that repeal of the Corn Laws which must follow the reduction of our duties. But whilst bread-stuffs rise with a bad harvest in England, cotton almost invariably falls; because the increased sum which, in that event, England must pay for our bread-stuffs, we will take, not in manufactures, but only in specie; and, not having it to spare, she brings down, even to a greater extent, the price of our cotton. Hence the result, that a bad harvest in England reduces the aggregate price of our exports, often turns the exchanges against us, carrying our specie abroad, and inflicting a serious blow on our prosperity. Foreign nations cannot for a series of years import more than they export; and, if we close our markets against their imports by high duties, they must buy less of our imports, or give a lower price, or both."

NOBLE RESOLUTIONS.

(From Punch.)

At a select meeting of British landholders, the following propositions were unanimously agreed to:

1. That the appetite for food and drink, unfortunately implanted by Nature in the agricultural labourers, is the great cause of their distress and discontent.
2. That for the security and quiet of the landowner, it is expedient that some measures should be taken for allaying this craving for sustenance.
3. That for the better attainment of this object it is advisable to excite competition by the encouragement of ingenuity; and accordingly that prizes, varying in amount, should be awarded by the aristocracy to the inventors of the best succedaneum for bread, beef, bacon, potatoes, beer, and other eatables and drinkables.
4. That rewards should further be offered for contrivances for superseding fire and clothing, the deficiency of which, no less than that of food, is productive of dissatisfaction amongst the labourers.
5. That thanks are due to his Grace the Duke of Norfolk for his suggestion of curry powder as a sedative to the stomach.

SOMETHING IN A NAME.—The second title of the Norfolk family is that of Earl of Surrey. We understand the present head of the illustrious race intends to change Surrey into Curry; for he insists that the latter was the original title, of which the former is merely a corruption.—Punch.

QUALIFY! QUALIFY! QUALIFY!

THE Friends of FREE TRADE residing in the Northern or Midland Counties, desirous of purchasing Freeholds in any of the undermentioned Counties, are requested to apply to the Secretary of the League, Newall's Buildings Manchester.

North Lancashire	North Derbyshire
South Lancashire	South Derbyshire
North Cheshire	North Durham
West Riding of York	East Cumberland
South Stafford	West Cumberland
South Stafford	South Northumberland.
South Cheshire

Each applicant is requested to give his name and residence at full length.

By Order of the Council,
JOSEPH HICKIN, Secretary.

QUALIFY! QUALIFY! QUALIFY!

FREE TRADERS desirous of purchasing Freeholds for Middlesex, East Surrey, West Kent, South Essex, East Sussex, and South Hants, are requested to send their applications, with name and address in full, to the League Offices, 67, Fleet-street, London.

By Order of the Council,
JOSEPH HICKIN, Secretary.

FREEHOLD QUALIFICATIONS FOR HERTS.

FREE TRADERS desirous of purchasing Freeholds in Hertfordshire are requested to send their applications to The League Offices, 67, Fleet-street, or to Mr. J. F. Bontems, Herts Registration Office, Hertford.

NORTH LANCASHIRE.

QUALIFY! QUALIFY! QUALIFY!

FREE-TRADERS desirous of purchasing Qualifications for North Lancashire, are informed that they can be obtained for 33s. and upwards each, yielding from 6½ to 7½ per cent.

Applications may be made to Mr. Moorhouse, League Rooms, 4, Cheapside, Preston.

VOTES FOR THE WEST RIDING OF YORKSHIRE.

THE WAKEFIELD FREE TRADE COMMITTEE can secure, for Parties desirous of possessing a qualification for the West Riding, FREEHOLDS, to pay from Six to Seven per Cent., at sums varying from 30s. to 40s. each, including expenses.

Apply to Mr. Joseph Rhodes, sen., of Wakefield, the Secretary, or to the Committee, care of Messrs. Nichols and Sons, Printers, Wakefield.

CONTRIBUTIONS TO THE QUARTER OF A MILLION FUND.

Subscriptions received during the week ending Wednesday, Dec. 31, 1845.

N.B.—As the Subscription List is made up from Wednesday to Wednesday, contributions received on Thursdays and Fridays are not published in the LEAGUE of the Saturday immediately succeeding, but are included in the list of the week following.

*Radnor, Lord, Coleshill House, Berkshire	50	0	0
Dimmack and Thompson, Manchester	20	0	0
*Binns, M., Great Ancoats, ditto	20	0	0
*Lees, A., Blackfriars ditto	10	0	0
Watkin, Absalom ditto	10	0	0
*Grimston, John, Newick, near Driffield, Yorkshire	10	0	0
Crawford, Wm. Sharman, M.P., Crawfordsburn, near Belfast, Ireland	10	0	0
Bowring, Dr. M.P., London	10	0	0
*Haworth, John, Milton-terrace, Stretford New Road, Manchester	5	0	0
*Johnson, R. and Brothers, Dale-street, ditto	5	0	0
*Hervey, Wm., Parker-street, Derby	1	0	0
*Farrar, Joshua, Marsden, near Huddersfield	1	0	0
*Spry, Geo., Rodney-street, Wigan	1	0	0
*Smith, Richard, Market-street, ditto	1	0	0
*Savage, Charles ditto	1	0	0
*Dawber, James, grocer ditto	1	0	0
Liddell, John, and Brothers, Huddersfield	1	0	0
*Kirkpatrick, John, Mill-street, Macclesfield	1	0	0
*Billington, Wm., High-street, Sandbach	1	0	0
Husband, R., 26, Old Haymarket, Liverpool	1	0	0
Aster, Wm., Barnstable	1	0	0
*Richardson, John, chemist, Harrowgate	1	0	0
*Dick, James, Soap Works, Leith	1	0	0
*Hodgson, James, Wilderspool, near Warrington	1	0	0
*Igham, J., White Hall Mills, Chapel-en-le-Frith	1	0	0
*Ellis, Edward, Bank, Tewkesbury	1	0	0
*Airey, Thomas, Park Green, Macclesfield	1	0	0
*Taylor, Ralph, Mount Pleasant, Todmorden	1	0	0
*Bowman, Wm., Bolton-street, Bury, Lancashire	1	0	0
*Walker, N., Shipley, Bradford, Yorkshire	1	0	0
*Hales, Ralph, Unicorn, Church-street, Manchester	1	0	0
*Holland, F. W., 86, Grosvenor-st., C on M ditto	1	0	0
*Massie, John, 1, New Cannon-street ditto	1	0	0
*Middleton, S., Roger-st., Red Bank ditto	1	0	0
*Whitelock, Jas., Medlock-street, Hulme ditto	1	0	0
*Bamford, R., 108, Duke-street, Hulme ditto	1	0	0
*Duesbery, Wm., Stretford New Road ditto	1	0	0
Molinueux, Miss E., 2, Marshall-st., Rochdale-rd., ditto	1	0	0
*Greenhalgh, J., 3, Gore-street, Piccadilly ditto	1	0	0
*Summers, Geo., 31, Bold-street	1	0	0
*Allender, Geo., 6, Canterbury-street	1	0	0
Mander, Jas., Deane-street, Fairfield	1	0	0
R. G.	1	0	0
*Pentland, James, 32, Eldon-place	1	0	0
*Wilkinson, W. A., Camberwell	20	0	0
*Wilkinson, Horace, North-terrace, ditto	20	0	0
*Wedgewood, H. A., Hermitage, Woking, Surrey	10	0	0
Mowatt, Francis, Devonshire-place	10	0	0
*Mendham, W. H., Bishopsgate, near Englefield Green	5	0	0
*Hunter, Jameson, 110, Fenchurch-street	5	0	0
*Huggins, W., Caledon, Ireland	3	0	0
*Dixon, Charles, Chichester	2	12	6
Sutton, T. P., 64, Friday-street, Cheapside	2	0	0
*Jaqes, G. H., 2, Dartmouth Villas, Sydenham	2	0	0
*Drybrough, A., 6, Basing-lane, City	2	0	0
*Miller, Geo., 12, Fenchurch-street	2	0	0
*Norman, T., 1, Temple-street, Dalston	2	0	0
*The Workmen in the employ of Messrs. Bass, 66, Goswell-street	1	2	0
Ramsey, Wm., 13, Bermondsey Wall	1	0	0
Elkington, Henry, Russell-street, Bermondsey	1	0	0
*Dyke, Henry, 2, Hawe Court, Temple	1	0	0
Adam, James, 11, Pudding-lane, Lower Thames-street	1	0	0
Trow, Wm., Wilson-street, Finsbury-square	1	0	0
*Carr, G. B., 10, Lawrence Pulteney Hill	1	0	0
*Smith, Benjamin, 1, High Holborn	1	0	0
*Sallows, James, 1, Davis-place, Battersea Bridge	1	0	0
Davis, R. W., 17, Union-row, New Kent Road	1	0	0
Davis, John, 138, Tottenham Court Road	1	0	0
Cole, Joseph, 15, Seymour-street, Euston-square	1	0	0
Thornley, John, 1, Polygon, Somers Town	1	0	0
*Wyatt, James, 5, New Bridge-street, Blackfriars	1	0	0
*R. S., 8, St. John's-street Road	1	0	0
Crocker, J., George Hotel, Aldermanbury	1	0	0
*Cobon, J., Millfield Lodge, Tanners End, Middlesex	1	0	0
Sharp, Joseph, 14, Paragon, New Kent Road	1	0	0
*Armitage, R., 290, Strand	1	0	0

*Lees, R., Galashiels	1	0	0
*Withall, Geo., Beconsfield, Bucks	1	0	0
*Dickie, Thomas, 26, Broomfields, Deptford	1	0	0
*Wyatt, F. G., 11, Queen-street, Oxford	1	0	0
"A Tenant Farmer of Surrey"	1	0	0
*Wilkinson, John, Shakspeare-st., Newcastle-on-Tyne	1	0	0
*Palmer, Capt. E. D., Wye-terrace, Ross, Herefordshire	1	0	0
*Barnett, T., jun., farmer, Glenstone, near Ross, do	1	0	0
*Ryder, W., Mill-lane, Macclesfield	1	0	0
*Nicholson, Thomas, Lydney, Gloucestershire	1	0	0
*Froggatt, W., Cressbrook, near Bakewell	1	0	0
*Sim, Joshua and Sons, Braithwaite Mills, Keswick	1	0	0
*Bowes, Joseph, King's Arms, ditto	1	0	0
*Mellor, A., Bridge Mill, Holmfirth, near Huddersfield	1	0	0
*Mellor, Joseph, jun., Thongs Bridge, near ditto	1	0	0
McClellan, J. } Newtown, Holmfirth, near ditto	1	0	0
*Batty, R. }	1	0	0
*Webb, S., Bridge End, Westgate-street, Gloucester	1	0	0
*Kinross, John, Alloway Place, Ayr	1	0	0
*McHutcheson, Adam ditto	1	0	0
*Gibson, H. H., 10, Strand-street, Liverpool	1	0	0
*Weild, Nath., 50, Percy-street ditto	1	0	0
*Mason, Rev. W., Melbourne, Derbyshire	1	0	0
*Jones, J., 17, Rosamond-place, C on M, Manchester	1	0	0
*Bruce, John, Abbot's meadow, Melrose	1	0	0
*Stuart, J. A., Carnock, Dunfermline	1	0	0
*Holland, Mrs. A., Knutsford, Cheshire	1	0	0
*Challinor, Wm., City Road, Derby	1	0	0
*Williams, H., Newham, Truro	1	0	0
*Wilson, E. L., Poste restante, Orleans	1	0	0
*Dale, Dent, Balby, near Doncaster	1	0	0
*Baker, H. M., Dartmouth	1	0	0
*Baber, W., Woodborough, near Wells	1	0	0
*Buckland, John, Newton Abbot, Devon	1	0	0
*Morton, J. C., Whitfield Farm, Wootton-under-Edge	1	0	0
*Westrope, W. G., Burford, Oxon	1	0	0
Gerrard, Joseph, Derby-street, Bolton	1	0	0
Clark, David, 151, High-street, Bishopwearmouth	1	0	0
*A Cheshire Farmer, Middlewich	1	0	0
*Slee, John, Loughborough	1	0	0
*Jackson, Jane, Millgate, Wigan	1	0	0
*Knowles, Joseph, Tedmorden	1	0	0
*Ashby, Charles, Staines, Middlesex	1	0	0
Ashby, Morris, ditto	1	0	0
*Saville, J. and Son, Barnsley	1	0	0
*Daw, James and Son, North Berwick	1	0	0
*Jewsbury, F. C., 6, Threaplace, Gloucester	1	0	0
*Downs, J. H., Grays, Essex	1	0	0
*Cooper, John, Masons Hill Farm, Bromley, Kent	1	0	0
Blair, James, Dudley	1	0	0
*Fletcher, D., High-street, Macclesfield	1	0	0
*Crewe, Wm., Duke-street, ditto	1	0	0
*Stevens, C., Greenfield, Holywell, Flintshire	1	0	0
*Shaw, David, Cheapside, Leicester	1	0	0
*Rahu, A. Godfrey, Bishopwearmouth	1	0	0
*Steel, J., 5, Fitchet-court, City	1	0	0
Tobin, Edw., 226, Bermondsey-street	1	0	0
Sharwood, T. R., 160, Aldersgate-street	1	0	0
Webb, Joseph, 23, Roman Road, Old Ford	1	0	0
*Carr and Robertson, 130, Wood-street, City	1	0	0
*Fellows, John, King's Head, Museum-street	1	0	0
*Stoddart, Robert, 13, Red Lion-street, Clerkenwell	1	0	0
*Cowper, Edw., 6, Camden Hill Villa, Kensington	1	0	0
*Marley, H. M., 15, Grove-road, North Brixton	1	0	0
*Wright, W., 6, Belvidere, Cambridge Road	1	0	0
Garnett, Thomas, 27, Portman-place, Marylebone	0	5	0
Barnett, H., 59, Upper North Place, Gray's Inn Road	0	5	0
Todd, B. B., St. Thomas's-square, Hackney	0	5	0
Wisdell, J. C., 7, Long-lane, Smithfield	0	2	6
Perry, Robert, Hammersmith	0	2	0
*Gregory, Professor, Inverleith Row	2	0	0
*Horsburgh, John, 18, Buccleuch Place	1	0	0
*White, Thomas, & Co., 225, Canongate	1	0	0
*Adam, Alex. & Son, Bonnington	1	0	0
*Mackenzie, W., 29, Charlotte-square	1	0	0
*Simpson, Jas., 33, Northumberland-st.	1	0	0
*Dunlop, John, of Brockloch, 7, Randolph Cliff	1	0	0
*Falkner, Counsellor, 63, South Bridge	1	0	0
*Sheppard, Counsellor, 68, George-st.	1	0	0
*Slinch, Alex., Slott, Gundry	1	0	0
*Livett, G., 15, Regent-street	1	0	0
*Newby, Charles, 55, ditto	1	0	0
Coomer, C. H.	1	0	0
Smith, Wm., Hermitage	1	0	0
*Neisk, James	1	0	0
*Sturrock, J., jun., writer, Park-place	1	0	0
*Sturrock, John ditto	1	0	0
*Graham, Miss Stirling, Dunsburn	1	0	0
*Land, John, 152, Briggate	1	0	0
*Garlick, S., 38, Park-square	1	0	0
*Noddings, J., Commercial-road, Holbeck	1	0	0
*Bilbrough A., Gildersome, near	1	0	0
*Watson, John, Holbeck Lodge	1	0	0
*Nettleton, T. and W., 84, Basinghall-st.	1	0	0
*Mason, Sam., 20, Queen-square	1	0	0
*Topham, Sam., 5, West Bar	1	0	0
*Bilbrough, James, Gildersome, near	1	0	0
*Blackburn, Enoch, Hunslet	1	0	0
*Smith, James, 110, Meadow-lane	1	0	0
*Kidd, James	1	0	0
*Simpson, T., Broad-street	1	0	0
*Waterhouse, Thos. P., 4, Greenhill-ter	1	0	0

* Those names marked with an asterisk are renewed subscriptions.

ERRATA.—In LEAGUE, No. 117, for Amount of Collection at Messrs. Tunstall and Cash's Manufactory, Stroud, read Great Gardens, Bristol. In No. 118, for Samuel Grey and Co., Manchester, 2351, read Samuel Grey and Co.

We have also to mention that the following gentlemen have sent in their names for the subscriptions as below:—
W. A. Wilkinson, Camberwell £100
Horace Wilkinson, ditto 100
H. A. Wedgewood, Hermitage, Woking 50
T. Prout, East Hill, Wandsworth 50
G. W. Walker, Grecian Chambers, Devereux-court, Strand 5

Mr. Scrope, M.P., has announced his intention to subscribe, through the Stroud Free Trade Association, £100 to the League Fund.

To the Editor of THE LEAGUE.

Manchester, Dec. 31, 1845.

DEAR SIR,—In your Manchester Subscription List of last Saturday, there was an error in entering to the credit of James Wrigley, junior, 50s.; it should have been James Wrigley, senior; my subscription being in the amount of 250s., by Thomas and James Wrigley. Your correcting the above will oblige your obedient servant,

JAMES WRIGLEY, JUN.

SUSSEX LAW.—A labourer, named James Bishop, was charged before the Lewes bench of magistrates on the 21st ult., with being on the Downs for the purpose of taking game (rabbits). It did not appear whether the defendant had work or not, but it did appear that he had not taken any game. Defendant pleaded "guilty," and the Bench observed that it was a "serious offence to which defendant had pleaded guilty," and he was sentenced to ten days' hard labour, and at the end of that term to find securities to keep the peace (towards the rabbits?) for one year, himself in 3s., and two securities in 3s. each.—The Times.

LETTERS ON THE CORN LAWS, No. LIV.

TO B. HAWES, ESQ., M.P.

SIR,—Your speech to the electors of Lambeth, at the meeting on Tuesday evening, is a masterly summary of the arguments against the food monopoly. The declaration that you are determined "cordially and faithfully" to support the "unconditional repeal of the Corn Laws" is an appropriate pendant to such a speech. That declaration amounts, in my apprehension, to a distinct "pledge" upon the question. You cannot recede from it without dishonouring yourself, unless at the same time you place your seat afresh at the disposal of your constituents.

According to the report, you were thus understood at the meeting. The elector who questioned your colleague at first avoided any similar appeal to yourself, on the ground that you had rendered it unnecessary; and when afterwards he adopted a different course, it was apparently only to avoid making any invidious distinction between the two representatives for the borough.

I cannot imagine that you consider a promise less binding when it is given unasked for, than it is if given after being asked for. "I WILL support the unconditional repeal of the Corn Laws." That is what, by the report, you did say, of your own accord; and that is also what, by the report, you refused to say, when a constituent inquired whether you would do so. Not having been present, I cannot say whether the questioner's manner was respectful. Nor can that much signify. It was as the voice of the meeting that he put the question; and it was not to him individually, but to the meeting, that your answer was required. Thoroughly acquitting you of any mental reservation in your declared purposes, relying on you as firmly as if you had sworn to Corn Law repeal upon the holy Gospels, I cannot but think that you have drawn a distinction unmeaning in your own case, but not without both meaning and mischief in the case of many others who may follow your example.

The Reform Bill was carried by a pledged Parliament. Its triumph would have been much less secure had the electors been satisfied by candidates promising that they would deliberate, and inquire, and exercise their discretion. They were sent to pass the Bill. Just so, at the next election, must they be sent to repeal the Corn Laws. The Free Trade constituencies will stultify themselves egregiously if they return members of whose conduct any doubt can exist. In such a prospect, it would well become those who, like yourself, may claim confidence in their consistency, to set the example of cheerfully coming under obligations which as to others are far from being always unnecessary. You deprive them of excuse for equivocation. You help to insure the identification between the elected and the electors. If such as you are ready to pledge yourselves, who can demur?

There was a disposition, in the elections immediately after the Reform Act, ridiculously to multiply pledges. The absurdity cured itself. A representative legislator must have a large discretion to be of service to the country; not because he is often likely to hear, in the House of Commons, what will change his opinions—how many such conversions do you remember?—but because the representative has often to deal with unforeseen circumstances; and the application to those circumstances of the principles he holds, may require deliberation. But there are certain specific and paramount questions about which no such reservation need exist. Such was Parliamentary reform. Such is Corn Law repeal.

It is beside the mark to talk of going to the House of Commons "in a deliberate character," and of hearing arguments, and of the landlords refusing to discuss with you if you are pledged, (they not being qualmish themselves about pledges,) after telling the world so plainly, as you have done, of your fixed determination. Your mind is made up. Nobody doubts it. After your speech, it would be an insult to suppose that any landlord can persuade you to vote for prolonging the food monopoly. Were it possible for you to profess such a conversion, who would believe you sincere? Not yourself even.

Your free-born indignation is misplaced. You bind yourself as much as, on your own account, any body wants to bind you. But let us take the question somewhat more broadly.

It is not a party question. The co-operation of all parties is honestly invited and cheerfully accepted. Had Lord John Russell succeeded in forming an administration, the Free Traders, as such, would not have been committed to the support of his Government an inch further than is implied in the repeal of the Corn Laws. So far they are ready to support Sir Robert Peel's Government, whenever it will go so far. They are not a section of the Whig Opposition. They do not aim at "ejecting the Tories from office;" at least, so long as a Free Trade administration (which might be either Whig, Tory, or both) appears impracticable. The chairman of your electoral meeting was a Free Trade Tory. There are many such. The union for this object is honourable and patriotic; but it destroys the security which party ties give the electors for the consistency of the elected. Whig electors, and Tory electors too, have a right to demand that they be not made party tools of. They go up to the hustings to poll, not for Whigism or Toryism, but for Free Trade. They have a bond which is paramount to party; and that is what they desire of those whom they elect. They require that there should be no reservation in favour of the Parliamentary tactics or interests of either political party. How are Free Traders to secure this paramount consideration for the question which they deem paramount? Your chairman gives the plain answer. "I have pledged myself to vote for no one but a man who will vote for an abolition of the Corn Laws." Well said, honest Tory; and let every honest Whig say the same. That is the spirit which will carry the elections. The object can only be worked out by pledging the candidates. Dishonest men, no doubt, will take pledges; let dishonest men take them also; and then the electors will only have to choose between honesty and dishonesty. But let a candidate be in ever so high a repute for integrity, if he refuse this simple test of his purpose, the very integrity breeds suspicion of his not exactly intending to do what is wanted. It is subordinate, in his mind, to some other consideration. The constituencies should leave no such uncertainty. There is "ample room and verge enough" for discretion on other matters. On the repeal of the Corn Laws, they should be "lound hand and foot;" and let the candidates say, if they like, that "it was of no use talking to them." We want members to whom it is of no use either for landlords or party lords to talk. We want, in short, the thing done; and the simplest way is to send to Parliament those, and those only, so far as we can, who will undertake to do it.

Whether the "leaders of the League" would or would not have approved what passed at the meeting, I am incompetent to say. But I misunderstand them very much unless they approve the determination of electors, whether Whig or Tory, to make their votes contingent on the candidate's going for the immediate, total, and unconditional repeal of the Corn Laws.

A NORWICH WEAVER BOY.

We are much gratified to learn that Messrs. Cobden and Bright are to visit Newcastle on Monday, and to address the people on the great struggle which is now going on. We need hardly add that we fully and confidently trust their reception will be not only such as their own great talents and popular claims deserve, but as one worthy of the great cause which they have so ably and successfully advocated.—Tyne Mercury.

REPRESENTATION OF WAKEFIELD.—Mr. D. Gaskell, the former representative of the borough, has promised to become a candidate upon Free Trade principles, whenever an election may take place.

DEATH FROM THE FALLING OF A CHIMNEY.—A melancholy occurrence took place on Tuesday evening, at the Ballast Hills, near Newcastle-upon-Tyne, from the falling of the chimney of a dwelling-house during a gale of wind. The chimney broke through the roof of the house into an upper apartment, where a female was lying ill in bed; two children were playing on the floor, and an infant, eight months old, was asleep in the cradle. Some of the bricks and rubbish fell into the cradle, and killed the child, but the others escaped with comparatively slight injury.

CORRESPONDENCE.

Coleshill House, Dec. 27, 1845.

DEAR SIR,—I congratulate you, myself, the whole country, and the world in general, at the admirable success of the meeting held at the Town Hall, Manchester, on the 23rd; and I herewith send my 50*l.* as promised. I do not give it as the first instalment (20 per cent.) of an undertaking to give you 250*l.*; but if the contest is protracted for five years, and I should so long live, and a further contribution should in a less time be wanted, I shall ever be ready to attend to your call to the extent of my means.

I am, yours faithfully,

G. Wilson, Esq.

RADNOR.

Hall Barn Park, Beaconsfield, Buckinghamshire,
26th December, 1845.

MY DEAR SIR,—I am sorry that I was not able to be with you on the 23d inst., when you made so noble a demonstration in favour of carrying out the cause in which the League has embarked. I have read Mr. Cobden's speech in the Times of the 24th inst. with much pleasure; it is a clear exposition of my views; nothing could be better timed than his declaration of our intentions, for our opponents have attributed to us all kinds of motives but the right one. They have now clearly before them a simple and intelligible mode of dissolving the League by a total and immediate revocation of our corn and provision laws, but without any rider whatever that would render the repeal less acceptable to the country. This measure of justice has been too long delayed. I hope our opponents by this time see that public opinion, honestly, firmly, and constitutionally expressed, when founded in justice, is irresistible. No administration can now stand and support laws that inflict permanent scarcity on the country; but we must not relax our exertions until every vestige of them is repealed. Pray add my name to your list for one thousand pounds, and believe me to be ever yours, truly and respectfully,

WM. BROWNE, of Richmond Hill.

George Wilson, Esq., Chairman of the Anti-Corn-Law League.

Crawfordsburn, Bangor, Ireland, Dec. 27, 1845.

MY DEAR SIR,—I think that a period of the Anti-Corn Law agitation has arrived when every man, who at any former time professed an attachment to that cause, is bound to renew the evidences of his adhesion. Circumstances which now exist indicate the probability that the struggle is approaching to a successful issue; but the more nearly the termination approaches, and the more numerous the defaulters from the ranks of the monopolists, the more desperate will be the efforts of those who remain; and success cannot be insured except by energy and, above all, by uncompromising determination. I use the word uncompromising emphatically, because I have no doubt that when open resistance becomes hopeless, compromises will be offered, and every stratagem adopted to disunite the supporters of your cause by offers of this nature; but I confidently anticipate that the League will stand by its avowed principles without swerving, and that no assent will be given by your body to any arrangement which does not honestly carry out the object of total and immediate repeal of the duties on food; and that no relaxation of your agitation will be tolerated till every law imposing such duties shall be erased from the statute book.

Under these impressions I send you the enclosed as a token of my humble co-operation with your efforts in so noble a cause; and however anxious I may be to press for the removal of other monopolies, I think that in the present position of this question, the advancement of free institutions of all kinds can be best promoted by concentrating the moral power of this great country on the undivided object of the destruction of the food monopoly, which has been justly termed the basis on which every other monopoly rests as its chief support. And I also feel that those who entertain the opinions I do, and are connected with the landed interest, have a double duty to perform, because, whilst I do not apprehend any permanent evil from the repeal of the Corn Laws, I think that danger the most imminent, the most certain, and the most fatal will arise to that interest from its assuming on that question an insulated position of hostility to the feelings and interests of all the other classes of the community.

Having ventured to express these views, permit me to subscribe myself, with the most unfeigned respect and esteem, my dear Sir, yours faithfully,

WM. SHARMAN CRAWFORD.

Richard Cobden, Esq., M.P.

Ilfracombe, Dec. 25, 1845.

SIR,—It seems to be the order of the day to publish recipes by which Englishmen may be taught how to keep life in the body in the time of famine with the least possible amount of nourishment. I can help you to one that may be placed in juxtaposition with the Buck wheat, alias Buckland's beans, and Norfolk punch.

A highly respectable shoemaker of this town, the son of an agricultural labourer, assures me that a neighbouring labourer (to his father) with his wife and family, existed for six weeks upon potatoes, washed without being skinned, and grated into water, and the pulp boiled up; they had great difficulty in procuring the small quantity of potatoes they did obtain, and the grating system was adopted in order to stretch the potato porridge to its utmost limit.

I have no doubt this will be found to be a most valuable discovery, for hitherto the water in which potatoes have been boiled has been looked upon as poisonous, and on that account is not at present given to the pigs; but since it can be proved that a whole family has existed for six weeks on the porridge I have named, perhaps at some of the Protection dinners we shall find that cottagers will be advised not to throw away the water in which potatoes have been boiled, but to use it as a substitute for the strong ale with which the husbandman, in years, alas! gone by, used to be treated.

I sincerely congratulate the League on the splendid commencement of the Quarter of a Million Fund.

I have always said that the delegates and lecturers of the League were only missionaries to teach; but when full meetings could be obtained, by townsmen coming forward to hear townsmen talk to them, then would the accomplishment of their desires not be very far off. We had an instance of a town's meeting here last night, and a splendid one it was; the addresses would not have disgraced a Covent Garden meeting.

I am, Sir, yours very sincerely,

Richard Cobden, Esq.

9, Bruce-street, Dunfermline, 27th Dec., 1845.

RESPECTED SIR,—The annexed resolution was unanimously adopted last night, at a meeting in the Town Hall. For your information I may state, that immediately on receipt of intelligence of the resignation of the Peel ministry, a copy of the Times was ordered by a few of the most zealous of the operative Free Traders, and was every night read publicly, on the arrival of the post. The interest exhibited was only equalled by that at the passing of the Reform Bill. A great majority of the audiences were of the working class, with a sprinkling of shopkeepers and manufacturers; and it was delightful to witness the unanimity and enthusiasm which prevailed. Tories, Whigs, and Chartists were present; and all of them declared their willingness to forego for a time their opinions on other questions, and unite on the one, repeal of the Corn Laws. The choppings and changings in the ministry appeared to them of much less consequence than the course the League, and you, Sir, in particular, would adopt in the present singular and eventful crisis. They hoped that you would have been ready to lead the masses in an immediate and simultaneous attack on "that mass of ignorance and selfishness, the landed interest;" and they were quite prepared to give their quota of "the force" necessary to effect the object. With these hopes and feelings, imagine the disappointment and regret—I ought rather to say dismay—with which that part of your speech at Manchester was received where you evidently made up your mind for a lengthened contest, fall back on your old plan of vanquishing the British aristocracy by the purchase of 40*s.* freeholds, and to allow the present fortunate and unlooked-for state of public opinion to pass unimproved—at least, so far as respects an attempt to organise "the people" against the monopolists, is concerned. After the reading of the papers, a discussion ensued on the position of the Free Trade question, which resulted in the unanimous adoption of the resolution I have the honour to forward you by desire of the meeting. With admiration for your talent, and gratitude for your exertions in the cause of Free Trade, and with a lively hope that you will before long see it your duty to put yourself at the head of the people to achieve your object, of which there will then be no doubt,—I remain, Sir, yours respectfully,

Richard Cobden, Esq.

THOMAS MORRISON.

"COPY OF RESOLUTION.

"That this meeting observes with deep regret that Mr. Cobden, in his speech at Manchester, anticipates a lengthened agitation to obtain a repeal of the Corn Laws, which he hopes to effect by swamping the landed interest in the counties by the purchase of 40*s.* freeholds. That in our opinion the present time is most favourable for a decisive attack on the monopolists, and for that purpose we respectfully suggest to the League the propriety of their recommending a national organisation of the working classes, or such other plan they might approve, as best calculated to obtain a total and immediate repeal of those obnoxious laws. Also, that this resolution, with an explanatory letter, be sent to Mr. Cobden."

19, Little Pulteney-street, Golden-square, Jan. 1st, 1846.

DEAR SIR,—With much pleasure I forward you the enclosed 10*l.* as my contribution to the 250,000*l.* fund, being double my former one, and ready to double again should 500,000*l.* be wanted. I cordially agree with every effort that has been made, during this arduous struggle, for the emancipation of our just and sacred rights; but, above all, the last and great movement in the County Registration Courts, which, I believe, will prove the most powerful and decisive, and, without doubt, a truly constitutional weapon, that can be brought into action, to curb the selfish and destructive policy of our assuming, hereditary, legislators. I can hardly presume to offer any remarks after the brilliant efforts that have been made to awaken the minds of the industrious middle and working classes to the vast and paramount importance of the 40*s.* freehold qualification. I would earnestly remind all true Leaguers, and every friend to enlightened legislation, not to let one day pass without placing themselves in a position by this simple, but effective means, of rendering their country most important service; for we know not at this eventful crisis what a day may bring forth. That we must be called on before long, is certain, to exercise the noble privilege of choosing our law-makers; and into whose hands we trust the destinies of millions of our skilled and toiling fellow countrymen will be placed.

I remain, Dear Sir, Yours faithfully,

A. W. Paulton, Esq.

J. W. HUTCHINSON.

To the Editor of THE LEAGUE.

ROXBURGHSHIRE, DEC. 22.—SIR, I have received your communication recommending me to acquire freehold qualifications in certain English counties, with the view of promoting the great cause of Free Trade. I shall make particular inquiry, and do what is right in the matter. In the meantime, there are one or two remarks which I would humbly venture to submit to your consideration bearing upon this important subject. Before doing so, however, I may first state what we have been doing on this side of the border since the Reform Bill became law. In the year 1832, the constituency of this county numbered nearly 1300; that number is now 2100; thus showing an increase of 800 during the last twelve years. Allowing 700 of these freeholds to have cost 150*l.* each, you have thus a sum of not less than 105,000*l.* expended in the purchase of freeholds; and when it is considered that the county contains only 45,000 inhabitants, it will be allowed that there has been no apathy here, at least in the matter of the franchise.

Having said this much as my warrant for what is to follow, I would remark that the franchise in Scotland is a 10*l.* franchise, while the English is only 2*l.*; that the population of England is 16,000,000, of Scotland only 2,500,000; that the property-tax renchises 5,000,000*l.*, of which Scotland contributes only 350,000*l.*, or one-fourteenth part; and that England returns 500 members to Parliament, Scotland only 53—the result of all which is, $5 \times 6 \times 14 \times 10 = 4200$; that is, in this question of the franchise England possesses capabilities no less than 4200 times greater than Scotland. But, indeed, this is understating the case, since there exists another vast power of extending it in England not known here. This arises from the Freeman clause, which I understand extends to all the old burghs, without exception; and although it may be difficult to calculate its precise value in figures, yet it must be very great. These calculations show how much more political power the English people possess than the Scotch. But, alas! how do they exercise that power? While Ireland and Scotland, far poorer countries, have always returned a majority of liberal representatives, these are altogether swamped by the great preponderance of the English Tory members—the exertions of the Irish and Scotch being rendered unavailing through the apathy, ignorance, and venality of the great body of the English electors

These may appear strong terms, but are they not borne out by notorious facts? Is it not so, that at elections votes are given not out of regard to the candidate's principles, but the colour of his favours, or the family of which he happens to be a member or relative? There is indeed another method, worse than either of these, and that is, the acceptance of even the most trifling sum of money as a bribe. Nor is this vile system of bribery confined to the humbler classes. I remember seeing it stated some years ago, that in the Burgh of Stafford, voters, persons of condition, actually came in their carriages to receive these wages of sin. I observed also, within the last twelve or eighteen months, a contest in Yorkshire for the keepership of a county record, the electors being owners of 100*l.* sterling in land; yet even with this constituency of gentlemen (qualified by property to be placed in the commission of the peace) the expenses incurred by the two candidates amounted to 6000*l.*; and although none of this might be given in money, it must have been for their travelling expenses and refreshments, both of which ought to have been beneath their acceptance. It was oppressive treatment to the candidates, and a bad example set to their poorer countrymen. I am proud to say that in Scotland, electors in the middle rank of society will rarely accept payment of their travelling expenses in going to the poll.

What I would, therefore, humbly suggest, is the necessity of your unceasingly impressing on your countrymen the propriety of

1st. Considering that the franchise is nothing more than a trust placed by the constitution in their hands, and that the perversion of this trust, by exercising it without reflection, or for venal considerations, is an act of open treachery and wickedness, and in cases where the bribery oath is tendered also, of perjury.

2nd. To urge them not only to refuse reward for their votes, but to defray their travelling charges out of their own pockets in all cases where they are able to do so, besides assisting their poorer brethren. Were this rule acted upon in the approaching contest for Yorkshire, for instance, perhaps 50,000*l.* would be saved, and the successful candidate would be under no obligation to any elector in particular: whereas, if his expenses are defrayed by fifty or a hundred noblemen and gentlemen, he is laid under a deep obligation to the parties, and thus does not hold the proper independent position in Parliament of representing equally all his constituents.

3rd. As it is for the reasons above stated only in England the Free Trade battle can be won, this fact ought to be constantly impressed on them, as well in connection with the acquirement of freeholds as of entering as freemen in boroughs, and in all cases at their own sole expense.

By such means as these, and by such only, can the English nation secure freedom of trade, and relieve themselves of the debt of gratitude they owe to their Irish and Scottish brethren.

I am yours, &c.,
A SCOTTISH ELECTOR.

To the Editor of THE LEAGUE.

The Edge, near Sheffield, Dec. 30, 1845.

SIR,—I herewith enclose 10*l.* from a friend and myself towards purchase of smock frocks for some of the labourers alluded to by Mr. Ferguson in last week's LEAGUE. You will much oblige me by placing it at the disposal of that gentleman in due course. I also beg to say that my subscription to the League fund will be this year 3*l.*; my last year's was 1*l.* I will pay it to the local agents when called upon. I am, very truly, &c.

EDW. HOYLAND.

To the Editor of THE LEAGUE.

Retford, Nottinghamshire, Dec. 30, 1845.

SIR,—On reading the statement by Mr. Ferguson in THE LEAGUE, respecting the poor labourers in Bicester, Oxfordshire, I forward 1*l.* to be appropriated for smock frocks, that some of the poor may have the comfort of going to the house of God.

WM. SHREWSBURY, SEN.

We have received the following from a friend in Manchester, to whom it was addressed:—

Liverpool, 18th November, 1845.

MY DEAR SIR,—I hand you a statement of the domestic cotton goods exported from the port of Boston in the months of September and October, which you will please forward to the LEAGUE; showing that their supplanting our manufactures is only a question of time, if the price of food in this country continues under the present restrictions on importation.—Your's truly,

W. WATSON.

BOSTON.

DOMESTIC COTTON GOODS TRADE.

The export of Domestic Cotton Goods from the port of Boston, for the month ending September 30, has been as follows:—

To Valparaiso.....	bales and cases	2256
Hong Kong.....		490
Rio Janeiro.....		150
Sumatra.....		75
California.....		26
Jamaica.....		33
Buenos Ayres.....		70
Smayna.....		94
Hobart Town.....		49
Laguana and Porto Cabello.....		38
St. Domingo.....		15
St. Peters.....		6
San Juan.....		4
New Orleans.....		449
Mobile.....		20
Charleston.....		980
Baltimore.....		504
Philadelphia.....		2372
New York.....		5253

Total for September.....	12,884
August.....	4263
July.....	4637
June.....	2375

Total for four months.....	24,359
Same time last year.....	33,154
Exported to Foreign ports this year.....	10,975
Same time last year.....	7390

Increase.....	3385
Export to Domestic ports this year.....	13,384
Same time last year.....	29,764
Decrease.....	12,380

The export of Domestic Cotton Goods from the port of Boston, for the month ending October 31, has been as follows:—

To Hong Kong.....	bales and cases	169
Manilla.....		245
East Indies.....		230
Rio Janeiro.....		397
Buenos Ayres.....		25
South America, via Richmond.....		164
St. Thomas.....		93

West Indies.....	25
Campeachy.....	25
Cape Haytien.....	13
Mansanilla and Peru.....	51
Puyal.....	11
St. Peters, Miq.....	25
St. Domingo.....	50
Pernambuco.....	1
Nova Scotia.....	4
New Orleans.....	313
Mobile.....	93
Charleston.....	1160
New York.....	4638
Baltimore.....	1800
Philadelphia.....	2352
Richmond.....	104
Apalachicola.....	95
Salem.....	50
Pattersonville.....	5
Calais, Me.....	4
Thomaston, Me.....	6
Belfast.....	6
Castine.....	4
Portland.....	1

Total for October.....	12,114
Previous four months.....	24,359

Total for five months.....	36,473
Same time last year.....	40,134

Exported to Foreign ports this year.....	12,459
Same time last year.....	9571

Increase.....	2887
Exported to Domestic ports this year.....	24,015
Same time last year.....	30,563

Decrease.....	6548
---------------	------

THE SHADOW AND THE PANIC.

A WITCH STORY FOR THE NEW YEAR.

CHAPTER I.

Some account of where and under what circumstances.

How long it is ago can hardly yet be told. It may be known before we are done.

The time of the year was December. There were mistletoe about and holly; there were carcasses of prize cattle, which told of Christmas; but the weather did not belong to Christmas. It was not weather to rejoice the well-fed of the world; the butchers did not like it. It was not weather to rejoice the firesides of the very poor, for benevolent coal clubs did not open their hearts because it was not a hard winter. It was foggy, muggy, muddy, chilly, shivery, drizzly, windy, cold, and wet weather; that is what it was.

It was like as if December had not taken his natural rest, and had not risen from his bed the sound-headed, hard-footed Christmas-faced, dancing December which he used to be. It was as if he had turned his days, short as they were, into nights, and had been spending them with November in carousals of heavy-wettedness; coming home to the performance of his own business dozing and winking; bespattered from head to foot; refusing to be brushed and look respectable; storming and blustering; driving poor people about who were obliged to carry loads on their heads; wetting every body all over; tearing the soles from bad shoes, and the shoes from wayworn feet; spoiling the prize beef and mutton, and the geese and turkeys, and threatening to do the same with the mince-pies, and make Christmas like himself, sour and unhappy. Such was that December in which occurred the events of our legend.

I do not know that our legend belongs exclusively to any one place. I have reason to believe it does not. We often find different towns in possession of the same legends. For instance, 20 villages in England, and nearly as many in Scotland, contend with half as many towns for the distinction of having buried a lady who was only in a trance, and of having had a sexton who opened the grave at night, and cut her fingers off to get her rings; who thus broke her trance, and enabled her to get up and tap at her own door for admittance, within which the bereaved husband was heard to declare that if his wife was not dead and buried, he would say that she was at the door!

Some towns dispute as to which burned the last witch; some dispute as to which of them gave birth to the man who sold himself to —, no matter whom; and others contend for the distinction of having had a ravine dug out, a bridge built, or a road made by that remarkable old "navvy," who bought the man who sold himself. It has even been disputed to which parish some ghost belonged, which made its appearance in several, as if it had been a parish ghost seeking a settlement.

There is no doubt but the events of our present story have occurred in more places than one. I believe there is scarcely a town distinguished enough to have a corn-market in it, in which they have not occurred. But I adhere to a West of England version, as it happened in the county town of a shire which has the Bristol Channel on one side and South Wales on the other. This town stands on the banks of the river Doubleyou, near to its confluence with the Emm, and they were both in high flood. It is a genteel river, the Doubleyou, but had then been getting in its first winter contributions, a kind of water rental from the plebeian working streams, and it looked familiar with them, and was not so genteel and reserved as it had been. It was of a fustian-jacket-like colour, but not so black as its vassal the Emm, which issued from the womb of the Welsh mountains, deep into which the human ants—worms, if you will—had penetrated for coal and iron to make wealth and strength for England. The Emm was a working river, embrowned with its coaly toil and with the iron rocks in the deep caves, and with the red earth which seemed to yield its very blood to give England treasure. A hundred humble streams of its own industrious order joined with it, and were swallowed up by the genteeler Doubleyou, which, in its turn, was gobbled by the Severn, he rolling along like a tax-gatherer to the ocean to feed the great monopolist of all; where the dyed waters from the Welsh hills bore no more evidence of having once been the water of working streams than do any three halfpence paid for a pennyworth of bread bear evidence of having been once a working-man's halfpence when they are in the treasury of a duke—the fractional part of an ocean of guineas.

The Emm rushed down in full flood, as if it could not spare a moment from business to linger anywhere. Its neighbours, larger and less, were all alike. The very springlets, by far too young as yet to do any work, imitated their elders, put their little feet in their father's shoes, put his hat on, which fell over their eyes, rambled about knowing not where they went, and raised their voices as if they bade all England bear witness that they had now grown big.

But it was a dreary day to such men and beasts as were obliged to be out in it. How the shepherd who had been twenty years in that one service, having his choice between the shelter of the hedge where the ground was wettest, or the windy side of the hedge where the ground was driest, longed to see ten other Decembers over his head that he might then perchance get a "premium of a sovereign and a great coat, with the society's buttons on it, for long service!" How strongly did he feel a conviction that stall and shed feeding for turnip eating sheep was the best! and when he saw his flock knee deep in earthy mortar, their food as deep in the mud as their feet; and how the cattle in the wet meadows shivered, and felt what it was to be on farms which had not plenty of straw for them and winter food; how they would have understood the operation of a Corn Law, which their owners did not understand, had they been farmers as well as beasts; how they would have said, bring oats and beans for us to eat and be fat with, and we will make the farm rich to grow wheat and plenty of warm straw to be on, and much provender to be added by you to our oats and beans!

But shepherds and sheep, and meadow cattle, shivered and were drenched, and nobody seemed to think they ought to be warm and dry. What between the ploughmen sinking in the undrained land when they ventured on it in the day time, and sinking in their potato burrows when they put their feet on them at night, unconscious that their stores of winter food had been transformed into heaps of rottenness; what between their master seeing the wheat which was sown for next year's crop rotting in the ground, because the land was undrained and the weather so continuously wet; what between his knowing that he had no money to drain it, and not much chance of getting the profit if he had money and did drain it; what between having his hay spoiled in the summer by a month of rain, and the flooding of the rivers upon meadows where his rheumatic sheep now stood—rheumatic because they were in the wet, in the wet because they must pick up scanty grass, there being little hay, no corn to eat, and little straw to lie upon; what between all these things, the continued gloom of the weather, and a gloomy foreboding of something which was once far off, but which was now coming near and nearer, and which such friends as they ever took pleasure in listening to, said was to be a terrible calamity; what between all these things, they were every one, both masters and men, as low in spirits as the weather-glass in the parlour, or as the cattle that hung their heads in the meadows.

But amid all this dreariness of man and beast, of earth and air, there was, at least in one place, a spot of joy—a focus of happiness, where the light spirits of youth, released from school for the Christmas holidays had assembled. A young tradition says it was in the town which stands at the mouth of the Emm, or rather where the Doubleyou snatches up the Emm in its mouth, that these light spirits, heroes and heroines of our tale, were assembled.

CHAPTER II.

An account of the Giant Child and his Grandmother.

In that town indicated in the last chapter lived a fortune-teller, one Sally Morgan. It was often a subject of dispute with the townspeople, whether old Sally really believed in her power of telling fortunes, or only professed to do so for the pence which the practice brought to her. If she did not believe, she simulated belief with wonderful fidelity. My own opinion is that she believed. The fact that out of hundreds of prophecies there was hardly one instance known of her being correct, only proves that her system of fortune-telling was false ; it does not prove that she did not believe in it.

She was grandmother to one Benjamin Morgan, a man of large stature and weak mind, who walked on crutches, and did not look straight with his eyes. He was old enough to be a man, but hardly wise enough to be a boy. He passed his time as a boy ; as a small boy ; as a boy petted and made much of—even unto spoiling.

There might be some excuse for this, inasmuch as he, being of weak mind, and of feeble health, and being entirely under the charge of his grandmother, she had a tenderness of regard for him, increased by his helplessness. But this tenderness of regard led her to confine him entirely within doors, suffering him not to go out either for the increase of health or strength, or to assist in adding something to the family income. Indeed, on the last point, it was sometimes alleged that old Sally made more money through the pretence of having a poor helpless, fatherless and motherless "innocent" to look after, than she would have done had he worked for and looked after himself. And there is no question at all that her practice of fortune-telling was far more profitable to her than a more honest course of life would have been. And there was something in the appearance of the gigantic child in her house, always there and never out of doors, save when he peeped out at lonely hours, and instantly drew in again if he saw himself observed,—there was something in this giant whom she "protected" that deepened the mystery of her own life, and thus added value to her prophecies ; for prophecies must be planted in deep mystery to take root and grow, and be rank, and rear themselves up with dark shadows, and look terrible. If there is no mystery at their roots, there is no life in them ; they are seen, and they perish. The world's eye withers them up.

The giant was not an unhappy creature ; though, by a kind of "whining" noise he made whenever a stranger came within hearing, that stranger would have thought him greatly distressed. He begged halfpence from all who came to his grandmother to get their fortunes told, and it was her custom to foretell an indifferent fortune to those who in the least hesitated to give him halfpence. To those who refused, she prophesied disasters not much short of ending their days upon the gallows.

The gigantic Benjamin, by the halfpence thus obtained, and by other means, to be explained presently, provided himself with toys for his amusement ; rather, it should be said, for his employment, for he had no employment but his amusements. He had a box of earth in the front window, and another in the back window, and in these he would plant a bean or two, and half a dozen grains of wheat. The hearthstone was his farmyard ; and he had not only wheeled waggons and ploughs upon it, but horses on wheels. He had cows which lay down because they could not stand—not for fat, but for the want of feet to their wooden pegs. The floor was always in confusion. It was bestrewn with wooden hounds, foxes, and hunters, which stood still, save when he moved them ; and when he was tired of moving them, and tired of play, he grumbled to his grandmother, who comforted him with the assurance that somebody would soon be coming to get their fortunes told, of whom he could beg a few more halfpence to get a few more toys. And when they came, this he did accordingly.

It was a pitiable sight to see a creature, and that creature human, bearing the name, nature, stature, and years of a man, thus growing into mature life, year after year, with no higher enjoyment, and no higher purpose, than the play of a child. Pity suggests that we should hide such a helpless being, so humiliating to human nature, in obscurity for ever ; but duty says, that he who could learn nothing himself must be made a lesson of instruction to others. The giant Ben had certain propensities and habits, and did certain acts which led some people to doubt if he was as harmless and weak-minded as he outwardly seemed to be. He was not altogether an innocent ; he was not free of guile : but that I attribute to weakness of intellect, and the teaching of his grandmother, rather than to any inherent propensity to do mischief. He was taught to live by his helplessness, as has been already told ; how he acted up to that tuition we shall now in part discover.

It was in grandmother Morgan's house that the holiday children, who had escaped from school, were assembled to have sport with one another and with Ben. The old woman had this peculiarity about children coming to her house, that she did not hate them, else she would not have permitted them to come ; but she only loved them for what they brought with them. They brought their holiday half-pence ; and their fathers and mothers gave them liberty to take presents to her, that she might not cast an evil eye on them in after life. She also contrived to be friendly with the parents, and she was friendly with them because she foretold the good fortune that was to happen to the children, to such children at least as shared their cakes with her gigantic grandson, Big Ben. The children were also excellent listeners to her stories about witches, ghosts, fairies, and enchantments ; and as she loved to hear herself talk, she loved listeners. Thus far, and thus far only, did she love the children.

They, on the other hand, thought it such prime sport to see Big Ben, larger than any of their fathers, playing with toys, and they allowed to mingle their toys with his, that nearly every one, whose parents would permit, and who had a toy, or a box of toys to bring with them, were there in the play led on to the sport by the great man-child. And they put all the oddest looking toys and the most expensive together, and made a show of them. Their cows and bulls that ran upon wheels, and their pigs that had not a leg to carry them, they put them altogether, and clapped their hands and laughed ; Big Ben clapping his hands first, and laughing loudest. They called this their Christmas cattle show ; and then the little ones clapped their hands louder and louder, because Big Ben continued to clap his hands.

The world has many pleasant things in it ; things at once happy and beautiful. It has months called May and June, and they have fruit-trees and blossoms in them, and flower-gardens. The world has weddings. It has also first-born babies, and young mothers nursing them. Christmas belongs to the world, and boxing day ; and so do many happy things that belong to Christmas and to boxing day. The assemblies of happy little children belong to both ; and the world has no lovelier sight than an assembly of little children, entertaining one another with their own cakes and fruit ; with their own miniature table spread and surrounded by themselves, making their own mirth, singing their own songs, dancing their own dances, laughing their own laughter. They are fairies at such a time ; but, like the fairies of the summer groves, you must be good friends with them, and approach them discreetly, to be admitted into their society without spoiling it. They have come too recently from fairy-land, have advanced but too short a way into the mortal world, to have their joys fully understood, or partaken of by mortals who cease to be mirthful as they grow into the world, and think they grow wiser as they cease to be mirthful.

There was not a happier assembly of young spirits within the regions of Christmas mirth than that which met at Sally Morgan's ; there might be a few, perhaps a good many, who had some distrust of both Sally and her grandson, but they got such a warm welcome, and were so caressed by the old lady, and so assured of friendship that would never vary by the very large and silly gentleman, Mr. Benjamin, that they were speedily relieved of all distrust ; and they proceeded with their show of toys, and their play as farmers and farmers' wives, led on by Big Ben himself, most gloriously and uproariously.

So long as the cakes and halfpence they brought with them lasted, and the apples, nuts, and oranges which the halfpence were sent out to purchase lasted, Big Ben was the best of friends. It has since been alleged that when he could get no more halfpence, cakes, apples, nuts, or oranges, from them, he began to help himself to their toys ; and his avarice growing by what it fed on, as a prize pig does, he, in conjunction with his grandmother, who told them such ghost stories as nearly frightened them out of their senses, and who raised ghosts, or who made them shut their eyes that they might not see the ghosts which she said were there—his avarice growing by what it fed on, to wit, friendship for children's halfpence, and cakes, and toys, aided by his grandmother, who told him it was quite right that they should make dupes of those who would be duped, he proceeded to take from them things which they never intended to part with, and which they never knew how they lost.

But in saying this I am perhaps speaking too fast ; too fast in respect of time and place, if not in respect of act and fact. We shall see.

CHAPTER III.

The Shadow and the Witch and the Panic.

The gigantic child led on the play, by telling every one what they were to do. They were to play at farmers ; and, as they were all in his house, he was to be landlord, and they were only to do what he bade them. And they all clapped their hands, and said they would only do what he bade them. And it was comical to see the large creature, with the body of a giant and the mind of a baby, directing their play ; telling them how he would teach them to make nine pretty farms all over the floor and on the hearth ; how he would tell them the best way to put out their toys to be like a real farm, while he had never seen a real farm in his life, and knew nothing of one but what his grandmother told him ; and she, old woman, had been short-sighted, very, all her days.

His own eyes not serving him perfectly in estimating the number of children in the room, who contended for space to spread out their toys, and less perfectly in estimating the space of floor proper to each, according to the toys each had to put upon it, he gave some a great deal too much, and left none to others. Mat White was one who had not many toys, but who was to have all the room between the arm-chair at the fireside and the table at the front window. John Button, who had a great many toys, and no room to make a farm, seeing how much space Mat White had got, looked on in silence for awhile, and at last said he did not care about playing at farms ; he would make a shop. And others, who had been looking on, like him, and for the same reason, cried with delight at the discovery of this resource, that they would keep shops, too.

"I won't have no shops," said Big Ben. "What do we want with shops ? We be a playing at farmers. You are all farmers, and I am your landlord. I won't have no shops, now, I tell you. And I tell you what it is, Button ; if you don't do like the rest, you shan't play at all."

"But I can't do like the rest," replied Button. "There is Mat White making his meadows all under his grandmother's arm-chair, and over half the floor, just for his own few sheep and cows ; and see how he is just getting anything, pieces of stick and cinder, and calling them bulls and cows ! There is no room for me. I should keep a shop, and they as have farms should come to market and sell butter, and cheese, and corn, and buy things at my shop. And I should pay rent to you for my shop, as well as they do for their farms."

Upon which Mat White said pettishly, "Now Button, you are always for something new, and spoiling the play. I'm sure Mr. Benjamin knows better how we should play than you do ; and he says we are to play at farms, and have no shops. What do we want with shops ? Aint it genteeler to have farms than shops ? (whispering) I'll let you have part of mine for one of your seed cakes."

And thus the first attempt was made at the middle-man system and sub-letting. But in this case it was prevented. Big Ben had the merit of seeing his own interest in this instance. He saw the seed cakes in Button's pocket, and heard some jingling of halfpence, so he gave him and several others who had seed cakes and halfpence in their pockets leave to play at shops. He, however, impressed on them, or tried to do so, the fact that it was a great favour to let them play at shops ; and though the space required was small, they must give him much more seed cake for that than any one gave for the same room who played at farms. Button said he did not mind giving one of his seed cakes and another halfpenny, only he did not think it was fair to make him pay for just half the top of the smallest stool in the house, while Mat White had all the room from the arm-chair to the table for a seed cake and two halfpennies. He asked in addition, how could they play at farms if there was not somebody to pay them for what they brought to market ; and to sell that again, and to get the implements for them to work with, and the clothes for them to wear that played at farms ?

At which Big Ben only laughed, and said, "Ah, Button, you don't know how to play ; what has a farm to do with a shop ? You mind your shop, that is all you have to do. Now all of you as have shops, put your things in them."

And the little shopkeepers clapped their hands, and said how nice it was to keep shops ; and they called to Mat White, and all the little boys that had farms, and to the little maids that called themselves farmers' wives and dairymen, to be quick, and make their butter and cheese, and fetch it to the shops ; and to be quick and sow their corn, and get it reaped, and threshed, and winnowed, and measured, and bagged, and carried to market. And all their little voices shouted, and called out, "Let us get butter, and cheese, and corn to carry to the market."

And so they went on as busy as little bees, and as noisy ; and some never stopped, no, not for an instant, until long after they had seen Mat White stop and sit down on his farm, and let his cows fall down flat on their sides that had no feet to their wooden pegs. He was listening, and then they all listened, to a tale which old Sally was telling of a witch that was to come across the Bristol Channel to the shores of Monmouth in a ship ; and the witch was to take hold of all little children, and open their mouths, and put food down their throats until they burst ; and was also to fill all their fathers and mothers until they burst ; and all their big brothers and sisters until they burst ; and all the parsons, and doctors, and lawyers until they burst ; all the lords and ladies of the land until they burst ; and all the cats, and dogs, and pigs, and fowls, and horses, and cattle, farm-labourers, and all ; paupers, too, in the workhouses ; every beast, and bird, and fish, and living thing was to be filled with food by the witch until everything bursted! And everything with itself bursted, was to live and never eat another morsel of food, nor move from the spot upon which it was rent asunder by the fullness of the one great burst of food which the witch was to give it. All green things were to wither and die; nothing was to live to see the desolation but the creatures that had bursted with fullness of food. They were to live for punishment if they allowed the witch ever to set foot on dry land in Monmouthshire.

Mat White was so frightened, that he was almost running away from his farm, but he was as near to old Sally's arm-chair as he could get; so he held on where he was, and crept under her arm, and never looked over his shoulder to see if his toys were all safe. It was said that Big Ben took advantage of this diversion, and got hold of both cakes and nuts and pence and toys. But, if it was true, it was only Button that saw it. There was such a panic among the little creatures, they could do nothing but hold on by one another, and cry in terror, "Oh, if the witch should come, and fill us all till we burst!" and look at old Sally earnestly in the face, to see if there was hope of her being able to save them from the witch.

And old Sally understood their looks, and said there was only one way to be safe from the witch; they must each of them give Benjamin a halfpenny and a nut to crack, and not forget herself with something that was soft to her old teeth; if they did that, she and Benjamin would keep the witch away, and they would not be filled till they bursted.

Button murmured, though in a very low voice, "This is not playing at farms and shops, listening to a story about a witch. If you be all at work, as you should be, the witch will never catch you to fill you till you burst."

However, Button paid his halfpenny and his nut to Big Ben, along with the rest, and gave a sugar-plum to Ben's grandmother; "For," said he, "if I don't, Ben will take more out of my shop." And then he called to Mat White and the rest, saying, "Come, now; get on and fetch your things to market, and let us buy them; and then you will get what you want out of our shops."

And Big Ben cried, "Yes, come; let every one come and be at the market selling their corn. Now you are all on the road to market. Now you are all in the market. Now you are to be all ready to sell your corn; but you are not to begin until I tell you; you are to do nothing until I tell you. Button, what are you about, buying and selling before I bid you begin? Grandmother, look at Button; he won't wait till I give the word; he will buy and sell; make him leave off, grandmother."

Whereupon old Mrs. Morgan said something, and did something, and moved forward and then backward, and again said something, and once again did what she did before, and a black shadow was seen rising upon Button. And all of the little graziers and corn-growers, and the little maids that acted as if they were their wives, with butter and cheese to sell, saw the black shadow upon Button, and they started back and would not sell anything, nor exchange anything, nor do anything, neither with him nor with one another. They would not move; they could not. Their little hearts smote within them, and they trembled; for it was a real black shadow.

After it was gone, Button professed not to care for it, and said there was no use being frightened at shadows; and he told Mat White that he never would do anything on that part of the floor between Old Sally's arm chair and the table, if he was to be frightened at shadows, for there were always shadows there,—her shadow, and Big Ben's. Indeed, he thought that when they were all frightened at the black shadow which Old Sally made, he had seen Ben's hand, his real hand, not a shadow of it, on more of the farms than Mat White's, and on that among the rest.

And so two or three of them suspected. Mat White found that some of the cows which he had left lying for want of feet to their wooden pegs, were missing, and the remaining halfpence which he had been persuaded to deposit behind the arm-chair, on that part of the floor called his farm, and close to Big Ben's seat, were all gone.

He did not hide his loss. He grumbled loudly. At first, Ben and his grandmother frowned upon him for complaining. But when he blamed Button, or some of those who played at shops, for having taken his halfpence when the black shadow was in the room, they joined in the complaint, and said it was a shame to have taken Mat White's halfpence; and Button or some one who was not friendly to Mat, must have done it.

Button denied that he had done it, and said that it was done when the shadow came, and when, as they all knew, he was trying to find out what the shadow was, for he did not believe it was anything but a trick; and perhaps it was not hard to guess who made the shadow and who stole the halfpence.

Whereupon, old Sally called him a little unbelieving cheating rogue, who would go to a bad place when he died. And all the children who believed old Sally, and all who were afraid of her, though they did not believe her, called Button an unbelieving rogue, who would go to a bad place when he died.

But Button persevered in the truth, and asserted that it was not he that had robbed Mat White, nor was it any of the others who played at shops. He knew who it was, and he would tell plainly who it was. It was Big Ben. And he could prove to them all that more had been taken out of the shops when the witch story was told, and when the black shadow was in the room, even than from the farms.

Children as they were, and frightened as they were of Big Ben, lest he should be angry, they looked as if they believed Button rather than Ben and his grandmother. Seeing which, old Sally told them she would let the witch come upon them all, and fill them till they bursted. "There is the witch at the door!" she cried; "The witch will be here directly. Here she comes!"

Whether it was a witch, or goblin, or ghost, or shadow, or fancy, may not be told. But there, before the wild imagination and the disordered senses stood a mysterious something, with bags all hung round her, or his, or its body, and all the bags stuffed with penny rolls; and the hands of the thing were also full of cakes. And the thing advanced and laid hands on Button, and opened his mouth, and held it open, and stuffed cakes and penny rolls into him until he nearly bursted.

And as they saw this, and saw the thing putting out its hands to stuff them and make them burst, they all ran, some leaping out at the window and breaking, or nearly breaking, their limbs; some escaping by the door, and so getting away; but the greater part running one another down in the dark passage.

Pen cannot write, tongue cannot tell, the height and depth, length and breadth, the intensity, enormity, and disaster of that panic raised by Ben Morgan's grandmother. One thing only did not happen; not one child, not even Button, was filled until he bursted. But the victims of it who survived lost their toys. Some, alas, were never more seen. Mat White was one of them. Whether Big Ben devoured him up bodily, as some have said, or whether in his haste to escape the flooded river swept him away, is not yet known. Some were bruised, and some broken; all were stripped. Button asserts that Big Ben and his grandmother did it; and they say that the children waylaid and plundered, and misused by the witch, got no evil treatment from them; that in their house they received nothing but "protection." And strange to say, the children themselves believe it, or say they believe it. Such is the influence of Big Ben and his grandmother. They can bring together, alarm, disarm, and strip their little victims with impunity. Button says he knows better, and one day all the world will know better.

ONE WHO HAS WHISTLED AT THE PLOUGH.

A PRIZE PEASANT SHOW.

(From Punch.)

The custom of stuffing cattle to an unnatural degree is, we are told, desirable, for the purpose of improving the character of stock, and we should be very glad to see the experiment tried of improving the characters of peasants and agricultural labourers by feeding them. We should very much like to have an annual show of prize poor got up in the numerous districts where the "friends of the working man" are so very busy in cramming cattle with all kinds of herbaceous luxuries. If a good quantity of fat stock is a sign of their owner being a good farmer, surely a good quantity of plump portly-looking labourers would be a testimonial to the goodness of their employer.

We fear, however, there is no chance for any experiment being made which would involve the necessity of generous dieting. There is a much greater probability of a competition between the Norfolk and Buckland principles by a show of rival peasants, fed respectively on peas, starch, and mangel wurzel, or the celebrated promoter of warmth lately introduced to the notice of the poor in the shape of curry powder. We can fancy what a capital catalogue could be made up from the materials of such an exhibition.

No. 1. A short-legged Norfolk labourer. Fed on boiling water and curry powder. Walked thirty miles to the exhibition. Bred in the Norwich workhouse. 1st prize.

No. 2. A Hampshire labourer. Supported entirely on starch. Brought in a cab half-a-mile to the exhibition, by Dr. Buckland. 2d prize.

No. 3. An old bankrupt thimble-rig proprietor, who since the abolition of gambling at races has been living entirely on his remaining stock of peas, with a slice of mangel wurzel twice a week, and a little starch on Sundays. 3d prize.

We think that in order to make the rivalry complete, the Union workhouses should be allowed to send in a limited number of paupers for competition.

The Suspension Bridge joining St. Gilles to Croix-de-Vie (Vendée), constructed about ten years back, fell down on the 18th inst., under the weight of a heavy waggon passing over it.

A young girl, of 16 years of age, a few days back, at Laudvennee (Finistère) cut in pieces, with a sickle, a little boy aged twelve, with whom she used to play.

AGRICULTURE.

THE LANDOWNERS' BLACK-MAIL.

When the Highland chiefs owed a large portion of their revenues to the cattle they "lifted" in the lowlands, the only mode by which the industrious breeder of cattle could escape such exactions was to pay a composition or "black-mail" for immunity from pillage. And there is a rumour that Sir Robert Peel intends, upon the meeting of Parliament, to propose that the British people shall pay a "black-mail" to the landed oligarchy for immunity from the roundabout system of plunder established in the Corn Laws. If the nation have a voice in the matter, it requires no prophet to predict that such a wrong will not be submitted to.

But there is reason to apprehend that the present monopolist majority in the House of Commons may combine to perpetuate some monstrous job. Now, whatever form such a job may take, be it a direct grant of money, or the removal of rates and local taxes from the shoulders of the landowners to those of the nation, the farmers cannot partake of the unrighteous gains of such an operation. The whole profit will go into the pockets of the owners of land within twelve months after the enactment of the measure. These rates and taxes always form a deduction from rent; and if they are removed, the rent will be speedily advanced in precisely the same proportion, while the farmers, as part of the tax paying community, will have to bear their share of the additional burthens imposed on the national income.

In the contest now going on between industry and feudalism, the natural place of the farmers is on the side of industry. To none are the landowners so directly and immediately antagonistic as to the farmers; for when the restrictive scheme of the landocracy proves successful, rents are enhanced out of the profits of the industrious employers of capital and the wages of labour, including farmers and their labourers; and if the scheme break down—as it does in plentiful seasons—the high rents are still received by the landlords, but out of the substance and capital of the deluded tenant-farmers. The tenant-farmers, therefore, have an interest, in common with the rest of the industrious classes, to resist to the uttermost all attempts to offer the landlords a sop for consenting to the now inevitable repeal of the Corn Law.

In the select columns of the Morning Post we find records of numerous meetings of provincial "Protection Societies," and a great show of bustle in support of monopoly is got up. But the whole thing is a sham. Doubtless there are a few farmers in most rural districts who entertain a wild and vague apprehension of Free Trade in corn, and who really believe the false statistics which it has pleased the "Central Society" to issue, and the squires to circulate; but there is no real intention amongst the squires to sacrifice party politics to protection. They excite the farmers' fears, and pander to their prejudices, when they want to use the farmers, but they have no notion of being used by the affrighted farmers in return. When it was believed Lord John Russell was coming into office, nothing could exceed the vehemence with which the political squires vowed to "nail the flag of protection to the mast," a phrase meaning neither more nor less than that the said squires would oppose the popular minister by all means, fair or foul. But since the re-establishment of Sir Robert Peel, these gentlemen have wonderfully cooled down. Already ambiguous sayings are scattered about at "Protection meetings," which show, that if Sir Robert be inclined to repeal the Corn Laws, he will meet with no great obduracy amongst the main body of his parliamentary adherents. Most of them are obviously won before they have been wooed by a Conservative Free Trade minister, and are only hoping for the largest possible sop—compensation is the genteel word—for the public cost. Doubtless there is a little band of monopolist martyrs who will divide against the minister on some occasion, when they are quite sure he can do without them. These "farmers' friends," whose fame stands on an imperishable monument of tarred butter and taxed lard, will again expose themselves to the sharp ridicule of opponents, and the more contemptuous sneers of political friends; but none know better than they that the whole thing is a sham, a cheat got up to bamboozle the farmers.

Scarcely a public meeting occurs in which the protectionist members of Parliament do not betray the direction the current is setting. Amidst plentiful abuse of the League, now no longer dead or dying, but a thing of stupendous and dreaded power, Sir Robert Peel's friends are, as a farmer said in Devonshire, "leaving many loopholes to creep out of." Thus, in Devonshire, Sir J. Y. Buller knew nothing of the Premier's intentions, but could not suppose it possible that he would alter his own law of 1842; talked of "not consenting to any further diminution of protection until a fair equivalent was pointed out;" and would only pledge himself "to do the best he could for his constituents, according to the best of his judgment, and the circumstances in which he might happen to be placed." And a very safe pledge that is; it leaves something more than a "loophole" for contingencies. So Lord Courtenay said he "must decline to pledge himself, aye or no, in a measure of which he knew nothing;" and "to any measure which should withdraw protection from the agricultural interest without being accompanied by that which he, when the best consideration he might be able to give to the matter, should deem a fair equivalent, he should give his most strenuous opposition." It is proverbial, that when a woman hesitates, she is lost; and not less certainly is the monopolist politician, who gives his "best consideration" to propositions of change, a lost sheep from the fold of monopoly.

So, in Wiltshire, we find Mr. Heneage, one of the monopolist members for Devizes, telling his constituents:

"That the situation of Conservative members in the ensuing session would be one of great doubt and difficulty. It must be clear to everybody that there was one question—a paramount question—which would certainly be agitated during the session; or, if such a state of things should arise, at a dissolution. It was a question of which, unfortunately, they had already heard too much; it was generally termed the question of Protection. One word he would say with respect to it. He always thought that to attempt to bring one interest alone under the principle of Free Trade was unfair and unjust."

Now, if Mr. Heneage only wants the principle of Free Trade to be applied universally, in order to assent to Free Trade in corn, a Free Trade Minister will have no difficulty with him. Indeed, we are not sure that the following passage does not entitle Mr. Heneage to be an honorary member of the League;

"Should, however, the time arrive when a minister should be bold enough to say to the country—I intend to repeal the Corn Laws, but I intend at the same time to make your silks, your sugar, your timber, and other necessities cheaper, and to alter the system of taxation so that the change shall not be felt; if a minister should be found sagacious enough to say, When I do this I will provide for the great deficiency which will be produced in the revenue without any increase of taxation on the industry of the country;—then would be the grand time for the agricultural interest, for all interests, to consider what plan would be most advantageous to adopt. All we know is that such a plan has never yet been proposed."

And his colleague, Mr. Bruges, said,

"That in the present state of affairs the situation of a Member of Parliament was one of some difficulty. But as he had been returned by the electors unfettered by any pledge, so he trusted to be able to discharge his duty, as he hoped he had hitherto done, in such a manner as to deserve their confidence."

And Mr. Sotheron, member for North Wilts, who has been regarded as a sort of pilot balloon on the subject of Free Trade, remarked that,

"With regard to his political course, he would only say in plain terms, that his constituents might depend on it that to the best of his judgment and conscience, he would stand up for that which he believed to be for the interests of the whole kingdom. He would never consent to injustice being inflicted on any body, but he would legislate as far as his humble voice went on fair and equal terms to all."

This savours strongly of surrender of the long cherished monopoly of the people's food; and multitudes of similar passages might be selected from the speeches of other monopolist members. We shall content ourselves with two others. Lord Alford, in Bedfordshire, gave the following specimen of his high talent and great capacity for legislation:

"He did not, however, think any combination of circumstances could warrant Sir Robert Peel placing the Corn Laws in this state. (Cries of 'Will you support him?') He would not give any pledge—he would not consent to go into the House of Commons bound to a certain course. Sir Robert Peel was not justified in the precise course he took, but they were in the position of people who engaged to go by a train of thirty miles an hour, and the man puts on the steam and takes them at the rate of 100; but however angry they might be, they would admit he was the only person to take them in safety; and his excuse would be that there was another train coming after them at the rate of 150 miles an hour, and by Jove that was the only plan of getting out of the way. (Great confusion.) Still he admitted that Sir Robert Peel had no right to make children of them as he had done."

It has been well remarked, that even so his monopolist lordship won't escape a collision at last. Fast as he supposes the minister to be, his pace, by Lord Alford's metaphor, is still too slow.

Again, Mr. Pakington in Worcestershire said: "If the Government propose to make any alteration in the existing Corn Laws, I shall expect a statement of the reasons which have led to these alterations. I shall then reserve to myself the right to consider these arguments, and shall give every consideration to the plan which may be proposed by the Government. If, upon mature consideration the arguments advanced in support of the alteration should convince my judgment, of course I shall support their views; but if, on the contrary, I am not convinced, no high-sounding name shall induce me to give support to a proposition which I may think can be anywise injurious to the true interests of our country."

The honourable member is recorded to have resumed his seat amidst the cheers of the "protection society;" yet is Mr. Pakington a lost monopolist. And the more rational writers of the monopolist press have arrived at the conclusion that the game of monopoly is up; for, in the leading article of last Monday's Mark Lane Express, are these remarks:

"Sir Robert Peel will make such alteration in the Corn Laws as he may deem expedient, unless resisted by the mass of agriculturists through the representatives now in Parliament. He will not appeal to the country, because the struggle would be doubtful. He will, as he did before, coerce the House of Commons to agree to his terms, and leave the members to fight the battle with their constituents in 1847. Mr. Miles will, we have no doubt, rally a section under his banner; but the Minister has a sufficient margin to allow him a few more than in 1842; we do not, however, believe he will reach the number he mustered in opposition to the tariff. Our friend 'Rusticus,' an experienced practical farmer, in a letter in another part of this paper, accounts for the little effect our appeals to the farmers to arouse themselves have had, by stating that, from his experience, he finds farmers becoming advocates for repeal of the Corn Laws, but no Anti-Corn-Law advocates becoming protectionists; in fact, that public opinion is going in one direction."

Our own experience, and all we hear of the opinions of farmers in various parts of the country, confirms the explanation of "Rusticus."

Now, the mere attendance of farmers at protection meetings must not be taken as any evidence of their opinions, for they are not free agents. Three-fourths of those present are obliged to attend, as they are compelled to vote at elections for their landlords' nominee. But the prevailing sentiment amongst farmers is a desire to have the question settled; and large and increasing numbers of them know that the only settlement will be total repeal.

MONOPOLIST ARGUMENTS AND STATISTICS.

It is curious to note the grounds on which the monopolists defend the Corn Laws, and to observe how entirely self-dependent, how completely independent of facts and experience their arguments are. Take for instance the following, from the Mark Lane Express review of the corn trade:

"The object of a sliding scale of duties is to afford an adequate protection to farmers in years of plenty, when sufficient grain is grown at home for the consumption of the country; and in adverse seasons, to diminish the impost in proportion to our necessities."

How can a sliding scale, or any scale of duties, afford adequate or any protection to farmers, when "sufficient grain" is grown at home for the consumption of the country?

Is not the whole scheme of Corn Laws founded upon the assumption that enough corn is not grown at home for the consumption of the country? Why is it that, when years of plenty occur, farmers are invariably in distress? They calculate on a scarcity which does not happen, or is less intense than they expect, and then with monopolist burdens and engagements they have to encounter natural prices arising from home abundance. Then as to the diminution of the impost "in proportion to our necessities," in adverse seasons, we leave the bakers' bills, the reduced wages, and the Express's own remarks on the corn trade of the present season, to answer that statement. Again, in Worcestershire, we find Mr. Woodward, a farming land-agent, who has several times been put forward to give evidence before Agricultural Distress Committees, saying, "he would fearlessly express his belief that there was at the present moment abundance of food in this country for the maintenance of the population till next Michaelmas, without the necessity of importing a single bushel of foreign grain."

Now, such men as Mr. Woodward, whose fears are probably centred in the idea of displeasing the squires, may rush on where statesmen fear to tread; but if food is abundant, why, as he immediately said, is "the agitation which had been raised at this juncture for a repeal of the Corn Laws begun at a most critical juncture?"

We will tell Mr. Woodward and his co-monopolists why the juncture is critical: the landlords have been caught in the fact of filching the people's food; their hand has been found in the public meal sack, and they have no better excuses to offer for the awkwardness of their situation than such as are given by the minor prigs, who appear at the Old Bailey. And this same Mr. Woodward called "upon the peasantry of Worcestershire to assist in repelling their (the monopolists') assailants; for it depended upon their united exertions whether they should in future receive 7s. a bushel for their wheat, or 4s. or 4s. 6d. per bushel." The gentleman seems to have forgotten that the "peasantry" buy bread, and don't sell wheat; so that, on the authority of the Duke of Richmond, they would naturally abstain from interfering to avert such a benefit to themselves and their families as a fall in the price of wheat to 4s. or 4s. 6d. a quarter.

Let us also see how these advocates of artificial scarcity deal with statistical facts. Mr. Curtler at the same Worcestershire meeting said:

"He showed the documents issued and arguments propounded by the League, with the object of depreciating the home cotton trade, to have been founded on false premises; and, after entering into some particulars with reference to the manufacture of cotton abroad, and its effect upon the English market, he proceeded to combat the arguments made use of by the League, that Free Trade in Corn would certainly bring increase of trade in manufactures. For this purpose Mr. Curtler showed that, from 1836 to 1841, we had large importations of corn into England from abroad. In 1838, the ports were thrown open from the operation of the old Corn Laws, and a deluge of foreign corn was the result. But what was going on in the manufacturing districts all this while? Where was the promised activity in trade and manufactures? Why, the fact was, that at this very time there was great commercial depression. Numbers of cotton mills were shut up, the manufacturing population sought refuge in the workhouses, and trade was almost entirely suspended. And this commercial depression actually took place at the very time when (the ports being open) the Leaguers now assert that foreigners would exchange their corn for our manufactures. Foreigners had, in fact, so improved their own manufactures as not to require ours in the proportion alleged by the Free Traders, and it seemed impossible that we could find a market for our manufactures much extended beyond our present production."

Now it would be difficult to find a more complete specimen of perverse and wrong-headed ingenuity. The importations alluded to took place under the operation of the Corn Law, after the artificial scarcity created by that law had been so long continued that the trade of the country had become so fearfully depressed, as to lead many to despair of its recovery. Yet it did recover when food again became plentiful; and let such obtuse men as Mr. Curtler remark, that trade is again languishing under the influence of returning artificial scarcity, which he and his fellows are banded together to perpetuate.

THE SPIRIT OF LANDLORDISM.

It is a common observation that more is known of the estimation in which one is held in an individual family, from the behaviour of the children and servants, than from that of the head of the house; so is it with the landocracy; its weaker members and its dependents betray, in the most striking and offensive forms, the spirit of landlordism. Thus at the Worcester meeting of monopolists, Mr. Curtler, an attorney, said:

"With reference to the resolution which he held in his hand, that it was necessary to take means to secure the adoption of a well regulated mode of action throughout the country, in order to defeat all future attacks on the agricultural interest, he perfectly coincided with the hon. member for Droitwich, that they had to contend with an enemy of no mean character, and that they must guide their own conduct by the course which that enemy pursued. He apprehended that, although hitherto the agriculturists, as a body, had not been in the habit of meddling with the business of other people, they would soon arrive at the time when they would be driven to that expediency. He would impress upon all present that the question at issue, as it affected the interests of the agriculturists, was not one of Whig or Tory. The agriculturists should unite together, and taking the lists of voters in their hands, should make use of what arguments they had in their favour with those voters over whom they might be supposed to have any control."

We do not remember to have met with a more unblushing avowal of the use of coercion and intimidation than is contained in the last sentence.

AGRICULTURE IN SURREY.

To the Editor of THE LEAGUE.

London, Dec. 27, 1845.

SIR,—The advocates of "Protection" assert that the landowners are entitled to the exclusive supply of the home markets of Great Britain with grain, until it reaches a certain price. Such a claim leads us to inquire if, by an economical mode of farming, and by bringing into cultivation all land capable of producing food, the supply has been increased and the prices thereby reduced?

If we cross the wide tracts of heath to the south-west of Farnham, in Surrey, what progress do we see made towards reclaiming them?

Wherever industry has been at work, near the cottage of the labourer, we see patches of the heath under cultivation—but where the land is held by some large proprietor, or by the church, no attempt at improvement is visible.

In the journal of the Royal Agricultural Society, vol. 6, part 1, various modes are pointed out for reclaiming waste land; do we see any of these adopted to an extent deserving notice?

If we travel from Kelso to Edinburgh, on a side of the Tweed where indifference, or more frequently hostility, to the present Corn Laws prevails amongst the farmers, we may see land of very inferior quality, and far higher above the level of the sea than any of the Surrey hills, raising excellent green crop, on which large flocks of sheep are fed, and to which succeeds good pasture—affording evidence that, by capital and industry, many acres now unprofitable may yield a fair return to the grower, while by augmenting the supply the consumer is also benefited.

But the protectionists would fain have also the monopoly of the supply of provisions and live stock. Had you been present, as I was, at the late Cattle Show, at Farnham, on the 15th current, you might well question the propriety of such a claim. So little attention was paid to purity of breed, or the aptitude of particular kinds to fatten readily, that animals of any or no definite breed, and of any age from two to six years' old, were allowed to compete in the same "classes;" so that the same encouragement may be given to inferior animals, which in other districts is awarded to those only which remunerate the rearer, and can be brought to market at prices more favourable to the consumer.

The premium bestowed on a lot of particularly fine two tooth (i.e. two year old) wethers, a cross between the South and Hampshire Downs, and which were far superior to any other lot exhibited, might have served to convince the farmer that it was his interest to rear such kinds of stock as would early yield a return for the outlay upon their keep.

Is it then just that we shall be compelled to submit to a system which, from the absence of competition, induces the farmer to continue an unimproved mode of agriculture, which prevents the people of this country from obtaining supplies at all times from other markets, and which tends to effectually narrow the field for, and limit the extension of, our commerce?

In my next I shall endeavour to give you some account of the rents paid for land, and the rate of labourers' wages in the district.

I remain, Sir, your obedient servant,

A PROPRIETOR OF LAND IN SCOTLAND,
On a Visit in Surrey.

DISTRIBUTION OF BEDS TO AGRICULTURAL LABOURERS.

To the Editor of THE LEAGUE.

SIR,—In my long communication published in your last, there are one or two mistakes, which you will please to rectify. Case 6. For three "wretched huts," read three wretched beds. Case 9. For "Thomas Barrel," read Thomas Barratt. Case 15. For "coals 22s. per cwt.," read coals 1s. 10d. per cwt. Case 16. For "J. Mapping," read J. Napping. Case 29. For "Heperoff," read Hopcroft; for "coals 1s. per cwt.," read coals 1s. 5d. per cwt. Case 32. For "one flock bed, and one bed, and one chaff," read one flock bed and one chaff.

As I have published through your kindness an account of the starving and naked condition of some shoemakers, as well as of some field-labourers, you will I doubt not give insertion to the following, in relation to the sufferings and miseries of poor tailors. John Walduck is a tailor; he has a wife and two children. Their only bed is neither a flock nor a chaff bed, but a thing made up of pieces of old cloth and rags. Walduck is a very sober man; but as he is one of those tailors who used to be more frequently employed by the poor than by the rich, and as the peasantry have now seldom any money with which to buy either cloth or cotton, the poor tailors, like the poor shoemakers, are greatly reduced, and some of them ruined. I asked a number of poor persons, the other day, why they left off sending their children to our British School? Their answer was, Yours is a good school, and 1d. per week is a small sum to pay for the education of each child; but if you could educate our children for nothing, we could not send them; they are starving, and we send the strongest of them out to beg! What an honour and glory it must be to a certain party to support a system by which so many of the rising generation are being trained up in the arts of begging and starving upon Swedes, rotten potatoes, and a short allowance of dear bread! Allow me, sir, to add, that my door is thronged daily with persons (many of them deserving, and in great distress) begging for beds, bread, and clothes. God help the poor! for too many of them cannot help themselves.

I am, Sir, yours respectfully,

W. FERGUSON.

Bicester, King's End, Dec. 30, 1845.

LORD MORPETH AND THE WEST RIDING.

Since our last, the requisition to Lord Morpeth, soliciting him to stand for the representation of the West Riding, and which we stated was in the course of signature, has been accepted by his lordship. True to the principle laid down in his former communication to Mr. Baines, he comes out uncompromisingly for a total, immediate, and final repeal of the Corn Laws. This at once fixes the point on which the election will turn, offering both to Free Traders and monopolists a fair test for solving the question of the progress of their respective opinions. No other candidate has yet appeared in the field, though there are many whisperings and hints that an active opposition is being organised. Some of the quidnuncs murmur sagacious prophecies touching Mr. Charles Wortley; while others hang their hopes on Mr. Edwin Lascelles, brother to the Earl of Harewood. But we think that the bump of cautiousness is too largely developed in both these gentlemen for either the one or the other to encounter the moving accidents of a West Riding contest in the present state of the constituency; and if in these quarters there be a shrinking from the trial by battle, we cannot think that a scion of any other noble house, or a deputy from any clique or club, will be found valorous enough to essay a passage at arms with a man of such unbounded popularity as Lord Morpeth. No: however humiliating to the "agricultural mind" will be a transfer of the West Riding to the friends of industry, that important event is on the eve of being realised—and that, too, without any tangible opposition. Lord Morpeth, we have little doubt, will walk the course—another bitter fact, which monopoly, "dying and making no sign," must even swallow with what appetite it may.

Our opinion is founded on the ground, first, of the exceeding popularity of the candidate. Why, even with many of those who contributed to prevent Lord Morpeth's return at the last election, it was an expressed wish that he had stood alone, when they would not have regretted his return as colleague to Mr. John Wortley. This friendly feeling towards his lordship still exists, and will make sundry active Tories neutral, as well as induce men, formerly neutral, to record their suffrages in favour of Morpeth and unrestricted commerce. Secondly, on the education of farmers in the principles of Free Trade, who were formerly cheated or frightened into the opinion that, without a sliding scale, their labour would be valueless, their capital swallowed up and lost for ever, and their families plunged into ruin. But many of the burly-brained yeomanry of Yorkshire have, since the last election, examined the question of Free Trade, and found that it was not such a bugbear after all; and so far as they are "protected"—not by a sliding scale, which mocks them—but by a lease, which gives them a sort of independence of action as well as of thought,—many of these, we say, formerly opponents, will now be found among the supporters of Lord Morpeth. Thirdly,—The altered state of the registry; for whereas, at the last election, the majority was on the side of restriction, now, by the noble exertions of the League, the majority is on the side of Free Trade. It is true that the number of signatures attached to the requisition did not amount to more than one-fourth of the qualified electors; but then it ought to be remembered that the canvass did not continue over a day and a half, and, of course, in its result, gives no idea whatever of the numbers who will be prepared to rally round the yellow banner on the day of election. It is true, also, that the Free Trade registration movement was not commenced so early in the West Riding as in South Lancashire; but such a number of votes have, nevertheless, been placed upon the lists as not to leave any monopolist candidate the shadow of a chance. A result like this, however, will be entirely dependent on the activity of the Free Traders. They have spoken clearly and ably, but now is the time for vigorous action. Victory will not perch on their helms if they lazily fold their hands, and lay aside their weapons: their arms must be kept continually furnished, their ranks mustered, without leaving the name of a man out of the roll-call, when the very show of such a force with such appointments would compel the enemy to lay down their arms. But if it should come to a pitched battle, why, let it come. The Free Traders can, if they will, be prepared even for this; and with their hosts in a compact body, will cleave their way to a conquest which will be memorable in the annals of commercial reform. Contest or no contest, nothing can snatch success from the Free Traders, if they only be true to their principles. Let the registers be thoroughly examined; let officers be appointed to every district in the Riding, and every district thoroughly canvassed; let the result of the canvass be scrutinized every evening, and all possible influences brought to bear wherever there may be a hesitancy, or coldness, or want of conviction on the part of any elector as to the soundness of the principles of Free Trade. "Yorkshire governs England," is an old saying; and we think the result of the coming election will govern the minister. Free Traders! let it then be a government which may not prostrate, but emancipate industry—that will not induce famine and social misery, but spread peace and plenty throughout the land. All is in your own hands: work with a will: "Let this be but well fixed in your minds," as Hannibal said to his veterans, "and once again, we say you are conquerors."—Sheffield Iris.

The requisition calling upon Lord Morpeth to come forward as a candidate for the representation of the West Riding of Yorkshire, was presented to his lordship at Castle Howard, on Friday, 26th ult., by a deputation consisting of Messrs. F. H. Fawkes, Charles Wood, M.P., Hamer Stansfeld, and Edward Baines, jun., when he consented to be put in nomination. The feeling in favour of his lordship throughout the Riding is most decided, and far beyond what even his warmest admirers could have anticipated. As a proof of this we need only mention the fact, that within twenty-four hours the requisition to his lordship received the signatures of no less than 8,500 West Riding electors. This marked display of feeling has thrown the utmost dismay into the Conservative ranks, and even the bitterest opponents of his lordship hesitate not to predict his success, and to discourage, as altogether futile, any attempts at opposition by the monopolist party to his return. The only rumour of opposition that has yet been current is that the Hon. Edwin Lascelles, brother to Lord Harewood, will be brought out by the Tories. We believe, however, that by the Tories no steps whatever have been taken to contest the Riding, and we believe also that few of them are so short-sighted and injudicious as to venture upon a struggle which must result in inevitable mortification and defeat.

The following is the address which has been issued by Lord Morpeth:

"TO THE ELECTORS OF THE WEST RIDING OF YORKSHIRE."

"GENTLEMEN,—I am deeply penetrated by the gratifying import of the invitation which has just been conveyed to me. More than one reason might have induced me not to resume a Parliamentary life at present; but if the electors of the West Riding shall determine to persevere in the prompt and generous movement they have made in my favour, I cannot hesitate, in such a crisis of public affairs as the present, to put myself at their disposal. I appreciate the kindness of the suggestion for dispensing with a winter canvass; and I should feel it invidious to visit some of the polling districts and omit others. I will therefore present myself on the day of nomination at Wakefield, and there submit the issue to the decision of this great constituency. The inhabitants of the West Riding are already acquainted with the principles by which my public conduct, in and out of office, has been guided. I still adhere to them in all essential points; but if I am sent to the House of Commons at the present juncture, I should deem it the main object of my mission to insist upon an immediate and final repeal of the Corn Laws. I have the honour to be, Gentlemen, "Castle Howard, Dec. 26,"

"MORPETH."

NEW WEEKLY NEWSPAPER, conducted by an association of literary gentlemen. The UNIVERSE, 20,000 copies of this new journal will be published on Tuesday next. It will be a newspaper of the first class, similar in size, form, paper, and type, to the double Times. It will be the uncompromising advocate of freedom in commerce and in politics; it will be the uncompromising advocate of the rights of principles, not parties, measures, not men. It will avoid petty personalities and denominational strifes. A religious influence will pervade each department. Some of the first writers of the age are engaged as contributors. Advertisers should make immediate application, as nearly all the advertising columns are engaged. Office, 11, Whitefriars-street, Fleet-street, London.

NEW SERIES OF THE NONCONFORMIST

On Wednesday, January 7, 1846, will be presented to the public the first number of a new series of the Nonconformist,—enlarged, remodelled, and, it is confidently trusted, greatly improved.

The principles of the Nonconformist will remain, of course, unchanged. It will continue as earnestly as ever for justice as the basis of our political institutions, unrestricted liberty as the soul of commerce, and entire independence of magistracy support and control as essential to the purity and extension of the Christian church.

The spirit in which these great objects will be pursued, will be the same as in the high appreciation of the ends and independent means, and an earnest desire to compass them by peaceful and legitimate means. The prevailing tone, however, of the paper, it is proposed to modify. The Nonconformist has established its character both for integrity and for power—and the circumstances under which this has been accomplished, imposed upon it the necessity of taking an antagonistic attitude. It has had to do battle for its present position of strength—but that position having been made good, it can henceforth wield gentleness with effect. Recognised as having a right to speak, and a claim to be listened to, it will speak in the accents of faithful friendship.

The new series will be distinguished by a greater variety of literary talent. Arrangements are in progress for securing valuable assistance from several able hands, and the superiority of the Nonconformist will, it is hoped, be enhanced, by making its editorial articles the reflection of more than one mind, and its correspondence from abroad, direct, frequent, and instructive.

The news department of the paper will be entirely remodelled. It is determined to make it an interesting family journal, as well as an influential organ for the diffusion of sound political and ecclesiastical views. Ampler space for this will be commanded, without enlarging our sheet, by slightly widening and lengthening each column, and by some what more economical distribution of type. By this arrangement, it is calculated, about two pages will be gained.

Solidity and strength have been, hitherto, the characteristic features of the Nonconformist newspaper. Without impairing these, it will, in the forthcoming series, combine with them ornament and grace. Its mission is to all classes—and for all classes it will seek to provide entertainment as well as instruction.

Published every Wednesday afternoon, at No. 3, Whitefriars-street, Fleet-street, London. Price Sixpence.

THE MANCHESTER TIMES.

The MANCHESTER TIMES, commenced in 1825, was established less as a business speculation than as a means of promoting civil, religious, and commercial liberty; and every great political and social reform, during a period of unusual excitement and conflict of opinion, has received its zealous assistance.

It was the first paper in this part of the country which removed from what was then called the ultra liberal press, the imputation of infidelity; and by its reports of meetings which had previously been utterly neglected by the Manchester papers, was at first shown that Lancashire possessed a religious press.

It supported Catholic Emancipation, not from indifference to the value of Protestantism, but on the ground that men should not be excluded from civil rights on account of their religious opinions.

Its exposure of the inequality and deficiency of the old representative system previous to the proposal of the Reform Bill were of acknowledged utility; and, since the passing of that great but still imperfect measure, it has not ceased to advocate a fuller and more complete representation of the people, with full protection to the voter from the exercise of undue influences.

It was the only paper in Manchester which devoted its space to the proceedings of the Anti-slavery Society; and the editorial articles which appeared from time to time to show that man could not justly hold property in man, were not only of great utility in forming public opinion which effected the emancipation of the negroes in our colonies.

It took the lead of all the provincial papers in opposition to Church Rates, either as a direct impost, or, as the Whig administration proposed, a permanent charge on the Consolidated Fund; and it is now the only paper in Manchester which avowed that the religion of the people is not a proper subject for state legislation.

Recognizing the advantages of Education, in the establishment of new and the reform of old Educational Institutions, it has been eminently useful; and it was the only paper published in Manchester which opposed the measure of Church rate assents, and in some instances, treble the price at which, in consequence of the destruction of the monopoly in Scotland, it is now published.

It has unceasingly been the earnest advocate of perfect freedom of trade, not only for its direct benefits, but as a means of promoting Universal Peace; and it is not too much to say that the peace which Manchester has taken in the present great movement against the landowners' monopoly, in a considerable degree, be attributed to the effect produced upon the public mind by its constantly-repeated expositions of the mischiefs inflicted by the Corn Laws.

Such was the course pursued when the proprietors were in advance of public opinion, and when they had to struggle with difficulties which would have overwhelmed men of less attachment to principle and less determination to carry out the views which they were pledged to maintain. That such a course has been pursued, under such circumstances, is no slight guarantee, that now, notwithstanding the temptations to expediency offered by the example of public men hitherto enjoying much of the public confidence, Civil, Religious, and Commercial Liberty will continue to be promoted with unabated zeal and energy.

Ducie-place, Manchester, Dec. 31st, 1845.

THE FREE TRADE INVESTMENT ASSOCIATION.

DIRECTORS.

A. W. Paulton, Esq., 67, Fleet-street.
George Thompson, Esq., 3, Waterloo-place.
Dr. Thomas Price, 7, Highbury-terrace.
Wm. Leaver, Esq., 5, Park-street, Islington.
Josh. Ivimey, Esq., 26, Chancery-lane.
Wm. Wilson, Esq., 123, Long-lane, Bermondsey.
G. T. Kemp, Esq., 35, Spital-square.
John Gadsby, Esq., Bouverie-street, Fleet-street.
A. L. Saul, Esq., 67, Fleet-street.
Richard Taylor, Esq., Red Lion-court.
John Lowe, Esq., 88, Fleet-street.
John Burnet, Esq., Covent Garden.
Frederick Farrand, Esq., Priory Villa, Peckham.

In consequence of earnest and repeated applications made to some of the gentlemen whose names appear in the above directory, an Investment Association is about to be formed.

Its object will be principally to afford to persons of limited means, facilities for purchasing freeholds, &c.

In addition, it will serve all the purposes of a general Investment Society, and will be established on the most approved plan.

A prospectus, with full particulars, will be published shortly.

QUARTER OF A MILLION LEAGUE FUND.

THE COUNCIL OF THE LEAGUE begs to announce that arrangements have been made for commencing the METROPOLITAN SUBSCRIPTIONS to the QUARTER OF A MILLION LEAGUE FUND, and respectfully requests that all parties desirous of contributing thereto will be kind enough to send in their names and addresses, together with the first instalment of 20 per cent. on the aggregate amount, as early as possible, to George Wilson, Esq., Offices of the League, 67, Fleet-street.
Jan. 1st, 1846.

POSTSCRIPT.

LONDON, Saturday Morning, January 3, 1846.

We have derived much amusement from the reports of the recent protectionist meetings, and have enjoyed the strange gambols and freaks by which noble dukes have contributed their share to the festivities of the Christmas season. It is, therefore, very pleasant to find a proposition emanating from some of those meetings, in which we not only heartily concur, but are anxious to ensure its complete success. In Staffordshire, Suffolk, and some other places, it has been resolved to convene open county meetings, to take into consideration the propriety of petitioning in favour of protection. This is a bold appeal to public opinion, and if it be offered in a spirit of fairness, we gladly accept the challenge. County meetings are among the valuable relics of our good old Saxon-institutions; they give to every free man an equal voice on all the public questions submitted to their consideration. In the show of hands, the hard palm of the labourer counts for as much as the hand that has never felt the roughness of toil. Every man in the country has an equal right to be present, and an equal right to express his opinion, either by speech or by vote. Such a meeting cannot be packed, unless by gross fraud, too monstrous to escape detection, or by the gross negligence of those whose opinion such a meeting purposes to represent. The decision of a county meeting is generally, and not unjustly, assumed to be the decision of the majority of the inhabitants of that county; and it is therefore not only the right, but the duty of every man holding an opinion on the question at issue, to be present, and to give, at least, his vote. Let Free Traders cheerfully append their names to every requisition for a county meeting; they want nothing more than free discussion to establish the justice of their cause, and free discussion cannot be refused at a public meeting of free men. When the meeting is convened, let every Free Trader, whatever may be his grade or position in society, make it a point to be present; let the labourer come to say whether his loaf should be taxed and his food stinted; let the operative come to say whether his wages should be lowered by the restriction of employment; let the artisan come to decide whether his skilled labour shall bring him comfortable support or be wasted in cold obstruction; let the really independent farmer come to declare whether uncertainty of tenure, and uncertainty of price, shall continue to blight his industry; let the manufacturer come to determine between open markets and limited demand; let all come to decide, in the face of their country, between cheap bread and dear bread—between scarcity and abundance—between increasing commerce and declining trade—between justice to all classes, and selfish advantages claimed by a handful of monopolists.

Let the leading Free Traders of the county be present at their posts on the platform, prepared to move a Free Trade amendment to the monopolist resolutions. Let the wording of the amendment be a simple statement of facts, with their obvious inferences; let there be no ambiguity in the terms of the proposition. The Free Trade amendment must in the most unequivocal manner protest against any and every tax upon the food of the people. We have no fears for the result. We are persuaded that the doom of monopoly has been pronounced by the voice of the nation, and that every county meeting will repeat and register the national sentence.

We have assumed that the proposed county meetings will be what they profess, fair, open, and public. If any attempt at packing or intimidation be made, the Free Traders must be present to expose it. The crisis of our great struggle has arrived; we must all in our several localities, and in our several and social capacities, be up and doing. We have carried the outworks, but monopoly is concentrating all its forces round the citadel. The great and decisive effort is yet to be made; let us therefore press forward with fresh courage, new zeal, and more vigorous exertion. No opportunity must be lost, no occasion neglected, no point of attack left unassailed, no point of defence exposed unguarded. Each must strive as if success depended on his own individual exertions; each must work for all, that all may work for each. The new year must be marked by new resolution, and then the toil of 1846 will ensure the prosperity of the remainder of the century.

THE FUNDS.
	SAT. Dec. 27	MON. Dec. 29	TUES. Dec. 30	WED. Dec. 31	THUR. Jan. 1	FRI. Jan. 2
Bank Stock	205	204½	204	204	204	204
3 per Ct. Red. Ann.	97½	97½	97½	97½	97½	97½
3 per Ct. Con. Ann.	103	103	103	103	103	103
Long. An. Ex. 1860	95	95½	94½	95	94½	94½
Cons. for Act.	24	27½	28½	26-28	26-29	26-29
Exc. Bills, fm.	38	38	38	33	33	33
Ind. Bds. un. 1000.
India Stock
Austrian
Belgian 4½ per Ct.	96	95½	..	96½	96½	..
Brazilian 5 per Ct.	82	81	81½	..
Chilian	100	98
Columb. ex. Venez.	16½	17
Danish	86	87	..	87½
Dutch 4 per Cent.	93½	93½	94½	94½	94½	94½
Dutch 2½ per Cent.	61½	61½	61	60	60½	60½
Mexican	31½	31½	31½	31½	32½	31½
Peruvian
Portug. conv.	59½
Russian 5 per Cent.	113½	112½	..	112½
Spanish 5 per Ct.	30	29½	29½	29½
Do. 3 per Ct. ex. dv.	40	40	39½	39

MARKETS.
CORN MARKET.
MONDAY, DEC. 29.—In the course of last week after Monday the deliveries of Wheat, Barley, and English Oats were scanty, but considerable of Irish Oats. To-day the samples of Wheat and Barley fresh up, both coastwise, and by land carriage, are few in number. There are scarcely any new arrivals of Oats. English Wheat is in rather better demand than has been the case lately, and for fine parcels is more money is obtained than last week. Other qualities meet a fair sale at late rates. Free Foreign and Bonded Wheat are no dearer, and the transactions in them are not numerous. Barley fetches last Monday's prices, though the trade is not brisk. The supplies of Beans and Peas are not large, and there is no alteration to notice in the value of either. Notwithstanding the continued plentiful supplies of Oats during the last few weeks, the advancing prices in Ireland, and the certainty that the quantity now on the way to our market from that country is limited, induces holders to remain firm at the present rates. The amount of business done to-day is not very extensive, but the tendency of prices is upward. S. H. LUCAS.
BRITISH.
Wheat, Essex,	Red 50 to 60	White 58 to 68
Kent, & Suffolk	49 58	56 64
Lincolnshire & Yorkshire	47 54	54 62
Scotch
Oats, Lincolnshire & Yorkshire Feed	23 25
Scotch	24 26
Scotch Feed	25 26	Potato 28 29
Limerick	23 25
Ditto	Fine New 26 28	Old Fine none
Cork
Waterford, Youghal, & Cork Black	21 23
Sligo	22 24
Galway	21 23
Barley	32 38
Beans, Mazagan	New 32 34	Old 40 44
Harrow	38 42	..
Small	40 44	..
Peas, White	54 56
Grey	30 48	Maple 38 40
Flour, Town made	per sack of 280 lbs. 45 57
Norfolk and Suffolk	43 46
FOREIGN.
Wheat, Danzig, high mixed	58 to 66	46 52
Rostock	56 60	44 48
Stettin	54 60	43 46
Hamburg	52 57	42 45
Odesa	46 50	40 42
Odesa Polish	50 56	40 43
Russian	soft ..	48 57
Ditto	hard ..	46 55
Spanish
Ditto	White
Australian	60 69	..
Barley, Grinding	27 30	..
Distilling	30 32	..
Oats, Archangel	25 26	22 26
Danish	25 26	22 26
Swedish	24 25	21 22
Stralsund
Dutch Feed	22 23	19 20
Brew	25 28	23 25
Polands	28 29	25 26
Beans, Egyptian	40 41	39 40
Peas, White	54	..
Ditto Boilers	none
Flour, Canada, fresh, per barrel of 196 lbs.	34 35	..
United States	35 36	..
Danzig
Australian, per sack of 280 lbs.

Account of CORN, &c., arrived in the Port of London, from Dec. 22 to Dec. 26, 1845, both days inclusive.
	Wheat.	Barley.	Oats.	Beans.	Peas
English	2888	4608	935	742	1137
Scotch	2830	1737
Irish	905	25476
Foreign	10097	4081	6251	3015	4241
Flour, 8431 sacks; 3110 barrels.

FRIDAY, JAN. 2.—English Wheat and Barley, and English and Irish Oats, are in very short supply this week. There are a few cargoes of foreign Oats in the report; and this forms the amount of arrivals since Monday. Fully late rates are asked for English Wheat, which meets a limited sale at these prices. There is some demand for bonded Wheat for Belgium and the North of France, and prices remain the same as for the last fortnight. —Oats are held at rather more money than on Monday; but buyers being unwilling to comply, not much business is done; a fair sale may be made at the prices of that day. No change in the value of Barley, Beans, or Peas. The duties on Wheat, Barley, and Beans rose one step yesterday. S. H. LUCAS.

Account of CORN, &c., arrived in the Port of London, from the 29th of December to the 2nd of January, both inclusive
	English.	Irish.	Foreign.
Wheat	650	4290	..
Barley	1510	3600	..
Oats	140	1240	..	5100	..
Flour, 760 sacks.

LONDON AVERAGES for the Week ending Dec. 30, 1845.
	Qrs.	Price.	Qrs.	Price.
Wheat	5340	58s. 8d.	0s. 0d.
Barley	4306	32s. 5d.	1374 57s. 10d.
Oats	18627	23s. 1d.	895 42s. 0d.

IMPERIAL AVERAGES, Weeks ending
	Wheat.	Barley.	Oats.	Rye.	Beans.
e. d. s. d. s. d. s. d. s. d. s. d.
22d Nov.	57 11. 34	1. 25	5. 37	1. 43	4. 45
29th "	58 2. 33	2. 25	0. 35	4. 41	9. 45
6th Dec.	59 0. 32	10. 24	7. 35	0. 41	8. 43
13th "	59 4. 32	9. 24	6. 36	8. 40	8. 43
20th "	57 11. 32	7. 23	4. 34	5. 39	6. 42
27th "	55 4. 32	5. 23	0. 32	8. 38	6. 39

Aggregate Average of the Six Weeks. Wheat, 57s. 11d.; Barley, 33s. 0d.; Oats, 24s. 4d.; Rye, 35s. 2d.; Beans, 40s. 11d.; Peas, 43s. 4d.
Duty. Wheat, 15s. 0d.; Barley, 5s. 0d.; Oats, 4s. 0d.; Rye 7s. 6d.; Beans, 3s. 6d.; Peas, 1s. 0d.
Stock of Corn in Bond, Dec. 5, 1845.
Wheat. Barley. Oats. Rye. Beans. Peas. Flour
In London, 322869 8421 63791 .. 803 959 57362
Unit. King. 794252 67574 108596 .. 803 959 405457

MEAT MARKET.
The demand was slow to-day; otherwise, with the very limited supply, prices would have advanced. Good Veal was remarkably scarce.
PER STONE OF 8 lbs. BY THE CARCASE.
Prime Beef .. 3s 6d to 3s 8d Middl. Mutton 3s 6d to 3s 8d
Middling do. 3s 2d to 3s 4d Veal, from .. 4s 4d to 5s 0d
Plain, or infe- Small Pork .. 4s 8d to 5s 0d
rior Beef .. 2s 8d to 3s 0d Large, or infe-
Prime Mutton 3s 10d to 4s 0d rior Pork .. 3s 4d to 3s 8d

THE LONDON GAZETTE.
FRIDAY, DEC. 26.
BANKRUPTS.
C. W. TOULMIN, South Island Place, Clapham Road, livery stable keeper. [Mr. Buchanan, Basinghall Street.
F. DIXON, Long Lane, Bermondsey, currier. [Mr. Fry, Cheapside.
F. ROBINSON, Princess Street, Chelsea, cowkeeper. [Mr. Wansey, Moorgate Street.
J. LANKSHEAR, Seymour Row, Little Chelsea, surgeon. [Mr. Thompson, Bucklersbury.
G. A. ABSALOM, Portsea, victualler. [Messrs. G. R. and C. C. Corner, Dean Street, Tooley Street.
C. WILLIAMSON, Great Portland Street, Marylebone, wine merchant. [Messrs. Bristow and Tarrant, Bond Court, Wallbrook.
E. STREETER, Bristol, builder. [Mr. John Hopkins.
W. WAILES, Newcastle-upon-Tyne, grocer. [Messrs. Bennett and Co., Scott's Yard, Cannon Street.
P. PHILIPS, Birmingham, steel pen maker. [Mr. George Jabett, Birmingham.
DIVIDENDS.
Jan. 16, W. F. Mills, Hart Street, Mark Lane, and High Holborn, merchant—Jan. 23, J. Pegrum, North Brixton, carpenter—Jan. 23, A. Hindes and J. Thompson, Leeds, stock-brokers—J. and J. Thompson, Leeds, stockbrokers.

CERTIFICATES.
Jan. 16, J. Mortimer, Adelaide Street, West Strand, bookseller—R. Hutchinson, Jewry Street, Aldgate, leatherseller—J. Gibson, Motcomb Street, Belgrave Square, oilman—C. Couper, West Boldon, and South Shields, cinder burner—H. Blunt, Woolton, Lancashire, victualler—H. and W. Kimber, Old Trinity House, Water Lane, wine merchants—R. Reynolds, Manchester, cabinet maker—T. Hall, Thetford, ironmonger—H. Mallinson, Almondsbury, manufacturer of fancy worsted goods—Jan. 17, W. R. Lejeune, Southampton, corn merchant—G. Staigh, Skinner Street, Snow Hill, dealer—T. Arnold, Shrewsbury, veterinary surgeon—J. O. Harvey, Newark, Nottinghamshire, grocer—Jan. 19, A. Featherstounhaugh, Great Bolton, butcher—J. Isherwood, Bolton, innkeeper—Jan. 20, R. Warr, Beaumont, Dorsetshire, auctioneer—Jan. 21, S. and J. Burton, Kingston-upon-Hull, chemists—J. Rawthorne, Manchester, general agent—Jan. 23, J. H. Walter, Camberwell, ironmonger—Jan. 26, J. and D. Woodhead, Netherton, Yorkshire, woollen cloth manufacturers—Jan. 31, W. Bickerton, Kingston-upon-Hull, timber merchant.

SCOTCH SEQUESTRATIONS.
W. Allan, Glasgow, oil merchant—S. Davidson, Bairdston, Lanarkshire—D. McGilvray, Edinburgh, tailor—D. Morrison, Glasgow, merchant.

TUESDAY, DEC. 30.
BANKRUPTS.
J. BROOKE, Gooderstone, Norfolk, miller. [Mr. Nettlefold, Vine Street House, Milbank.
B. JONES, City Road, draper. [Messrs. Soles and Turner.
R. MORE and B. W. BLAKE, Norwich, coal merchants. [Mr. Jay, for Mr. Bailey, Norwich.
G. J. WORRMAN, Great Mitchell Street, St. Luke's, engineer. [Mr. Buchanan, Basinghall Street.
T. PHILLIPS, Shrewsbury, hop merchant. [Mr. Bartlett, Birmingham.
B. WOOD, jun., Leeds, wine merchant. [Messrs. Few, Hamilton, and Few, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden.
J. COUSEN and L. COUSEN, Bingley, York, and J. R. COUSEN, Bradford, York, worsted spinners. [Messrs. Hawkins and Co., Boswell Court.
SCOTCH SEQUESTRATIONS.
F. Clerihew, Aberdeen, wright—J. S. Robertson, Edinburgh, banker.

APPROPRIATE GIFTS FOR CHRISTMAS & NEW YEAR'S DAY.
Published by GEORGE VIRTUE, 26, Ivy-lane, London.

BERNARD BARTON'S New Volume of Poems.
Price Six Shillings, foolscap octavo, neatly bound in cloth extra. Dedicated to the Queen, by her Majesty's express permission.
HOUSEHOLD VERSES. By BERNARD BARTON.
Embellished with a Vignette Title and Frontispiece, engraved by Bentley, from Drawings by Churchyard.
The Third Thousand, revised and enlarged.
Medium octavo, in neat cloth binding, price 10s. 6d.
WALKS ABOUT JERUSALEM. By W. H. BARTLETT.
Illustrated with Nine Engravings on Steel, by Cousen, Bentley, and Brandard; a Map; and nearly Forty superior Woodcuts.
The object of this Work is to present a correct idea of this memorable city, in our own day, from personal observation; embracing the principal objects of interest, most of which have not been before described. The Ancient City is illustrated in a brief Essay, with a View as besicged by Titus, drawn from the most careful investigation, and beautifully printed in the new tinted style by the patent process.

In large folio, uniform with "Robert's Holy Land," price 15s.
BARTLETT'S VIEWS, Illustrating the Topography of Ancient and Modern Jerusalem; drawn from original materials collected on the spot. Lithographed by J. C. Bourne, accompanied by Maps and a Descriptive Key.

The Thirteenth Thousand.
FAMILY WORSHIP. A GUIDE TO FAMILY DEVOTION, by the REV. A. FLETCHER, D.D., of Finsbury Chapel, London. Price 21 6s., handsomely bound in cloth, with gilt edges, and embellished with Seventeen Steel Engravings. This Work comprises a Hymn, and a Portion of Scripture with suitable Reflections, and Devotional Exercises; presenting an entire course of Family Worship for both Morning and Evening of every day throughout the Year.

A COMPLETE BODY OF MUSIC, adapted to the growing demand for Music among all classes of the community. In three volumes, super-royal 8vo., in very neat cloth bindings, 38s.—each volume embellished by an elegant Frontispiece—in separate volumes,
I. Psalm Tunes, 236 pages - 8s. II. Secular Music—Songs, Duets, Trios, Glee, Madrigals, &c. 360 pages - 12s.
Being "The People's Music Book."
By JAMES T. LEE, Esq., Organist of Westminster Abbey; And EDWARD TAYLOR, Esq., the Gresham Professor of Music.
The Tunes and Pieces are arranged principally for Four Voices, with an accompaniment for the Organ or Piano-forte. Forming respectively a complete body of the best Music for the Cathedral, the Church, or Chapel, the Family, the Glee Club, and the Musical Society.
A considerable allowance will be made to Congregations adopting the Psalm Tunes, and taking a number of copies, and choirs, Choral, and Madrigal Societies, &c., with the sacred and secular music.

Mozart's Last and Greatest Work.
In super royal oblong quarto, price Six Shillings.
MOZART'S REQUIEM, adapted for the first time to English Words, chiefly from the Holy Scriptures, with the approbation of the principal Dignitaries of the Church. By the Editors of "The People's Music Book." The Accompaniments expressly arranged from the original score.
London: George Virtue, 26, Ivy-lane.

Price One Shilling; by post, One and Sixpence.
WHAT TO EAT, DRINK, AND AVOID. Addressed to the Nervous and Dyspeptic. By R. J. OLIVER, M.D., Member of the Royal College of Surgeons, &c. Sherwood, 23, Paternoster-row, and all Booksellers, or direct from the Author, 21, Arundel-street, Strand.

Published Monthly, with an Illustration on Steel by Leech.
DOUGLASS' JERROLD'S SHILLING MAGAZINE.
Contents of No. XIII.
The History of St. Giles and St. James. By the Editor. Chapter XXII.
The Cricket on the Hearth: a Fairy Tale of Home.
Men of Letters and their Abettors.
The Iron Heart.
The Winter Robin.
English Scenes and Characters. By William Howitt.
The Fate of Cities.
The Englishman in Prussia. No. VI.
A Vision.
The Hedgehog Letters.
The Old Soldier.
The Spirit-Voice.
A History for Young England. Chapter X.
Reviews of Books, &c. &c.
Vols. I. and II., neatly bound in cloth, price 7s. each, are now ready.
London: Published at the PUNCH OFFICE, 92, Fleet-street.

On the 1st of January was published, price 6d., with Illustrations, the ALMANACK OF THE MONTH,
A REVIEW OF EVERYTHING AND EVERYBODY.
Edited by GILBERT ABBOT, a BUCKET.
Amongst the Contents are the following:—
Some Account of January—The Great Event of the Month: The Ministerial Crisis—The Exhibition of the Month: The Smithfield Club Cattle Show—The Abuse of the Month—The Ballet of the Month: The Devil to Pay—The Absurdity of the Month—The Books of the Month—Hetting of the Month—The Music of the Month—List of Books received during the Month—The Talk of the Month—Chronology of the Month—Calendar of the Month.
London: Published at the PUNCH OFFICE, 92, Fleet-street.

New and Revised Edition of "OLIVER TWIST," in Ten Monthly Parts.
On the 1st of January was published, price One Shilling, with Two Illustrations on Steel (uniform with the "Pickwick Papers"), Part I. of OLIVER TWIST. By CHARLES DICKENS.
Illustrated by George Cruikshank.
This Edition has been carefully corrected by the Author throughout, and it will contain the whole of the original illustrations.
London: Published by Bradbury and Evans, 90, Fleet-street.

TAIT'S EDINBURGH MAGAZINE FOR JANUARY,
(the commencement of a Volume), Price One Shilling, will contain—
Visit to Mr. O'Connell at Derrynane; by William Howitt—Children—
Fairies and Hailroads—Naples in 1843; by Madame Wolfsoberg—
Lines on Gifford's Gallery of Literary Portraits; by Thomas De Quincey, No. III. Shelley—Love, Jealousy, and Vengeance; a Highland Tale, by Sir Thomas Dick Lauder—Oliver Cromwell's Letters and Speeches—
How is Parliament to get through its Railway Business?—Literary Register—Poetry of the Month.
W. Tait, Edinburgh; Simpkin, Marshall, & Co., London.

KNIGHT'S PENNY MAGAZINE.
Weekly Numbers One Penny.
Monthly Parts (with a Supplement) Sixpence.
Quarterly Volumes Eightpence.
"THE PENNY MAGAZINE" has now been in the course of publication for fourteen years, and during the whole period the duties of Editor have been discharged by Mr. Knight, "under the superintendence of the Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge." The time has arrived when that "superintendence" has merged in the individual responsibility of the Editor.

The circulation of "The Penny Magazine" is very large; its reputation is unimpaired. But fourteen volumes having been completed in accordance with the original intention of the work, which was to combine miscellaneous information with expensive pictorial embellishment, circumstances now point to the necessity of some essential modification of plan. Left to his individual responsibility in the conduct of the work, the Editor deems it his public duty to take a new position, to enable him to carry out his views of what should now be the character of a widely circulated and eminently cheap Miscellany. Such a Periodical Work may command as high and as various literary talent as the most lofty of its contemporaries; and the best talents and acquirements may now be fully employed in the service of the people, instead of addressing themselves only to readers of wealth and leisure. "Knight's Penny Magazine" is intended to be for the people of 1846 what "The Penny Magazine" of the Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge was for the people of 1832.

Without any change in the objects for which "The Penny Magazine" was established—to enlarge the range of observation, to add to the store of facts, to awaken the reason, and to lead the imagination into agreeable and innocent trains of thought. It is now, however, to be able to do more, and to do it with a more varied character. It will henceforth be chiefly a Magazine of Reading. Woodcuts will no longer continue to be the prominent feature of the work; but will be frequently used as necessary illustrations and as specimens of art. As compared with "The Penny Magazine," the work now in preparation will be a larger sheet, but a smaller paper. It will consist of sixteen pages instead of eight; and will contain a much greater amount of reading. It will be printed in the best style, in a very clear type; and the form being that of a handsome portable book, it will find in convenient volumes for times a year, so as to constitute an important addition to a "Library for all Readers."

"KNIGHT'S PENNY MAGAZINE" will be published, as previously indicated, in a Weekly Sheet, a Monthly Part, and a Quarterly Volume; and in all these forms it may hope to become a Fireside and a Travelling Companion, as universally sought as in the most "fashionable" days of "The Penny Magazine" of the Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge.

Number I. will be published on Saturday, January 3, 1846; Part I. on the 31st January; Volume I. on the 31st March.
London: Charles Knight and Co., Ludgate-street.

NEW MORNING PAPER.—On Wednesday, January 21, will be published, No. 1. of THE DAILY NEWS.

A MORNING NEWSPAPER OF LIBERAL POLITICS AND THOROUGH INDEPENDENCE.
The leading features of the Paper may be briefly stated under the following heads:—

Its CITY NEWS and COMMERCIAL INTELLIGENCE, collected from the highest sources, will be scrupulously impartial, and always early.
Its SCIENTIFIC AND BUSINESS INFORMATION on every topic connected with RAILWAYS, whether in actual operation, in progress, or projected, will be found to be complete.

An extensive system of FOREIGN CORRESPONDENCE in all parts of the world has been for some time, and is now, in course of organisation.
Its PARLIAMENTARY REPORTS, its Law Reports, and every other item of such matter, will be furnished by Gentlemen of the highest qualifications.

Among the writers of its LEADING ARTICLES, its Criticisms on Books, the DRAMA, MUSIC, and the FINE ARTS, are some of the most distinguished names of this time.

The J. F. DEPARTMENT OF THE DAILY NEWS will be under the direction of Mr. CHARLES DICKENS.

As a Journal addressing itself to Men of Business in all parts of the world, particular attention will be paid to the arrangement of its Advertisements.
The Office for Advertisements intended for insertion in THE DAILY NEWS, will be at No. 90, FLEET STREET, LONDON. All communications for the Editor should be addressed to the Publishing Office, WHITEHALL.

FREEHOLDERS' BUILDING SOCIETY,
Manchester. Shares, £20. Subscription, 10s. per Month.

John Brooks, Esq., President. Alderman Elkannah Armistead.
Alderman William Harvey. W. Rawson, Esq.
Alderman Charles J. S. Walker. W. Evans, Esq.

BANKERS.—Messrs. Cunliffe, Brooks, and Co., Market-street.
SOLICITORS.—Mr. John Howitt, 47, King-street.

SECRETARY.—Mr. William Jackson Keighley, 9, Princess-street, Manchester.
The object of this Society is to assist the middle and industrious classes to obtain Freehold Dwelling houses of their own, and more especially to create a spirit of independence in the latter, and to induce habits of economy in all who have a surplus of income beyond providing for their current necessities.

2899 shares have now been taken up. It is evident this Society will be very large, so as not only to afford a good profit to those who have savings to invest, but to supply ample funds to such as wish to borrow money. From the present amount of Shares the Trustees will receive £2140 every Calendar month, in addition to the £1000 which the Society has to be lent out to members of the Society on real or leasehold security, so that not only may small Shareholders be at once accommodated, but those whose circumstances render it desirable may take up £2000 or £3000 at once.

In another adjournment of the first meeting of the Society to the 7th of January, 1846, other members have an opportunity of entering by paying the first month's subscription only—namely, 10s. on each Share.

A sale of Shares will take place on the said 7th of January, 1846. Persons wishing to take up Shares will do well to make early application, as the above will be the last adjournment, after which the back subscriptions will be required.

One peculiar feature in this undertaking is the facility afforded to Building Members to obtain the County Freehold in the first instance, on all purchased Shares, for building with, the monthly subscription may be reduced to 2s. 6d., thus leaving a surplus of rent beyond the encumbrance on mortgage sufficient to give a qualification.

Applications for Shares may be made to the Secretary, Mr. W. J. Keighley, 9, Princess-street, Manchester; or to Mr. H. Rolleston, 47, King-street; Mr. W. Burton, Oldham-st.; Mr. A. Burgess, printer, Victoria Arches; and Mr. T. Owen, 8, Moreton-street, Strangeways, Manchester; where Rules, price 6d. and Prospectuses may be had.

ENLARGEMENT OF THE ATHENÆUM.—On and from January 3, THE ATHENÆUM will be Permanently Enlarged to Twenty-four Large Quarto Pages. Price Fourpence.

OUR BANKING LAWS, VERSUS THE CORN LAWS.
THE BANKER'S MAGAZINE for January, price 1s. 6d., contains an article on this subject showing the impossibility of maintaining the present Corn Law in conjunction with the New Banking Laws; also various articles connected with Banking, Investment of Capital; Savings Banks; Railways; the Money Markets, &c.
London: R. Groombridge and Sons, 5, Paternoster-row.

This day is published (in the Catholic Series) price 3s. 6d., bound in cloth,
THE DESTINATION OF MAN.
Translated from the German, by Mrs. PRISCY SINNITT.
"This is the most popular exposition of Fichte's Philosophy which exists."—Memoir of Fichte, by W. Smith.
London: Chapman (Brothers), 121, Newgate-street.

Just published, handsomely bound, gilt edges, 5s., plain, 4s. 6d.,
THE DISRUPTION; a Scottish Tale of Recent Times.
London: David Rogers, Edinburgh; John Menzies; Glasgow: David Robertson, and all Booksellers.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.—"Since the era of the Waverley Novels, Mr. Cross's tale is equal if not superior to anything we have seen, as a masterly delineation of common Scottish life."—Edinburgh Mercury. "Apart from its interest as a new tale, it claims high merit from its healthy tone, its fidelity to real life, and for several passages of rich and genuine humour."—Scotsman. "We have seldom read a tale which gave us more genuine satisfaction. The style is lucid and sparkling, abounding with idioms and phrases, which shows the author to be a master of English composition."—Glasgow Examiner.

EDUCATION.—The MISSES WICKHAM beg to call the attention of Parents and Guardians to their Establishment for Young Ladies, situated in a healthy part, a short distance from town. Terms from £20 to £25 per annum, according to age, including all extras. A vacancy for an Articled Pupil. Application at 2, Belle Vue Terrace, Ball's Pond Road, Kingsland. An Assistant Wanted.

THE OXFORD AND SALISBURY DIRECT RAILWAY.

The Committee of Management have the satisfaction to announce that the requisite notices have been served on the landowners and occupiers, and that the plans, sections, and books of reference have been regularly deposited in the District Office and the Hill Office, and with the clerks of the several parishes throughout the line. The whole of the standing orders of both Houses of Parliament have thus been fully complied with, and the Committee are proceeding with all the necessary preparations to enable them to present their bill in the ensuing session. By Order of the Board, Z. HUBBENSTY, Sec.
Moorgate Chambers, Moorgate-street, Jan. 1, 1846.

THE OXFORD AND SALISBURY DIRECT RAILWAY.

The whole of the standing orders of Parliament having been duly fulfilled up to the present time, the Committee of Management consider it expedient to inform their shareholders and allottees, as well as the public at large, that, in order to ensure, as far as possible, the patronage to which the projected line of railway is justly entitled, they have resolved upon a further extension of the time for payment of deposits on shares in this Company until the 21st inst. The Subscribers' Agreement and Parliamentary Contract Lie for signature at the Office of the Company. By Order of the Board, Z. HUBBENSTY, Sec.
Moorgate Chambers, Moorgate-street, Jan. 1, 1846.

JONES'S £4. 4s. SILVER LEVER WATCHES
warranted not to vary more than half a minute per week, are selling at the Manufactory, 388, Strand, opposite Somerset-house. They combine the truth of a mathematical instrument with the elegance of an ornament of taste. On receipt of a Post-office order for as above the price, a Watch will be sent free to any part of the Kingdom. Read Jones's "Sketch of Watch Work," sent free for 2d. stamp.

BOTANIC WATER AND BEAR'S GREASE.—When the hair is becoming thin and falling off, the only effectual remedy, besides shaving the head, is the use of the two above named articles, applied alternately—the botanic water to cleanse the roots from scurf, and as a stimulant, and the bear's grease as a nourisher. If any further evidence was required of the virtue of bear's grease for renovating and preserving the hair, Mr. Catlin's account of the quantity used, and the length of hair obtained by some of the North American Indians, would be a sufficient answer.—ROSS and SONS, 119 and 120 Bishopsgate-street, who first introduced the use of bear's grease into this country, and who fit and kill the animals, recommend the public to purchase none other but with their names and address printed on the pot, or the chances are they are obtaining a spurious article. All vegetable oils applied to the hair are worse than useless.

LONDON AND PROVINCIAL BUILDING AND INVESTMENT SOCIETY.

(To be Enrolled pursuant to Act of Parliament, 6 & 7 Wm. IV., ch. 32.)
Shares, £120. Monthly Subscription, 12s. per Share. Entrance Fee, 2s. 6d. per Share.

No Redemption Fees.
Monthly Subscriptions payable at Radley's Hotel, New Bridge Street, Blackfriars, on the Third Wednesday in each Month.

PATRONES.
The Rev. John Campbell, D.D., Tabernacle Church, Finsbury.
The Rev. James Sherman, Surrey Parsonage, Blackfriars Road.
The Rev. George Smith, Trinity Parsonage, Poplar.

TRUSTEES.
Thomas Ales Hankey, Esq., Fenchurch Street.
Samuel Morley, Esq., Wood Street, Cheapside.
William Beddome, Esq., Fenchurch Street.

DIRECTORS.
William Beddome, Esq., Fenchurch Street.
William Tyler, Esq., Bolt Court, Fleet Street.
James Smith, Esq., Strand, and Peckham Rye.
Chas. Henry Leach, Esq., 91, Bishopsgate-street, and in the City.
William Nathan, Esq., Limehouse and Plaitow.
John Hooper, Esq., Mill Dock.
Samuel Blackburn, Esq., Globe Office, Strand.
(With power to add to their number.)

Mr. Charles Burs, jun., 15, New Bridge Street, Blackfriars.

MANAGER.
Mr. William Lawley, 6, Red Lion Street, Borough.

BANKERS.
Messrs. Hankeys and Co., Fenchurch Street.

SOLICITORS.
Hugh Terrell, Esq., 30, Basinghall Street.
Joseph Bagster, Esq., 3, Sise Lane, Bucklersbury.

SECRETARY.
John Morris, Esq., 58, Fenchurch Street, and 4, Trinity Terrace, Poplar.

The projectors of this Society, availing themselves of the experience furnished by the history of Building Societies, have matured a plan which not only embraces all the advantages of those societies, and avoids the inconveniences incident to them, but secures peculiar benefits to the shareholders, and opens its doors to parties hitherto altogether overlooked. Sanctioned by ministers and laymen, whose names are a sufficient guarantee for the integrity and spirit by which all the operations of the London and Provincial Building and Investment Society will be governed, the Society is now ready to receive applications from persons desirous to join a Society through which (as will be presently shown) they may be assisted in their efforts to promote the cause of religion, and the education of the young.

The objects generally contemplated by Building Societies are—To enable the shareholders to build or purchase household property. To give those shareholders who do not wish to build or purchase, a higher rate of interest for their money than they could obtain the Public Funds or the Savings Banks. Some Societies also advance money to enable shareholders to redeem mortgaged property.

The objects of the present Society are the following:—
1. To enable persons to build dwelling-houses, or to purchase freehold or leasehold property, on the most advantageous terms.
2. To afford assistance to congregations wishing to erect chapels or school-rooms, and to enable them to purchase land, and erect buildings, and prevent the possibility of foreclosure in cases where buildings are mortgaged.
3. To give to monthly depositors a higher rate of interest than is yielded by the ordinary modes of investment.

4. To give to persons advancing money by way of loan to this Society interest at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum.
5. To advance money to shareholders upon freehold or leasehold property, and upon reversions or other kinds of real security, subject to the approval of the Directors; and to enable mortgagors to redeem their mortgages.

Applications for Shares may be made, in the undermentioned form, to Mr. Hull Terrell, 30, Basinghall-street; Mr. Joseph Bagster, 3, Sise-lane, Bucklersbury; Mr. Charles Burs, jun., 15, New Bridge-street, Blackfriars; and of Mr. William Lawley, 6, Red Lion-street, Borough, from whom also Prospectuses may be obtained.

Prospectuses may also be obtained at Radley's Hotel, Bridge-street, and John Morris, Esq., 58, Fenchurch-street, or 4, Trinity-terrace, Poplar.

THE DIRECTORS OF THE LONDON AND PROVINCIAL BUILDING AND INVESTMENT SOCIETY.
I request you will send me a Member of the London and Provincial Building and Investment Society for Shares, and enclose £ s. d. being the Entrance Fee of 2s. 6d., and the first Monthly Subscription of 12s. upon each of such Shares.

Name in full _____ Residence _____
Profession or Trade _____
Date _____

All Post Office Orders must be made payable at the Office, St. Martin's Lane.

For the further accommodation of applicants for Shares, attendance will be given at Radley's Hotel, New Bridge Street, Blackfriars, on Tuesday and Friday in each week, from six to nine o'clock, (to hold Shares, and answer inquiries.

NUMBER ONE, ST. PAUL'S CHURCHYARD.—As real goodness is not helped by praise, nor injured by reproach, so the BLACK TIE, at 4s. 6d. per lb., sold by DAKIN and COMPANY, owes its popularity solely to its intrinsic excellence.
Orders from the country forwarded Carriage Free.

WHITAKER'S FRENCH JET WRITING INK.
This splendid freely-flowing ink is adapted for either steel or quill-pens, and will be found the most desirable for Records, and Office use, as time and climate will never efface its brilliancy. Sold by the Proprietor, 69, Hatton-garden, London, and all respectable booksellers, stationers, and druggists.

GENTLEMEN'S WINTER DRESS.
BURCH and LUCAS, Tailors, 62, King William Street, London Bridge, opposite the Statue of William IV. Waterproof Over Coats, of the newest designs and best materials, kept ready, and made to order in the most approved style, at the lowest possible price for Cash. The workmanship of every garment may be relied on as being well and elegantly finished, the whole being made under the immediate superintendence of the Proprietors, who, being Tailors, are able to answer for its superiority over the slopwork generally sold, and which is entirely excluded from this Establishment.
An extensive and fashionable assortment of Dress and Great Coats, Summer Over Coats, Cloaks, Waistcoats, and Trousers, kept ready made.
62, King William Street, London Bridge.

THE Royal Family at Home, consisting of the Queen and Prince Albert caressing their Four lovely children. The Grouping and Colouring by Madame Tussaud, the Models and Portraiture by Mr. F. Tussaud, the Costumes by Mrs. F. Tussaud, is now added to the Collection.
—W. A. K. Illustrations, 10, Northampton-square.
"This is one of the best exhibitions in the metropolis."—Times.
Admittance, 1s.; Napoleon Rooms, 6d. Open from 11 till 4; and from 7 till 10.

BETTS'S PATENT BRANDY, certified by the Faculty of England to be the purest spirit, and guaranteed by the Patent Metallic Capsules, embossed "Jett's Patent Brandy, 7, Smithfield-bars," is sold at 3s. 6d., bottle including, by the most respectable dealers, lists of whom may be obtained at the Distillery, where quantities of not less than two gallons, in bulk or bottles, are supplied. Address, 7, Smithfield-bars.

BRANDY AND CAPSULES.
MR. BETTS (the late firm of J. T. BETTS & Co.) Patent Brandy Distiller, 7, Smithfield Bars, feels it due to himself and the public to state, that the Manufacture of the Patent Brandy was not, nor ever was, carried on by any person except to himself and one of his sons. And that he succeeded in the business of the Distillery, 7, Smithfield Bars, by his sons, J. T. Betts, jun., and Co., on his retiring therefrom, in 1843.

Mr. Betts further states, that he is the sole Patent manufacturer, and vendor of the Metallic Capsule (or solid metal covering for the mouths of bottles), that no other Brandy in England, except Betts's Patent Brandy, is thereby protected; the Patent Metallic Capsule if, therefore, applied to any other Brandy, must have been surreptitiously obtained.
Metallic Capsule Manufactory, 1, Wharf-road, City-road.

LUXURY IN SHAVING.
JOHN GOSNELL and CO.'S AMBROSIAL SHAVING CREAM (Patronised by Prince Albert). This inestimable Cream possesses all the good qualities of the Finest Naples Soap, without the disagreeable smell inseparable from that article in a genuine state. It is of a white pearly very agreeable, produces a creamy lather, which will not dry on the face, and emits in use the delightful flavour of the almond.
In Pots, price 2s. 6d., 3s. 6d., &c.
Perfumes to her Majesty, 12, Three Kings-court, Lombard-street, London. Manufacturers of Combs and Brushes of the best quality, and on the most approved principles.

ACCEPTABLE PRESENTS.—At a period when the social sympathies are most predominant, and the genial influence of "HOME" is felt in the highest degree—more especially by "My young master and mistress," now spending their vacation at the "Old Hall," the most appropriate present becomes the first subject of consideration; a merely useful one can afford no evidence of taste, while a present possessing no claims to utility, shows a want of judgment. To combine these requisites, a more fitting souvenir cannot be suggested than ROWLAND'S Toilet Articles, the "MACASSAR," "KALYDOR," and "ODONTO."

Each of inflexible attributes. In creating and sustaining so brilliant a series of trifles, ROWLAND'S MACASSAR OIL is highly appreciated by Bank and Fashion, and patronised by all the Sovereigns of Europe. ROWLAND'S KALYDOR is a preparation of unparalleled efficacy in improving and beautifying the skin and complexion; and ROWLAND'S ODONTO, or PEARL DENTIFRICE, is invaluable for its preservative and healthy effects on the Teeth and Gums, which infallibly tend to the augmentation of that imposing exterior, which Lord Chesterfield justly observes is "a card of recommendation."

Beware of SPURIOUS IMITATIONS! Each genuine article has the word "ROWLAND'S" preceding the name on the Wrapper. All others are FRAUDULENT IMITATIONS. The genuine are sold by the Proprietors at 20, Hatton-garden, London, and by Chemists and Perfumers.

THE NEW YEAR 1846.

The subject upon which we fix is Eighteen Hundred and Forty-Six. This year will prove while it discloses, A memorable year with MOSES. New styles in dress will be displayed, And new advantages in trade. Additions and imitations in trade. Will constantly be brought to view: MOSES and SON, with greater care, Will bring economy to bear. And thus this era, when it closes, Will tell a merry tale of MOSES. Before we end the present year The grand new dress-mart will appear, And in the City be displayed A novel-mart, where all are glad. And shall not new supporters come To this renowned Emporium? Yes—new supporters will appear Throughout this memorable year. Increase your patronage in trade At MOSES' Mart will be displayed; And thus this era, when it closes, Will prove a noted year with MOSES.

LIST OF PRICES.		READY MADE.
Beaver Tazionis	2 4 6
Chesterfields or Coddingtons	0 7 6
O'rsay's, Athol's, Pembroke, and every description of winter coats	1 0 0
Boy's winter coats in every style	from 0 6 6
Winter trousers, lined	0 10 0
Doekins	0 10 0
Dress Coats, edged	1 0 0
Drum ditto	1 0 0
Roll collar Vest	0 6 0
Double breasted ditto	0 2 6
Boy's Hussar and Tunic Suits	0 18 6
Boy's winter Trousers	0 3 0
Boy's winter Vests	1 0 0

MADE TO MEASURE.
Winter Coats in every style and shape, handsomely trimmed	1 5 0
Milled O'oth Great Coats, velvet collar and cuffs	1 10 0
Tweed Wrappers	0 18 6
Ditto Trousers	0 8 6
Winter Trousers, in all the new patterns	0 12 0
Doekins Trousers	0 10 6
Best, or Dress Trousers	1 0 0
Dress Coats	1 10 0
Ditto, best quality made	1 10 0
Frock Coats	1 10 0
Ditto, best quality made	0 3 0
Cashmere Vests	0 8 6
Satin, plush or fancy	0 6 0
Boy's Hussar and Tunic Suits	1 0 0
Boy's Great Coats	1 0 6

A new work, entitled "The Palace of Beauty," with full directions for self-measurement, may be had on application, or forwarded post free. Mourning to any amount can be had at five minutes' notice, at the following prices:

Men's Suits, dress coat, vest, and trousers	from 1 16 0
Ditto, jacket, vest, and trousers	from 18 0

IMPORTANT ANNOUNCEMENT.
OBSERVE. E. MOSES and SON, Tailors, Wholesale and Retail Woollen-drappers, Outfitters, and General Warehousemen, 154, Minorities, and 88, Aldgate, City, opposite the Church.

CAUTION. E. MOSES and SON are obliged to guard the public against imposition, having learned that the untradesmanlike falsehood of being connected with them, or it's the same concern, has been resorted to in many instances, and for obvious reasons. They have no connection with any establishment in or out of London; and those who do desire genuine Cheap Clothing should (to prevent disappointment, &c.) call or send to 154, Minorities, or 88, Aldgate, opposite the Church.

N.B. No business transacted at this Establishment from sunset on Friday to sunset on Saturday, when business is resumed till twelve o'clock.

Printed at the Whitefriars Printing-office, Bouvierie street, in the precinct of Whitefriars, in the City of London, by JOHN GOSNELL, printer, at Number 7, Ridgeway-street, near the County Gaol, in the County of Middlesex, and also of Number 4, Fairfield place, Chesham-hill-road, in the parish of Manchester, in the County of Lancaster, and published at Number 67, Fleet street, in the parish of St. Dunstan-in-the-West, in the City of London, by ABRAHAM WALTER PACTON, of Number 67, Fleet-street, on Saturday, January 3, 1846.

THE LEAGUE.

No. 120.—VOL. III.]

SATURDAY, JANUARY 10, 1846.

[3d.]

NOTICE TO THE PUBLIC.

LEAGUE FUND.

All Subscribers of £1 and upwards to the LEAGUE FUND will be entitled to, and receive, a copy weekly of this publication for twelve months from the date of the receipt of their subscription.

Subscribers of half-a-crown, and under £1, will have forwarded to them a copy of THE LEAGUE, containing an acknowledgment of their subscription; and it is requested that all subscribers will be kind enough to send their names and addresses to the offices of THE LEAGUE, Newall's-buildings, Manchester, or 67, Fleet-street, London.

N.B. As there is considerable risk in the transmission of gold and silver by post, parties wishing to forward small contributions to THE LEAGUE FUND are particularly requested to make their remittances by post-office orders.

The Council of the League would also suggest to their friends in the country the importance of transmitting their copies of THE LEAGUE newspaper, after perusal, to such parties (more especially farmers) as may be either hostile or indifferent to the question of Free Trade.

By order of the Council,

JOSEPH HICKIN, Secretary.

THE COUNTIES! THE COUNTIES!

REMEMBER THE 30TH OF JANUARY!

Mr. Cobden and Mr. Bright have now completed, for this season, their tour of agitation for the county qualification movement, and left this vital and all-essential work in the hands of the Free Trade public. Their visits have ranged over some dozen of the counties of England; from Somersetshire in the south, to the borders of Scotland in the north. They have spoken face to face with the men of Gloucestershire, Staffordshire, Nottinghamshire, Derbyshire, Somersetshire, Warwickshire, Yorkshire, Lancashire, Cheshire, Durham, Northumberland, Cumberland, and Westmoreland. In all these counties, the business is in course of active and vigorous prosecution. In all of them, qualification committees are hard at work—enrolling and arming the hosts of forty-shilling freeholders, who, at the next registration, will receive from the lips of the revising barristers their commission, made out in due form, to depose landlordism from the power it has so insolently usurped and so audaciously abused.

We dare say our friends are all too busy to trouble or amuse themselves much with reading tedious reports of silly and stupid harangues made at hotel-and-corner protectionist meetings. But if ever they do happen to take the Post or Herald in their hands, they will find abundant encouragement and stimulus to go on working this movement with a most unsparing vigour. The monopolists feel it, and roar out lustily. They can bear a potato panic admirably,—but this is a panic that upsets all their philosophy. They are now, for the first time, really hurt, and their cries of distress are most unmistakeably genuine. The thing is “unconstitutional,” an “attempt at intimidation,” an “attack on the independence of Parliament,” a “violation of the rights of British subjects,” and everything else that is horrible. Actually, one gentleman (at a Waltham meeting) discovers that “it will be very un-English to be governed by forty-shilling freeholders”—un-English to be governed according to the most ancient of English constitutional franchises! All which, of course, simply means, that the landlords feel their ill-used power to be slipping through their hands, and know that they will never, while England is England, get it back again. At the Hertfordshire protectionist meeting, the most noble Marquis of Salisbury thus plaintively gave vent to the emotions of the perturbed landlord mind:

“They were alarmed at the proceedings of an association which made fearful encroachments on the free exercise of their rights as British subjects. It will doubtless be the duty of Government, under these circumstances, to put a stop to the proceedings of the body calling itself the Anti-Corn-Law League. But I shall not make this a subject of discussion, although I am ready to say that I shall be among the first to petition Parliament to put a stop to practices calculated to be so subversive of all good government. You are aware that the proposed measures of the Anti-Corn-Law League are in the last degree subversive of your interests.”

Poor silly marquis! For an hereditary legislator, this is coming down. “Among the first to petition Parliament to put a stop to practices,” &c. Why not bring in a bill, most noble marquis, and advertise our movement for us, by a debate and division? We fear your petition will only be “laid on the table,” or, at best, “ordered to be printed”—for the benefit of the trunkmakers.

As we have given the marquis's text, we must not withhold Mr. Cobden's very suggestive commentary. At the great Newcastle meeting of last Monday, after edifying his auditory with a quotation of the above outburst of the frightened and angry lord of Salisbury, Mr. Cobden added, for a wider circle of hearers:

“Now, I'll tell you what I did directly I had read the speech of the Marquis of Salisbury. I wrote to a friend in Hertford immediately, and said, ‘Buy me a 40s. freehold in Hertfordshire.’ I'll be on the list for Hertfordshire next year, and I will beg and entreat all my friends, all good Leaguers, in the metropolis and the neighbourhood (where they are within half an hour's ride of the polling place for that county), to follow my example and qualify for it. We'll very soon show the Marquis of Salisbury how easy it is to send him back to his privacy, and just leave him as much power over the representation of Hertfordshire as any man wearing a round frock upon his estate.”

Most heartily do we join in Mr. Cobden's hope and entreaty, that all good Leaguers will go and do likewise. This county of Herts is among the prizes most easily to be won, and best worth winning. It is within reach of London. It is one of the comparatively few counties in which, at the last general election, opinion was so far independent as to render a contest not absolutely desperate; and it returns three members to Parliament,—that is to say, one annual forty shillings worth of freehold property in Hertfordshire gives three votes—three shares in the sovereignty of the empire. We tell the Londoners, they must make Hertfordshire their own BETWEEN NOW AND THE THIRTIETH OF THIS MONTH OF JANUARY.

Again and again, with an earnestness deepened, by the rapid flight of time, into almost importunate anxiety, we say—THE COUNTIES! THE COUNTIES! QUALIFY, QUALIFY, QUALIFY! Whatever else you do, or leave undone, do this—do this NOW. Sow the seed now, with unsparing profusion,—that seed which the coming summer will mature into available franchise. Let nothing divert your attention for an instant from this movement. It is of incomparably more importance than anything and everything beside. Neglect anything and everything rather than this. Petitions to Parliament, subscriptions to the League Fund, great demonstrations by public meetings—all these, however important, sink into insignificance before the transcendent and paramount necessity of obtaining the legal and constitutional powers of self-government. Only let us have the votes, and we shall not want the petitions, the subscriptions, and the meetings. The votes are ALL IN ALL. Give us the votes, and we have the Legislature, the Cabinet, the empire, all for our own, by a title as secure as that of our freeholders themselves. Stand fast on the votes, and the three estates of the realm will come round to us without more words.

THE QUARTER OF A MILLION LEAGUE FUND.

We suppose it will be pretty generally allowed, that Manchester has, by this time, about done its part. The resources even of Manchester are finite; and if they have not yet absolutely found their limits, the subscription of 74,000*l.* will at least be considered a very sufficient beginning. It is now for the country to go on, and do the rest. We appeal to the zeal and spirit of England, Scotland, and Ireland, to carry on and complete that which Manchester has so nobly begun.

There will be no waiting, we hope, for visits from Mr. Cobden and Mr. Bright, or deputations from the League. Mr. Cobden and Mr. Bright cannot at this period of the year—within a few days of the assembling of Parliament—make visits to one-tenth of those towns on which we naturally rely for the completion of our fund. We must look to local exertion, local spirit, and local self-acting zeal. We must trust—and do trust—to the spontaneous energy and activity of our friends in distant parts of the country. Every considerable town must have its own meeting, its own canvass for subscriptions, its own subscription committee. The League can just now undertake nothing more than to receive the resources placed at its disposal by national zeal and devotedness, and organise and work them for the national cause.

We may say a word on the meaning and significance of this Quarter of a Million Fund, by way of showing the vast importance of making it up at once. It is second in importance only to the qualification movement—of which, in fact, it may be regarded as a branch. The two are parts of one whole—the fund guarantees the extension and continuance of the struggle for the franchise. The Quarter of a Million will show Sir Robert Peel and the landlords what is coming. It will give the promise of another year of the qualification movement, should another year be wanted. It will put the option distinctly and tangibly before them—total, immediate, and unconditional repeal this next session, OR A QUALIFICATION AND REGISTRATION AGENT OF THE LEAGUE PLANTED IN EVERY COUNTY IN ENGLAND. The progress of this fund will, to the mind of politicians, be a measure of the force and earnestness of public determination—a coarse and imperfect measure, perhaps, but a singularly intelligible one. It will make the whole affair level to the meanest capacity. We will venture to say, Sir John Tyrrell himself will understand it. If we would give the Ministry and the monopolists a perfectly clear idea of what we intend and they may expect, nothing will answer the purpose better than the facts and figures of a subscription-list for rooting out such landlordism from its Parliamentary preserves.

Now is the time to strike home—now, before the 22d of this month. Sir Robert Peel has not yet committed himself—he doubtless is glad to wait to the last. His “plan” is yet a secret to the world—possibly, a secret to himself. The questions of compromise or no compromise is still, for anything that is known, an open question in the Minister's mind. We have no particular reason for supposing that his mind is closed absolutely against every kind of argument. Perhaps he is still “waiting for an excuse.” At all events, let him not have this excuse for further paltering with the nation's demands, and tampering with the nation's life—that he does not exactly know the nation's mind. The Quarter of a Million Fund will make it all very clear to him. It will tell him—and will tell those who, with all their bluster and fanfaronnade of “independence,” will do pretty much as he may bid them—that, if this question be not settled now, landlordism, as a political power, will be extinguished within the year.

A CANDID “SPECTATOR.”

“There is a hypocrisy of candour which injures the cause of justice.”—Spectator, February 27, 1844.

So wrote our contemporary in the days when there was a “Whig” Ministry to be schooled, and scolded, and snubbed for "so often querulously remonstrating against the recognition of general principles;" and when the "leaders of the Anti-Corn-Law agitation" needed, in the estimation of this sharp-scented moral critic, to be spirited up to the advocacy and championship of "Free Trade in the most unrestricted sense of the word." The then so zealous and uncompromising Cato of Free Trade and virtue has since lived to furnish an illustration of his own aphorism, such as could scarcely have been anticipated from so stern a censor of the vices of the age.

We are pretty well seasoned by this time to the disagreeable emotions consequent on witnessing the self-degradation of the press into subserviency to the piques and spites of those who wield its powers. Yet we have seldom felt a more lively disgust and contempt than in perusing an article in which the Spectator, on Saturday last, lectures the League for what it is pleased to call—with a happy unconsciousness of the recoil of its own phrase—the "spiteful antagonism" that insists on the whole of a just demand, and refuses to fritter away a righteous principle in compromise. In order completely to show the true character of the ill-tempered and worse principled effusion to which we allude, we may first of all refresh the public memory a little, on the former professions and conduct of this rigid moral and political purist.

If any of our readers happen to have at hand the volume of the Spectator for the year 1841, they will find, on turning to the date of the 6th of March, an article entitled, "TOTAL AND IMMEDIATE REPEAL OF THE CORN LAWS." The occasion of that article was the refusal of a portion of the constituency of Forfar to vote for a candidate who declined pledging himself to total and immediate repeal—the candidate in question being a gentleman who "would not fetter himself, in the exercise of his vote on the Corn Laws, by any pledge which might risk the speedy attainment of a wholesome modification of those laws." From this the Spectator took occasion to discuss at length the question of "the wisdom of the Anti-Corn-Law agitators taking up the ground of 'total and immediate repeal.'" The inquiry was prefaced as follows:

"In the reiteration of the brief formula, there is necessarily at times an appearance of dogmatism—of the substitution of passionate will for reason. We propose, therefore, to recapitulate, in a condensed form, the reasons upon which we understand the Anti-Corn-Law League to have taken up the ground of total and immediate repeal, for the purpose of ascertaining whether it be the deliberate resolve of dispassionate inquiry, or merely an expression of strong self-will."

After an elaborate examination of both branches of the "total and immediate" formula of League faith—in which he particularly insisted on the superior safety and advantage, to the agricultural interest itself, of the immediateness of repeal—our contemporary concluded thus:

"These, as we are given to understand, are the grounds upon which the Anti-Corn-Law League rest their recommendations that the repeal of the Corn Law should be both total and immediate. After a dispassionate review, we can see NO FLAW IN THE CHAIN OF REASONING, NO GROUND WHY THEY SHOULD MODIFY THEIR DEMAND. And, entertaining these views, we cannot see how the members of the League, as honest men, could do otherwise than recommend to all electors to exert themselves to return to Parliament such members only as agree with them in opinion. . . . This being the case, they are quite right in insisting upon precise and explicit declarations of opinion on this subject from all Parliamentary candidates. . . . In stating, however, this unqualified approbation of the position taken up by the League, we must be allowed to suggest, that its members ought to embrace every occasion of stating the process of reasoning by which they support their laconic confession of faith."

Now, will it be believed, that, for having stood firm to this "laconic confession of faith," through seven years of hard, up-hill working and fighting—and for pertinaciously continuing the "reiteration of this brief formula" at a moment when it is all ripe and ready for legislative recognition,—this candid and impartial "Spectator" of men and things attacks us, of the League, with the charge of "spiteful antagonism,"—of a "habit of desperate warfare," for warfare's sake, that "continues to operate after victory"—of a cowardly "love to beat a prostrate foe," and "wish to trample" on opponents "after getting them down"—and of a vindictive "rejoicing in the prospective misery of farmers and labourers, because it will "serve them right." It is, of course, superfluous to add, that the Spectator has not a word to say now for the "laconic confession" of Free Trade faith.

In its article of Saturday last, entitled, drolly enough, "How to FACILITATE CORN LAW REPEAL," the "hypocrisy of candour" endeavours to "facilitate" the advent of Free Trade, first by vilifying its advocates—next, by darkly suggesting the most dire possibilities of evil as incident to its realisation—and lastly, by proposing to make its attainment conditional on the antecedent or concurrent adoption of a complicated and costly appendage, in the shape of a grand scheme of colonisation, to be devised by the Spectator and executed by the State. Hypocrisy of candour begins in this fashion:

"There is a class of politicians whom the gaining of their object does not satisfy. They cannot be happy unless they gain it by a sort of violence upon their opponents, whom they also take delight in punishing for having opposed them. Of such is the agitator, in whom the habit of desperate warfare continues to operate after victory. He loves to beat the prostrate foe."

On which we have only to say, that we have not got our "victory," and never should get it if we took counsel with hypocrisy of candour. The foe is not "prostrate," but paramount in both Houses of Parliament.

Candour proceeds:

"His (Mr. Cobden's) League has recently given some indications of a wish to trample on the agriculturists after getting them down. It would seem that the more active of the Anti-Corn Law party (or some of them at least) want more than a total repeal of the Corn Laws. In order to please them wholly, the repeal must be instantaneously sudden as well as entire. If the suddenness of so great a change should lead to panic amongst the farmers, and this panic should throw great numbers of labourers out of employment, and vastly increase the poor-rate, 'why, it will serve the monopolists right,' say some of the League, 'for their opposition to Free Trade.'"

Will Candour please be so good as to say when and where "some of the League" have ever said anything of the sort? Also, what it means by the League's "wish to trample on the agriculturists?" Have the League ever proposed to do, or indicated a wish to do, anything which, in Candour's opinion, would be an INJUSTICE to the agriculturists—which "trampling" means, if it means anything?

Candour resumes:—

"He (the Leaguer) insists on 'no delay,' 'no compromise,' 'no letting down easy.' He scorns to facilitate, he will only force, the accomplishment of his own purpose. He has but one notion of means to his end—spiteful antagonism. It never occurs to him, that as all things have their season, so now, when success is clearly within his reach, the time has come for avoiding risks and employing facilities—for helping on by every conceivable aid that conclusion which nothing can prevent, nor anything long delay save the desperation of the party which are yielding. There are Leaguers who appear bent on making the agriculturists desperate."

Our contemporary has certainly an odd judgment in "seasons." On the 8th of May, 1841—which was decidedly no season for very big and boastful words—he wrote, "If there be among the Free Trade agitators any men who know what they would be at, and possess courage and energy to put it in act, they may say of our legislators, as Cromwell said of the Scots at Dunbar, 'The Lord hath delivered them into our hands.'" But now, when "success" really is "clearly within reach," he is all timidity and compliance. Perhaps, as "all things have their seasons," the Spectator's principles are an affair of the seasons. Our contemporary's virtue thrived wonderfully in the "Whig" days—we have not seen so much of it under the Peel régime.

Notwithstanding that success is within reach, and the victory, in fact, already won, Candour sees a great "difficulty"—a difficulty which "Free Traders wholly overlook," but happily "which it may be in the power of the Government to mitigate." The difficulty is certainly original—of Candour's own composing. Candour apprehended that "the rural clergy of England and Scotland, though they have for the most part abstained from defending the Corn Laws, are generally impressed with a belief that the poorest class of their parishioners will, at least for a time, suffer grievously from the admission of foreign grain free of duty—suffer to the extent even of 'famine and pestilence;'" and consequently, the said rural clergy have (quite irrespectively of tithes, which, in fact, have nothing in the world to do with it) a "strong dislike to a measure from which they expect results so disastrous to the class who are their especial care." Yet there is, fortunately, a way out of the difficulty. For, by a felicitous coincidence, "it likewise happens that this body, speaking generally, has for some years been desirous of seeing the Government adopt a particular means of affording relief from superfluous numbers in the rural districts—emigration, or rather colonization, managed by the State; and that such a measure is peculiarly applicable to the emergency dreaded from the repeal of the Corn Laws." Can anything be luckier? Let the Government only get up a grand scheme of "emigration, or rather colonization"—and a cause of one of the most formidable obstacles to Free Trade will be removed." The rural clergy's general, but inoperative, "fears" of "famine and pestilence" will be laid to rest, and clergymen will, "to a considerable extent, at least, be reconciled to that freedom of the Corn Trade which they now dread." As colonization is a difficult question, which the Government does not at all understand, the Spectator promises to go to work at once on a plan for Mr. Gladstone's consideration; and then, if Mr. Gladstone understands and approves the Spectator's plan—and if the Cabinet agree with Mr. Gladstone—and if the two Houses of Parliament agree with the Cabinet—then we shall be ripe, at last, for entertaining the question of Free Trade. And this is "How to facilitate Corn Law Repeal"—and to be of any other way of thinking is "spiteful antagonism."

If our readers have not, by this time, a perfectly clear idea of what is meant by "HYPOCRISY OF CANDOUR," we can only say, it is neither the Spectator's fault, nor ours.

THE QUARTERLY REVIEW.

Rigby has once more tried his hand at a "slashing article," and has put the author of Coningsby to the blush, by surpassing, in sober reality, the wildest extravagance of caricature. His peculiar tact in marshalling circumstantial evidence, so as to contradict the plainest fact, has been indulged to such an excess, that he has saved his adversaries some trouble in refutation by committing himself to two contradictory propositions; he has laboured to prove that Lord John Russell adopted Free Trade principles only in consequence of the report of Sir R. Peel's resignation, and in the same breath he asserts that Lord John Russell has been a Free Trader ever since 1841. The Times has sufficiently exposed the blustering frenzy which such short-sighted inconsistency exhibits; but there are some other examples of irate senility in the article which must not be passed over without notice, however painful may be the task of meddling with the drivellings of angry dotage.

In criticising Lord John Russell's letter, Rigby first assails the assertion that early in November last there was a general expectation that ministers would relax the restrictions on the importation of food, either by an Order in Council, or by an immediate assembling of Parliament, to suspend or repeal the Corn Laws. Against this Rigby marshals the circumstance that Lord John Russell went at this period to Edinburgh—as if railroads had not brought Edinburgh into such close proximity with London, that little more than a day would be lost if the noble lord found it necessary to communicate with his colleagues. A second circumstance adduced to show the improbability of any such expectation existing is, that there was a large stock of corn in bond; but the additional circumstance is omitted, that the stock of bonded corn had been diminished in the month of October by the exportation of provisions from British ports to Belgium. We shall only adduce one evidence for the existence of this general expectation, the Standard newspaper, which declared that Sir Robert Peel was not only ready to open the ports, but, if necessary, to grant a bounty on the importation of foreign corn.

Rigby next attributes inconsistency to Lord John Russell in demanding the free importation of food, and at the same time condemning all Government interference with the supply of provisions. The restrictions, as every child knows, are the interference, and it is the merest quibble to represent the removal of these restrictions as an additional interference. Such logic belongs to the philosophic school, in which the moralities of a marquis and his mistress vary as they are placed in a dining-room or in a carriage.

We have next a very oracular decision on the points at issue between the Times and Standard respecting the causes that led to the disruption of Sir Robert Peel's Cabinet. Rigby thinks that "the statement of the Times was unfortunately nearer to the truth;" but he forthwith adds, that he cannot believe our sagacious Premier would repeal a law "which, instead of alternate gluts and famines, and corresponding fluctuations of work and wages, is calculated, as far as human laws can operate, to correct the vicissitudes of the seasons, and to preserve a steady supply and moderate prices."

Before we proceed to examine this poetic description of the results of the Corn Laws, we should like to know what is the precise nature of the correspondence between the "fluctuations in work and wages, and gluts and famines." If abundance and consequent cheapness of food produces greater employment and larger wages, then what Rigby calls "a glut" is a national blessing; and that such is the case has been proved by the experience of this very year in the manufacturing districts, where food is dearer and wages lower than they were at this period last year. A glut of food,—that is, a supply too large for the wants of the consumers—has not occurred in England within the memory of man; but scarcity verging on famine has visited us periodically ever since the enactment of the Corn Laws; and the fluctuations of price since 1815, as extraordinary as they were unexpected, have amounted to 199½ per cent. So much for the boasted steadiness of supply and moderate prices!

Rigby next revives the exploded sophism of "dependence on foreigners;" he conveniently forgets that we are already dependent on foreigners for the staple of our principal manufactures, yet he has never been troubled with a vision of the United States laying an embargo on the export of cotton, or Spain and Saxony withholding their wool. The very reason why corn is exposed to such a danger, is the uncertainty and irregularity of the trade; foreigners prohibit exports at one time, because we have prohibited imports at another. He says, with truth, that "starving millions cannot await the slow oscillations by which, after the lapse of time, the pent-up corn may flow in on us." But who first established these oscillations, under the pressure of which we are now suffering? Clearly the authors of the sliding scale, whose graduations of scarcity at this moment keep corn pent up in our bonded warehouses; and the slowness of the oscillations belongs peculiarly to the present Premier, whose system of taking the averages has gauged our powers of endurance by the price of the inferior grain, while the nutritive wheat has run up beyond the average of free importation.

Rigby next asserts that a free importation of foreign corn would throw English land out of cultivation. We appeal to the facts and figures collected by Messrs. Morton and Trimmer, in their unanswered and unanswerable pamphlet, to show that the Corn Laws are actually an impediment to the cultivation of the land in England. But we have the fact proved by the admission of the monopolists themselves. When Mr. Cobden, in the last session of Parliament, challenged them to an enquiry into the effect of protection on agriculture, they shrunk from the investigation, and thus tacitly acknowledged that agriculture derives no benefit from protection. Every practical farmer knows that the free admission of inferior grain, by enabling him to feed cattle, and thus obtain an abundant supply of fertilising manures would lead to a great extension of the cultivation of the best varieties of wheat, now greatly neglected on account of the vast increase of the cost of production resulting from the Corn Laws.

Rigby next refers to the case of Ireland, and insists that the Corn Laws have no relation whatever to the potato disease. Of course, he can show that they have no close connection in the way of cause and effect; but the question now is about remedy, and we humbly conceive that bread will save a man from starving when he has not a sufficient supply of potatoes. It is true that a poor peasant cannot buy enough of dear bread to satisfy his wants; but lower the price, and he may perhaps be able to obtain a portion. Rigby tells us that the great want of the Irish is money; and in order that this limited supply of money should go as far as possible, he insists on keeping up to the highest point to which it can be screwed the price of necessary provision!

Rigby next proceeds to the protection of manufactures, and quotes as his strongest case the prohibition of foreign reprints of our books. The law of copyright, the question of property in the creations of the mind, is so utterly unconnected with all questions of exchange, that long as we have been familiar with Rigby's hardihood in practised sophistry, we felt more than astonished at his hazardous such an illustration. It is, however, sometimes convenient to confound free booting with Free Trading. Rigby has not even the merit of originality; he took the idea from that very sagacious legislator, Mr. Ferrand, who vented some similar nonsense when discussing the question of copyright in design. The prohibition of foreign reprints is not a protection to British industry in any sense of the word; it is a protection to private property, a property which no legislature can confer, and of which it never does more than recognise the existence.

Rigby's next case is the protection accorded to British spirits. He omits from their case that they are subjected to the duties of the excise, and we have no doubt that they would willingly resign protection in exchange for a total remission of the special taxation to which they are subjected. We know of no excise levied on corn; and those who resisted Mr. Ward's motion ought in very shame to be silent about the special burthens on land.

Rigby next deprecates Free Trade in labour. He forgets that it already exists, except in so far as it is affected by protective duties, all of which, by limiting the range of employment, and thereby diminishing the demand, lower the rate of wages. Parliament has over and over confessed that it is impossible to fix the amount of wages by statute; and this very confession enhances both the iniquity and absurdity of fixing, or rather attempting to fix, the rate of the provisions which wages have to purchase.

"O God! that food should be so dear,
And flesh and blood so cheap."

As a matter of course, the League comes in for a very large share of vituperation. The tone of abuse is, however, moderated since the Gregorian era, when Rigby accused the Free Traders of plotting to revive the horrors of the French revolution; and paraded garbled extracts from the farrago of reports industriously collected by Mr. Gregory in Manchester, while hunting for proofs of imaginary conspiracy. Rigby has, however, revealed the sore point with his patrons—the determination of the League to rescue the counties from the degraded condition of pocket boroughs, which he facetiously denominates "corrupting the constituencies." He may rest assured that the progress of this good work will not be interrupted unless speedy justice be obtained; and that the power of vassalage and serfdom will be humbled before a race of freeholders.

"Who know their rights;
And knowing, dare maintain."

To the string of questions respecting manufactured goods with which Rigby concludes his frenzied ravings, we have a very short answer. Our textile fabrics need no protection; for as they compete, at least on equal terms, with foreigners in neutral markets, they can fear no competition at home. Excisable articles have a claim for compensation, and are therefore indifferent to the issue; and the remaining items would be compensated for the loss of protection by the increased consumption consequent on freedom of trade.

With more than usual folly and audacity, Rigby enters upon the questions of compensation and taxation, taking as his text that the land of England is mortgaged for the payment of eight hundred millions of national debt. He was not very prudent in reminding the tax-payers, that though this debt was contracted for the land, its interest has been paid by the industry of the country. He should have hesitated before he reminded us of the fraud practised in the levying of the land-tax, by which the owners of estates, violating their own stipulated tenure, have abstracted from the revenue a sum more than sufficient to pay the whole amount of the national debt; he seems to have forgotten such special exemptions as fire insurances and legacy duties. Nothing but the most crass ignorance or downright insanity could excuse the advocate of the lords of acres for venturing on this perilous ground. Let the cry of compensation be once raised on their side, and a louder and more equitable demand for compensation of a different kind will be made by the other. The arrears of the land-tax would be a formidable item in the settlement of accounts, and the monopolists may be assured that it will not be forgotten if they call upon the nation to compare the respective schedules and strike a fair balance.

Some threats of agrarian resistance are insinuated, rather than expressed, by the antiquated reviewer. Such threats are the hackneyed resource of a bully, to frighten away fear; and while he uses them, his craven terror is too strong to be concealed. They appear, however, to be designed more for the Premier than the people. He is menaced with the fate of Actæon—that of being destroyed by his own hounds. Whether such a euthanasia be probable, may be for the future to determine; but no coin in the realm is sufficiently small to show the low amount of premium for which we should insure him from the old toothless cur that now barks at his heels.

At the very earnest solicitation of the Free Trade party, backed by a most numerously signed requisition, Daniel Gaskell, Esq., of Lupset-hall, has finally determined to become a candidate for the representation of Wakefield, in the event of a dissolution of the present Parliament.

At Bradford, the requisition to Mr. Busfield and Col. Thompson has already received about 500 signatures.

Of the gentlemen returned as representatives of the 25 wards in the London court of common council, the great majority are advocates of Free Trade.

FREE TRADE MEETINGS.

IMPORTANT MEETING OF AGRICULTURAL LABOURERS IN NORTH WILTS.

(From the Times.)

WOOTTON-BASSETT, JAN. 6.—A meeting of a very remarkable and important character at the present crisis was held last night at a village, six miles beyond this town, called Goatcree, a small place, with an agricultural population scarcely exceeding 200 persons, but surrounded at various distances by several similar villages or hamlets. The chairman was a labourer; the speakers, with the exception of two, were labourers; and the object in view was to call public attention to the present condition of the labouring population in this part of the country, and to petition Her Majesty and the Legislature to take decisive steps for the speedy relief of their extreme distress. The meeting was to have been held in a large booth erected in a field, but the great expense of providing such accommodation was beyond the combined contributions which these poor people could spare from their very scanty means; and therefore they were compelled to assemble together in the cross-road of the village, and to endure the inclemency of a winter night while they talked over their common sufferings. The whole of the arrangements and proceedings were strikingly characteristic of the occasion. A hurdle supported by four stakes, driven into the ground beneath a hedge on the road side, formed a narrow and unsteady platform, capable of supporting only the chairman and one speaker at a time. Below this rustic erection were placed a small deal table and some rushbottom chairs, borrowed from a neighbouring cottage, for the accommodation of reporters. Four or five candles, some in lanterns, and others sheltered from the wind by the hands that held them, threw a dim and flickering light upon the groups on this spot, before and around which were gathered nearly 1000 of the peasantry of Wiltshire, some of them accompanied by their wives and their children, who, thus collected, presented a wild and painful appearance. In the shadows of the night the distinctive garb of their class was everywhere discernible, but when the fitting clouds permitted the moon to shine brightly in their faces, in them might be seen written, in strong and unmistakable lines, anxiety, supplication, want, hunger, ever responsive in expression to the sentiments and statements delivered by speakers, who merely described in plain unvarnished language the miseries of their rural auditors. The style of the more important speeches, and the nature of the disclosures made in them, demand an exact report of them, which will be found below, abating the provincial accentuation of words.

DAVID KELL, a man of rather advanced age, was formally called upon to preside, and opened the proceedings by reading a printed copy of the following notice:—

"Anti-Corn Law Meeting at Goatcree.—At a meeting of the committee of the Goatcree Reform Society, held at the committee-room, Goatcree, on Tuesday, December 8th, the following resolutions were unanimously carried:—Resolved, 1. That, in the opinion of the committee, the distress of the labouring people, caused by the failure in the potato crop, and the high price of bread, is such as to justify the holding a public meeting for the purpose of petitioning the Queen for a total repeal of the Corn Laws, inasmuch as wheat has risen 25 per cent., while the wages of the farm labourers have not risen 5 per cent. 2. That a public meeting be held at Goatcree on Monday, the 8th of January, 1846, for the purpose named in the first resolution. In pursuance of the above resolution, notice is hereby given that a public meeting will be held in a large booth at Goatcree, on Monday, the 8th January, 1846, at half-past 6 o'clock in the evening, for the purpose of petitioning the Queen for a total repeal of the Corn Laws.—Joseph Brewer, Chairman of the Committee. N.B. It is earnestly hoped that all who are suffering from distress will attend, that their distress may be made known."

The CHAIRMAN then said: To all who are here present, and to my poor fellow-labourers in particular, I call your attention to a subject of the utmost importance—a subject which demands very serious consideration. You know by painful experience that we are suffering under distress and poverty; and we are met here this evening on purpose to make known that distress to her Majesty and to her Ministers, to pray them to open the ports and to repeal the unjust Corn Laws, so that we and our families may enjoy the bounties of Providence. (Hear, hear.) As it respects my own distress, and the calamities and miseries I have undergone and undergone, I have spoken of them before at the Ramsbury meeting. But the case is not altered now. I have only 6s. a week for keeping myself, a wife, and two small children. I cannot earn half enough to keep us. 6l. 10s. must go to pay house and garden rent, and no potatoes got. (Hear.) I say, then, let us unite together to advocate the cause of Free Trade. (Cheers.) Free Trade for ever! (Repeated cheers.) What was it we were sent into the world for? Is it not for the benefit of society? Hath God not committed to us a talent, and will He not require the use of it at our hands? (Hear, hear.) There are classes of people in this world, but perhaps they are unknown to many of you, that think that, because God brings all things to pass according to His unalterable decrees, they may sit down and rest contented, and never think of doing anything at all, except it is to usurp the authority of God. They may look into His sacred word; but with His revealed will they will have nothing to do. Dost thou not know, O man! that thou wast endowed with a mind, and will, and faculties, which God works upon as His instruments to bring about His all-wise purposes? He looked upon His people in Egypt, and He saw their affliction, and raised up Moses to be their deliverer. Again, He raised up Gideon to deliver them out of the hands of the Midianites. And Cyrus again to deliver them from Babylon, when they were in captivity; and to come nearer our own times, He raised up Oliver Cromwell and many others to do what was to be done. And in the present day, is there not a Cobden, a Bright, and a Radnor? It is not for us to inquire whether these men are good men or not. It is sufficient for us to know that they are doing a good moral work in our nation. (Cheers.) But there is another class of characters which I would speak to, for perhaps there are some of them amongst you; poor dear souls, they are to be pitied, for they are fearing where no fear ought to be. They are afraid they shall be turned out of their labour, and out of their houses; and they are fearing this great man, and that great man, and the other great man. They are fearing every day because of the fury of the oppressor. And "where is the fury of the oppressor?" There is no cause at all to fear him, my poor fellow-labourers. For says God, "Behold, I have created the smith that bloweth the coals in the fire, and that bringeth forth an instrument for his work; and I have created the waster to destroy. No weapon that is formed against thee shall prosper; and every tongue that riseth against thee in judgment thou shalt condemn." Let us stand up, my fellow-labourers, for good laws, for freedom, for equality. (Cheers.) I envy not the rich man for his riches; but is it not unreasonable and arbitrary that the rich should be endowed with the full and sole power to send members to Parliament to legislate? (Hear, hear.) The laws press upon the poor, who never had any hand in making them. (Hear, hear.) But I do think the time will come when every labouring householder will have the privilege of sending members to Parliament. (Cheers.) When every man comes under the power of every law that is made, ought not every man to have a voice in making that law? (Hear, hear.) And now a word or two for the protectionists. I would ask, where is the utility of the protectionist contending for the Corn Law, since it has been proved again and again, by invincible argument, that the Corn Law is no benefit to him? But he is led on by the Duke of Buckingham and others, just as the Italian leads a bear through the streets, and when he has made as much money of him as he can, he turns upon the poor creature, and cuts him up to make bear's grease. (Laughter.) So it is with the poor farmer, and so the poor labourer is brought down to misery and ruin. (Hear, hear.)

WILLIAM BURCHELL then came forward to move the adoption of the following resolution, or rather declaration:

"We, the labourers of Goatsacre and its neighbourhood, in public meeting assembled, do solemnly protest against the Corn Laws, which were enacted on the plea of being beneficial to our interest, but have been, on the contrary, injurious, inasmuch as they prevent the employment of capital in the improvement of the soil, and thereby diminish labour, and raise the price of the first necessities of life. And we labourers declare that we are lingering out a miserable existence under the idea of being protected." (Hear, hear.)

He considered that this was the best resolution that the meeting could carry. (Burchell finding a little difficulty at first in expressing himself, one of his fellow-labourers in the crowd called out, "Never mind about a word or two; hungry men can understand what you mean.") The remark was re-echoed by many voices.) He was one of the poor Wiltshire labourers who were suffering under a pretended Corn Law protection. It had been many times stated that this Corn Law protection was for the benefit of the labouring classes, but he maintained that at the present time it was an injury to them. (Hear, hear.) He, therefore, hoped that they would unite in petitioning for the speedy removal of that protection, and the establishment of Free Trade for the nation. (Loud cheers.) God Almighty in his providence caused the earth to produce abundance of provisions for man, and what one nation could not produce another could; therefore everything should be so managed as to have free commerce throughout the world. (Hear, hear.) The labouring classes were in a most distressed condition at the present time—worse than last year, when he said at Wootton Bassett that every man with five or six children went to bed more in debt than he was the night before. His condition was worse than it was that time twelvemonth. If wages had risen within the last few years 1s. a week, the price of bread had risen 2s., so that the difference was against himself and his family. (A voice—"True, we be always going back.") He hoped the Legislature would take into consideration their distressed state, and find a speedy rescue for the oppressed poor. (Hear, hear.) He could maintain the truth of all that the chairman had stated about their distress. He believed that there were at the present time many who had not a bit of bread to eat. He did not know whether the man was in that congregation or not, but one man of Lyneham parish had told him that many a night he had gone to bed hungry. (Cries of "Ah, he is not the only one"—"No, not by many.") Those who were in distress should come forward and manfully make their distress known; that would show the necessity for Free Trade, which he believed to be the only remedy. (A voice—"It can't make us worse.") 20 or 30 years ago, the labourers of Wiltshire used to go up into the hills and make a good harvest; but since trade had failed it was no use for them to go looking for reaping, for many thousands of "scribblers" and weavers out of employment went and cut down the wheat at low wages. But he believed that if every scribbler had work at his mill, and every weaver employment at his loom, they would not rob the poor agricultural labourer of his day's work. (Hear.) Many persons said that Free Trade would make things worse for them; he did not believe that to be possible, and all he wanted was, that the experiment should be tried. (Hear, hear.) He had heard that in centuries past labouring men had for food bread, and butter, and cheese, and beef, and pork, and beer; but now it was bad potatoes and salt. He was often thankful that the streams and rivulets were so bountifully spread around their neighbourhood, and that taxation could not be written on their bosoms. (Hear, hear.) But it was distressing for a man to get up early and go to work having little or no victuals, and to return to dinner upon a few potatoes, and then be afraid sometimes to eat what he had. (A voice, "Cause you would not have any for to-morrow.") He had heard it said that there was no market for meat. Why was that? Because the people had not the means of purchasing meat, therefore the consumption was not bigger. He was past 40 years of age, and he could say that he never purchased a pound of good slaughtered beef fit to be carried into market. As to mutton, he had purchased a little of that, but never as much as would average a pound a year in the 40 years. He knew what veal was, but he had never had any at all. He believed that the only way to improve the meat market and increase the home consumption, was to establish Free Trade; and he would conclude by calling on them to unite in petitioning for Free Trade. (Cheers.) Free Trade for ever! (Renewed cheers.)

CHARLES VINES, in seconding the resolution, said,—Friends, I wish the moon was a little brighter just now, that I could see better who is here; but I see enough to find that here is a good many people, and almost all of 'em wear smock-frocks and poor old hats as I do. Some of us heard from a pulpit a short time ago, that the mind of man is like to be dissatisfied. I believe it. Dissatisfied minds have brought all these men here to-night. (A woman's voice, "Ay, and women, too.") I believe, fellow-labourers, that if you and your families had full bellies, you would now have been at home, after being working hard all day, comfortable with your wives and families. ("Ay, that's true.") I am sure I should not have walked all the way up here from Christian-Malford, through lanes and paths full of mud and dirt, if it hadn't been for that. I don't come here to talk politics, I don't know nothing of 'em. But I don't know much of the Corn Laws, only that they ha'n't done we labourers much good. (Cries of hear, hear.) Everybody knows that. (A voice, "I've had 'em staring me in the face ever since 1817.") Yes, the Corn Laws exist, and every one of us feels that the sooner they be abolished the better. (Cheers.) I don't know whether many of you read newspapers; but I must tell you that in the Wiltshire Independent, not long ago, there was this statement made by a labourer of Christian-Malford to the Editor,—“As Mr. Benett, M.P. for South Wiltshire, lately stated at an agricultural meeting that the poor of Wiltshire were always employed regularly at the rate of 8s. and 9s. per week, and that they were well fed and well clothed, and as I know by experience that that statement is false, I will, if you will be so kind as to allow me to occupy a small space in your valuable paper, prove that it is so; and I will tell what I earned for 39 weeks ending the 10th of June, 1844, to maintain as large a family as almost any poor man has. The number of my family is eight; all of those 39 weeks we wanted 7s. a-week for bread, not having any potatoes a third part of the time; so that, if I had not been receiving 8s. a-week during all that time, it would not have been enough to buy bread and firing. And now, sir, I will tell what was the exact amount of what I did earn during those 39 weeks; it was 5l. 19s. 8d., which is not quite 3s. 1d. a-week. This report is almost enough to make you stagger to believe it, but it is no less strange than true; and I can say, for a truth, that if it had not been for a little land which I rent of the Hon. Earl of Carnarvon and the Rev. Mr. Law, and a few good friends amongst my neighbours, my family and myself must have died from starvation; it was not much better as it was. Now I will ask the hon. gentleman if he thinks he is justified in stating such things at public meetings? I could say a great deal more on the subject, but I will leave these remarks for Mr. Benett's present perusal, and say a word or two at some future period, and I sincerely hope and trust that these remarks will open the said Mr. Benett's eyes a little, so that he may see that the poor are in distress; and I sincerely hope he will make speeches and try to adopt measures for the bettering the condition of us poor labourers; and I don't doubt but that it will redound to his praise; and I think he, in so doing, will glorify God, who alone knows the hearts of all, and the distress which we, as a nation, are labouring under, for there has been an increasing distress for years past. Many in this parish are now suffering greatly for want of work.” (Cries of, “Ah, that is true, all true.”) This case, so stated in that paper, was the case of the man who stands before you. (Hear, hear.) And now, my friends, the purpose of my being here to-night is to prove to you the accurate sum that I earned from September 16, 1843, till November 23, 1844, which is about 62 weeks, together with the amount of money earned by me down to the 31st of December, 1845, which, if I reckon right, is about 119 weeks and three days. Together with relief when ill, and 20 weeks for a boy, 12 years old, who was allowed 3d. a day, the whole sum amounted to 42l. 5s. 5d., that is exactly 7s. 14d. a-week, or thereabouts. Now, I will ask any labourer with a wife and six children, to step forward and, if he can, tell me in what I am to spend this money, so as to pay every man I deal with 20s. in the pound? (“Why, thee can't.”) If he can, I shall be glad to take a lesson in economy of him. I can only say that my wife and myself have made it our study for the last 14 years and more. She says she can't make the money do it, and yet I am proud to say she is as good a wife as any man has got. (Cheers.) I would remark here that there are other necessities besides food. There is house rent. I pay 4l. a year, as a good many in this meeting know. Now, 119 weeks, which go a good way towards two and a half years, will take away 9l., leaving 33l. 5s. 9d. Then I reckon shoes a necessary. (“You can't do without them.”) I take what a pair cost me two years ago; I haven't had any since, nor my family, and I suppose we never shall any more. I paid 12s. for a pair of water-tights; and if there is any shoemaker here who will make me another pair at that price, I shall want at least six months' credit. (A laugh.) If he wants them he shall have two bondsmen farmers, and I will be bound to say that they must pay him, for I don't see that I ever can. (Laughter.) Then there is a pair for my wife, 6s. 3d.; for my oldest daughter (14 years) 5s. 6d.; for my oldest son (11 years) 6s. 6d.; for my next son (9 years) 5s. 6d.; for my next daughter (7 years) 4s. 6d.; for my next (4 years) 3s.; for the youngest child (2 years) 1s. 6d. All that amounts to 24.4s. 9d., leaving a surplus of 31l. 0s. 9d. to buy food for 119 weeks, being 5s. 2½d. per week for eight in a family. I will leave all the world to judge if that sum is sufficient to keep a family, eight in number, in food. (“No, it can't be done.”) I am sure I often don't know how to make both ends meet. My bread bill, since last July, cost me from 7s. 7d. to 8s. 8d. a-week. Then you'll say, “You can't pay for your bread.” (“No, that you can't.”) That's true, for some I've paid for, and some I ha'n't, and don't see any way to pay for it for the future; neither do I know how I'm to pay for what will be wanted in future, for I have no good potatoes, hardly one fit for a pig to eat; for I don't rent a bit of land now, half an acre, and there is not a good potato in it. I've got here one I had boiled for my dinner to day; I brought it for a specimen. (The potato was handed down and examined under the lanterns; it was black with the prevailing disease.) Yet this is what I am to feed upon when I get up to work at 4 o'clock in the morning, if there's no bread in the house. It is a long time till July next before we get new potatoes; and unless something turns up for we poor creatures, starvation stares us in the face on both hands. But I sincerely hope “long looked-for” will come before July next. (Hear, hear.) To obtain our rights effectually, we must all, with one heart, lift up our cry and petition Her Majesty to remove the restrictions upon trade and commerce, so that the poor labourers may have bread and cheese and good table beer, to enable them to do the work which their present scanty food never can. (Hear, hear.) May that cry meet with a reply from our gracious Queen. God save the Queen! (Cheers, and responses of “Amen.”) Friends, every man who is born and bred a labourer has for his birthright a living from the soil, to be obtained without being restricted by any laws— unjust laws I might call 'em—enforced by our Legislature. (Cheers.) I will now read a few lines which I have collected together with something of my own, showing the right of an English labourer:—

“My own claim is this,
“With labour stiff and stark,
“By lawful turn, my bread to earn,
“Between the light and dark.
“My daily bread, and nightly bed;
“My bread and cheese and beer;
“But all from the hand that holds the land,
“And none from the Overseer.

(Loud cheers, and cries of “No overseers for we.”)

“No parish money, nor parish loaf,
“No pauper badge for me;
“I'm a son of the soil, by rightful toil,
“Entitled to my fee.”
“No alms I ask, give me my task,
“For will, or arm, or leg;
“I'm strong and bold, and to this I'll hold—
“To work and not to beg.”—(Loud cheering.)

WILLIAM PARRY, of Charlton said, I have come a distance of 20 miles to tell my tale of distress. I have six children, a wife, and myself to maintain on 8s. per week, bread being 15d. per gallon. The farmers tell us that our wages go according to the price of bread; but last spring I had 7s. a-week, and could buy bread at 9d. a gallon. Now it is 6d. more; and a gallon a day, being one pound to each, is what we want in my family. Then there is clothing and firing wanted, and house-rent to pay; but there is nothing to pay for any of these things. I told the relieving-officer that I could not keep my family on my wages. He said he would bring my case forward at the board of guardians. Well, he sent me an order for one of my children to go into the workhouse. Now, fellow-labourers, is not one child as dear to you as another? (Hear, hear.) Well, I did not know which to send. I could not part with ne'er a one. I said to my oldest girl, “You are to go into the workhouse.” She did not like to go, and I spoke to others, and there I had the cries of my poor children, which were piercing to my heart, “Don't send me, father! don't send me!” Was not that enough to try a man, without the pressure of starvation? I spoke to master about it. “Oh,” he says, “if you cannot maintain them you had better send one into the workhouse; I shall not allow you any more wages.” I said, what benefit is it to send this child into the workhouse and banish it from its home? It will do the rest no good, nor that one either. Besides, I should have it always upon my mind, for no man would like to part from his children in such a way. (Hear.) I spoke a few words at a meeting at Upavon, and master told me I had done myself a great deal of hurt by it. I know I only told the truth. He said the farmers might have done me some good but for that. I wanted some better potato land, but master wanted 8l. an acre for it. I told him I could not pay that. If I could get three acres at the same price that the farmers get it—2l. an acre, I could provide for myself and family. (A voice—“Ay, the labourers would not let the land go out of cultivation.”) But the farmers say it will, if we have Free Trade. (Cries of “No, no.”) Where I come from, there are fields and fields full of nothing but thistles. Why? Because there are no farmers enow to cultivate the land. Some of the land our people reaped produced two thistles to one wheat ear. (Cries of “Shame, shame.”) I was at home emptying this wheat, and master came into the yard. I said, “Look at this.” The thistle down was flying off like a snow storm. I said, “You had better have had more labourers to cut the thistles out; the land will never be cultivated while this goes on.” He said, “But I have kept all the sixpences in my pocket.” (Murmurs.) I wish the farmers would have public open meetings to discuss these subjects. (Hear, hear.) There was a meeting in Devizes, where Mr. Bethel made a grand speech, and said that the labouring men were all in a flourishing state and well satisfied. (Cries of “He's a liar.”) Mr. Bethel was in a warm room—had, perhaps, had a bottle of wine, and was himself in a flourishing state when he said that; while at the same time his poor labourers were starving. (Hear, hear.) If it was not for potatoes, starved we must be. (Hear, hear.) How does the poor man get clothes? He lives upon potatoes and salt, and saves a little to buy two or three rags, or else he would be positively naked. We could better ourselves if we were permitted. I told master that if he would let me have three or four acres at 2l. an acre, I could keep my wife and family without coming upon him or going into the workhouse. But they won't agree to it. They say if the land is let in that kind of way it will go out of cultivation; but that is the very way to bring it into cultivation. Fellow-labourers, there is one thing that we are very wrong in. We go to work at mowing, cutting and slashing away, without asking master what we are going to have for doing it before we begin. But I know very well that when a man asks a fair price, the farmers say, “Go along—I don't want thee. I can do without thee.” The man who speaks fairly, and asks a fair price for his labour is sure to be persecuted. But we should unite together, and know before-hand what we are going to have for doing the work. (Hear, hear.) After some further remarks upon the low wages paid to agricultural labourers, which had reduced them to a miserable condition, worse than that of transports, the speaker said—there was nothing left for them now but starvation or Free Trade. He believed that Free Trade would give them good beef and bread to eat, instead of potatoes and no meat or bread. Bad living had made the agricultural labourers physically weaker; he hoped also that it would now have the effect of making them wiser. It had made them wise enough to attend that meeting. They must speak out their distresses, or they could not expect relief. His master had told him that he thought himself a fool for not turning him away from attending the meeting at Upavon. The fact was, the farmers wanted to keep the labourers in the dark. The farmers and landlords held their meetings in private, and would prevent the labourers from having any meetings at all. The labourers must be persecuted for meeting together; but farmers and landowners might meet and devise how to starve the poor labourers, and that was all right. (A voice—“Never mind, it won't last long.”) He hoped not. His master (Mr. Wansborough) said, that Free Trade would starve them. (Cries of “Let's try it; why we be starving now.”) He said, “You won't have any money if you have Free Trade.” How many in that meeting had money? He would venture to say none. (A labourer—“I have been five weeks without a farthing in my pocket; I have never seed any money all that time.”) He saw no hope for them but in Free Trade. There was plenty of bread and meat waiting to come into this country, but the Corn Laws would not let it come in. Their cry, then, must be, “Free Trade, Free Trade for ever!” (Cheers.) They were told that if corn became cheap, their wages would be reduced. But were their wages now according to the price of bread? (Cries of “No, no.”) When corn sank in price 2s. or 3s. a sack, the farmers took off 1s. or 2s. from the labourers' wages. But when corn went up again the labourer was left in the lurch, for his wages were not raised. (Hear, hear.) He should like every labourer to come forward to tell his grievances. (A voice—“Then the meeting would last till the 31st December next.”) No, not if they got Free Trade before next summer. (Cheers.) They must not be afraid to tell the truth. His master told him that if he had not gone to a meeting he would have done a great many things for him. (A labourer—“Why did not he do 'em before?”) It appeared that he never thought before of doing anything for him. Although this meeting was large, he knew there were hundreds who were kept away through fear of offending their masters. His master told him that if he went to another meeting he would turn him off. But when engaged in a right cause they must not fear man, who at the most could only destroy the body. Let them fear God and trust in him, and they would succeed. (Cheers.)

WILLIAM TAYLOR stated that he had a wife and four children, and expected soon to have five; and was at present out of employment. For the last seven weeks he was in work he got 6s. 6d. per week. For many days he had been without a bit of bread to eat.

A person in the crowd.—But you are one of the protected Wiltshire labourers. Were you discharged from your employment because you were so weak you could not work?

TAYLOR.—Yes, I could not work because I was not strong enough; I could not get victuals to make me so; and my master, Mr. Styles, of Whitcomb, discharged me. I have no work now, and not a sixpence.

A voice.—“Go to the Duke of Richmond at 17, Bond-street. (Cries of Hear, hear.)

Another voice.—Did ever any of your fellow-labourers give you bread when you were starving?

TAYLOR.—Yes, several times; I can't had any to-day but what that man gave me (pointing to a labourer in the crowd, who replied, “Yes, I gave him some to-day.”) May God Almighty soon send Free Trade.

[This poor man need not have called himself a starving man, his emaciated appearance spoke in stronger terms than his voice could utter.]

JAMES PEGLER complained that he had been “hunted down” under the Poor Laws, having been, with his wife and family, forced into the workhouse, and separated from them for 11 months. (Cries of “Shame.”) At last he was turned out to get work; and, because he went out of the district to find work, he was taken before the magistrates, and charged with desertion, for which he was sent to prison for a month. It was no use for him to grumble; he was served so again after that. “God bless my heart and life! (exclaimed this man) I never seed such a go to be sure as how I was served. I knows enough of starvation and misery to make me say, ‘God send us Free Trade!’” (Cheers.)

The resolution was then put, and unanimously agreed to.

Mr. COLE said that he had no idea until he got on the platform that there were half so many persons present, neither could he have believed that in a district where there were comparatively few houses, so large a number would congregate together after the toils of the day, many of them coming from a considerable distance. But it went to prove that hunger, the cause of a dissatisfied mind, would drive people to do many unusual things, and make them submit to serious inconveniences. (Hear, hear.) He believed the time had nearly arrived when the atrocious Corn Laws would be blotted out of the statute-book. (Cheers.) Lord J. Russell, a nobleman who enjoyed the confidence of his sovereign, had declared that those laws were not only the blight of commerce, and the bane of agriculture, but the cause of penury, death, and crime among the people. (Hear, hear.) Could such laws, then, be permitted to remain in a country like this? (Cries of No, no.) They were morally repealed already. (Cheers.) He was satisfied that Sir Robert Peel or Lord J. Russell must repeal the Corn Laws. Would the protectionists move for a committee of inquiry into the truth of Lord John Russell's assertion? No. They refused the self-same thing last session. (Hear.) Meetings like the present were strictly constitutional; and he thought this one would be gratifying to Lord John Russell, and even to Sir R. Peel, who was waiting for the people of this country to press him on to repeal, for he knew, as well as any man, the bad effects the Corn Laws were producing. The resolution he had to propose was, that petitions, founded on the resolutions already adopted, should be prepared, and circulated throughout the district for signature, and then be presented to the House of Commons. He was satisfied that a great moral and intellectual improvement had been produced among the working classes, by the exertions of those gentlemen who had agitated this question, and diffused information upon it. Who would have supposed that such a meeting as this could have been collected, and would, as he had no doubt, quietly disperse? The League had taught the people that every thing was to be gained, not by physical, but by moral force. (Hear, hear.) They now knew where their strength lay. (Hear.) He hoped the young men present would devote their leisure hours to self-improvement, and read and reflect upon the history and laws of their country; in that way they would learn what were their rights, and how properly to secure them. He did not believe that the farmers were to be blamed for low wages; much depended on the demand for, and supply of, labour. Neither did he believe that any one would suffer from the repeal of the Corn Laws. Instead of land going out of cultivation, he thought that the reverse would be the case. There would not be so large a stock of rabbits and hares kept on the land. A protectionist, not 10 miles from that spot, had so many hares on his land, that they actually consumed more of the wheat crop than the whole of the families of farmers and labourers. (Hear, hear.) There was some talk of having a county meeting. Should one take place, let the labourers go, and show the protectionists that they were really desirous that those laws, which had produced so much mischief and misery, should be repealed. (Cheers.)

Mr. EDWARDS, in seconding the motion, said he believed that Sir Robert Peel was inclined to do justice to the working people of this country; but it mattered not to them, as working people, whether a Whig or Tory held the reins of Government, so long as they were well fed and clothed. (A Voice.—“And no curry powder.”) And no curry powder. (Laughter and cheers.)

The motion was then agreed to, as also one of thanks to the public press—that portion of it which advocated the rights of the people.

The CHAIRMAN: In closing this meeting, my fellow-labourers, I wish you to take notice of two things. First, you have heard these poor labourers state their distress; but we don't wish to insinuate to you that you are to rebel against the law that is now in existence. (Hear, hear.) In the next place, we don't wish to insinuate to you that you are to neglect your employment. (Cries of No, no.) You are to follow your work with honesty, integrity, and uprightness. (Hear, hear.) You will do all you can to please your masters, and live up to the law that is now in existence as far as you can, and do it for conscience sake. (Hear, hear.) For you may depend upon it that the very moment you break the law, the very moment you neglect your master's employment, you put a weapon into their hands with which to wound yourselves. (Hear, hear.) Recollect that a few years ago the mob rose in Rumsbury and other places, and took the wrong step. They destroyed people's property, and demanded their money, instead of acting legally and petitioning the Sovereign and the Government. Had they done so, no doubt they would have been heard. But not doing so, they put a weapon into the hands of the monopolists, and the monopolists rode about the country, and hauled them away to prison, and rejoiced that they had got them just where they would have them. (Hear, hear, and cries of, “We know better now.”)

Three cheers were then given for Free Trade, and for Cobden and Bright, after which the meeting quietly dispersed, breaking into as many separate parties as there were roads, some of them had long journeys to make before they could reach home.

Some letters from labourers were forwarded to the chairman, amongst which were the following, which we give verbatim et literatim :—

“Sir,—I take the liberty of addressing myself to you, as it is not convenient for me to attend your meeting, nearly to inform of my distress, which is very Great. I assure you I have four children to maintain and not a potato for my use, my house rent very high, which makes it impossible to get bread enough half my time for them. I am the Father of six Children, one died A natural death, and one burnt to death A Month Ago. in all these troubles and afflictions I have not had the least assistance from any one. My Children are all so young that my Wife cannot earn anything, therefore I will leave you to Judge my case. I will further add there is but few that would not attend your meeting, if they dare, the poor are under that Bondage which makes them afraid to make their distress known, if they did they would be discharged from their work and turned out of doors. God grant that these Petitions might be heard.

“your Afflicted and humbel Servent”

“December 31, 1845.”

“Gentlemen, as it is not convenient for me to attend your meeting, I dress myself to your notice in the following remarks of the distress of the farm labourers are in the present time; in the first place I will state the Case of the men that have a wife and two Children only, as most people say, that these men cannot be bad off, but see the case, all the people knows that the wages in Wiltshire are 8s. per week, and when the Master have taken 4s. per month for rent, there is but 7s. per week for two, provide food for the four people, and there is 7 days in the week that is 1s. a day, that 3d. each person, and as all have a little food 3 times a day, that is 1d. for each meal, and now we see what can be bought for the 1s. We give 7d. for a four pound loaf, and so we see that there is 6 pound of Bread and 3 half penny for butter for the four, that is a pound and half each a day. And now, if I go where there is 4 children that brings it two one pound of bread a day for each person, and one farthing for each for butter, and if we go where there is 6 Children, that brings it two 3 quarters of a pound of bread a day for each, and three half penny for butter for 8 people; and now if this was stated before the masters of the labourers, they would ask me what I should do with the Exter Earnings in the summer a mowing and hoving, and reaping, my answer two this is, that the fire-place takes 1s. per week, that is £2 12s. a year, and from 30 years Experience, I well know two keep the house in sope, candles, thred, and wosted, needles, and pins, Bruns a bruis two keep the house clean, that takes 1s. per week more, that is 2l. 12 more, and the man have a pair of shoes a year, that is 12s., and the wife a pair, that is 8s. more, and two children a pair each, at 5s. each, that is 10s. more, and we rent a leetle Land of our masters at 8 pence per pool, and we have about 30 poles, and takes a pound more a year all kinds of twols in repair—that takes 10s. a year more. So now two sum up all the household arteckles, that is the firing	£	s.	d.

Candles, sope, and the other arteckles	2	12	0
The four pair of shoes, that is	1	10	0
All kinds of tools, that is	0	10	0
30 pole of Land, at 8d. pole, that is	1	0	0

£8 4 0

and there is no more than 4 month two Earn this sum in, and where is the man that takes 2l. 9s. 6d. a month for 4 month. I Dont know the Man. And the failure in the potato crop makes it a great deal worse than it was 12 months ago, and the deffarence in the price of bread makes in the above named famely 2s. a week and have but one shelen to pay it with, and I cannot add no more at present,

“Your humbel servant,

“A LABORER.”

NEWCASTLE-UPON-TYNE.

TUESDAY.—It having been announced that Mr. Cobden, M.P., and Mr. Bright, M.P., a deputation from the National Anti-Corn-Law League, would visit this town, and deliver addresses on the bread tax and the registration of voters, extensive arrangements were made for their reception, and for the accommodation of those desirous of attending. The Guildhall, affording more space than any other public building where meetings of the inhabitants are usually held, was selected for a public meeting on this occasion, and an announcement made to that effect; but it was found, notwithstanding its ample dimensions, altogether inadequate to contain the immense number that might be expected to be present; and in consequence it was subsequently determined to fit up the Corn-market, in St. Nicholas-square, which is capable of holding upwards of 6000 persons; and, it must be admitted, a more appropriate place could not have been fixed upon for such a purpose.

The building forms an immense parallelogram lighted from the roof, with open sides, which, on this occasion, were enclosed, leaving separate entrances to the reserved seats and places not reserved, the separation being effected by means of a strong wooden barrier thrown across the market, nearly in the centre. At the south end spacious hustings were erected for the speakers and the principal members of the League, with a convenient enclosure in front for the accommodation of the press. Flags were suspended from the pendants of the roof, which is supported by a double row of metal pillars, and in front of the hustings were painted in large characters on red calico the words—“Monopoly injures Trade;” “The League demands Justice;” “The Bread Tax is cruel, odious, and unjust.”

As Messrs. Cobden and Bright could not visit any of the neighbouring towns, owing to their numerous engagements, special trains were arranged to leave for North and South Shields, Sunderland, Durham, and the intermediate places, soon after the proceedings terminated.

During the course of yesterday a great degree of interest was manifested by the public in the progress of the works in the interior of the market, which was visited by some hundreds of persons, and the “merrie bells” of St. Nicholas did honour to the occasion. The meeting was appointed to be held at seven o'clock last night, by which hour the spacious building was nearly filled. A large proportion of ladies occupied the reserved seats, and some of the principal merchants of this and the neighbouring towns were on the hustings and among the general company. Sixpence was charged for admission to the reserved seats; but subscribers of 1l. and upwards to the League fund, and contributors to the bazaar, were admitted by free tickets, the general public being also admitted without charge “below the bar.”

Shortly after seven o'clock, Mr. Bright, accompanied by Sir John Fife, Mr. Crawshaw, of Gateshead, and a number of other gentlemen, entered the meeting, which was now densely crowded, and having ascended the hustings they were received with loud cheering.

Sir JOHN FIFE, on the motion of Mr. Crawshaw, was called upon to preside. He congratulated the meeting on the near approach of the consummation of their exertions in the cause of Free Trade, and concluded a short but animated speech by introducing Mr. Bright.

Mr. BRIGHT, on presenting himself, was received with loud and continued cheering. When it had subsided, he spoke as follows: Every person who amuses or instructs himself by looking into the public newspapers must be convinced that there is at this moment some great question which is exciting the mind of almost the whole population of the kingdom; and I take it, this great question which now agitates the kingdom is one of no small interest to the inhabitants of the town of Newcastle. Within this building there are assembled, I should think, not less than 4000 grown up inhabitants of this town, and we could not have assembled them here to-night unless it were on some question which they believed to be of vital interest. (Cheers.) At this meeting we advocate the principles of Free Trade. What we mean by Free Trade is very easily expressed—that every man should be at liberty to employ his industry and his skill freely, and that when he has produced anything as the result of that industry or skill, or a combination of both, he should be at liberty to sell it to any customer that will buy it (cheers), and that he should be at liberty to receive in payment anything which his customer offers him, and that he should trade freely with all the markets of the world without let or hindrance by the law. And these principles we hope to apply to every man, and every class of men. We, as manufacturers, do not seek for Free Trade in Lancashire, or Yorkshire, or Newcastle only, but everywhere. We seek for it for the landowner, the farmer, the farm labourer, and every class of the community. We seek to keep no protection for ourselves or for our own branch of trade. (Loud cheers.) Now, on the other hand, the protectionists offer very different principles. They propose that there shall be upon the statute-book special laws, having for their object to raise the price of certain articles of produce—to give to certain producers a better and more highly remunerative market than they would have if those laws did not exist. Now, there are two reasons why we object to those principles of theirs. One is, that it is utterly impossible to protect everybody; and the other is, that if it were possible to protect everybody it would be injurious to everybody. The landowners make a law to raise the price of corn, the effect of which is to shut out foreign supplies. When the population is going on increasing at the rate of 400,000 persons in the year, they do not allow food to be brought in from abroad to continue the supply of this continually increasing population. They hope by that means to set everybody scrambling for it, that so they may get a higher price for their grain than it is worth in the world's market. (Loud cheers.) It is quite clear if the landowner has a right to such a law, everybody else has. I am a manufacturer of cotton goods, and, as you all know, the cotton is the largest manufacture in the kingdom. It exports nearly one-half of all the goods exported from this to foreign countries, and those sending goods to all the markets in the world could calculate the quantity if there were no laws to raise the price of the elements of production. We send goods to China, the East Indies, and the Mediterranean, and there they have to compete with goods of the same kind from other countries. I have seen goods of my manufacture lying upon the stool of the merchant in Smyrna side by side with pieces of the same quality from the United States of America, and unless my piece can be sold as cheap as that from America, the American will take the market from me. (Hear, hear.) The cotton trade has no protection, and the coal trade has no protection. (Cheers.) A little time ago you had something very opposite to protection in the coal trade—you had a tax. (Hear, hear.) The protective system, then, is not applied to everybody; and, more than that, you know it cannot be applied to those trades which export any portion of their produce. But it is an injustice to every manufacturer and every workman who has to purchase his food at a price raised by law, while the produce of his labour remains at the natural level. Do I exchange my goods with the farmer for his grain? If the law raises the price of his grain, and does not raise the price of my goods which I give him in exchange, I must give him a larger quantity than I should be obliged to give him if the law were not in existence. (Loud cheers.) I should like to see any one in Newcastle who wishes trade to be protected as a compensation for the protection given to land. (Hear, hear.) There is only one class that expects such compensation, and that is the shipowners' class. I do not wish to speak disrespectfully of the shipowners, especially the shipowners of Newcastle; but as far as their interest goes they are a very obtuse class of people. (Cheers.) Wooden ships are going somewhat out of fashion, and in some parts of the world they talk of building iron ones. I don't know whether it may ever be the case or not that wooden ships go out of fashion, but if they do, I hope wooden heads will be no longer found among shipowners. (Laughter and cheers.) Our ships are competed with all over the world, and at this moment the owners of those vessels are acting in opposition to their own interest in claiming protection against foreign competition, that interest being a conditional one, that trade should be free in all branches of industry, in order that a large quantity of every description of goods and passengers should cross the ocean, so that there may be abundant cargoes for ships, at a rate of charge such as will pay them for their trouble. (Cheers.)

If the principle of protection could be applied in every case it would nevertheless be most unjust. We should simply be robbing each other in order to charge each other by law all round, so that no person would get more in the end than if such a law were not in existence. There was a senator in the council of King Gotham who proposed that everybody should be taxed, and that the profit of the tax should be put into everybody's pocket. (Laughter and cheers.) Just such a law would that be by which everybody was allowed to overcharge his customer, in order that everybody should become richer by the process. (Cheers.)

Why, then, the principles of Free Trade must be admitted. They have been long admitted by many who oppose us. (Cheers.) The scarcity, which is the effect of the Corn Laws is not a scarcity which affects the very rich, but is a scarcity which affects the poorest. The Corn Laws never work as the landlords wish them to work. Their effect is to starve somebody, but not the men who come upon platforms. (Hear, hear.) No; the rich are comfortably enough off; but those suffer first and most severely who are at the bottom of the scale of comforts. Within the last three or four months, at any rate within the last six months, the price of bread has risen considerably. The potatoes have failed. I had a letter from a gentleman in Suffolk the other day, and he tells me the labourers there are eating onions and Swede turnips. (Hear.) The classes who of all others should have the necessities of life at a cheap rate are those at this moment suffering from the effects of scarcity. (Hear, hear.) If you have read the newspapers within the last fortnight you will have seen long reports of protection meetings—meetings for the protection of native agriculture—which, put in plain language, means meetings for the creation of scarcity and the general extension of famine among the poor. The squires meet, and the farmers who depend upon them meet with them, and the substance of their speeches is this—one-half consists of denunciations of Sir Robert Peel. They denounce him as a most perfidious statesman. Now, these men assert at the same time that they are the most powerful party in the kingdom, and everybody knows they are a most suspicious party as regards their own interest. Now, if they are a very powerful party, and a very suspicious party—that is, a party that is wide awake—I cannot tell how they come to be so treated. They say they are the paramount interest in the State—that there is no one worthy of carrying on the Government but the owners and representatives of the soil. That paramount interest, however, is terribly afraid lest some of the miserable serfs of Russia or Poland should send so much wheat here that the stout farmers of England should be entirely driven out of the market. (Loud cheers.) They have said over and over again at these meetings that if the Corn Laws were repealed we should be inundated with foreign corn. They have an idea that somewhere—they don't know much of geography—somewhere across the water—there is an inexhaustible supply of grain, all in sacks, marked and ticketed for exportation to this country (laughter); and that the moment the duties are taken off so much corn would come in from abroad that the English farmer would not be able to sell a single quarter. (Cheers.) I never heard of a country being inundated with foreign corn. We are never inundated with cotton, though it comes in free. The Northernland farmers could tell you that we are not inundated with sheep's wool since the duty was taken off. The duty was taken off lard after a fight in the House of Commons; but there has been no inundation of lard. A large quantity comes in and finds customers. Some one gets lard that did not get any before. (Cheers.) And there can be no doubt whatever that if the Corn Laws were abolished, everybody who now eats bread, would eat bread still; and those who now eat potatoes would come in for some of the wheat received from abroad. (Cheers.) I find that at those agricultural protection meetings the speakers are under great alarm of a foreign war. They don't want a large price for their produce—they don't want to starve us—they only want to prevent foreigners starving us. (Laughter.) They say, only look—suppose we should have a universal war? Suppose, we might reply, the sky were to fall (laughter), men would catch larks. (Cheers.) Well, suppose there was a universal war, we should not be able, they say, to get food from abroad, and we should be pent up in this island, and we should starve. I don't know that it is worth while we should go on partially starving now—a great many, I fear, are on the verge of starvation—in order that we may not be starved at some future time that cannot be named. (Hear, hear.) The Times put it very well in one of its leading articles on the Corn Laws. The writer said, some day or other a comet might strike the earth; but he did not think it advisable to go to any expense, as the danger was not very imminent, in providing buffers, the same as they have between locomotive carriages. (Cheers and laughter.) But on this question of war I have a word or two to say. What part of the world is it upon which the cry of war arises? The United States of America. From what part of the States particularly? From the western and north-western States—the great agricultural and corn-growing districts of the country. The southern States do not wish to go to war, especially with England, with whom they carry on a trade in cotton. The Atlantic States of America do not wish to go to war with England, because the flags of their vessels are constantly passing over the Atlantic, to and from this kingdom. The western States are growers of Indian corn, wheat, cheese, and butter; but they don't look for a trade to us, because our Corn Law prevents it. No doubt, if they could be imported free, like cotton, immense quantities of these would come here. The duty on tobacco is entirely a revenue duty. It does not keep the tobacco out, and therefore we do a large trade in that article. (Hear.) But the object of the Corn Law is not to raise a revenue from American grain, but to prohibit the arrival of American grain in the ports of this kingdom. Mr. Polk is a leading man, and speaks the sentiments of the western States. But if we trade with the western States as we do with the southern we should secure them with the same bond, and a war with the United States of America would be the most unlikely thing we could think of. (Cheers.)

Mr. Bright resumed his seat amidst loud and long-continued cheering.

Mr. COBURN was called upon by the chairman, and after some introductory remarks he proceeded to say—I observe that at these protection meetings they have rather changed their tune in one particular. They now say, "Don't let us call this a Corn Law question." One wise man in Wiltshire said, "I don't like the word Corn Law," and well he might say so: "Let us," he said, "call our cause the protection of native industry." And I observe that Mr. Stafford O'Brien—(who is a young man of talent; nay, I believe, if he had a good cause, he would display brilliant talents, but he has got into the wrong groove, as he will find out before the next session is over)—Well this young statesman said in Northamptonshire the other day, "We must change the name of our society, from 'a society for the protection of agriculture,' and we must call it 'a society for the protection of native industry.'" That is, they want to protect you and to protect everybody else. Now my friend Mr. Bright has alluded briefly to the fact that manufacturers are not, and cannot be, protected. A very large portion of our manufactures are sold abroad, and goods sold abroad can have no protection from our Act of Parliament. The very fact that we send goods abroad is a proof that we have more made than we can sell at home; and our manufactures, therefore, cannot be protected. Well, then, all the great manufacturing interests of the kingdom are altogether unprotected, and incapable of being protected, and I would ask Mr. O'Brien if it is likely that the vast body of the industrious classes engaged in these manufactures will ever submit to any small portion of the community being protected at our expense. (Loud cheering.) I am glad the protectionists have been brought to this. They cannot sustain their cause whilst they talk only of protecting themselves; they dare not face us in Parliament again on that ground—they have been too soundly drubbed for that; and they have taken up a new position, which is more untenable still. (Hear, hear.) It has become a matter of fact. We can prove that they have not protected—that they cannot protect—the most important portions of the community; and that being proved, the whole system must disappear as a mere fraud, delusion, and injustice. (Cheers.) Well, but let us go a little further, and ask, are the people that are protected by their laws better off than those that are left to their unaided energy, and who have to find a market for their produce in the open world? Who are the people in this country that are receiving the lowest wages? Precisely that portion of the community for whose benefit these protection societies pretend to exist—the agricultural labourers, who are getting 7s., 8s., or 9s. a week—aye, in Herefordshire, and parts of Somersetshire, 6s. a week. The unskilled labourers in the manufacturing districts, who are working for Russians, Poles, Americans, and Chinese, are as a rule, without exception, getting 50 per cent. more wages than those who are at work for these protected interests. (Applause.) Aye, and whilst these men are pretending to maintain this protection for the benefit of the peasantry, the peasantry are running away from their protection, and coming to manufacturing districts, seeking better wages, and better employment from the hands of those who have no protection, and who are working for the open markets of the world. But these protection societies not merely attack the League, they seem to have very great doubts about their own champions. Really the maundering—the rapid maundering—of these societies when they talk of Sir Robert Peel and Sir James Graham, is sickening. It is sickening to find men, and Englishmen too, talking such insensate twaddle about the intentions of these ministers, whom they profess all the while to govern and control. One man says he can't believe that Sir Robert Peel intends to repeal the Corn Law; another says he has just come from the clubs in London, and he cannot gather a single hint as to what Sir Robert Peel intends to do; another says he hopes Sir R. Peel will stick to his promise to maintain protection. Why, gentlemen, if you could imagine a flock of sheep suddenly endowed with the power of speech, and if you could suppose that flock of sheep speculating as to what their shepherd is going to do with them, just such a conversation, I'll be bound to say, would take place amongst them as that which takes place at protectionist meetings. (Laughter.) One old solemn-looking wether would say, "Well, do you think the shepherd and his dog will take us to that wet cold hill-side to-morrow, or do you think we shall be down in the valley, where we shall have the protection of the hedge?" Then up would come another very dismal looking ewe, and she would say, "I wonder when the shearers are likely to come? I wonder when we shall be fleeced?" (Loud cheers and laughter.) And another probably would be speculating whether the butcher was coming to put an end to their lives. (Roars of laughter.) Now this is a pretty kind of argument for the aristocracy of this country, isn't it? They are speculating upon what the son of a cotton spinner is going to do with them. Why are they as helpless as a flock of sheep? Simply because they cannot find a bell-wether amongst themselves to lead them. (Continued cheering.) There is not a mutton amongst them to keep them out of the mire, and so they are in the hands of Sir Robert Peel, and Mr. Gladstone, the son of a Liverpool merchant, and Sir James Graham. Well, gentlemen, it is a pitiable exhibition. But it will have much more grave consequences to our landed aristocracy than the repeal of the Corn Law, if they do not take care. (Hear, hear.) If they could have held their tongues—if our landed aristocracy could have only contrived to have wrapped themselves up in a mantle of exclusiveness, and maintained that taciturnity, which may pass for wisdom—in the absence of it; why, such is the veneration of the English people for rank—we are such a lord-loving people—that they might have gone on for generations, ruling us by a kind of prescriptive right, and the middle and industrious classes would not have inquired into their right or competency to govern us, provided they had governed us with anything like fairness and decency. But they have committed a great wrong, and they have been silly enough to come forward in public, and try to justify that wrong by argument; and then we find what idols of clay we have been worshipping! The oracle has spoken, and instead of its being the pure and precious metal we have been dreaming of, it has turned into dross before us. I do not profess to be particularly democratic. I should have no objection to changes going on in this or any other country gradually; but, positively, I begin to fear that these men by their folly—their absolute silliness and stupidity—will precipitate changes faster than any man who likes ordinary movement would wish. Men are not prepared to leave their counting-houses and warehouses, and carry on the affairs of State instead of them. We have plenty that are able to do it. We have tens of thousands and hundreds of thousands of men in our workshops, in our warehouses, in our counting-houses, ready, and fit, and willing to do the nation's work better than these maundering silly people do it, but then they have other engagements on hand, and cannot do it at an hour's notice. (Laughter and applause.) And if these men go on as they are now going, why they will precipitate some sort of revolution in this country before the country is prepared for it. What I should like to see would be a movement amongst the wiser part of the aristocracy to save the rest. I would begin with the dukes, for the dukes seem to be the most infatuated class. There are the Duke of Norfolk, the Duke of Richmond, the Duke of Cleveland, the Duke of Newcastle, and the Duke of Buckingham, why these five dukes are enough to ruin the aristocracy! (Much laughter.) If you had five ship-owners in Newcastle so infatuated, so silly, so positively incapable as these five dukes are, why the shipping trade would leave your port. Cannot the Duke of Sutherland, the Duke of Bedford, and another or two of our dukes, lay hold of these five dukes, and manage to put them in strait waistcoats? (Renewed laughter.) And then the marquises—the next in rank—seem to be just next in folly. There are the Marquis of Londonderry and the Marquis of Salisbury. I observe that the Marquis of Salisbury has been having a meeting in Hertfordshire, at which he talked about the League being a great unconstitutional body, which, if allowed to go on, would deprive them of all their rights, and liberties, and franchises; and he wound up a magniloquent tirade by declaring that he'll sign a petition in order to put the League down. (Laughter.) That was in Hertfordshire; and all this scolding is simply because the League recommend the middle and industrious classes to possess themselves of 40s. freeholds in the counties, in order to prevent such men as the Marquis of Salisbury and the Marquis of Londonderry disposing of the representation of counties in the way they had done. Hertfordshire sends three members to Parliament: it is one of those counties which they call a unicorn county, driving three, and the Marquis has hitherto been the driver. Now, I'll tell you what I did directly I had read the speech of the Marquis of Salisbury. I wrote to a friend in Hertfordshire immediately, and said, buy me a 40s. freehold in Hertfordshire. I'll be on the list for Hertfordshire next year, and I will beg and entreat all my friends, all good Leaguers, in the metropolis and the neighbourhood (where they are within half an hour's ride of the polling place for that county) to follow my example and qualify for it.

I have been a year and a half working this question, and I am convinced that this county qualification movement is a leverage by which we can transfer the power of the monopolist landlords utterly and for ever into the hands of the middle and industrious classes of this country. I should despair of ever succeeding in this question by anything short of a physical force revolution unless I saw in this 40s. freehold qualification the means of doing it. I believe that all argument is useless. I believe that appeals to reason and conscience are utterly useless in the House of Commons. They yield to but one influence, and that is fear. It is base passion to govern any body of men; but I believe that neither the House of Commons nor the House of Lords will yield to anything else. They don't care for your arguments. They won't yield to your logic. But show them that you have the power of transferring their majority into a minority, and you will then move them. (Loud cheers.) At this moment, when Sir Robert Peel is in deep and intimate communication with the leading men of the aristocracy, trying to persuade them to allow him to settle this question, and to put down the League in the only way in which it can be put down—by doing justice on this question of corn, (Applause,) in these secret conferences, I have no doubt that the most cogent argument that Sir R. Peel has to use with the more long-headed of the aristocracy is this, "See what the League are doing: they have taught the middle and industrious classes of the towns the use of the power that has long been latent, and if you force them by resistance to go on, year after year, the counties will be torn from you, and you, the great landed proprietors, the lord-lieutenants, and the magistrates, will have no more power in your own counties than so many labouring men. If you resist this body, you will not only lose the power to maintain the Corn Law, but the men who are getting votes to put down the bread tax are of a class that will very likely put you down." (Loud cheers.) That is the argument we are furnishing to Sir R. Peel. If these men yield next session—as I predict they will yield—it will be because they know we have the power to force them to yield, if they attempt to procrastinate the settlement of this question. I say I have no doubt that they will yield next session. I do not know that we shall get what we want through Sir Robert Peel. I don't care who it comes from. Get it we will. (Deafening applause.) They may force Mr. Bright and myself to endure another three or four years' domestic martyrdom, sacrificing our health, and getting more grey hairs and more wrinkles by this laborious agitation—(The vast assembly here rose as one man, and cheered for some seconds, following this by loud clapping of hands)—but the cheering reception you have given us at this meeting, and our fund of 250,000*l.*, makes me confident that we shall force them to submit. It is possible they may yield to Sir R. Peel. It is possible he may yield to them. If he bring forward any half-and-half scheme, then we have a power in the opposition to bring against him which we have never had before. We were never a united opposition before. I declare to you most solemnly, that up to within the last six months I have been more afraid of the Whigs than of the Tories. I have looked with fear and trembling at a division in the House of Commons which might possibly throw Sir Robert Peel into a minority, because I was afraid that, if the Whigs came into power without recorded pledges to carry out our principles, we should have been worse off than in the hands of the Tories. Not that I think worse of those who are nearer to us on some points than of those who are further off. I was afraid of the Whigs for this reason. They have still some popularity in the country, and I was afraid that if they proposed a compromise there would be a disposition in many parts to coincide with them, in order to keep them in power. But all that is past. We go to Parliament this next session, a united opposition. If Sir R. Peel does not go straight, then the sooner we find him in a minority the better. If he does not go straight, I shall not care with whom I vote, if by any honourable vote I can throw him into a minority. If he does not bring forward a full measure, he'll not live through the session. With 200 men opposed to him in a compact body, and—leaving myself out of the question—comprising nine-tenths of the talent of the House, it is utterly impossible for his Government to stand through the next session, unless he takes a course which will secure to him the support of the country on this question. If Sir Robert Peel proposes to abolish the Corn and Provision Laws, I'll cling to him as faithfully until he has done his work as I would to Lord J. Russell or any one else. (Cheers.)

Mr. CRAWSHAY proposed the following resolution:—
"That this meeting having heard the addresses of Messrs. Cobden and Bright, heartily thank them for their attendance here this evening, and pledges itself to carry their recommendations into effect by every means in its power."

After advocating the general principles of Free Trade, he announced a meeting for the purpose of raising funds for the League, and for placing votes on the register.

Mr. W. L. HARRIS seconded the resolution in an animated address, in which he particularly alluded to the representation of the town, and stated that if Mr. Hinde did not come round to them, they would have to use every exertion to send a fitting condutor with Mr. Ord.

Mr. J. RAYNE, extensively engaged in shipping, at the request of the chairman, addressed the meeting, stating it as his belief that an unrestricted trade would be most advantageous to the shipping interest, and hoped that the ship-owners would soon become unanimous on that subject.

The resolution was then put and carried with acclamation. Mr. COBURN returned thanks for himself and Mr. Bright, and concluded by proposing a vote of thanks to Sir John Fife, which was seconded by Mr. Bright, and carried with cheering.

Sir JOHN FIFE acknowledged the compliment, after which the meeting gave three cheers for the deputation, and three for the League and Free Trade.

Meetings also have been held at Carlisle and Kendall, the reports of which have not yet reached us; but they have been most spirited and enthusiastic.

DINNER TO THE MAYOR OF NORTHAMPTON.

A most gratifying demonstration of public opinion took place, on Tuesday evening, at Northampton, on the occasion of a public dinner to the Mayor, John Groom, Esq. It was a most important instance of the great advance of Free Trade principles, and deserves additional notice, coming, as it does, so quickly after the occurrence of an "Agricultural Protection" meeting at Northampton, collected together by all the influence which could be brought to bear on the agriculturists of the neighbourhood, whilst the meeting of Tuesday night was an exhibition of the independent and unbiassed feelings of the enlightened inhabitants of Northampton, who are subject to no such influences, and whose judgment is left unfettered and free. The most perfect unanimity pervaded the assembly as to the necessity of emancipating the industry of the country, and encouraging the full development of its great manufacturing and commercial capacity by removing all restrictions upon the import of the prime necessary of life.

At five o'clock the chair was taken by Vernon Smith, Esq., M.P., John Stanton and Joseph Wykes, Esqs., acting as vice presidents.

The dinner, which took place at the Peacock, was admirably provided, and reflected much credit on the proprietor of that hotel.

Amongst those present we noticed Raikes Currie, Esq., M.P., Rev. J. Sargeant, rector of Stanwich, Rev. T. C. Wilson, rector of Boneat, Rev. Mr. Bennett, Aldermen Porter, Willis, Walke, and Hollis, Town Councilors Denis, Wykes, Lloyd, Haggie, Marshall, Roe, Edens, &c.; J. Hensman, Esq., town clerk, G. Cooke, Esq., clerk of the peace, W. Stevenson, W. Turner.

The usual preliminary loyal toasts having been disposed of, the Chairman proposed the health of the Mayor which was drunk with acclamation.

After the mayor had briefly replied to the toast, the Town Clerk proposed the health of the members for the borough.

Mr. VERNON SMITH, M.P., addressed the meeting in a long speech, declaring his determination to support the total repeal of the Corn Laws; and commenting on the late Ministerial crisis, and the present position of Sir Robert Peel and the protectionist section of the Conservative party.

Mr. V. Smith was followed by Mr. RAIKES CURRIE, M.P. for the borough, who made a long and eloquent speech, which we regret our space will not allow us fully to report. He paid a short but well merited tribute to the late lamented Earl Spencer; and made some humorous and telling comments on recent events and future prospects by the following reference to pending rumours as to the part taken by Earl Grey in the late attempt to form a Liberal Administration: Lord John Russell embraced the cause of total and immediate repeal with unreserved frankness, and with a decision which inspires confidence. I believe that he attempted the formation of a Government most reluctantly, and solely from a sense of public duty; but this we have the happiness to know, that he undertook it on the basis of carrying out boldly, loyally, and completely the great truth he had avowed; and gave the best pledge of his sincerity and earnestness by the offer of office to the ablest and most successful advocate of this, or indeed of any other movement. (Cheers.) It boots not to inquire why Lord John Russell failed to form a Government. Mr. Macaulay, perhaps rather prematurely, tells us that the failure is solely attributable to Lord Grey. I will only say, speaking of public men from the calm distance-ground of private life, whence, however, I have, I hope impartially and certainly with care, observed them, that I hold the strong opinion that any Liberal Government formed on Free Trade principles, in which Lord Grey did not occupy a prominent station and fill an important post, would be in a most false position. (Hear, hear.) The depth and soundness of his economical opinions, his able and fearless advocacy of them, his bold and statesman-like views on the vexata questio of the Irish church, his complete mastery of colonial subjects, his indefatigable industry, and his thorough honesty and courage, have impressed this on every independent man. It is the fashion to call him "crotchety," which, being interpreted out of party language, means often conscientious; to consider him "impracticable," which in like manner may be, that he forms and maintains his opinions with sincerity and boldness. I wait for the 22d of the month. I shall not attempt to read the riddle of the great political sphynx, which is very like a Christmas conundrum, to be handed round among the bewildered country gentlemen, who paw it and mumble it, and then fairly "give it up." (Laughter and cheers.) Mr. Raikes Currie then proceeded in a most earnest and eloquent manner to expose the fallacies which the landlords were now so ludicrously attempting to give currency to in the counties, and terminated a long and able speech with the following most effective passage:—In the observations I have made I have assumed, as the protectionists (who vilify the minister) assume, that at last, awakened to the responsibilities of his position, Sir Robert Peel has determined to repeal the Corn Laws. I do earnestly hope, that for his own future fame—for the sake of the agriculturists themselves—above all; for the peace and security of this country—this may indeed be so. (Loud cheers.) But, to quote one line of truth from a tissue of brazen sophistry which appears in the last Quarterly Review upon this subject: "The fate of the people of England does not depend on the will of any Cabinet: it depends upon themselves."

"Let peers and premiers fly which way they will, We are ourselves, and our own masters still." (Cheers.) If justice be denied, if the struggle be continued, a combination, already fearful, will become "a solemn league and covenant," such as the world has never seen. Victory, never doubtful, cannot be long delayed; but in the passions of protracted strife, in the achieved possession of electoral power, in the inevitable intemperance of triumphs, what institutions shall be safe? I turn from the fearful picture! This must be no class triumph, no death-feud of rival interests, but a common effort for a common good. I see this great nation at length awakening through the length and breadth of the island, to declare that trade shall be free (tremendous cheering), and, from the chaos in which the old party combinations are mingling to their dissolution, I see evolving a gigantic power, the party of the people. (Cheers.) If a statesman could be found worthy to grasp and combine the elements which are heaving with momentous changes, to lead and moderate and direct the inevitable movement—to do this in a spirit of faith, sincerity, and wisdom—what a glorious destiny awaits him! He yet might reconcile order with progress—he yet perchance might say, "I will stand by the old institutions of the country, by our limited monarchy, by an endowed church, by an hereditary peerage; but, then, I will achieve entire justice for the people." (Repeated cheers.) May He with whom are the issues of national as of individual life control the acts of men—may they who have the apparent power see the things which belong to their peace—and may we, who have the real power, use it with the forbearance of conscious strength, with perfect firmness of purpose—but calmly, legally, without unnecessary offence, and in the hour of victory abstain from triumph! (The honourable gentlemen resumed his seat amidst the most enthusiastic cheering.)

The CHAIRMAN having proposed the health of the Rev. Mr. Sargeant, and the liberal clergy of the county of Northamptonshire.

The Rev. Mr. SARGEANT rose amid much applause to return thanks. He said, I have always claimed for the ministers of religion a full right to entertain an opinion upon public affairs, and to express that opinion whenever they think proper so to do. Gentlemen, I am not going to claim this right merely as a free-born Briton in its full extent to-day, but I stand here as a clergyman, and as a clergyman only; for I maintain that if ever there was a question which might and ought to call forth the opinion of the clergy, it is that question which now agitates the public mind—the question whether the field of labour shall or shall not be extended; whether the population of this country shall be fed, and have a regular supply of food at equitable prices; not in my opinion—for in that I entirely agree with what Mr. Currie has said—not at prices which shall be ruinous to the farmer, but at the same time at prices which shall not be ruinous to the consumer, and therefore ruinous to every class of the community. (Cheers.) Gentlemen, if I had not been for many years a friend to Free Trade, I could not now refuse my consent to it. If I had been what is called a "Conservative,"—an opponent of Free Trade, and supporter of prohibition—still I think by the present crisis I must have been very much shaken in my opinion. When we see so many great and good men making declarations of their convictions that Free Trade must come—when we remember—I do not know that I dare allude to the presence of that noble lord among us (referring to Lord Spencer) on a former occasion, so deep are my feelings of reverence and respectful love for his memory, (hear,)—when we remember his many declarations in favour of Free Trade—those declarations coming from a man so pure, and whose heart we all know beat in sympathy with others' woes,—a man who always employed the energies of his great and enlightened mind, not for himself, but for his country's good,—I say, looking to all this, if I had not before been in favour of Free Trade, I think these facts must have very much shaken me. But we have also an instance of a noble lord coming forward and declaring his conviction that he was formerly wrong. All honour be to Lord John Russell for that candid declaration. (Cheers.) I care not whether the change in his mind has been gradual or sudden. I honour him for avowing that change. He once opposed Free Trade in corn; but he, that great statesman—the greatest perhaps of the age in which we live—now comes forward and declares that Free Trade is necessary for the interests of this great commercial country. I am arguing, you know, as if I had been a Conservative clergyman and a protectionist; and if I could not be moved by the example of noble lords such as I have mentioned—because, as a Conservative clergyman they would have been opposed to me in politics—still shall I be able to hold my opinions when I find the very chief whom the protectionists chose for themselves—the very pink of protection, Sir Robert Peel—also in favour of Free Trade principles. (Hear.) Gentlemen, it is no great stretch of imagination for us to picture to ourselves certain county members going upon some cloudy day in last December to the Treasury, big with great thoughts for their country, their constituency, and themselves; one, perhaps, to hint that he had a son brought up in the diplomatic line, and that it would be for the good of his country if he was removed to some more important court than that at which he might have been so long languishing. Another, gratefully to thank his friend the Premier for having attended to his prayerful petition in having put a meritorious brother into a very nice situation of some 1500*l.* per annum; or, perhaps, for having given at his earnest request the adjutant of his invulnerable yeomanry—involuntarily no doubt if they have an enemy to fight—for having given him a snug situation in the maligned penny-post. (Laughter.) Only think of the consternation which would come over such persons, and others going to pay their homage at the shrine of their idol, to find him fallen from his pedestal, to behold the Dagon of expediency prostrate in the dust before the great principles of Free Trade. Mr. Sargeant having referred to the altered tone of the farmers with respect to Free Trade, and their universal indifference as to the abandonment of protection, proceeded as follows: But when I look at the manufacturing districts, what do I see there? I see the great captain of the League going into all our country towns, and challenging his opponents to dispute the point with him. (Hear, hear.) But they have very wisely abstained from the contest; or, if in a few places they have dared to show themselves, I think you will agree with me, that they have been very miserably worsted in argument. But without wishing to take away from the merit of Mr. Cobden, for I think him a brave, great, and good man (hear), he may have his faults; violence and abuse certainly never do any cause good; but still I contend, making due allowance for the position in which Mr. Cobden is placed, that he is a great and good man. (Loud cheers.) But yet after all, gentlemen, I ask you what Mr. Cobden is but an emanation of the public mind? He is forced into his present prominence by the masses: they are pressing him behind. Gentlemen, I have a higher opinion of the people of this country—for remember that the schoolmaster is abroad—than to suppose that they would go on agitating in any cause for a length of time, unless that was a right and righteous cause. Further, I would look to the state of the question in regard to the present time in which we live. We have been told that there is a likelihood of great scarcity before the next harvest. Now, even if, as we have heard from some, these accounts are greatly exaggerated, still I ask whether we are to wait before our ports are opened till the people are actually perishing for want in the streets, or until they are pining upon beds of sickness and death? (Hear.) No, gentlemen. But besides that, I must believe that there is some reality in the apprehension of scarcity when I find great men—philosophers and philanthropists—going out of their way and racking their brains to find out cheap substitutes for human food (hear), not wholesome Norfolk dumplings (laughter), but an indescribable stimulant, made of curry powder—not the gluten, starch, and farina of that invaluable compound of the GREAT CHEMIST, bread corn, but the starch of a lady's white pocket handkerchief; and peas—

"Peas pudding hot,
Peas pudding cold;
Peas pudding in the pot
Nine days old."

(Loud cheers and laughter.) A great philosopher has also made a statement at which I am rather surprised, namely, that bones are very nutritive. Why, gentlemen, that great philosopher—and a very learned man he undoubtedly is—probably has a museum of his own. Now, only imagine a furnished multitude going to that haunt of his, and breaking into his museum. Think you that if they found the bones of any animal—the ichthyosauri, for instance—that they would eat them? (Hear and laughter.) But, not to travel so far, there is a reverend baronet, who was once one of us, whom I have been in the habit of meeting at places like this,—at meetings composed of such men as you and I are, such "wicked men" as we are; I find he was to have been at the opposition meeting last week at the George Hotel, but was prevented by ill health, for which we are all very sorry; for although we do not agree in the change, we all must acknowledge that he is a warm-hearted, benevolent man; but he wrote a long letter not long ago in the Northampton Mercury, and pointed out certain succedanea for bad potatoes, such as small white turnips, and other esculent roots, which we are in the habit of giving to our sheep and pigs! (Laughter.) These points have been made ludicrous by these gentlemen themselves—these great and learned gentlemen; but, after all, they are but as the comic scenes introduced into the deepest tragedies, to make the contrast stand forth more boldly. It becomes a matter of sad, serious, and sober consideration. They are an evidence, to me at least, that there are beyond doubt some apprehensions of scarcity before the coming harvest. I say then, that if I were a Conservative, the veriest "monopolist," "protectionist," or whatever you please, that ever existed, I should pause under all these circumstances before I should decide upon continuing in these principles. Finding the nature of the question, that it is not a political or party question, not a question even whether this or that class shall predominate in the Government; but, seeing so many great and good men declaring that Free Trade must be carried (cheers), some of them new converts to the doctrines,—knowing the state of the public mind on the subject, and that that public mind is resolved that Free Trade shall be—(renewed cheers,) knowing also that there is an apprehension of scarcity; I say, gentlemen, under all these circumstances, had I been a Conservative clergyman, and opposed to Free Trade, for the sake of that church wherein I am a humble minister, but whose doctrines I revere, I dare not stand between the people and their bread. (Enthusiastic cheering.)

The Chairman read several letters from country gentlemen, regretting their absence, but heartily agreeing in the principles of Free Trade. One was from Mr. Watson, high sheriff of the county, who declined to attend solely because he considered he ought not to be present at any political meeting, except in his official capacity. Mr. Watson possessed one of the finest estates in the country; and that gentleman desired to take that opportunity of publicly stating, that he, as a landowner, was favourable to the total repeal of the Corn Laws, as he thought their present state of uncertainty would, ere long, be most injurious to the farmers. (Enthusiastic cheers.)

The health of Edward Bouverie, Esq. was then drunk with great applause.

"The dissenting clergy of Northamptonshire" was then proposed; but the toasts having been altered from the programme by the Chairman, the rev. gentleman who was to have replied to it had left the meeting, and it was responded to by the Rev. Mr. Phillips.

Mr. VERNON SMITH having left the chair, the Mayor was called upon to preside.

Mr. STANTON, (one of the Vice-Presidents,) strongly censured the conduct of Mr. Smith in having refused both upon the present and last occasions, to propose the fourth toast in the printed programme, "The people—the legitimate source of power." He strongly denounced such conduct as wholly unjustifiable in the Chairman. A long and angry discussion ensued upon the point.

The Mayor hoped, for the sake of the harmony of the meeting, that the objection would not be pressed.

The omitted toast was then drunk. The healths of Messrs. Cobden and Bright, and several other toasts were subsequently drunk, and the meeting separated at a late hour.

LANCASTER.

On Monday last, a public meeting, convened by requisition, was held in the Town Hall, to petition Government for the immediate removal of all restrictions on the importation of foreign grain and provisions. Shortly after 12 o'clock the spacious edifice was filled almost to suffocation, the audience comprising persons diametrically opposed to each other in general politics, but unanimous in feeling as regarded the object which had brought them together. Among other gentlemen on the platform, we noticed T. H. Bateman, Esq., of Halton Park; John Armstrong, Esq., of Acrelands; T. H. Higgin, Esq., of Greenfield; James Johnson, Esq., M.D., Bare; Enoch Broster, Esq., of Vale Cottage; W. Satterthwaite, Esq., of the Greaves; John Greg, Esq., of Escow Beck; George Burrow, W. Jackson, and Thomas Dewhurst, Esqrs.

Mr. T. H. HIGGIN, in a speech enthusiastically cheered, moved the following resolution:—"That this meeting views with anxiety and alarm the present condition and future prospects of the labouring population of this country, arising in a great measure from the failure of the potato crop and a deficient wheat harvest, entailing upon them greatly enhanced prices for every description of agricultural produce, and as a consequence a great depression in trade and want of employment."

Mr. W. SATTERTHWAITE seconded the resolution.

The CHAIRMAN then put the resolution to the meeting, and it was carried by acclamation.

Mr. HIGGIN said that upon so important a decision he must call on them to give three hearty cheers, and he himself would give the "hip." This call was immediately responded to with the greatest enthusiasm.

Mr. BATEMAN then rose, and was loudly cheered, and moved the following resolution:

"That it is the opinion of this meeting that petitions be presented to both Houses of Parliament, praying for a repeal of the present impolitic and mischievous restrictions on the importation of grain, pulse, and provisions, and that the people of these realms be henceforth allowed to purchase food wherever the same can be bought, and to import the same into this country duty free."

The resolution was seconded by Dr. JAMES JOHNSON.

Mr. GREG moved the adoption of a petition based on the resolutions that had been passed.

Mr. BURROW seconded the motion.

The CHAIRMAN then read the petition to the meeting, and its adoption was affirmed unanimously, every hand in the densely-crowded Hall, with the exception of the reporters, being held up in its favour.

Mr. HIGGIN proposed three cheers for the success of the petition in Parliament, and the appeal was enthusiastically responded to.

Thanks were voted to the Chairman, on the motion of Mr. Greg, and the meeting then broke up.

ILFRACOMBE.

This spirited place has been the first among the towns of north Devon, to join in the movement—now so general as almost to claim to be called "national"—in favour of a repeal of the Corn Laws. In compliance with a requisition, numerous signed, the worthy Portreeve, Robert William Dickinson, Esq., convened a public meeting on the subject on Wednesday evening last. The meeting was very well attended, and the proceedings were in the highest degree enthusiastic.

Mr. DICKINSON was called to the chair, and after an introductory speech called upon

RICHARD BLIGH, Esq., who moved, "That the present circumstances in which this country is placed especially demand the total repeal of those laws which prevent the free circulation of the produce of the earth, and impede the commerce of an industrious people."

The Rev. BENJAMIN PRICE, minister of the Episcopal Free Church, in an eloquent address seconded the resolution, which was adopted with acclamation.

JOHN JONES, Esq., moved the second resolution:—"That a memorial be presented to her Majesty in Council, drawing her attention to the anticipated famine, and praying her Majesty that she will be graciously pleased to direct the attention of Parliament to the present Corn Laws, with a view to their immediate repeal."

Mr. HILLMAN seconded the resolution.

Mr. GEORGE THOMPSON next addressed the meeting, and having, in terms of the most eloquent eulogium, described the obligations which the nation was under to Mr. Cobden and the Anti-Corn-Law League, concluded by proposing an address to her most gracious Majesty, "Lumbly praying that her Majesty would be graciously pleased, at the opening of the ensuing session, to press upon the attention of both Houses of Parliament the indispensable necessity of considering the effect of protecting taxes upon articles of food, with a view to their immediate and total repeal."

The Rev. G. SMITH seconded the adoption of the memorial, which was carried by acclamation.

On the motion of Mr. BLIGH, seconded by Mr. THOMPSON, the Portreeve was requested to sign the memorial in behalf of the meeting.

Three cheers were given and repeated for the early and total repeal of the Corn Laws; and the assembly broke up, after one of the most unanimous and energetic meetings ever held in Ilfracombe.

MUSSELBURGH.

On Monday evening a large and respectable meeting of the inhabitants of Musselburgh was held in the Town Hall, for the purpose of memorialising her Majesty, and petitioning the Legislature, for the immediate and unconditional repeal of the Corn Laws and all protective duties on food. James Bridges, Esq., of Williamscraig, was called to the chair, who, after an introductory speech, called on

Mr. A. MILLER, a baker, who submitted for the adoption of the meeting a memorial to be transmitted to her Majesty, praying for the abolition of the Corn Laws.

The Rev. Mr. MANN seconded the adoption of the memorial in an able speech, for which we regret we cannot find room.

This motion was carried with acclamation, so also were the others which were submitted to the meeting.

Baillie SMART said he had much pleasure in proposing the following motion:

"That a petition be presented to both Houses of Parliament founded on the memorial that had been submitted, and unanimously agreed to; and that the petition to the House of Commons be intrusted for presentation to our honourable friend, Mr. Rutherford; and the one to the Lords to Lord Clarendon." (Applause.)

The Rev. Mr. LIVINGSTON seconded the motion.

Dr. WILSON had much pleasure in proposing the following resolution:

"That the meeting do return their grateful thanks to their respected member, Mr. Rutherford, for his kindness in appearing here this evening; and that all present do express their continued and perfect confidence in him as member for the burgh." (Cheers.)

Mr. P. WILKIE seconded the motion.

Mr. RUTHERFURD, M.P., who was received with great applause, after eloquently entering into the argument of the Corn Laws, said, We are entitled to ask Sir Robert why he dissolved the Government? If it was about the Corn Laws, we are further entitled to ask him what he intends to do in reference to this question? He will to a certain extent disoblige some of his former friends, if he intends to make an alteration in the Corn Laws. They will naturally leave him; and he must, of course, look for support from the Liberal party in the House; and that support, I have no hesitation in saying, he will get. (Cheers.) But if Sir Robert Peel's Government wish our support for any measure touching the Corn Laws, it must be for a measure that shall at once and for ever settle that question. (Renewed applause.) It must be a measure which shall set at rest those accursed discussions between the aristocracy and the lower ranks, between one great class of her Majesty's subjects and another class, more numerous and not less important, not less influential, and one whose happiness is unquestionably not less sacred in the eyes of the constitution. (Loud cheers.) It must be a complete settlement of the question; and I do not see how any settlement can be so, which does not amount to an absolute repeal of the Corn Laws. (Great applause.)

A vote of thanks having been proposed to the chairman by the Rev. James Robertson, and agreed to, the meeting separated at ten o'clock.

On entering his carriage for Edinburgh, Mr. Rutherford was greeted with three cheers by the crowd which had assembled.

HASTINGS.

On Friday evening last a very numerous meeting of the inhabitants of Hastings and St. Leonard's was held in the Town hall, convened by the mayor, in pursuance of a requisition to him, "for the purpose of taking into consideration the present alarming state of the country as respects the prospects of a supply of food for its inhabitants; and to petition her Majesty to open the ports of this kingdom for the admission of all sorts of grain free of duty."

The Mayor, John Hornby Maw, Esq., was in the chair.

BENJ. SMITH, Esq., M.P. for Norwich, read a letter, accounting for the absence of Mr. Holland, one of the members for the borough, he being abroad. Having contended that the amount of wages in no way depended on the price of corn, and that the country demanded an immediate repeal of the Corn Laws, he concluded by moving the following resolution:—"That this meeting views, with painful anxiety, the fact, that in consequence of the blight which has fallen upon potatoes, a great part of their fellow subjects in England and Scotland, and a still larger number in Ireland, are subject to great distress and to the danger of famine."

Mr. KELLAND seconded the motion.

J. F. STANFORD, Esq. (a gentleman visiting the town, and who has offered himself as a candidate at the next election), then entered into an elaborate view of the question, contending that the ports must be thrown open without delay to meet the wants of the country.

HOWARD ELPHINSTONE, Esq., M.P. for Lewes, next addressed the meeting; and having recapitulated a few of the arguments in favour of a repeal of the Corn Laws, said it was the bounden duty of Mr. Bisco, one of their members, to have attended the meeting, as he lived on the spot; Mr. Holland could not, he being in Italy; but he would be found at his post at the proper time, ready to fight the battle of Free Trade.

The first resolution was then put by the MAYOR, and carried unanimously, amidst acclamation.

Mr. JOLLY next moved, "That we have now assembled to express our conviction that the suffering of the poor is mainly attributable to erroneous legislation in restricting commerce, which excludes the importation of food, and so intercepts from the people the bounties of Providence."

This motion was seconded by Mr. WOMERSLEY, and carried amidst much cheering.

The Rev. Mr. PRAVELL (a dissenting minister) proposed the next resolution, "That this meeting do send a humble address to the Queen, praying that her Majesty will use all such means as her Majesty constitutionally possesses for throwing open the ports of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland for the free importation of food."

The preceding resolution was seconded by Mr. H. THWAITES, and carried unanimously.

Mr. EDWARDS proposed, and Mr. POOLE seconded, "That a petition be sent to both Houses of Parliament, praying for an immediate, total, and unconditional abolition of the Corn and Provision Laws, as the only step which is most likely permanently to avert the awful consequences of a deficient supply of food." This resolution, like the preceding ones, was carried amidst most vociferous cheering.

A vote of thanks having been passed to the mayor with much applause, the meeting separated, after having given three cheers, and one cheer more, for a total repeal of the Corn Laws.

CITY OF LONDON.

We rejoice to see that the Ward of Cripplegate Within is setting an excellent example to the other Wards of the metropolis. The rejection of the Conservative candidate, Mr. Wilson, whose only disqualification was his undecided opinion upon the Free Trade question, and the election of a thorough Free Trader in the person of Mr. Bennoch, has already produced important results. The following resolution was unanimously passed at the Wardmote:

"That being deeply impressed with the idea that most of our present difficulties abroad, and all our threatened distress at home, is attributable to the pernicious operation of the present Corn Law, which in principle is most unsound, in operation most injurious; alike unjust to the manufacturer, deceptive to the agriculturist, and oppressive to the poor; this meeting pledges itself to use every legitimate means to have it immediately abrogated."

The Alderman, Mr. Challis, appointed Monday last for the discussion of the question, when a large number of the influential warehousemen of the Ward attended, and passed unanimously the following resolution, THOMAS CHALLIS, Esq., Alderman of the Ward, in the chair:

Moved by Mr. CASH, seconded by Mr. BENNOCH, and resolved:—"That this meeting views with deep concern the unsettled state of the country, arising chiefly (as it believes) from the pernicious operation of the present Corn Law, which holds out delusive hopes to the agriculturist, cripples commercial enterprise, introduces a system of gambling into the ordinary business of life, which is alike destructive to morals and legitimate trade, induces a precarious supply, enhances the price of food, and is not only oppressive to the poor, but also subversive of the best interests of the vast majority of the population."

Moved by Mr. DEWAR, seconded by Mr. STROUD, jun., and carried unanimously:—"That the direful effects of the present Corn Law, set forth in the foregoing resolution, render its immediate and unconditional repeal essential to the prosperity of the people and the peace and safety of the kingdom."

Moved by Mr. HOOLE, seconded by Mr. LART, and carried unanimously:—"That petitions to the Houses of Lords and Commons be prepared, founded on the foregoing resolutions—that Lord Radnor be requested to present the petition to the Lords, and Lord John Russell that to the Commons; and that the other representatives of the City of London be desired to support the prayer of the petitions."

Moved by Mr. B. BROWN, seconded by Mr. BARNARD, and carried unanimously:—"That the thanks of this meeting be given to Mr. James Crocker, for generously granting the use of the George Hall, free of expense."

Moved by Mr. SAMUEL MOBLEY, seconded by Mr. DEPUTY SMITH, and carried unanimously:—"That the best thanks of the meeting are entirely due, and are hereby given, to our worthy Alderman, for his ready acquiescence in and quick response to the wishes of the inhabitants of the Ward in calling this meeting, and for his able and impartial conduct in the chair."

The petitions are now prepared, and will be signed by nine-tenths of the inhabitants of this wealthy and influential ward. This is as it should be.

UXBRIDGE.

A Free Trade meeting was held on Wednesday evening, in the Public Rooms, Uxbridge; Henry Hull, Esq., in the chair. Several farmers and agricultural labourers were present.

The CHAIRMAN having opened the meeting in an appropriate speech, called on R. R. Moore, Esq., who delivered an impressive address, taking as his text the several meetings of the protectionists, and contrasting them with the meeting of labourers held in the open air by moonlight, at Goatacre, in North Wiltshire. The latter meeting Mr. Moore designated as most remarkable in its character, and pointed to it as far more important than all the meetings of the protectionists that had been or could be called together. He then drew a powerful comparison between the speeches made at protection meetings by great landlords, which contained, he said, matter only to be laughed at, and the plain, earnest, and heartfelt expressions of suffering poured forth by the poor labourers of Goatacre. The vivid picture of the meeting of these unfortunate victims of oppression, given by Mr. Moore, seemed to impress the assembled crowd with feelings of the deepest commiseration. A profound silence evinced the deep interest with which extracts from, and commentaries on, their speeches were received.

Mr. Moore having concluded, the Chairman called on Mr. Edward Davy, of Crediton, in Devonshire, whom Mr. Moore introduced as a warm friend to Free Trade; and had prevailed on to accompany him from town and to attend their meeting.

Mr. DAVY bore his testimony as a manufacturer and a landowner to the baneful effects of the Corn Laws, and dwelt forcibly on the advantages to be derived from Free Trade. He warmly applauded the efforts of the League, and expressed confident hopes that North Devonshire would soon experience the benefit of the 10s. freehold movement. Resolutions condemning the Corn Laws, congratulating the League on the county movement, and promising to carry it forward in Middlesex and East Surrey, were adopted unanimously, and with the utmost enthusiasm; and a petition praying for the total, immediate, and unconditional repeal of the Corn Laws, was also unanimously carried, and was signed by a large number in the meeting.

On the motion of Mr. DAVY, seconded by Mr. MOORE, thanks were voted to the Chairman, and carried with three cheers for the county registration movement, after which the meeting separated.

THE MANCHESTER REGISTRATION COMMITTEE.—This committee still continues its activity, notwithstanding that some of its members are also at work on the Quarter of a Million Fund Committee. At the weekly meeting of the committee, held at the League Rooms on Tuesday evening last, a number of new names were handed in of gentlemen who were desirous of purchasing qualifications. One member of the committee (Mr. S. P. Robinson) gave in six names for North Lancashire, two for the West Riding of Yorkshire, and one for North Cheshire. Mr. J. Gadsby stated that he had just returned from Preston, where he had been to purchase qualifications for himself and three others, and that he had there met a gentleman from Halifax, who had been purchasing qualifications for between 40 and 50 of the "good men and true" of that town. It will be remembered, that at the late meeting at Preston, at which Mr. Cobden was present, Mr. Livesey, of Preston, stated that the Register for North Lancashire would be altered by 3000. A few more exertions, a few more Halifax men, added to those already sent and to be sent from Bolton, Manchester, &c. &c., and this will literally be done.

LEAGUE MOVEMENTS OF THE WEEK.—On Monday evening last, there was a great meeting at Newcastle-on-Tyne, chiefly with a view to promote the registration, and the purchase of county qualifications by Free Traders. It was attended by Mr. Cobden and Mr. Bright, who addressed the assemblage. Last evening, the same gentlemen were to attend and address a public meeting for similar purposes at Carlisle; and this (Wednesday) evening, we believe, they are to be present at another similar meeting at Kendal, for the same objects. On Friday next, they are to attend and address a large Free Trade meeting in Liverpool, the object of which is to commence the contributions of that town to the great Quarter of a Million Fund. Next week, besides several smaller meetings in various places, there are to be two large and important assemblages; one in the metropolis of Yorkshire and the woollen manufacture, and the other in the great metropolis of the cotton manufacture. The great West Riding dinner, we believe, is to take place at Leeds, on Wednesday next, the 11th instant; Messrs. Cobden and Bright are invited to attend, and will, in all probability, be present; and at this dinner the subscriptions of the West Riding to the Quarter of a Million Fund are to be commenced. From what we hear, the men of Yorkshire are determined on this occasion to show their Free Trade zeal and liberality, by the amount of their subscriptions—and it is expected to be a very interesting meeting. Last in this brief notice—though certainly by no means least, either in numbers, interest, or importance, there is to be, as usual, a vast gathering of Free Traders in their Free Trade Hall, on Thursday in next week, the 15th instant; and it is expected that the principal speakers on the occasion will be Messrs. Cobden, Bright, and W. J. Fox.—Manchester Guardian.

MORE CONVERTS TO FREE TRADE IN BUCKINGHAMSHIRE.—On Thursday evening, the 1st of January, Mr. John Gibbs, of Aylesbury, delivered a lecture in the British School Room, at Chesham, on the present political position and political duties of dissenters, in the course of which he dwelt largely on the Corn Laws. John Garrett, Esq., a very considerable landed proprietor, was, with many other gentlemen, on the platform. As soon as the lecture was over, a Mr. Geary, also a landlord, who was in the body of the room, called upon Mr. Garrett to give his opinions upon the Corn Laws. The chairman, (Charles Payne, Esq.) said Mr. Geary was out of order. Mr. Garrett was there as a hearer, and was not obliged to reply. Mr. Garrett stepped forward, and said he had no objection to answer the question. (Cheers.) He admitted that up to a recent date he had been an advocate for a moderate fixed duty on corn, but that the strong arguments used, with other recent events, had convinced him that a total repeal, followed up with other Free Trade measures, would be the best thing for the country, and for which he should now contend. (Loud cheers.) Mr. Gibbs thanked Mr. Geary for the result of the question, although he was out of order.

The best potatoes are now selling in the Lancaster market at 7d. per stone. Last year, at this time, they might have been purchased for 3d. per stone.

MEETING AT COVENT GARDEN THEATRE.
THE NEXT AGGREGATE MEETING OF THE NATIONAL ANTI-CORN LAW LEAGUE will be held on WEDNESDAY EVENING next, the 14th of January, in the Theatre Royal, Covent Garden.
George Wilson, Esq., will take the Chair at Seven o'clock precisely.
The Meeting will be addressed by the Hon. C. P. Villiers, M.P., Thomas M. Gibson, Esq., M.P., and Thomas Gisborne, Esq., M.P.
The Tickets of Admission will be issued on Monday and the following days.

QUALIFY! QUALIFY! QUALIFY!
THE Friends of FREE TRADE residing in the Northern or Midland Counties, desirous of purchasing Freeholds in any of the undermentioned Counties, are requested to apply to the Secretary of the League, Newall's Buildings Manchester.
North Lancashire
South Lancashire
North Cheshire
West Riding of York
South Stafford
North Stafford
South Cheshire
North Derbyshire
South Derbyshire
North Durham
East Cumberland
West Cumberland
South Northumberland.
Each applicant is requested to give his name and residence at full length.
By Order of the Council,
JOSEPH HICKIN, Secretary.

QUALIFY! QUALIFY! QUALIFY!
FREE TRADERS desirous of purchasing Freeholds for Middlesex, East Surrey, West Kent, South Essex, East Sussex, and South Hants, are requested to send their applications, with name and address in full, to the League Offices, 67, Fleet-street, London.
By Order of the Council,
JOSEPH HICKIN, Secretary.

QUALIFY! QUALIFY! QUALIFY!
AS only three weeks now remain for Qualifying, so as to be on the next Register, the Friends of Free Trade are respectfully urged to purchase Freeholds without delay.
Freehold Property, giving a Qualification, can be purchased, in North Lancashire, at from 30% to 35%, yielding about 7 per cent.
Every information may be had from Mr. Moorhouse, League Rooms, 4, Cheapside, Preston.

FREEHOLD QUALIFICATIONS FOR HERTS.
FREE TRADERS desirous of purchasing Freeholds in Hertfordshire are requested to send their applications to the League Offices, 67, Fleet-street, or to Mr. J. F. Bontems, Herts Registration Office, Hertford.

CONTRIBUTIONS TO THE QUARTER OF A MILLION FUND.

Subscriptions received during the week ending Wednesday, Jan. 7 1846.
N.B.—As the Subscription List is made up from Wednesday to Wednesday, contributions received on Thursdays and Fridays are not published in the LEAGUE of the Saturday immediately succeeding, but are included in the list of the week following.

	£	s.	d.
Lees, R. & Sons, Manchester and Dukinfield	200	0	0
A Friend, W. M.	100	0	0
A Friend, per John Bright, Esq.	100	0	0
Robinson, S. P., Spring Gardens, Manchester	20	0	0
Worsworth, G. M., 13, George-street, ditto	10	0	0
Kell, S. C., Huddersfield	10	0	0
High, R., Hfracombe	10	0	0
Baile, Walter, M.P., Gretnock, N.B.	10	0	0
Kershaw, R., solicitor, Manchester	5	0	0
Tov, Thomas, 133, York-street, Cheetham, ditto	5	0	0
Leech, Thomas, Urnston, near ditto	5	0	0
Thorp & Statham, Collyhurst, ditto	4	0	0
Rees, Chas., Lancashire-avenue, Leamington	4	0	0
Hewley, Edw., 28, Pinner-street, Manchester	2	2	0
Newton, M., Mount-street, Great Ancoats-st., ditto	2	2	0
Waddell, Andrew, Town Hall Buildings, ditto	2	2	0
Mahert, John, St. George's Road, Little Bolton	2	2	0
Hanson, J. N., Burton-on-Trent	2	0	0
Hodgson, John, Litchford, near Warrington	2	0	0
Wilson, J. & Co., Hunt-st., Garratt-rd., Manchester	2	0	0
Bell, John, Strangeways, ditto	2	0	0
Clay, Wm., 21, Ducie-street, ditto	2	0	0
New on, W. G., 1, Lonax-st., Gt. Ancoats st., ditto	2	0	0
Beswick, J., 9, Kennedy-st., near King-st., ditto	1	2	6
Shapley, J., 2, Cross-street, London Road, ditto	1	1	0
Broadhead, Geo., 37, London Road, ditto	1	1	0
Higginson, Thomas, Birmingham street, ditto	1	1	0
Reade, H., 18, Acton-street, London Road, ditto	1	1	0
Edwards, R., Beswick Pottery, Holt Town, ditto	1	1	0
Jackson, J. J., 1, Princess-street, ditto	1	1	0
Simmons, Isaac, 9, St. Ann's-square, ditto	1	1	0
Warburton, J., 10, Swan-street, ditto	1	1	0
Blore, Isaac, 21, ditto	1	1	0
Jackson, Thomas, 1, Grosvenor-st., G on M, ditto	1	1	0
Ogden, A., Mount-st., Gt. Ancoats-st., ditto	1	1	0
Ladd, Chas., H.M.P. Zephyr, Holyhead	1	1	0
Forster, Wm. F., Bolton, near Bradford, Yorkshire	1	1	0
Benson, S. Chivers, Cross Inn, near Llandilo, S. Wales	1	1	0
Gibson, Thomas, 80, Bedford-street, North Shields	1	1	0
Brady, H., High-street, Gateshead	1	1	0
Littlewood, Nathan, Holmfirth, near Huddersfield	1	1	0
The Workmen at Britannia Mills, Birstall, near Leeds	1	1	0
Waddington, Jonathan, Willgate, Wigan	1	1	0
Harriacn, H., ditto ditto	1	1	0
Potter, Miss, Market-place, ditto	1	1	0
Wild, J., King-street, Oldham	1	1	0
Walker, A., Walker-terrace, Southport	1	1	0
Phillip, David, Ossett, near Wakefield	1	1	0
Pearson, E., ditto ditto	1	1	0
Katwistle, Thomas, Church, near Acerrington	1	1	0
Milner, John Crossland, Thirlstone, near Barnsley	1	1	0
Croce, Andrew, Dumbane, per John Graham	1	1	0
Dewhurst, Mrs. C., Whitehaven Cottage, Oswestry	1	1	0
Barton, Mrs. Catherine, Chester	1	1	0
Weston, Thomas, Birmingham	1	1	0
Hall, James, Hall Place, Knutsford, Cheshire	1	1	0
Shaw, Geo., Dodworth Green, near Barnsley	1	1	0
Palley, Thomas, Halesow, Lancashire	1	1	0
Bennett, John, 57, Lord-street, Liverpool	1	1	0
Priestman, Miss, Summer Hill, Newcastle-on-Tyne	1	1	0
Hunter, John, Eldon-street, ditto	1	1	0
Riley, W., Bridgeholme Green, near Charnock-le-Feith	1	1	0
Peel, Henry, Fleet-street, Bury, Lancashire	1	1	0
Warrington, Wm., Deansgate, Great Bolton	1	1	0
Hawood, R., ditto ditto	1	1	0
Hawood, Thomas, High-street, Little Bolton	1	1	0
Pontons, R., 28, Penn-street, Salford	1	1	0
Gornall, Joseph, Newton Heath, Manchester	1	1	0
Anson, Geo., Chester-street, C on M ditto	1	1	0
Aspinall, John, Great-street, Hulme ditto	1	1	0
Adams, John, 25, Deansgate ditto	1	1	0
Wilson, J. & A., 178, Great Ancoats-street, ditto	1	1	0

*Graves, Charles, David-street	ditto	1	0	0
*Muir, Wm., 59, Oxford-street	ditto	1	0	0
Blyth, J. C., 24, Charlotte-street	ditto	1	0	0
*Gibson, Wm., 22, Tame-street, Ancoats	ditto	1	0	0
*Cutcliffe, Geo., 47, Thomas-street	ditto	1	0	0
*Smith, Peter, 3, Francis-st., Strangeways	ditto	1	0	0
A Friend, per John Bell	ditto	1	0	0
The Six Children of T. Leach, Urnston, near ditto	ditto	1	0	0
*Ward, A., 51, Deansgate	ditto	1	0	0
Hodgson, J., 85, Oldham-street	ditto	1	0	0
*Hampson James, 161, Great Ancoats-st.	ditto	1	0	0
*Slack, John, 29, Brook-street, C on M	ditto	1	0	0
*Howe, Thomas, 17, Smithy Door	ditto	1	0	0
Whitatt, John, Swan-street	ditto	1	0	0
Booth, Wm., Urnston, near ditto	ditto	1	0	0
*Lee, John, 1, Mount-st., Gt. Ancoats-st.	ditto	1	0	0
*Wadsworth, H., 24, Higher Temple-st., C on M, ditto	ditto	1	0	0
Nuttall, Jesse, 61, Great Mount-street	ditto	0	8	0
Nuttall, James, New Church, Rossendale	ditto	0	5	0
Pixton, G., Duke-street, Liverpool	ditto	5	0	0
Lees, J., Engine Bridge, Huddersfield	ditto	5	0	0
Per G. P.	ditto	2	0	0
*Holt, T. J., 20, Aldermanbury, London	ditto	2	0	0
Kenworthy, Anderson, F., Dawson-st., Manchester	ditto	2	0	0
Manchester.	ditto	1	0	0
Walton, Joseph, 89, Liverpool-road, do.	ditto	1	0	0
*Holt, Jas., 20, Aldermanbury, London	ditto	1	0	0
Anderson, Thomas, Rochdale	ditto	1	0	0
Sundry Persons in sums under 20s. each	ditto	25	1	6
*Collett, John, M.P., 7, Upper Belgrave-street	ditto	10	10	0
*Hutchinson, J. W., 19, Little Pultney-st., Golden-sq.	ditto	10	0	0
*Austin, Anthony, jun., 15, Stamford Villa, Fulham	ditto	10	0	0
*Hawkes, Wm., Eagle Foundry, Birmingham	ditto	10	0	0
*Surridge, Mr., Newgate-street	ditto	5	5	0
Davis, W. H., Amphill-place, Vassal Road, Brixton	ditto	5	0	0
*Thornton, T. W., Kennington-street, Walworth	ditto	5	0	0
*Parsons, J. M., 6, Raymond's-buildings, Gray's Inn	ditto	5	0	0
Wedgwood, H., 42, Chester-street, Regent's Park	ditto	5	0	0
*Baynes, Sir W., Bart., 25, Portland-place	ditto	5	0	0
Hawes, Benjamin, sen., Brunswick-square	ditto	5	0	0
*Wright, C., Sydenham, Kent	ditto	5	0	0
*Bickers, Henry, 8, Paradise row, Chelsea	ditto	5	0	0
*Dorville, H., Alphington, near Exeter	ditto	3	0	0
*Massey, T. H. M., 3, Oxford-square	ditto	2	10	0
*Massey, R. M., ditto	ditto	2	10	0
*Massey, E., 50, Cambridge-terrace, Hyde Park	ditto	2	10	0
*Massey, J., ditto	ditto	2	10	0
*The Three Crowns Association, East Road, City Road	ditto	2	10	0
*Kearsey, John, 24, Euston-square	ditto	2	2	0
*Leader, W., Leek Parsonage, near Kirby Lonsdale	ditto	2	2	0
*Tripp, G., Tavistock-place, Tavistock-square	ditto	2	2	0
*Tittford, W. & R., Leadenhall-street	ditto	2	2	0
*Tindale, Ebenezer, Broad-street, Ratcliff	ditto	2	0	0
*Barclay, J. Col., Balerno Lodge, near Edinburgh	ditto	2	0	0
*Jennings, G., The Shrubbery, Buckland, Dover	ditto	2	0	0
*Cheape, Capt. J., Gergenti, Irvine	ditto	2	0	0
*Bush, R. J., Brecknock Cottage, Camden New Town	ditto	2	0	0
*Robertson, David, 7, Pilgrimage-street, Edinburgh	ditto	1	1	0
Woodcock, Matthew, 228, High-street, Lincoln	ditto	1	1	0
Goss, C., Wargrave, near Henley-on-Thames	ditto	1	1	0
Brackston, R., 2, Elm place, Bath	ditto	1	1	0
*Price, Geo., Portsea	ditto	1	1	0
*Garratt, Joseph, Braintree, Essex	ditto	1	1	0
*Richardson, Wm., Shepton Mallett	ditto	1	1	0
*Morgan, Arthur, New Bridge-street	ditto	1	1	0
*Poulton, C. & G., 67, Blackfriars-road	ditto	1	1	0
*Humphrys, James, Wandsworth-road	ditto	1	1	0
*Dyte, John & C., 106, Strand	ditto	1	1	0
*Baker, J. E., 51, Burton Crescent	ditto	1	1	0
*Tittford, W., Leadenhall-street	ditto	1	1	0
*Webber, J., 1, Brewer-street, Golden-square	ditto	1	1	0
*Matthews, Geo., 11, Phoenix-street, Soho	ditto	1	1	0
*Shuter, R., jun., 66, St. Martin's-lane	ditto	1	1	0
*Brackstone, R. H., 124, Wood-street	ditto	1	1	0
Thompson, Andrew, 4, Grove terrace, Notting Hill	ditto	1	1	0
Wylde, Charles, 17, Chiswell-street, Finsbury	ditto	1	1	0
*Thornborough, W., 34, Trinity-square, Southwark	ditto	1	1	0
*Stupart, James, 6, Bridgewater-square, Barbican	ditto	1	1	0
*Gregory, Mr., 11, Glasshouse-street	ditto	1	1	0
*Cowley, W., 7, Osborne-street, Whitechapel	ditto	1	1	0
*Kettleford, Edw., 54, High Holborn	ditto	1	1	0
*Turner, W., 50, South Molton-street, Hanover-square	ditto	1	1	0
*Down, W., St. Saviour's Churchyard, Southwark	ditto	1	1	0
*Jackson, Edw., Hope Cottage, Deptford Lower Road	ditto	1	1	0
*Rodd, H., Red Lion Wharf, Upper Thames-street	ditto	1	1	0
*Sim, Wm., 8, King's Bench Walk, Temple	ditto	1	1	0
*Watson, James, 167, Fleet-street	ditto	1	1	0
*Shyam, John F., 121, Shore-ditch	ditto	1	1	0
*Hugh, James, 24, Down-street, May Fair	ditto	1	1	0
*Shoen, S., 9, Victoria-square, Piccadilly	ditto	1	1	0
*St. John, H., 27, Clerkenwell Green	ditto	1	1	0
*Williams, Col., 52, Connaught-square	ditto	1	1	0
*Sykes, Edw., 1, Fleet-street, Westminster	ditto	1	1	0
*Crossley, Henry, Church-street, Deptford	ditto	1	1	0
*Mason, Mr., 30, Charles-street, Middlesex Hospital	ditto	1	1	0
*Llewellyn, Thos., Forest House, Dalston	ditto	1	1	0
*Pamphilon, James, 27, Brydges-street, Covent Garden, near Mr. Bailey	ditto	1	1	0
Hill, Wm., builder, Blackheath Road	ditto	1	1	0
*Troup, J., 36, Hutton Garden	ditto	1	1	0
*Overbury, John, 4, Frederick-place, Old Jewry	ditto	1	1	0
*Matthews, Wm., 91, Wood-street, City	ditto	1	1	0
*Birch, C., 12, Downham Road, Islington	ditto	1	1	0
Mair, Wm., 46, Notting Hill-square	ditto	1	1	0
*Allingham, John, 8, Grange-road, Brompton	ditto	1	1	0
The Workmen in the employ of Messrs. Allingham and Son, Upper Russell-street, Brompton	ditto	1	1	0
Harris, F., 11, Mary's-pl., Park-rd., Old Kent Road	ditto	1	1	0
*Geesin, Wm., 34, Golden-square, St. James's	ditto	1	1	0
Murray, John, G., 22, ditto	ditto	1	1	0
Ward, G. D., 59, Shore-ditch	ditto	1	1	0
*Loosely, G., 10, Long-acre, Finsbury Circus	ditto	1	1	0
*Miller, G., 12, Fenchurch-street	ditto	1	1	0
*Cherry, James, Breutford	ditto	1	1	0
Romains, R., Hale Lodge, near Edgware	ditto	1	1	0
Cox, E., 6, Elm Tree Road, St. John's Wood	ditto	1	1	0
*Fraser, S., 133, High-street, Borough	ditto	1	1	0
Wood, John, 8, Little Newport-street, Leicester-sq.	ditto	1	1	0
Laycock, H. S., 42, Jernyn-street, St. James's	ditto	1	1	0
*Watts, Wm., Albion-place, Barnsbury Park	ditto	1	1	0
Patrick, W. B., 11, Church-street, Limehouse	ditto	1	1	0
Hinkle, Fred., 103, Great Portland-street, Portland-pl.	ditto	1	1	0
*Stewart, H., 1, A Weymouth-street	ditto	1	1	0
*Rotherham, J., 84, Shore-ditch	ditto	1	1	0
*Taverner, Josh., 140, Old-street, St. Luke's	ditto	1	1	0
*Watson, A., Deansgate, Bolton	ditto	1	1	0
*Burgess, W. H., Battle, Sussex	ditto	1	1	0
Des Essars, Jules, Paris	ditto	1	1	0
*Crosswell, Rd. L., Lonsdale-place, near Whitehaven	ditto	1	1	0
*Shapley, Mark, High-street, Macclesfield	ditto	1	1	0
*Beresford, Joseph, Bosley, near ditto	ditto	1	1	0
*Acton, Joseph, Broken Cross, near ditto	ditto	1	1	0
*Marson, James, Bewsey-street, Warrington	ditto	1	1	0
Lee, J. C., Charnomth, Dorset	ditto	1	1	0
Turner, J., Hartill Farm, St. Bridwell, near Coleford	ditto	1	1	0
*Froster, T. B., Coleford	ditto	1	1	0
*Miffield, S. & J., Westgate Hill, Bradford, Wilts	ditto	1	1	0
Wiglam, R., Haymarket, Norwich	ditto	1	1	0
*Speedy, G., sunder, Athol-street, Perth	ditto	1	1	0
*Evans, John, Dundee	ditto	1	1	0
*Wilson, Alex., Pilot, Holy Island	ditto	1	1	0
*Starl, Wm., 48, London-street, Edinburgh	ditto	1	1	0
*Artherton, Nathan, Kingston, near Chippenham	ditto	1	1	0
*Bond, Wm., 57, Bridge-street, Cambridge	ditto	1	1	0
*Grainger, Edw., Dudley	ditto	1	1	0
*Hector, Gray, Northampton	ditto	1	1	0
*Wyles, R., Court-street, Liversham	ditto	1	1	0
*Cross, Wm., Smallbridge, near Rochdale	ditto	1	1	0
*Costar, R., Benson, Oxon	ditto	1	1	0
*Mills, F., All Saints Green, Norwich	ditto	1	1	0
*Spratt, Mr., Hinton, near Yorkford, Suffolk	ditto	1	1	0
*Anderson, John, 47, Albany-street, Edinburgh	ditto	1	1	0
*Blyth, Sam., Park-lane, Langham Green, Colchester	ditto	1	1	0
*Clapp, Jerome, Rev., Odun House, Appledon, Devon	ditto	1	1	0

Cobb, C., Strood, Kent	1	0	0
*Taylor, John, Preston Brook, Cheshire	1	0	0
*Crossley, John, Brighouse, Halifax	1	0	0
*Graham, Edw., 25, Whitechapel, Liverpool	1	0	0
*McMillan, Wm., 2, Surrey-street, ditto	1	0	0
*Reynolds, F. K., Lynn, Norfolk	1	0	0
*Hull, H., Northampton	1	0	0
*Burton, R., Smallwood Manor, near Uttoxeter, Staffordshire	1	0	0
Walker, Thomas, 152, Perth-road, Dundee	1	0	0
*Hanson, S., Todmorden	1	0	0
Barratt, E., St. Austell, Cornwall	1	0	0
Marcom, A., Charleston, ditto	1	0	0
*Hawkes, W. R., Parsonage, Bishop Stortford	1	0	0
*Nash, F. S., ditto	1	0	0
*Barling, James, Fisherton, Salisbury	1	0	0
Grassam, John, Driffield	1	0	0
*Baynes, Geo., High-street, Dunbar	1	0	0
*Greaves, Wm. T., Hobden Bridge	1	0	0
*Broadhead, Joseph, Wooddale, Huddersfield	1	0	0
*Robuck, J., Wooddale Town-end, near ditto	1	0	0
Dickson, Arch., Dunbar	1	0	0
*Macintyre, J. J., Mid Calder, Mid Lothian	1	0	0
*McLellan, Thomas, Burnhead, near Glasgow	1	0	0
Beatonson, Wm., Rotham	1	0	0
*Armshy, G., Irthingboro, near Higham Ferrers	1	0	0
Roberts, Thomas, 126 A, St. John-street, Clerkenwell	0	10	0
R. D.	0	5	0
Mansfield, John, 1, Leicester-square	0	5	0
Bone, T., Mountcharles, St. Austell, Cornwall	0	5	0
{Bass, Isaac	2	2	0
Brighton. {Burgess, Henry, Meeting House-lane	1	1	0
{Patchell, R., Duke-street	1	1	0
{Brown, F., Black Lion-street	1	1	0
{Miall, John, Union-street	0	2	6
{*Rowlett, W. & Son, 3, Canning-place	1	0	0
{*Berry, Mrs., Narboro' Road	1	0	0
Leicester. {Evans, Geo., Talbot Inn	1	0	0
{Gillespie, R. W.	1	0	0
{*Crossley, James, High-street	1	0	0
{*Rodgers, T., Southfield Cottage	1	0	0

to wear of a warfare upon the landed aristocracy. The value of land cannot fail of being eventually enhanced by the influence of Free Trade. So taught the great masters of political economy; so urged the first movers in this agitation, and with no lack of sincerity or of argument. Proof has been given of the fact abundantly sufficient to convince the bonâ fide proprietor, would he but listen to you, rather than to the nominal landlord of mortgaged acres. He might then see the absurdity of compensation for a benefit; of asking to be bribed to the reception of an advantage; and of mixing his case up with that of the spendthrift, who may fairly be sent to seek his compensation in the wisdom taught by baffled fraud and self-created difficulties.

Should this question of "compensation" be mooted, a preliminary inquiry must be insisted upon into the incidence of taxation upon different classes. The burdens upon the landowners must be calculated, and the burdens upon other people, especially upon those who labour. The legacy and stamp duties must be investigated; the modes of assessing to the Income Tax; the immunities as to dogs, horses, bricks, and tiles, and 50 other items; and above all, the pressure of the whole system of indirect taxation upon the poor millions rather than the wealthy thousands. Before stirring such a topic, let the landlords calculate what can compensate them for the exposures of this investigation. Its avoidance would be a cheap bargain at the cost of all they are ever likely to gain by the Corn Laws.

A marvellous degree of effrontery is implied in the suggestion of "compensation." The monopolists have for 30 years abused the sacred powers of legislation, turning to their private advantage functions only allowed to exist for public good; and they ask for compensation. They have deprived industry of its right to expend its own earnings, turning back from our ports the food it craved to purchase; and they ask for compensation. They have interrupted and thwarted the progress of national prosperity, aggravated the fluctuations of trade, reduced honest employments to gambling speculations; and they ask for compensation. They have upheld their law-created scarcity in the face of an increasing population and a suffering population; they are answerable before God and man for the stimulus thus given to disease and crime; and they talk of compensation. It is for them to render compensation, were that possible, not to receive it; and be thankful that you require not at their hands such equivalent for the past as justice would award.

There are persons whose intellect, or whose morale, is of such a calibre that the notion is not yet driven out of their heads of this being merely a squabble of classes whose interests are capable of adjustment and pecuniary compromise. The League, they tell you, consists of certain Manchester cotton-spinners, who want to get rid of their stock. These cotton-spinners, they opine, hire lecturers and writers to abuse the landowners, on the speculation, by Corn Law repeal, of selling calico enough to realise a balance in cash, with which to purchase some of the land their tricks have cheapened. The notion of "compensation" fits in well with these theories of noodledom. "What will you give us (of the public money) to let you have a market for your surplus bales?" Such is their implied overture to the supposed cotton-spinners. They know not what a national policy is; unless it be the policy of getting all they can out of the nation. They think there is only a civil action against them for damages, instead of an indictment for the abstraction of property, the corruption of manners, and the destruction of human life. They fail to perceive that no cotton-spinning interest could have laid hold of the public mind, could have stimulated the pulsation of the common human heart, could have called forth exertions so laborious and contributions so munificent, could have pervaded all classes from the peer to the peasant, and have commenced the creation of a political power that overrides all party organization and demarcation, unless allied with elementary principles of truth, right, sympathy, and humanity. And so they twaddle of compensation and conditions. It is something too much, that you, in your consciousness of the growth of this cause, in your own minds and around you; in your familiarity with the lucid arguments and accumulated facts that have matured your conviction, and in your recollection of the fearful scenes of want and misery that have harrowed your sympathies and confirmed your determination, should be invited to accept so pitiful a version of your efforts, and to act upon it by compromise and compensation. Some of these persons trace their pedigrees to the time of the signing of Magna Charta; tell them that the demand of the Barons of England then was that justice should not be denied, delayed, or sold; and such is now the demand of the Commons of England.

A NORWICH WEAVER BOY.

CORRESPONDENCE.

DISTRESS IN OXFORDSHIRE.—WHO ARE NOW THE POOR MAN'S FRIENDS?

To the Editor of THE LEAGUE.

SIR,—It is as much my privilege as it is my duty to inform your many and benevolent readers that I have this week supplied some of the necessary wants of between sixty and seventy families,—some with bread, some with cotton sheets and blankets, some with beds, some with smock-frocks, and not a few with coals. Many thanks to those "Free Traders" and "Anti-Monopolists" who have put it into my power to help those who cannot help themselves. If the blessing of the poor be a blessing indeed, the members of the League and other Free Traders have their share of it. I walked fourteen miles this week to see and examine for myself, the novel and indescribable hole, or rather grave, in which a family of six persons are now spending their fourth winter. I say, grave, for the hole is more like a grave than any thing else to which I can compare it. I wish I could send you a drawing of it, but I cannot. The exact length of it is three yards and a half; the width of it is five feet ten inches and a half, and the height of it, from the bottom to the boughs and reeds which cover it, is five feet two inches. The place in which the poor labourer, his wife, and four children, live, stand, and sit, and taking off the part on which the bed and straw are placed, is just three feet and a half in length!!! What a house for a family of six to live in!! I challenge any man, in any country, in either England, Ireland, or Scotland, to point out another place inhabited by six human beings, equal in wretchedness to that of which I have spoken in this my letter. The very sight of it is a standing disgrace to the parish of Heyford, and to the county of Oxford. It is but doing justice to the poor man's wife to say, that I found the few things they have, clean, and in their place. The poor man works on the roads; wages, 6s. a-week; and one boy, in his sixteenth year, earns 2s. 6d. a-week. They have no potatoes. I promised them a bed as soon as they can get into a cottage. Were I to give them a bed now, it would soon be rotten and destroyed in their damp hole. A kind gentleman, who is a Free Trader, and his kind lady, pay for the education of two of the children at the village school; and another kind lady in the parish pays for the education of another of the children. The present system of monopoly has converted too many of the peasantry into unclean persons and thieves. And if the death of monopoly should not be effected soon, it will soon—very soon—seal the death of hundreds, if not of thousands, of our field labourers. The dread of being separated from their wives and children is not the only reason why so many of the peasantry would rather starve than enter the union house. There is another reason, of which very few persons are aware, why the poor field labourers will not go to the union; and that is, the dread of being deprived of their cottages. The number of cottages in many of the villages is rather on the decrease than on the increase, consequently many of the poor have to leave their own parishes, and to take shelter where they can find it. There is in Bicester a great number of cottages, which are the property of many different persons, and therefore the distressed poor are always afraid to enter the union house and thus give up their cottages, because, on leaving them for a time, the owner would instantly let them to others, if he could. I have just had three persons at my house from Charlton-Otmoor, Oxon, to whom I have given each a bed. I will trouble your readers with two of these cases:

Sarah Mobly, a widow, has eight children, only one of whom is at work, and earns 1s. 6d. a-week. She receives eight loaves and 2s. weekly from the parish. She has two straw beds, on which nine persons sleep, in one room. Eight loaves and 3s. 6d. in money! What a total for a mother and her eight children to live upon for seven days; and out of which she has to pay 9d. a week house-rent, and to find shoes, clothes, and coals!!! She has no potatoes.

George Trisby has a wife and eight children. Wages, 8s. a week. The whole of the children are at home without employment. They have one poor bed and some straw. All sleep in one room. No potatoes.

What a state of things in Oxfordshire! Here is a hard-working man who has to find bread, potatoes, shoes, and clothes for ten persons out of 10s. a week!!

I have thus, Sir, given both you and your readers, including the statements contained in my former letter published by you, an account of the real state and wretchedness of the peasantry in six villages and one market town. As my former letter has been published in our local papers, and at my request, I hope that the same editors will do me the kindness to copy this letter from your paper into their own. I am anxious that those who live in our own locality should see and know what I have to say in relation to the sufferings and miseries of the peasantry in Oxfordshire, and Buckinghamshire. I am, Sir, yours very faithfully,

W. FERGUSON,

Minister of the Congregational Church, Bicester, Oxon.

P.S.—The price of these brown loaves is 6d. each. I met a poor woman last night, whose husband is out of work, and consequently she had to pawn the clothes from off her child's back to get a loaf of bread. I gave her two loaves, and sent her back to get her child's garments. I know the family; they are industrious, but they cannot live upon air.—W. F.

[Mr. Ferguson, minister of the congregational church, Bicester, Oxon, begs to inform "Anti-Monopolist" that he has received the half of a five pound note safe and sound. Many thanks to "Anti-Monopolist." The money shall be laid out cautiously, prudently, and seasonably. Mr. Ferguson also begs, through the medium of THE LEAGUE, to thank "C. E." London, for a parcel of very seasonable and useful cast-off clothes forwarded to Mr. F. for the poor of his neighbourhood. (Let others go and do likewise.) Many heartfelt thanks are also due, and now tendered by Mr. Ferguson to "E.W., and friends," in Hereford, for a post-office order, value £5.]

To the Editor of THE LEAGUE.

8, Powis Place, Jan. 7, 1846.

DEAR SIR,—Not the least important object of the League I believe to be to protect agriculture (not landlordism) from protection. Surely so powerful a confederation should also do what in it lies to protect the tillers of the soil from persecution incurred in aiding the cause of Free Trade. I beg to call the attention of your readers to the meeting of agricultural labourers, held at Goatacre, North Wilts, the day before yesterday, reported in this day's Times, and then let them say if something should not be done for these men. I venture to say, a more touching, a more heart-rending, yet, vital, a more hopeful spectacle, has seldom met men's eyes. It is one of those startling occurrences that seem to take one's mind from the "ignorant present," as too large and unreal for its common places, and to loom upon us as through the mists of a far off time. It seems to say, by this picture, shall we of the 19th century be made known to posterity; and when the philosophical historian writes of England in 1840-6, it will be as thus presented, with our hideous social anomalies, as the land of the wealthiest aristocracy, and the poorest peasantry,—of the most princely domains, and the largest union houses,—of starvation laws, maintained for the benefit of the starving, and of thousands perishing under the pressure of "protection."

The meeting was held at nightfall, at the cross road of the little village of Goatacre; and thereto came one thousand peasants, some with their wives and families, to state their sufferings, and to petition the Queen for a removal of those laws which stand between the toiling, and the hungry, and their food. Many more would have come, but the threats of their masters had deterred them. There was but too much sameness in their simple stories,—none could earn sufficient bread and potatoes to satisfy the cravings of hunger; and some had neither work nor food, and only lived to bear about gaunt evidence of famine, by the charity of those, one step higher in condition than themselves; and yet the tone of all was moderate, dignified, and forbearing. With hunger gnawing at their vitals, they taught the lesson of peace, law, and order; and in rags, and standing by their ragged wives and children, they calmly spoke of their duties to man and of their trust in God. Leaguers! what can we do for these people? They have helped our cause in a critical moment; they will probably suffer for it. Even if the Corn Laws be repealed in a month, spite, or panic, may lay them in their graves before another harvest ripens in the fields. The monopolists raised 200*l.* in Sussex the other day to uphold starvation. What can we do to beat it down when it attacks such men as these. In our numbers we are strong; let us save them. I will with pleasure add my mite, 5*l.*, for such an object.—I am, dear Sir, yours truly,

P. A. TAYLOR, jun.

Pickering Farm, Bucks, 4th Jan.

DEAR SIR,—I have been on the Continent for the last two months, and on my return the other day I was glad to see the exertions making by the League to procure further contributions to the fund.

Will you have the goodness to add my name to the list as a subscriber of 100*l.*?—I am, dear Sir, yours truly,

J. C. EWART, of Liverpool.

G. Wilson, Esq.

To the Editor of THE LEAGUE.

MONSIEUR,—Le hasard ayant fait tomber entre mes mains un des numéros du journal, The League, j'ai été ainsi conduit à étudier les progrès de l'association formée dans le royaume uni de la Grande Bretagne pour obtenir le rappel des lois sur les bleds, et la liberté du commerce. J'ai lu avec admiration les discours de vos principaux orateurs, et j'ai vu avec surprise que les travaux de la Ligue étaient presque entièrement inconnus en France. L'organisation de la Ligue, ses travaux, ses développemens et sa puissance me paraissent cependant constituer l'un des événements historiques les plus intéressans et les plus remarquables de cette époque, non seulement pour l'Angleterre, mais même pour le monde entier. J'ai pensé, Monsieur, que vous ne refuseriez pas d'accueillir le faible hommage de la sympathie et de l'admiration d'un étranger, et j'ai l'honneur de vous envoyer le montant de ma souscription, en vous priant de me faire parvenir votre journal, que je lirai avec l'intérêt le plus soutenu, et auquel je consacrerai quelques articles dans une des publications périodiques de ce pays. Heureux si je puis contribuer ainsi quelque peu, et dans la mesure de mes forces, au succès de la noble cause que défendent avec tant de talent et de supériorité les hommes d'état et les publicistes qui dirigent la Ligue, et qui ont si puissamment concouru à répandre et à faire prévaloir dans l'opinion publique, les vrais principes de l'économie politique et du droit international.

Aggréé, Monsieur, toutes les assurances de ma considération la plus distinguée.

JULES DES ESSARS,

Membre du Conseil d'Arrondissement de Coulommier (Seine-et-Marne).
Paris, Rue Thiroux, No. 7, Chaussée d'Antin.

The following letter was read at the Watford Free Trade meeting:

Kytes, near Watford, Jan. 6th, 1845.

GENTLEMEN,—I am sorry to be absent from your meeting this evening, but not being previously aware of it, I am unable to attend. I beg to enclose five pounds, more as an earnest of opinion, relative to Free Trade, which I have held from my earliest age, than from the idea that such a trifle can be of avail to a cause, so amply, I am happy to see, supplied with the sinews of war. It is, I am sure, needless for me to write or say anything more, to urge upon persons, unbiassed by personal considerations, or I should rather say mistaken prejudices and short-sighted views, that the principles we advocate must be conducive to the general interests of the country.

WILLIAM CAPEL, JUN.

The new tariff is producing some rare imports. For instance, there were put up at a public sale, in London, thirty baskets of China vegetable or tree tallow, and thirty bales of China hemp, just received from Shanghai.

FREE TRADE AND THE REVENUE.

(From the Economist.)

It must be admitted that one of the most obvious and direct consequences of a repeal of the Corn Laws will be a repeal of all other protective and differential duties. Sound policy and justice to all classes of the community will equally demand these reforms in our fiscal laws; and we are not surprised at the effort which it is already evident will be made on the part of those whose whole object is to obstruct the necessary reforms which the Government has in view, by endeavouring to excite the fears of the country on the subject of revenue and taxation. It was under the pretext of raising revenue to the State that protective duties were first introduced, and it cannot, therefore, excite surprise if there should be an attempt to create a prejudice in the public mind against their abolition, on the ground of endangering public credit, or, at least, of leading to the imposition of other new taxes. In the present advanced stage of the Free Trade discussion, it may appear to some an unnecessary task, that we should dwell upon the difference between duties imposed for the purposes of protection, and those imposed for the objects of revenue. But we are so much struck by the numerous evidences which we at present discover, both private and public, of the efforts that will be used in the coming struggle to confuse these two distinct classes of duties, and to prejudice the cause of Free Trade, that we are induced to examine how far the revenue is dependent upon that part of the present customs' duties which operate as "protective," and which, as such, are objected to by the advocates of Free Trade.

Exclusive of corn, the customs' duties in 1844 amounted to £2,741,734; and further deducting the amount received from cotton and sheep's wool, raw silk, flax, and hemp, the duties upon which were abolished in the last session, there would be left the sum of £2,196,489, as derived from all other articles. To contribute this amount of revenue, no fewer than eight hundred and eight articles were chargeable with customs' duties; but of that large number, ten articles only yielded no less than £20,319,491, leaving a sum of only £1,641,998, as the produce of the whole remaining seven hundred and ninety-eight articles. This classification of the customs' revenue of 1844 may be thus more clearly stated:

Amount of customs' duties, independent of corn, cotton, wool, silk, flax, and hemp, ..	£21,969,489 of which,—
Coffee produced	£ 682,218
Sugar	5,216,569
Molasses	290,888
Tea	4,524,613
Spirits	2,211,243
Wine	1,981,686
Tobacco	3,977,037
Fruits	509,241
Timber	916,606
.. .. .	20,319,491

Produced by the remaining 798 articles £1,649,998 of the seven hundred and ninety-eight articles producing the sum of £1,649,998.—

Four hundred and sixty-seven produce less than 100l. each
One hundred and sixty-seven produce more than 100l. but less than 500l. each
Fifty produce between 500l. and 1000l. each
One hundred and nine produce between 1000l. and 10,000l. each
Twenty-five produce between 10,000l. and 50,000l. each
Five produce between 50,000l. and 100,000l. each
Five produce more than 100,000l.

of the ten articles which thus constitute more than ninety per cent. of the customs' revenue, the chief articles which are subject to protective or differential duties are coffee, sugar, and timber; while tea, wines, tobacco, and fruits may be considered strictly as revenue duties. An inquiry into the effect which the differential duties upon coffee and sugar exercise upon the public interests and upon the revenue, will suffice to show the general tendency of all such laws.

COFFEE DUTIES.

The duty chargeable upon coffee of colonial growth is fourpence per pound, or 37s. 4d. per cwt., while that chargeable upon coffee of foreign growth is sixpence per pound, or 56s. per cwt. In 1844, the quantity of coffee taken for consumption was 280,314 cwt., of which, 174,688 cwt. was of colonial growth, and 105,626 cwt. of foreign growth, subject to the respective duties of 37s. 4d. and 56s. per cwt. It must be plain to those least accustomed to these subjects that the price at which foreign coffee, with the addition of the higher rate of duty, could be furnished to the consumer must determine the price which can be obtained for colonial coffee; and that the latter commanding the same price from the consumer, but being subjected to a lower duty, the difference must operate as so much additional price to the producer without any corresponding benefit to the revenue. Thus, for example, foreign coffee of a good quality is now worth 61s. 4d. per cwt. in bond, before any duty is paid; if to that price we add the duty of 56s. to which it is subject, the price to the consumer is then increased to 117s. 4d. per cwt., and colonial coffee of the same quality will be equally worth the same price, but being subject only to a duty of 37s. 4d. in place of 56s., it will command a price of 80s. per cwt. without the duty, while the foreign coffee of the same quality sells only at 61s. 4d. The consumer pays the same price for both, while in the one case 56s. of that price goes to the revenue, and in the other only 37s. 4d., the difference of 18s. 8d. being retained to the sole benefit of the favoured producer, and operating as a protective tax equally paid by the consumer, but adding nothing to the public exchequer. It may be an instructive inquiry to see how these respective duties affected the interests of the revenue and the consumer on the quantities of coffee consumed last year.

The cost to the public of the coffee consumed in 1844 may be thus stated:

£
174,688 of colonial, at a price in bond of 80s. 0d. for duty	117s. 4d. £326,752
105,626 of foreign, at a price in bond of 61s. 4d. for duty	117s. 4d. £323,919
280,314 total, at 117s. 4d. per cwt.	£ 1,644,506

Of this sum, £21,985, represents duties, and 1,622,521, the price paid to the importer. Now, looking to this statement, it must be apparent that if the duties were equalised the prices in bond must also be equalised; that if the duty upon colonial coffee were raised to the same rate as that charged on foreign coffee, the price to the consumer would still be the same, while the revenue would be enriched by all the difference; or if the duty on foreign coffee were reduced to the same rate as that chargeable upon colonial coffee, the price to the consumer would be reduced upon the whole quantity by all the difference, while the revenue would only suffer a reduction on the portion of foreign coffee on which the higher rate of duty is now paid; and in all probability the additional quantity consumed at the lower price would make up for the reduction of the rate of duty.

It is essential that the exact operation of these duties should be made as clear as possible. Let us suppose the rates of duty equalised, and that now chargeable on foreign coffee reduced to 37s. 4d. per cwt., the same as is chargeable upon colonial coffee; the effect would be that in place of 117s. 4d., the present cost to the consumer, it would be reduced to 61s. 4d., plus the duty of 37s. 4d., or 98s. 8d. per cwt. Now then, suppose that the consumption continued only at the same rate, the gain to the public by the reduction of the differential duty would be thus:

Present cost of 280,314 cwt., at 117s. 4d.	£ 1,644,506
Reduced	1,362,891

Public gain 261,625
Against this gain, however, we must set off the loss which the revenue would derive from the reduction; thus:

Present revenue—Colonial coffee—174,688 cwt. at 37s. 4d. ..	£ 326,083
Foreign coffee—105,626 cwt. at 56s.	295,752
280,314	621,835
Reduced revenue at an equal duty, 280,314 cwt. at 37s. 4d. ..	493,819
Loss to the revenue	128,016

So that, while the revenue would lose 128,016l., by equalising the duties to the lowest rate, the country would gain 261,625l. by a reduction of price. But experience gives us evidence, and in no article more than in coffee, that the consumption even increases in a greater proportion than the price is diminished. But even supposing the same sum of money only should still be expended in coffee at the reduced price as now is at the high price, then we should find the following results on the interests of the consumer and the revenue. The sum of 1,644,506l., which is expended in the whole consumption of coffee at the present price, would, if the price were reduced to 98s. 8d. per cwt., give a consumption of 333,316 cwt. instead of 280,314, or an addition of 53,032 cwt. The account would then stand thus:

Cost to the consumer at the present price of 280,314 cwt., at 117s. 4d.	£ 1,644,506
Cost to the consumer at the reduced price of 333,316 cwt., at 98s. 8d.	1,644,506

Revenue derived, at present rate of 37s. 4d. and 56s. per cwt., as stated on 280,314 cwt. 621,835
Revenue derived, all at the lower rate of 37s. 4d., on the increased quantity of 333,316 cwt. 622,244

Gain to the revenue 419

Thus, in this view of the case, by the reduction of the protective duty to the lowest rate, the public, at the same cost, have the advantage of an additional supply of coffee of no less than 53,032 cwt., and the revenue gains, besides, the small sum of 419l.

But suppose the duties are equalised by raising the rate charged on colonial coffee to that charged on foreign coffee, then the price would still remain at 117s. 4d., and no material increase of consumption could be expected; still only 280,314 cwt. would be consumed at the present cost to the country. But, in that case, what would be the effect on the revenue? In place of the present amount, at the respective duties of 37s. 4d. and 56s., we should have a revenue derived from the same quantity, all at the higher rate of 56s. thus:

Revenue on 280,314 cwt., at 56s.	£ 781,878
Present revenue at 37s. 4d. and 56s.	621,835
Gain to the revenue	163,043

Thus, by the equalisation of the coffee duties and the abolition of the protective principle, one of the three following results must take place:

1st. If the duties were equalised to the lowest rate, and the same quantity of coffee were still only consumed, the country would gain in reduced price the sum of 261,625l., while it would lose by reduction of revenue 128,016l., leaving a balance in its favour of 133,609l.

2d. If the duties were equalised to the lower rate, and the same sum of money expended in the article as at present, the reduced cost would furnish an additional quantity of no less than 53,032 cwt., at the same cost, and the revenue would at the reduced duty gain 419l.; while the dealers, merchants, and shipowners, would have the advantage of, and additional profit on, that increased amount of business.

3d. If the duties were equalised by raising the lower to the higher rate, then the cost and consumption of coffee would remain stationary at the present rate, but the revenue would derive a clear gain of no less than 163,043l.

SUGAR DUTIES AND THE REVENUE.

But the injury to the consumer, and the loss to the revenue, consequent upon a system of differential duties, are even more clearly shown in the case of the sugar duties. For the purpose of examining the operation of these duties, we will consider them under the great modifications of last session. By the law of last session the duties were reduced to 14s. per cwt. on colonial sugar, and to 23s. 4d. per cwt. on foreign free labour sugar. Under these reduced duties, the consumption has rapidly increased, but still it has been very evident, during the whole year, that the quantity has been materially lessened by the operation of the protective duty of 23s. 4d.

By the Board of Trade official tables of imports, published in our last supplement, it appears that the consumption of the year up to the 5th of November, had been 4,174,270 cwt. of colonial sugars, and 53,843 cwt. of foreign sugar. The cost of this quantity of sugar to the consumer may be thus stated:

Cwts.	£
4,174,270 colonial sugars, at 40s. per cwt., in bond, is ..	8,348,540
Duty on ditto, at 14s.	2,921,989
53,843 foreign sugar, of equal quality, at 30s. 8d. ..	11,270,529
per cwt., in bond	82,558
Duty on ditto, at 23s. 4d.	62,816
4,228,113 Total, at 54s. per cwt.	11,415,903

In this case, as in that of coffee, it must be plain that as long as both duties are operative, the higher rate added to the price of sugars in the open markets of the world must retribute the cost of all sugar to the consumer. As long as foreign sugar at 30s. 8d. per cwt., in bond, pays the duty of 23s. 4d., the price to the consumer cannot be less than 54s. per cwt.; and sugar of the same quality, of colonial growth, will command the same price, but being subject only to a duty of 14s., the importer will receive at the rate of 40s. per cwt. for colonial sugar, while foreign sugar, of the same quality, sells only for 30s. 8d.

The same reasoning applies in the case of sugar, as we have already used in that of coffee; and we will, therefore, without again repeating it, merely examine what would be the effect of an equalisation of the present modified duties. If these duties were equalised by reducing the highest to the lowest rate, then foreign sugar worth 30s. 8d. in bond, would be sold at 44s. 8d. to the consumer, including the duty, and colonial sugar of the same quality would only command the same price. A reduction of 9s. 4d. per cwt., (the amount of the existing difference of the duties,) would thus take place in the entire quantity of sugar consumed in the kingdom. For the ten months ending the 5th of November, that quantity was 4,228,113 cwt., and the effect of that reduction of price may, therefore, be thus stated:—

Cwts.	£
Present cost of 4,228,113 sugar, at 54s.	11,415,903
Reduced cost of ditto at 44s. 8d.	9,442,746

Gain to the consumer 1,973,117
But against this must be placed the loss to the revenue consequent on a reduction of the highest to the lowest rate of duty; which may be thus stated:

Cwts.	£
Present duty 4,174,270 sugar, at 14s., is 2,921,989
53,843 — at 23s. 4d. is 62,816
4,228,113	2,984,805

Reduced and equalised duty 4,228,113 sugar, at 14s. .. 2,959,678

Loss to the revenue 25,127

Thus while this reduction of duty would sacrifice only 25,127l. of revenue the public would gain by a reduction of price no less than 1,973,117l. But, as in the case of coffee, there can be no question that this reduction of price would promote a greatly increased consumption, and more than equivalent to the reduction of duty. But suppose that only the same sum was continued to be expended on the article at the lower price, that is now at the present price, then the consumption in place of being 4,228,113 cwt., would be 5,112,344 cwt.; being an addition to the present quantity of no less than 884,231 cwt., in which case the result of the equalisation of duty may be thus stated:

Cwts.	£
Cost to the consumer 4,228,113 at 54s. 0d. ..	11,415,903
5,112,344 44s. 8d.	11,415,903

Cwts.	£
Revenue at the present rates of duty of 14s. and 23s. 4d. on	4,228,113 2,984,805
Revenue at the reduced and equal rate of duty of 14s. on	5,112,344 3,578,640

Gain to the revenue 593,835

Thus, by an equalisation of duty and a reduction of price, assuming that the public would still expend the same sum on sugar as they do at present, they would obtain a quantity greater by 884,231 cwt. at the same cost, while the revenue would be benefited by the sum of 593,835l. But suppose the duties were equalised by raising the lower rate of 14s. to the higher rate of 23s. 4d.; in that case the cost would not be reduced to the consumer, but would remain as it now is, limited by the addition of the foreign duty to the price of foreign sugar in bond; and no material increase of consumption could be looked for. Still only 4,228,113 cwt. would be consumed at the price of 54s. per cwt. as at this time. But what would be the effect on the revenue?

Cwts.	£
The revenue at the present rates of duty on 4,228,113 is 2,984,805
The same at the higher ratio of 23s. 4d. would be	4,932,797

Gain to the revenue 1,947,992

So that again in this case, one of the three following effects would result from an equalisation of the sugar duties: 1st. If the duties were equalised by a reduction of the higher to the lower rate, and the quantity consumed continued only the same as at present, then the public would gain, by a reduction of price, a sum equal to 1,947,992l., while the revenue could only lose 25,127l.

2d. If the duties were equalised by a reduction of the higher to the lower rate, and the public expended only the same sum on sugar which they do at present, they would obtain for that sum an additional quantity equal to 884,231 cwt., while the revenue would gain no less than 593,835l.

And 3d. If the duties were equalised by raising the lower to the higher rates, the price of sugar and the amount of consumption would continue as at present; but the revenue would gain the enormous sum of 1,947,992l.

These two cases may be considered as fair examples of the operation of all protective and differential duties. They tax the consumer without enriching the State; they raise the price of the commodity without adding to the amount of the public revenue. So far from Free Trade, which seeks only to abolish protection and equalise differential duties, being inimical to the revenue, we have seen that in the case of coffee and sugar alone a sum equal to 2,111,035l. might be added to the public income, or otherwise given to the public in the advantages of a reduction of price, or of an increased supply at the present cost, by the equalisation of these duties; a sum, too, it may be remarked, larger than the entire amount produced from the whole remaining seven hundred and ninety-eight articles which, in addition to the ten enumerated, make up the number of articles on which the revenue of 1844 was charged.

There is, however, an exceedingly interesting branch of this inquiry connected with the numerous minor articles included in our tariff, to which protective duties less or more apply as to their effect upon the revenue, on the general industry of the country, and on the interests of those immediately engaged therein, to which our attention shall be directed on an early occasion.

INVITATION TO MR. COBDEN.—The Belfast Northern Whig says, "A strong desire has long prevailed in Belfast to have the honour and benefit of a visit from Mr. Cobden, the great apostle of Free Trade; and a number of the leading merchants, manufacturers, and others have resolved to invite him to a public dinner in this town, on some day before the meeting of Parliament. They are aware of the great demands on him elsewhere; but it is hoped that he will find time to pay us the requested visit. His presence in Ireland, just now, could not fail to be of the utmost public advantage. He would come upon no party errand, and would be received in no party spirit. Free Trade is not a question of Whig or Tory, Catholic or Protestant; it is a question of public justice and universal good; and it is in this spirit that he is invited, and in this spirit he would come, as come we trust he will."

HERTS COUNTY REGISTRATION.

On Monday last a public meeting of the members and friends of the Anti-Corn-Law League was held in the Town Hall, St. Alban's, for the purpose of hearing addresses from Mr. Falvey and Mr. Bontem, the active registration agent of the League. In consequence of the existence of a magisterial standing order against evening meetings, the meeting could not be held in the spacious Court House; and as the room in which it was held is not capable of containing more than about 500 persons, several hundred persons were disappointed in their desire to be present. Among the gentlemen present we observed Mr. E. Langridge, Mr. T. U. Blagg, Mr. Thos. Richardson, Mr. Joseph Bennett, Mr. Edwards, Mr. Syrett, Rev. N. Upton, and J. Champion, Mr. Buckingham, Mr. E. Harris, Mr. R. Gibbs, Mr. Hulk, &c. &c. The chair was occupied by Mr. C. H. Lattimore, of Wicenthamstead. At about half past seven Mr. Falvey entered the room, and was greeted with several rounds of hearty and enthusiastic applause. The chairman, in opening the business, observed that it afforded him much pleasure to preside at so influential a meeting. Its objects were of the most constitutional nature and of the greatest importance to the industrious and trading portion of the community. The Anti-Corn-Law League had patriotically determined to assist in extending the county franchise, and thus enable the electors to return three Free Traders to Parliament at the next election. At the conclusion of an effective speech he introduced Mr. Falvey, who was received with the most vehement applause. Mr. Falvey addressed the assembly in a most energetic manner for nearly two hours, and if the cheering, by which his voice was frequently silenced, can be taken as a criterion of the sentiments entertained by the large number of persons assembled, they were to a man persuaded of the truth and importance of the doctrines he enumerated. Mr. Falvey's allusions to the late protection meeting were most happy, and his facetious mode of exposing the cant and hypocrisy of the protectionists was acknowledged by the most unequivocal demonstration of delight. At the conclusion of his address Mr. Thos. Richardson rose for the purpose of moving the following resolution:—"That this meeting highly approves of the Anti Corn-Law League to increase the constituency of the county, and pledges itself to assist to the utmost in promoting that object." This was seconded by Mr. Joseph Bennett, and carried unanimously. Mr. Bontem then explained the plan which the League was pursuing in connection with the county registration, and in alluding to the charge made of faggot-vote making brought against the League by Lord Salisbury, he observed that on looking over the county register he found that the names of four sons of the late Earl of Verulam were on it, by virtue of a rent-charge granted to them out of a farm called "Bottom House." He explained that the League did not purchase property for the purpose of qualifying individuals. It merely endeavoured to bring the purchaser and seller together, and to induce all Free Traders to obtain the right of voting for the county. The population of the county was 157,000; there were 77,000 male inhabitants, and a constituency of only 5000! Mr. Bontem, also, mentioned that Mr. Halsey, the candidate for the vacant county seat, and a wholesale abuser of faggot-vote creators, was actually upon the register for a rent charge issuing out of the Gaddesden estate!! He also met the charge made by the Marquis of Salisbury, that the League made unfounded objections to county voters, and convinced the meeting that that body was infinitely more scrupulous than their immaculate opponents. Mr. Bontem concluded a brief but able address amidst loud cheers. Mr. Falvey then proposed a vote of thanks to the chairman, who briefly acknowledged the compliment; and after three cheers for Free Trade, the meeting quietly dispersed.

The address of Mr. Falvey has created a great sensation here; and as an evidence of the good resulting from the zealous advocacy of a good cause, we may mention that several of the electors who entered the room as decided enemies to the League and its doctrines, left it expressing their determination to become members of the local society.

THE COMMITTEE OF THE EAST SURREY FREE TRADE QUALIFICATION AND REGISTRATION SOCIETY, TO THE FREE TRADERS OF LONDON AND WESTMINSTER AND THE METROPOLITAN BOROUGHES.

FELLOW COUNTRYMEN,—We, Free Traders in East Surrey, want you to help us to drive monopoly out of our division of the county. You make no secret that you are going to return all Free Traders for your cities and boroughs, but that will be of little use if you allow the metropolitan counties to return monopolists. As the law stands you have as much right, and it is as much your duty, to qualify for counties as for boroughs; and, unless you do so, you might almost as well have done nothing. We, in East Surrey, are just in that position when individual aid is most valuable. Every additional vote is now of immense importance, for it stands a fair chance of being a casting vote. We are so nearly even with our opponents that, with an election on the present register, we should either just win or just lose; but as to the next register, the matter is in your hands. Look at the splendid example given to us by our friends in the north: Manchester and a few other towns have won South Lancashire; Leeds, Wakefield, and some neighbouring towns have put the West Riding of Yorkshire out of danger; and London and Westminster, with the metropolitan boroughs, have secured Middlesex. Is East Surrey, then, less fortunately situated? Cannot London and Westminster—cannot Marylebone, Finsbury, and the Tower Hamlets—cannot Southwark, Lambeth, and Greenwich—nay, cannot Middlesex, West Kent, and West Surrey, send as many Free Traders in East Surrey as they now send monopolists? If they will only send half as many, East Surrey will be as safe to win on the next register as Middlesex is on this.

But this must be done immediately—now. Every Free Trader who wishes to express an opinion at the next general election must have his 40s. freehold by the 30th of this month; the 31st will be too late. The whole cost of the best sort of qualification chest, because most secure and least troublesome, is 50s., including all expenses. This is the freehold ground rent, or rent charge. We don't (as the Herald says) we do, give people their qualifications; but we spare no expense of time or money in rendering every facility to those who wish to procure qualifications, and are ready to pay for them; and such persons can obtain full information on all points connected with the business by applying to Mr. Faulton, at the offices of the League, 67, Fleet Street; or to Mr. Russell, at the offices of this society, 82, High Street, Southwark. By order of the Business Committee,

ROBERT RUSSELL, Secretary.

AGRICULTURE.

FARMERS, LET THERE BE NO COMPROMISE.

It may suit the purpose of party politicians to promote some juggle which they term a compromise of the Corn Law question. Mortgaged landowners who fear to look at their real position may desire some compromise; and the owners of land who wish to retain a dependent tenantry may still seek to perpetuate the delusions of the Corn Laws under some new form of alleged compromise. But has the tenant farmer any community of interest with such men? Has he not rather been too long the victim of the uncertainty caused by their narrow and selfish legislation? Does he not above all things desire a speedy and final settlement of the question? Go wheresoever we may amongst farmers, we find this one sentiment prevalent. "Be it for good or ill, let us have the question settled," is the exclamation re-echoed at every market table in the kingdom. Now, there can be no other settlement of the question but a total repeal of all laws which restrict the free importation of grain. Compromise will be no settlement. The League will prevent that. The Leaguers have never deceived the farmers. They have told them from the first that if the Corn Laws did them all the service the monopolists pretended, yet those laws could not be retained because they were unjust, and injured the rest of the community. And the League did more: its speakers and writers invited the farmers' attention to the circumstances of their own business under a system of protection, and asked them whether farmers had not been injured rather than benefited by the Corn Laws? We have not flattered them, or pandered to their prejudices; we have not toasted them, as the "lion-hearted yeomanry," but, on the contrary, we have told them wholesome, though perhaps at times unwelcome truths. Let the tenant farmers contrast this with what they have heard from their protectionist landlords. Has not every effort and every promise, and every scheme of the monopolist landowners failed? And are the half frantic, half childish ravings, the threats and the promises, which now form the staple of monopolist speeches, more satisfactory to the tenant farmers than that which they have before heard from the same quarter? Now, we tell the farmers there can be, there shall be no settlement of the question but absolute, unconditional Free Trade.

In 1841, a majority of one hundred was elected to sit in the House of Commons, expressly to uphold the then Corn Law; and one of the very first acts of that majority was to modify the protective system, and remodel the Corn Laws. That was intended by Sir Robert Peel as a compromise. Did it settle the question? Not at all. From that moment the agitation of the League has been gathering strength; the facts have become more and more widely understood, until a public opinion has been created sufficiently powerful to overbear the power of the landed oligarchy, and to compel both the aristocratic parties of the State to give in their adhesion to Free Trade. Is this, then, the time when the question can be settled by compromise? Three years ago the League, representing the middle classes,—or rather, a section, though a large one, of the middle classes,—said, the compromise of 1842 shall be no settlement; and it was none. The League is now identified in principle with every statesman and every class of politicians who seek to influence the reason of the community. There is nothing opposed to us but the brute force of landlordism, and the passive resistance of a portion, and a daily diminishing portion, of the yeomanry of England.

We say now as we said in 1842, no compromise shall be a settlement. What chance is there of the League failing to upset any compromise which may be now attempted? For, let it be remembered, the League will be no party to any compromise. The monopolist majority in the Houses of Parliament may pass a statute intended as a compromise, but how long will it remain unaltered? Why, by the year 1847, at least one-third of the county seats in the House of Commons will be in the hands of the Free Traders. Let every farmer, then, who wants a settlement of the Corn Law question, oppose all compromise to the uttermost, for a compromise will be no settlement.

Of the few rational men who still linger in the protectionist ranks, there is not one who does not scout the idea of a compromise. Hear what Lord Worsley said in Lincolnshire on this subject:

"Something had been said about compromise. About a year ago he thought something like compromise might have been effected, but that day had gone by. There was at present only one ground for compromise, and that was a final settlement of the question, whereby agitation would be forever stopped. It was agitation on this subject that was doing all the injury, and the stopping of that was the only compromise that could be for a moment entertained. Some had supposed that it was the intention of Sir Robert Peel to propose a fixed duty with a descending scale, to go down gradually until it vanished altogether. That would not stop agitation. It would go on as violently as ever until the last shilling of duty was removed. It was also said that Sir Robert Peel intended to pay out of the consolidated fund the highway, county, and other rates, thus placing the manufacturers and farmers on an equality, as the former would not be relieved from the payment. He had never advocated this on the ground of the peculiar burdens on land, because if relieved of those it would not at all affect the Corn Laws."

Now this is very different from the vague and nonsensical jargon farmers commonly hear from protectionist landowners. Lord Worsley tells them there can be no compromise, and he urges them to resist any alteration of the present Corn Laws. But what hope does he give them of the success of such resistance? The following account of the break up and reconstruction of Sir Robert Peel's ministry, given by Lord Worsley, a political opponent of the Minister, proves that the chance of successful resistance to any change in the Corn Law is small indeed:

"A rumour had prevailed that it was the intention of the Government to open the ports for six months; that intention, it appeared, had been abandoned. There was no doubt, he thought, that the subject that broke up the administration was the Corn Laws. The common rumour was, that some of the members of the Cabinet would not agree to their repeal; 24 hours, it was said, were given to the Premier to reconsider his determination, but he was inflexible. Then Lord John Russell came in, and from circumstances which had already been fully before the public, failed in forming a ministry. Sir Robert Peel carried his point; those who opposed him came round to his views, finding that he would never give up his opinions, having arrived at them after due deliberation. He believed that Sir Robert Peel seriously thought that the course he had adopted was for the benefit of the country. He had a majority of 90 in the House of Commons at his back, with the House of Lords at his call, and he would not, therefore, have broken up his Government on slight grounds, nor would he have again accepted the reins of power without being fully convinced that he would be enabled to carry his views into effect."

Mr. Christopher, Lord Worsley's colleague, was less explicit, and "could not imagine what could prompt a Government to come forward and propose either a modification or repeal of the laws relating to corn." Now, considering Mr. Christopher was Sir Robert Peel's pilot balloon on the occasion of his last "modification," this assertion implies a wilful blindness to all that has been passing around him.

The farmers, too, are speaking out on the subject of compromise in many places. Thus, at the meeting of the Wiltshire "Protection Society," held at Devizes last week, where the squires indulged in their now usual ambiguities, Mr. Ferris, a tenant farmer, said the "question was now one of protection or no protection;" deprecated the pretence of not prejudging the intention of the Prime Minister with respect to an alteration of the Corn Laws, and urged the meeting to support the present law. He then added:

"He was in the habit of riding a great deal about the country, and he found that the general feeling which prevailed was, that the farmers would rather have a Free Trade at once than that Sir Robert Peel should go on frittering away their protection till they had not a shilling left."

And Mr. Stratton, another farmer, spoke to the same effect, saying:

"I think that, although Sir Robert Peel has said nothing, he has done a great deal which is calculated to excite alarm for our interests, by resigning the Government without stating any cause; and I think I state the sentiments of the majority of the agriculturists when I say, we would rather be without a protection altogether than have a constant succession of 'let-downs,' which are ultimately to end in Free Trade. (Hear, hear.) If we are to have Free Trade, let us have it at once. At all events, let us know upon what we are to depend."

And these gentlemen are quite right, as farmers, in saying, "If we are to have a Free Trade in corn, let us have it at once,—let us know upon what we are to depend."

And that we shall have a Free Trade in corn, no man in his right senses can doubt. And the same sentiments are expressed wherever the real tenant farmers take part in the proceedings of Protection Societies. But in most of such meetings the only actors are landlords, and their agents and bailiffs, clergymen, and the hangers-on of the aristocracy, while the farmers present are passive and not unfrequently disgusted spectators.

A HARD BARGAIN.

We don't profess to be in the secrets of the cabinet, or of the Duke of Richmond; but judging of the present from the past, and putting "two and two together," we think that the late Chichester meeting proves that the Duke of Richmond is seeking to force his last remaining brother—the too notorious Lord William Lennox, he of the "worst verses over zeed"—into the service of the country; that Sir Robert Peel deems this a hard bargain, a very hard bargain; and that all the artificial steam, which is merely smoke, of 17, Bond Street, is got up to induce the Premier, for the sake of a quiet life, to submit to this extreme and humiliating acknowledgment of Richmond power. However, we are the more convinced that some great Lennox movement is contemplated from the following passage in a leading article of the Morning Post, wherein the threat, the awful threat, to unmake the ministry, which the Duke of Richmond uttered just before he got the last place for a brother, is again shadowed forth editorially. These are the fearful words—the Richmond denunciation; hear it, Sir Robert, and tremble:

"It is really too bad—utterly scandalous and disgusting, in our opinion, that Sir Robert Peel, knowing the rumours which are afloat, and the opinions which are generally received, as to the projects which his Government has in view, should yet do nothing whatever towards the satisfaction of his Parliamentary supporters, but treat them as though they were a set of half-witted persons, or children, whose only concern with Government measures was to assent to them when proposed. Our sense of the insolent contemptuousness of such a mode of Government is lost in our anxiety for the consequences to which such folly must lead. For after all, Sir Robert Peel is the Government only because his supporters suffer the thing so to be. If he will offensively persevere in forcing upon general attention that he aspires to be the Government in right of his own superiority, and to make use of his supporters as an absolute sovereign does of his servants, of course the end must be a revolt. He must be taught to know his true position, and to learn that, though he may have all Manchester with its high intellect and its polished manners to back him, he can do nothing in the political government of this country except by and with the consent of the Lords and Commons in Parliament assembled."

Probably nobody knows better than Sir Robert Peel the price at which the consent of Lords and Commons—that is, the monopolist portion of the Lords and Commons—can be obtained. That he has found the Duke of Richmond's bargain one of the hardest and most unprofitable one he has had to make, will be readily believed.

THE CHICHESTER PROTECTION MEETING.

To the Editor of the Morning Chronicle.

SIR,—Your report, which I read this morning, astonished me. It must have been furnished by one of the duke's agents. There were not at any time, during the two hours the meeting continued, so far as I could judge, more than 1,100 persons present, 800 of whom were farm labourers. Nor is it true that the platform was crowded by a host of influential gentlemen or yeomanry of the county, for, with the exception of Mr. Hasler and Mr. Prime, there was scarcely a man of mark among them. The rich farmers, men who could afford to have an opinion of their own, were not there.

Nor is it true the meeting had been announced only a few days before it was held. The note of preparation had been long and long. Handbills informed the public a fortnight ago that the meeting would be held in the Council House of the Corporation. Afterwards other bills were issued, changing the place of meeting to the Corn Exchange. It is not, therefore, a "great fact," but a great falsehood on the part of your correspondent to say the meeting had only been advertised from the preceding Saturday.

But, why, at the eleventh hour, was the place of meeting altered? More reasons than one might be assigned. But let one suffice,—to prevent opposition. The Corn Exchange is private property, and men can do as they like with their own. The platform was so constructed that it could be gained by a private entrance at the back, and in the space below there was neither stool nor chair, nor anything to be seen by which a person might elevate himself so as to be either seen or heard by the meeting. Most effectually did the duke and his tail protect themselves. They evidently understood the principle of protection.

Nor is it true that many of the inhabitants of the city were present. Mr. Freeland, the duke's legal adviser, with a few other gentlemen, and a number of clergymen, were on the platform; but at no one time did the meeting, I believe, contain 100 Chichester men. There was nothing to attract them in the character of the meeting; and the 800 farm-labourers in front of the platform prevented the citizens who were there from hearing, had they been disposed to listen to the trash of the landed orators—for such were the speakers with but one or two exceptions. They were not tenant farmers. Such was the noisy and confused state of the meeting, that though I was near the centre of the hall for a considerable time, listening to the chairman and other speakers, not one sentence reached my ear, and frequently not even the sound of their voice. Such dumb show I never before saw; and such a farce of a meeting was never before played within the city walls.

The 800 farm-labourers had presented a fine audience for an Anti-Corn-Law Leaguer to address, had it not been for the system adopted to prevent any one being heard but those of the duke's party. The labourers themselves would have been delighted with an address from a member of the League. When I found it impossible to hear anything from the platform, I amused myself by talking with the labourers; learning from their own lips that they would like to see the Corn Laws repealed, though they dare not say so to their employers; and that they were paid for being present at the meeting.

That you may have some notice of the packed character of this protection meeting, observe an incident or two which happened there. A poor fellow of the name of James Constant, employed to distribute bills in the meeting to the labourers, was kicked out of it by a constable of the name of Robert Pasco, whom the Times designates as "the man who does the Duke of Richmond's dirty work." Another individual, not able to suppress his indignant feelings, called aloud for Free Trade, was ordered to hold his tongue by the same Mr. Pasco, on pain of being turned out; and when the honest fellow was not to be intimidated, six or seven of the labourers were summoned to put him down by the united strength of their lungs. Then came the conflagration of the Times, which you have already noticed. Such was the wretched character of the meeting. At its close I was anxious to see how the duke would be received by the people outside. Not a hat was raised to him, nor a cheer given. He looked pale and bad. His carriage was at the gate, and he was quickly on his way to Goodwood. Thus ended the protection meeting, which was protected by a body of labourers eight hundred strong, under the command of Mr. Pasco.

Should you think the above worth publication it is at your service; and I am, sir, your constant reader,

WILLIAM MALDON.

East-street, Chichester, opposite the Corn Exchange, Jan. 3, 1846.

THE REVENUE.

The usual quarterly statement of the Public Revenue has been looked for with more than usual anxiety, in consequence of the reports of improvement which had previously been set afloat. Inasmuch as there is a large surplus, the state of the public finances must be regarded as satisfactory; and it will enable the Prime Minister to meet Parliament with the blindest expression of complacency. As compared with the corresponding quarter or 1845, however, the only improvement is under Excise, Stamps, and Post-office,—an increase amounting altogether to about 350,000*l.* We are afraid that the apparent activity of business indicated by the latter two items must be ascribed chiefly to the reckless expenditure during the railway-shares mania. The decrease under Customs amounts to more than half a million, but is not greater than might reasonably have been calculated upon as the consequence of the remission of duties and the changes in the Tariff. The increase under Miscellaneous, of 360,281*l.*, is derived chiefly from (we believe) the last instalment of the Chinese ransom or indemnity. But for this windfall, instead of having a net increase upon the quarter of 95,105*l.* there would have been a considerable net decrease upon the quarter, and a still larger net decrease upon the year. The diminution under the head of Customs, on the year, amounts to nearly two millions and a quarter; to set against which, there is an increase under Stamps and Miscellaneous, amounting to rather more than a million. Under Excise, there is a very slight improvement,—only 17,000*l.* on the year.

(From the Liverpool Albion.)

We are happy to find that, at length, a day has been finally arranged for holding a meeting, in Liverpool, to give the merchants and traders of this great community an opportunity of uniting with the sister town of Manchester in a tangible expression of their opinions of the impolicy and iniquity of the corn and provision laws. It was at first intended that the meeting in aid of the great League Fund of a Quarter of a Million should be held on Wednesday next; but, as the numerous engagements of Messrs. Cobden, Bright, and Wilson prevented them from accepting the invitation sent to them to be present on that day, the meeting was deferred till Friday, that their presence might be secured. We do not apprehend that there exists any necessity now for an exposition of the principles of Free Trade, or the adduction of any arguments to prove the injurious tendency of commercial restrictions, and this is not the object which these great leaders of the cause now have in view in attending the "Quarter of a Million Fund" meetings in various parts of the kingdom. Free Trade has ceased, in nearly all the boroughs of the empire, to be a question for discussion. It is, rather, a great admitted principle to be wrought out. Men do not now require (commercial men, at least) to be convinced of its importance, but to be stimulated and excited to make a great effort for its immediate triumph. The danger of failure comes now from an opposite quarter to that in which it was once to be apprehended. Some years ago the difficulty was, to move the mercantile classes, who were convinced of the importance of a change in our commercial policy, to make any effort to bring it about because of the apparent hopelessness of the achievement; now the thing to be feared is a supineness which excuses itself by the plea that the work is done, that Sir Robert Peel is sure to propose and carry the repeal, and that further exertion is useless expenditure of time and money. This feeling, which we are afraid exists to a considerable extent, is the principal thing which the Free Trade party have now to fear. Men are so apt to form their views of the state of every question from the feeling which prevails upon it in their own locality, that they forget that they form, after all, but a section, and it may be, an insignificant section, of the whole community. The mercantile classes may be, and we believe are, all but unanimous on the subject of Free Trade; but among the agricultural and landed interest there is still a vast majority stupidly and blindly bent on the maintenance of the present restrictive system, apparently incapable, from habit and education, of comprehending the ruinous influence it has produced, and is still producing, on themselves as well as others. This party, though insignificant, nay, even contemptible, in point of talent, and which, according to the poetical and antiquated axiom, ought long ago to have been defunct, for as the dramatist says,

"Time was,

That when the brains were out the man would die"

is still so formidable in numbers, rank, and influence that, should a strong, decided, and resolute demonstration not be made by the people generally, and by the mercantile and monied classes in particular, they will be able to retard the settlement of the question, and so to modify the measure of the Minister as to make it fall very far short of what will alone satisfy the country, namely, the total and unconditional repeal.

It becomes, then, the duty of the merchants of Liverpool, whose weight with the legislature is second to that of no other commercial body, as a matter of policy and ultimate economy, to give to the present movement all the impetus which can be given by a subscription commensurate with the importance of the question, and such as will not disgrace them by contrast with that from any other part of the empire. While, however, we would urge the duty of liberality upon all whose means permit them to aid the movement, we would have them to remember that they are giving a double blow to monopoly by attending to the not less important duty of qualifying as county electors. They are thus providing beforehand for ultimate success, should Sir R. Peel now disappoint them; and if, before they have the opportunity of exercising the power thus obtained, the question should be settled, they will not have occasion to regret the possession of a voice in the county elections, since Free Trade is not the only good thing the people are in need of from the Government.

The funeral of the late Amos Swaisland, Esq., (well known for his Free Trade principles,) whose untimely death, which occurred on the 1st inst., spread a gloom over the inhabitants of Crayford and the surrounding villages, took place at Crayford, on Wednesday, the 7th instant, amid evidences of the sincerest grief of the whole population; many of the most respectable inhabitants of the place, the whole of the numerous operatives of all kinds, and many from the adjoining print-works, amounting to upwards of 300, habited in deep mourning, accompanying the mourners to the place of interment, to pay a tribute of their esteem for the many public and private virtues which adorned, in so eminent a degree, the short life of the lamented gentleman.

REGISTRATION APPEALS. COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.

EASTERN DIVISION OF GLOUCESTERSHIRE.—BISHOP, Appellant, Cox, Respondent.—Case.—At a court held for the revision of the lists of voters for the above county, the appellant objected to the name of George Woolford being retained on the list of voters under the following circumstances:

The objector, who resided at Cheltenham, delivered a notice of objection in the proper form to the voter and overseer of the parish, which notice bore the Manchester post-mark of the 24th August, 1845. It was proved that in the ordinary course of post these notices could have been delivered at their destination some time on the following day. The notices were not delivered until the 27th August. It was objected, on the part of the voter, that the objector had not given "the notices" required by the statute 6 Vic. cap. 18, s. 7, in due time, either to the voter or to the overseers. The revising barrister retained the names upon the list, together with 19 others. The question for the opinion of the court was, whether, under the provisions of the 6 Vic., cap. 18, s. 7, the notices were given in due time? If they were of that opinion the names were to be expunged; otherwise, to be retained.

Judgment.—Dec. 23.—(CHIEF JUSTICE TINDAL, now delivered the judgment of the court as follows:—In this case, which was an appeal from the decision of the revising barrister for the eastern division of the county of Gloucester, the question reserved by him for the opinion of the court was, whether the notices of objection to the party claiming the right to vote, and to the overseers, were sent in due time? The notices were properly addressed in point of form, and duly delivered to the postmaster in such time as by the ordinary course of the post they would have been delivered at the places to which they were respectively addressed some time in the day of the 25th of August; but in point of fact they were not delivered at such places until after that day, so that the question is limited to the sufficiency of the notices in point of time. Two questions are raised on the case before us, one with respect to the notice to the party objected to, and the other with respect to the notice to the overseers. We first consider the case of the notice to the party objected to. The Act 6 Vic. c. 18, by the 7th section requires the notices of objection to be delivered on or before the 25th of August; and in the 100th section it is enacted in the case of notice to the person objected to, that it shall be sufficient if the notice shall be sent by post, free of postage, directed to the person, to whom the same shall be sent at the place of abode described in the list of voters; and whenever any person shall be desirous of sending such notice of objection by the post, he shall deliver the same, duly directed, open, and in duplicate, to the postmaster of any post-office where money orders are received or paid, within such hours as shall have been previously given notice of under such regulations, with respect to the registration of such letters as shall be made by the postmaster-general. The Act then directs that the postmaster shall be paid a fee for registration, that he is to compare the notice and the duplicate, to forward the one, and to return the other to the party; and it provides that the production of the stamped duplicate by the party who posted such notice shall be evidence of the notice having been given to the person mentioned in the duplicate on the day on which the notice would by the ordinary course of post have been delivered at such place. It was argued on the part of the respondent, that the true construction of this section was that it should be sufficient if the notice was effectually sent, that it should be delivered; and there is no doubt this would be sufficient, if it meant at the same time what is necessary under this provision, which is a very special one, in order to make such a delivery sufficient, for there is no doubt that any sending and delivery by a servant or clerk in which the notice came to the voter would be sufficient by the 7th section. It is, therefore, evident the same proviso is not to be compared with section 100 as the mode of dealing with the notice, which is so carefully provided for. The notice must be posted, with a correct description, and sent within certain hours; the postage must be paid; it must be registered, and a fee for the registration paid; it must be delivered to the postmaster, open and in duplicate, compared and stamped, and the duplicate returned; and we think the meaning of the Act is this—when all these conditions are complied with, such a sending shall be a sufficient substitute for what the 7th section required to be done, that is, for giving the notice to the person objected to or leaving it at his place of abode. It was probably considered that the public convenience would be promoted by the present provision, that the advantage would greatly outweigh the inconvenience in some few cases which might arise from it. Indeed, in the case of leaving notices at places of abode, it may happen without any fault of the party objected to, that the notice may be lost or destroyed, or not delivered through the negligence of servants, and so never come to his knowledge. Yet, no doubt, this would have been a sufficient delivery; and perhaps a miscarriage under section 7 would be as probable an occurrence as the notice posted under the 100 section of the Act. If this is the true construction of that section, it follows that the objector has done all the Act requires him to do in order to enable him to call on the voter to prove his right whether the notice arrived or not, and whether it was prevented from arriving by the insufficient description of the place of abode, or by default of the post office; so that, supposing it was insisted with respect to the evidence of the stamped duplicate, that that was not conclusive, that was answered by proof to the contrary, as it was here. It makes no difference as to the right of the objector; and the fact, if disproved, is not material as to his right. The stamp on the duplicate was clear evidence of the posting on the 24th, and there was no contradiction as to the fact; so that whatever might be the consequence, if it had been shown in evidence that the notice was not properly posted on the 24th, and proved, still all the facts constituting a sufficient sending are proved without contradiction. It was objected, secondly, with respect to the notice to the overseers, that it did not come within section 100, that officers only serve the notices to persons objected to; and that section 101 did not help it, as that section says nothing of the duplicate being evidence; so that as there was no proof of notice to the overseers except the stamped duplicate, no notice was in effect proved. But it appears to us the clause in section 101, which provides that whenever by this Act notice is required to be given or sent to any person or persons whatsoever, or public officer, it shall be sufficient if such notice shall be sent by post in the manner and subject to the regulations hereinbefore provided with respect to sending notices by post, with a sufficient direction addressed to the person to whom the same ought to be sent, at his usual place of abode—affords us a sufficient answer to the objection. For it seems that the clause applies to most of the provisions in clause 100, as to notices to persons objected to, and includes the provision that requires the notice to be delivered open and in duplicate to the postmaster, and the postmaster to return the same, and the necessary consequence arises that the stamped duplicate shall be evidence of the time of the delivery; and as nothing appears, and no question is made respecting the address of the notice to the overseers, we think the notice to them falls within the same rule as the notice given to the party objected to. It appears therefore to us that each of the notices of objection were sent in due time, and consequently the decision of the revising barrister must be reversed.

BISHOP v. PHELPS.—Tindal, C.J.—This case turned upon precisely the same point, and consequently we give the same judgment.

FREE TRADE AND THE PUBLIC PRESS.

(From the Morning Advertiser.)

Mr. Cobden, and the chief speakers at the great Manchester meeting, have been summing up the vast machinery and increased power they possess, by their princely subscriptions, towards effecting the repeal of the Corn Laws. Let us see if there be not another power, perhaps equally great, moving to the same end, but not by the same machinery. The newspaper press of the kingdom is the public organ as well as the public instructor. The masses support those journals generally that mirror their own minds, hence the press may be said to reflect rather than create public opinion. Such being the case, it is an important, as well as a curious, inquiry, how far the press indicates public opinion upon the tremendous question to be brought before Parliament; or, in other words, what are the relative numbers of newspaper readers for or against the repeal of the Corn Laws, as proved by the last return to the House of Commons of the stamps issued to each. We may premise that, in adopting this "last return," which extended to the 31st of December, 1848, we are adopting a test of public opinion very far below that which a return made at this moment would furnish, if, as we consider, very likely, other Liberal journals have increased in circulation in a similar proportion to the Morning Advertiser. Taking the circulation, therefore, as it was just two years ago, we find the following results:—In the metropolis there are five morning papers, classed in the Parliamentary return as follows,—Advertiser, Chronicle, Herald, Post, Times. Now, three of those journals, viz., the Advertiser, Chronicle, and Times, are for repeal, and two of them, the Herald and Post, against it. The circulation was as follows:—

The three Free Trade morning journals per day	30,561
The two monopolist morning journals per day	8,327

Exhibiting a majority of nearly four to one of the readers of the Free Trade morning journals above the readers of the monopolist morning journals.

There are four evening journals, classed as follows:—Globe, Shipping Gazette, Standard, Sun. Three of these, the Globe, Sun, and Shipping Gazette, are for Free Trade; the Standard for monopoly. The following are the comparative numbers:—

The three Free Trade evening journals per day	7,416
The one monopolist evening journal	2,940

Exhibiting a majority of Free Trade readers of considerably more than two to one.

Of the weekly metropolitan papers, chiefly published on Saturday and Sunday, we find the following results:

Fifteen Free Trade weekly journals, per week (casting aside the units)	214,000
Five monopolist journals (casting aside the units) per week	20,000

Exhibiting a majority of Free Trade readers of more than seven to one!

This last list does not include Punch, which, notwithstanding its drollery, has rendered great and good service to the cause of the people, or THE LEAGUE and Economist,* which being the organs of THE LEAGUE itself, may be said to come within its machinery, rather than that of the separate and independent body of the metropolitan press, sustained by the public voice.

We find now this grand result:

The morning journals, circulated chiefly in London, though largely in the country, more than three to one in favour of Free Trade.

The evening papers, circulated chiefly in the country, though largely in town, more than two to one in favour of Free Trade.

The weekly journals, circulated about equally in town and country, more than seven to one in favour of Free Trade.

Of the provincial papers there appears to be nearly a similar result.

We have taken all which are at, or above, the circulation of the lowest London morning paper, viz., the Post.

There are eleven provincial papers, the circulation of which equalled, or exceeded that of the Morning Post, daily, viz.:—the Bristol Mercury, the Hampshire Telegraph, the Leeds Mercury, the Leeds Intelligencer, the Leeds Times, the Leeds and Stamford Mercury, the Liverpool Mercury, the Manchester Guardian, the Manchester Courier, the Manchester Times, the Newcastle Courant, and the Staffordshire Advertiser. The whole of these journals, save the Leeds Intelligencer and the Manchester Courier are for Free Trade. The result stands thus:

The nine provincial journals above the circulation of the Morning Post , for Free Trade, circulated weekly	49,749
---	--------

The only two provincial journals above the circulation of the Morning Post , that are AGAINST Free Trade, circulated weekly	11,347
--	--------

Exhibiting more than four to one of newspaper readers in the provinces, in favour of Free Trade.

We trust that these newspaper statistics will prove that the mind of the nation is working to the same result as the money and machinery of the League, and is, thank God, fully as encouraging.

* The Advertiser is here in error. The Economist, though a powerful exponent of Free Trade principles, is not connected with the League body.—ED. LEAGUE.

A meeting of the Free Trade Association was held at the Public Office on Tuesday last, when resolutions were adopted expressive of the necessity to attend to the registrations, approving of the effort of the League to raise the 250,000l. fund, and recommending that measures should be speedily adopted to procure subscriptions in this town and neighbourhood in aid of the fund.—Birmingham Gazette.

REVIEW.

Courrier de Marseilles, 17th Dec.—19th Dec. Marseilles: St. Ferreal. London: Parratt and Quin.

We have recently had occasion to notice the great progress which Free Trade opinions have made in France; and to praise the ability with which sound doctrines on commercial subjects have been advocated by some of the leading journals of Paris. We have now to direct attention to similar proofs of progress in the provincial press; and to call the attention of our readers to the exposure of the injurious effects of Corn Laws on the commerce and industry of France which has just appeared in that very able and influential paper, the Courrier de Marseilles. France has both a distinctive scale and a sliding scale; the frontiers of France are divided into four classes, and the duties on the importation of food vary according to the frontier at which it is received, and also according to the averages of certain selected markets. The highest rate of duties is levied on the coasts of the Mediterranean, and the lowest on the Belgian frontier; and the regulating markets are specially assigned to the several frontiers; those, for instance, that regulate the Mediterranean import are the markets of Toulouse, Marseilles, Lyons, and Gray. We shall not enter into any examination of the objections to the details of these restrictive laws; but shall rather extract some account of the evils which have resulted from the adoption of the pernicious protective principle.

The mean price which it was the object of the French Corn Laws to secure to the agriculturists (their "promised 56s. per quarter") is 21f. 6c. per hectolitre; but the mean price since 1830 has been 17f. 80c., and this has been found fully remunerative. Improvements in the means of communication and transport have so lowered the cost of production as to make the lesser modern price more remunerative than the higher rate of former time; and the consumers, at whose cost such improvements have been mainly effected, justly complain that the producers of corn have arrogated to themselves all the profits.

"But this high average for the pivot point (says the Editor of the Courrier) is injurious to the farmers themselves; the high price of corn drives French agriculture to look exclusively to the production of grain, and to neglect more natural and suitable cultivation. This exclusive pre-occupation in tillage compels France to expend sixty millions in the import of cattle, and thirty millions in the import of silk. If corn was allowed to fall to its natural price, the French cultivator would be obliged to pay more attention to his flocks and herds, or to the cultivation of silk, which would be a great advantage to the country."

"Commerce would derive great advantages from such a change. So soon as the import of provisions for home consumption would be permitted, Marseilles would become a vast granary, always abundantly stored. Thither would come all nations who had need of corn. Now there is no trade more lucrative, more productive, or more advantageous to a nation than the corn trade. In the first place, it rests on an immense basis; and besides, grain being a cumbersome article, it would give vast employment to a mercantile marine. Moreover, the manipulations it requires would greatly increase the amount of wages, and finally free import here would open large commercial marts for our manufactures in the corn-growing countries. Those from whom France purchased corn would take from France her wines, her cloths, her silks, and her soaps. No branch of commerce ever walked alone; it necessarily and inevitably terminates in reciprocity."

The intelligent writer from whom we have made this extract, has added many other arguments, which, however cogent, are too specially directed to the circumstances of France, to have any interest for English readers. There is one fact which he has omitted, but it is of some importance: French agriculture is at its lowest ebb in the provinces where protection is greatest, that is, on the shores of the Mediterranean; and has reached its highest perfection where protection is weakest, viz. on the Belgian frontier. We are glad that the Free Traders on the other side of the Channel are bestirring themselves; they have our best wishes for their success, and our best thanks for the aid they afford in the struggle against monopoly.

The Oxford and Cambridge Review. No. VII. London. Pickering.

This journal, the recognised organ of the Young England party, has put forth an able article temperately advocating the repeal of the Corn Laws, which report attributes to the pen of Lord John Manners. It is not customary to offer much criticism on what professes to be itself criticism; and we shall therefore only extract a few passages, which are indeed so forcibly expressed as to need no comment. The present condition of the protection question is thus stated:

"Is there, among the protection party generally, any desire to carry out their grand principle, or does the cry of 'protection to English industry' mean, in nine cases out of ten, anything more than a retention of the present sliding scale? And is not, therefore, the enterprise to maintain the Corn Laws an attempt to keep one portion, great and important no doubt, but still one portion, of an otherwise abandoned system, and that portion the one which, from the necessity of the case, is most exposed to the exciting abuse of demagogues, and the unreasoning enmity of mobs? No one could, or did complain, of the protection afforded to the cork-cutters of London, or the straw-plait makers of Hertford; a cry of 'cheap corks from Spain,' or 'cheap bonnets from Tuscany,' would never have aroused the passions or excited the hopes of any class of Englishmen—and yet, hardly with a struggle, their protection was destroyed; so likewise it fared with nearly all the other products of English industry, until the industry of agriculture remains well nigh the only one of English industries that is adequately protected against foreign competition. We do not say that this is wrong, or even practically unjust; but we assert that the fact being so, places the Corn Laws on an eminence, as it were, by themselves, exposed to the darts of an infuriated enemy, and unguarded and undefended by the other numerous smaller protective duties that heretofore were auxiliary to them. This, we think, is a very important consideration, and one that should not be lost sight of by the leaders of the aristocracy at this crisis."

The state of parties on the question and the chances of success are thus contrasted:

"We see the ranks of the opponents of the Corn Law increasing every day in number and influence; prime ministers, past, present, and to come, either openly joining that array, or desisting from opposing it; we hear of many converts to, of none, as we said before, from its ranks; and we behold an organised agitation at work throughout the length and breadth of the land to carry out its object, fraught with the gravest moral evils to the peace and stability of the empire. That is the picture on one side of the shield. Reverse it; what do we behold? Confidence? Unity of thought and action? A well-founded hope of an ultimate and lasting triumph to be followed by internal repose and harmony restored? Alas! none of these; but angry recriminations, just suspicions, the led mistrusting their leaders, the leaders deserting their followers, while no one ventures to say what no one is foolish enough to think—that permanent victory and tranquillity can result from a further protraction of the contest."

The abandonment of the Corn Laws is thus canvassed:

"This course, we believe, has found recommenders at protection head-quarters, and has the merit of settling the question for ever. It is either a bold and wise resolve, or a cowardly and stupid concession. Believing, as we do with the late Lord Spencer, with Lord Lyttelton, with Judge Coleridge, and Dr. Chalmers, that the land of England would not cease to be profitably cultivated, although individual cases of distress and hardship might occur, were the Corn Laws to be repealed—we shall not upbraid the leaders of the country party with treason or cowardice, if they adopt this course. Great dangers require great ventures, and the moral effect of the gentlemen of England coming forward, and doing of themselves what neither Russell, nor Peel, nor Cobden, could do without them, could not fail to be immense and salutary. But this step, if taken, must be taken with unblanched cheek and gallant bearing. It is the brave venture of men who, uncompelled, for their country's sake, leap, Curtius-like, into the gulf: there must be no murmuring, no complaining, no voting against the first reading of a bill, staying away on the second, and voting for the third: no unnecessary abuse of others, no petulant attempts to render the sacrifice, if it be one, as little gracious as may be."

Having shown that the compromise of a fixed duty is now unattainable, the writer proceeds to examine the efficacy of protectionist opposition:

"Should the aristocracy call upon the yeomanry and the rural population at large to maintain at all risks, and through all possible convulsions, the present Corn Laws, and govern the country on that basis? For this we apprehend to be the true statement of this alternative. A simply obstructive maintenance of the Corn Laws is no longer possible; it must be active, administrative. To turn one administration out after another, and not to find an efficient substitute for it, is not patriotism, but faction; inviting the attacks of foreign foes, and fostering the machinations of insincere allies. If Sir Robert Peel's Government proposes such an alteration in the Corn Laws as necessitates, according to the convictions of the country party, the overthrow by them of that administration, they must be prepared to step into the vacant seat of the stricken Peleton, and conduct the car of government through all the dangers and obstacles of the way. An obstructive policy, we beg Lord Stanley's pardon for reminding him of it, seldom benefits the country, nor redounds to the credit of those who pursue it, under any the most favourable circumstances. But applied to such a question as the Corn Laws, it is little short of insanity; and whatever truth there might be in the Duke of Richmond's famous boast, 'As we have made this government, so can we unmake it,' we are too secure of that nobleman's patriotism to fear he would act upon it, except under the above condition."

We earnestly recommend attention to this article. Though we dissent from some of the author's principles, and doubt the validity of several of his conclusions, he writes in too fair and noble a spirit to allow of our engaging in controversy on minor points of difference, when we are agreed on the practical result.

CORKE'S PATENT FIRING.—This admirable invention is an immense improvement on what may well be termed one of our greatest comforts of domestic happiness—a blazing fire. It is made up in squares of various sizes, perfectly clean to the touch, susceptible of being stowed away with impunity, and perfectly free from spontaneous combustion. It ignites immediately on being touched with a lighted match or piece of paper, thus superseding entirely the use of wood. It burns with a brilliant steady flame, and reminds us more of a flame given off from a log of pine, but is considerably more lasting. One block is sufficient to boil a kettle containing four quarts of water, or perform any office of cookery for which a bright blaze is required. An excellent fire, at a small cost, may at all times be kept up by adding a block or two of Corke's patent fuel to either cinders, small coal, or coke, which for heat and brilliancy cannot be surpassed. For the sick chamber, a desideratum important and essential will, for the purpose of kindling a fire, become the real servant's friend.

A requisition to John Wilson, Esq., of Dundee, is at present in course of receiving signatures, requesting him to stand at the next election, as representative of the Falkirk district of burghs, on Free Trade principles.

THE LEAGUE.

No. 121.—VOL. III.]

SATURDAY, JANUARY 17, 1846.

[3d.]

NOTICE TO THE PUBLIC.

LEAGUE FUND.

All Subscribers of £1 and upwards to the LEAGUE FUND will be entitled to, and receive, a copy weekly of this publication for twelve months from the date of the receipt of their subscription.

Subscribers of half-a-crown, and under £1, will have forwarded to them a copy of THE LEAGUE, containing an acknowledgment of their subscription; and it is requested that all subscribers will be kind enough to send their names and addresses to the offices of THE LEAGUE, Newall's-buildings, Manchester, or 67, Fleet-street, London.

N.B. As there is considerable risk in the transmission of gold and silver by post, parties wishing to forward small contributions to THE LEAGUE FUND are particularly requested to make their remittances by post-office orders.

The Council of the League would also suggest to their friends in the country the importance of transmitting their copies of THE LEAGUE newspaper, after perusal, to such parties (more especially farmers) as may be either hostile or indifferent to the question of Free Trade.

By order of the Council,

JOSEPH HICKIN, Secretary.

THE COUNTIES! MIND HERTFORDSHIRE!

The Hertfordshire election of last week is a most seasonable refresher—not that we are aware of anything of the kind being especially needed—for the zeal and activity of Free Traders, in rescuing the counties in general, and this of Herts in particular, from landlord domination. The thing could not have been better timed, or better in any respect, if the League itself had had the arranging of it. Had the Herts constituency, painfully conscious of its degenerate and humiliating condition, actually solicited us for an infusion of new blood, the request could scarcely have been preferred in more intelligible and moving language. The exposure which Hertfordshire has made of itself is a powerful, though silent, supplication to all true Leaguers and true men, to come and help it to independence and self-respect.

The utter prostration of everything like public spirit, evinced in the quiet and unopposed return—by the electors of a county containing a population of 157,000 Englishmen—of a young gentleman, of whom nobody knows anything except that he is the protégé of a little knot of squires, is perhaps the least striking part of the affair. It is not the nominee, so much as the nominor, that interests the public attention and excites the public wonder. The worst part of the humiliation which landlordism has inflicted on Hertfordshire, is the being compelled to accept a representative for itself, and to give a legislator to the empire, on the recommendation of a person of Mr. Delme Radcliffe's order of mind. We will not do Mr. Halsey the injustice of concluding, in the absence of evidence, that this individual's mode of introducing him to the electors was agreeable to his feeling; nor will we assume that it was any gratification to him to learn that he came up to Mr. Delme Radcliffe's standard of "a fit and proper person." But there can be no difficulty in knowing what to think of the intellect, the good taste, and the sense of propriety of those who judged Mr. Delme Radcliffe a fit and proper person to be their spokesman and representative on a grave and important public occasion. And we are equally well able to pronounce on the serf-like debasement of a constituency which could tamely tolerate such scandalous violations of common sense and decorum, as those committed by the delegate of Hertfordshire landlordism. That a man who cannot utter two consecutive sentences without a blunder, and whose notions of public decency permit him to compare Lord J. Russell to "Lucifer," and to call his political opponents "infernal," "unprincipled band of conspirators," men "devoted to the arch-enemy of mankind," and the like; that the author of that mad jumble of "monsters," "hideous heads," "giant strides," "hearths and homes," "railway trains," "dew-drops," "scum," "British lion," and "Jim Crow," should have been the person selected by the landlords of Hertfordshire to introduce their candidate to the constituency, is as audacious an insult to the people of Herts, and to the public of the United Kingdom, as could well be imagined. A county "election," may be a farce, in the judgment of the Herts squires; but it is neither decorous nor wise to make the buffoonery so very prominent.

It is now for the Free Traders of Hertfordshire, and of the metropolis—to which, by commercial dependence and local proximity, Hertfordshire naturally belongs—to determine that so degrading a spectacle shall never be exhibited in their county again; that there shall be an end of scandals so disgraceful to the people and their institutions; that the next time this important metropolitan county chooses a representative, the business shall be conducted with some attention to the rules of propriety and decency; and that the power of nominating lawgivers shall be wrested for ever from those who can put forward a person of Mr. Delme Radcliffe's style of mind and manners to represent them on a public occasion of weight and moment. We are glad to say, the work is already far advanced, and still goes bravely on—as may, indeed, be sufficiently inferred from the scurrilities of the Radcliffe eloquence. At this moment, by Free Trade qualifications purchased within the past few weeks, Herts is almost, if not altogether, our own. ONE EFFORT MORE—prompt, energetic, and united—during the few days yet left us, before the 30th of January shall close the year's campaign,—and the lords and gentlemen, who carry constituencies in the pockets, turn English counties into Gattons, choose our representatives for us over their wine and walnuts, and think a crazy mountebank a fit and proper person to nominate a lawgiver, may consider themselves relieved from all further concern with the election of members of Parliament for the county of Herts.

"FIGHTING THE LEAGUE WITH ITS OWN WEAPONS."

That portion of the public which interests itself in the affairs of the Central Society for the Protection of Agriculture, is probably aware, that the nobility and gentry of No. 17, Old Bond-street have just been rescinding that rule of their association which prohibited interfering in elections; and they have instructed their committee to appoint a sub-committee, for the purpose of devising the ways and means of interfering in elections with effect. Whether peers of the realm will be allowed to sit on the said sub-committee of interference, or to co-operate in the general object, we are not positively informed; but we should conclude, from the way in which the Duke of Richmond speaks of his snug little Old Sarum of West Sussex, that his Grace will insist on helping to look after his own property. No particular plan of interference has yet been advertised; but, judging of the intent of the new regulation from the language of protectionist orators, it seems quite fixed that landlordism is going to imitate the League, and get up a Qualification and Registration movement, the very fac simile of our own.

Now, is not this rich? Could the force of absurdity and self-contradiction further go? So then, after all they have been saying and shouting, day by day, for this many a long week, about the League's "unconstitutional machinations"—the League's "fictitious," "fraudulent," "fabricated,"

"false," and "faggot" votes—the League's "tampering with the elective franchise," "interfering with the independencies of Parliament," "invading the hearths and homes" of constituencies, and setting the "British Lion" quite beside himself with rage—these men are actually going to do the identical thing themselves, which, when done by the League, so outrages every constitutional and moral sensibility of Britons. It is some comfort, at any rate, to think the world has heard the last of all this trashy abuse of the League and its "machinations." The thing was getting stale.

Well then, gentlemen—if you will have it so, you shall have it so. No objection. Raise your Four Million Fund, promised by that funny person, Mr. Delme Radcliffe—who will start the thing for you with a donation of 1000*l.* (or of "half his fortune," if you prefer it)—and go to work. Qualify, qualify, qualify—register, register, register. Quite fair. The same law, the same constitution—the same registration courts, the same revising barriers, for both of us. You put the question in a very proper shape:—which of us two has the most men, the most zeal, the most money, and the most brains at command? Whether can you, or we, find the greatest number of unregistered Englishmen able and willing to invest 30*l.*, 40*l.*, or 50*l.* in land—and likely to keep in the same mind about protection, from now till the next general election? Which ever of us two can do this, wins the day. We are quite in love with the simplicity and equitableness of the test. Really, we never gave you credit before for being friends of universal suffrage. Nor had we the least idea, that when you talked of an "allotment system" for the poor, you meant fee-simple allotments and the franchise. We are delighted with the arrangement. It must be all legal, you understand. You will be strict with us—we will be strict with you. You will have your lawyers—we will have ours. You will keep off our fictitious and faggot votes—we will keep off yours. Thank you, gentlemen. Much obliged. We were doing well before; but this little stimulus will be a wonderful help. You know we always say, "Competition is the life of industry."

THE HONOURABLE W. F. COWPER'S "ON CONNECTION WITH THE LEAGUE."

At the recent Herts election, the above-named honourable gentleman, in the course of a speech intended as a "defence" of the League against the onslaught of Mr. Delme Radcliffe,

"Wished it to be understood that he had no connection with the League; and he candidly admitted that he disapproved of many of the acts of that body. He disapproved of their levying money for the avowed purpose of influencing elections, and he likewise disapproved of the presumptuous and foolish manner in which Mr. Cobden, and some other members of the League, spoke of the landed aristocracy of the country. While he entered his protest against these proceedings on the part of the League, he did not think they deserved what was said of them by Mr. Radcliffe. It was said that the League had an intention of attacking the church and throne; but he must say that he had never heard anything fall from any member of it showing that tendency, and he merely considered them as a club formed for a particular class."

So handsome and generous a defence seems to call for some return; and we feel that we cannot do less than gratify the honourable member's wishes, by giving to the important fact which he is so solicitous to have "understood," all the publicity within the power of our columns to command. We advertise the thing for him free of charge. Be it understood, then, by all Hertfordshire and all England, that the Honourable W. F. Cowper has "no connection with the League," and "candidly admits" that many of the League's sayings and doings are presumptuous and foolish, and such as he cannot but disapprove. At the same time, he thinks it only fair to add, that he has no idea that the League means mischief either to the Church or the Throne, or deserves the epithet of 'infernal.'

The notion of this Whig, or Whigling M. P., taking the pains to disclaim all connection with the League, by way of putting or keeping himself right with the public, reminds one of a pleasant little anecdote which we have seen somewhere. A young dandy of an ensign one day lounged into the shop of Hoby, the famous bootmaker; and after intimating his decided disapproval of the last pair of dress boots with which that accomplished artist had supplied him, called for his bill, and declared that all connection between him and Hoby was thenceforth at an end. Hoby of course had nothing left for it but to shut up shop, and immediately gave instructions to his foreman to that effect—"for Ensign So-and-so has withdrawn his patronage." We protest we feel this cut very much in the same way as the prince of bootmakers felt the loss of his patron. Our forlorn and repudiated selves are as nearly as possible in the case of the great but unappreciated Hoby. What will the League do without its Cowper? The League owes so much to the Honourable W. F. Cowper! The League expected so much from the Honourable W. F. Cowper! The League had been so accustomed to identify the Honourable W. F. Cowper's name with all its recollections of the past, and all its anticipations of futurity! The League has known the Honourable W. F. Cowper so long! This ensign (unattached) in the Whig camp has fought and won so many battles for the League! It is hard. At such a pinch, too—when the League positively does not know where to look for a friend!

In thus advertising our own humiliation, our sole comfort is that things do sometimes take strange turns in this world of mutation. And, as the young ensign (according to the most authentic edition of the story) eventually came back, under the compulsion of corns, to the disavowed and repudiated Hoby, and begged the man of boots to patronise him, we cannot finally despair of our Honourable W. F. Cowper. Possibly a time may come when the gentleman's "wish to have it understood that he has no connection with the League" may lose somewhat of its present importunateness. "Connection with the League" has been found, or fancied, of late, rather an advantage than otherwise to statesmen whose political standing is scarcely inferior to that of the gentleman who represents, under favour of a couple of peers, the populous and influential borough of Hertford. The League cannot certainly hold out any offers of direct service to tempt back, into a connection from which his refined taste shrinks, a statesman so completely independent of all popular support;—but we can at least undertake—if that will be any satisfaction to him—that the honourable gentleman shall not, at the next Herts election, undergo the mortification of having to "explain" why the popular party deem a contest inadvisable. Perhaps it may then be agreeable, as a matter of feeling, to the honourable W. F. Cowper, to find himself standing in the relation of patron to a party commanding the representation of his county. He well knows how to make the patron's office a sinecure.

THE PANIC AMONG THE PROTECTIONISTS.

This is genuine, at any rate. If the potato and famine panic must be confessed to have been a thing altogether "got up" by Sir Robert Peel, and the League, and the Whigs, and the newspapers, for "selfish and party purposes," there can, at all events, be no mistaking the entire sincerity and reality of the panic, that now agitates and bewilders the agricultural mind. Never was there such a constellation of horrors as that which now looms above the horizon of the "interest." Neither history nor fiction can match that depth, intensity, and complication of woes which, to the mazed and afflicted agricultural imagination, the treason of Peel and the machinations of the League are at present preparing for the wretched sons of the soil. No wonder that they kick. Even the gentle dullness of a Cleveland is all of a "quake and tremble." Although the Cleveland eyes are "dimmed with a veil," and are, we should apprehend, none of the clearest at the best of times, yet they can discern, in the present awful juncture of affairs, the elements of an unparalleled and well-nigh desperate peril, in which there is "much to fear, and little to hope." Better eyes, of course, see more; and the vivid fancies of some of our keener agricultural friends supply us with pictures of the calamities inevitably consequent on everybody getting a little more to eat, which cannot be surpassed for boldness of design, liveliness, and breadth of colouring. A loss is about to be inflicted on the "landed interest," which, according to the best calculations that Mr. Christopher is able to make, even the amazing and perfectly unheard-of sum of "TWO OR THREE HUNDRED MILLIONS OF MONEY" would inadequately compensate; and, as the gentleman plaintively inquires, "What Government could give the landed interest such a sum?" "Tens of thousands of farmers and landed proprietors, and millions of agricultural labourers are," as an Exeter orator observes, "ENTIRELY DEPENDENT ON THE PRESENT CORN LAW for that maintenance which they now derive from the soil"—the soil of England being, as is well known, absolutely worthless, in itself considered; and consequently, when the present Corn Law goes, they, the tens of thousands and the millions, will all go too, down into a fathomless ruin and an infinite despair.

It is needless talking of the fate of the institutions of the country, when, in fact, there will really, as one may say, be no country left. Yet the quick and fertile agricultural imagination cannot rest without going into all particulars. If no Corn Law, then no county-rate, no poor-rates, no fundholders, no taxes, no church, no aristocracy, no monopoly, no trial by jury even—it being a well-ascertained fact, that King Alfred was a staunch protectionist, and that trial by jury and the sliding scale are institutions of coeval date. As for the agitation against the Corn Law, it is a mere pretext for getting at the crown and constitution. The fact is, as was ably shown by a Mr. Haynes, at Dorchester, it is a REPUBLIC the League want, with "MR. COBDEN AS LORD HIGH PROTECTOR"—"they must make up their mind to that." Mr. Allix takes entirely the same view. "The question is not," says the honourable member for Cambridgeshire, "whether Sir Robert or Lord John shall rule the destinies of this mighty empire, but whether we shall have PROTECTION OR DESTRUCTION, A MONARCHY OR A REPUBLIC—for that is what it is come to now." There must be no mincing the matter. That's what it is, gentlemen, and so take your choice.

Of course, one cannot expect much in the way either of sense or manners from the victims of so passionate and uncontrollable a terror; We must make allowances. A panic like this cannot stand on ceremony. It struck us as rather hard of the chairman at Cambridge to be so strict about the behaviour of the poor creatures. What right had he to have "hoped that decent conduct would be preserved," and be "sorry to find himself mistaken?" This was being much too particular. How can men be expected to mind the proprieties in the presence of a representative, who as good as tells them to their faces that he means to give his vote for Peel and a republic? A reverend gentleman at Lichfield is more liberal, and postpones even the "moral virtues" to the exigencies of the monarchy and the constitution. The moral virtues are all very well in their time and place; but, says the Rev. C. Lander, "their moral virtues would be no good at all to them upon political occasions."

That all perceptions of the logical congruities should vanish in the presence of so astounding and paralysing a terror, is quite in the natural course of things. All colours agree in the dark; and the panic-struck and exasperated agricultural mind cannot, just now, discriminate the broadest and grossest of contradictions. It really would seem that, at these protectionist meetings, it does not signify what a man says on the economies of protection; one doctrine is as good as another; every speaker may flatly contradict, and be flatly contradicted by every other speaker, on the most vital and fundamental points of the protectionist theory—but it all goes down—the tolerant and oblivious auditors have their "cheers" ready for all and for all alike. At the special general meeting of the Old Bond Street people, on Monday last, this utter abeyance of the intellectual faculty produced some rather odd results. The Duke of Richmond was cheered for denying that the landlords "ever asked for protection to themselves from any selfish motives;"—and Mr. Christopher was cheered for the suggestion that protection is worth, to the "landed interest," at least "two or three hundred millions of money"—with a distant hint, that possibly the landed interest might not have objected to sell their protection at some such figure, only that they don't see who is to pay the money. Lord Beaumont was cheered for averring that the intent of the Corn Law is not "to enhance the price of corn and to diminish the supply of food," but rather to furnish the farmer with an inducement to "HELP THE PRICES DOWN as much as possible;"—and every speaker was likewise cheered, who said, or suggested, that low prices mean low wages, and are the poor man's greatest curse. The same noble lord was cheered when he derisively asked, "Where is the corn to come from?" in the event of the monopoly restrictions being abolished: and Messrs. Miles and Baker were cheered, too, when they answered, Why, from America, to be sure, where supplies are "prodigious," and "really without limit," and are actually at this moment shipped, "ready to sail for England." The company cheered his lordship again, when he said, that "so far as it was possible to COUNTERACT NATURAL CAUSES, it was done by the operations of the sliding scale," which was especially intended to prevent, or moderate "variations of price;"—and positively they cheered again, when a Mr. Ball expressed his sense of the impiety of such attempts at counter-acting nature, by declaring that "it was impossible, UNLESS THE CREATURE COULD BECOME THE CREATOR, to make any law that could prevent fluctuations in the price of corn." The agricultural wits are clearly in a conglomeration just now.

They will come right, however, after a while. We do not by any means give up the case of the agricultural mind for lost. There is still a glimmering of light athwart all this intellectual darkness. Even at the very height of their panic paroxysm, our landlords exhibit a few lingering, or incipient, indications of the good sense which their fever-fit has put in temporary abeyance. They keep clear of the public. They abstain from taking the sense of a public meeting on their nonsense. They know how they stand for intellect in the greatest of public meetings—they sorrowfully confess how "very little debating power" they have "to back their cause in the House of Commons." Better still; they scout trimmers, and half-way men and measures, and will hear nothing of "compromise" or "compensation;"—for, as Mr. Bankes well puts it, "Who will secure us of the permanency of that compensation or that compromise, when the security which was formerly given to us, as we thought, is about to be destroyed in little more than three years?" And, best of all, they are for FREE TRADE IN ALL THINGS, IF IN FOOD. They expressly vote, at their central meeting, that the "removal or diminution of the protection now afforded to the agricultural classes will be followed by the removal or diminution of every protective duty imposed for the benefit of the home or colonial producers."

This is hopeful. Mr. Cobden was right. Take away the key stone, and down comes the arch. By and by, they will be Free Traders all. What short work they will make with the sugar, and the coffee, and the silk, and all the other "interests," great and small! We confess we are impatient. We long for the consummation of the alliance thus prospectively and hypothetically tendered. With the Mileses and Tyrrells fighting in our ranks, and the great Richmond himself at our head, we shall make a clean sweep of the enemy in no time. We promise that nothing shall be wanting on our part to realise that preliminary condition, on which the Richmond overture of a Free Trade alliance is based.

NEW GROUNDS OF PROTECTION.

The Emperor who offered a reward for the invention of a new pleasure could not have been more sated with ordinary indulgences than we have been by the stale and oft-refuted sophisms which form the staple of the speeches at agricultural meetings, and the stock of materials for the maundering invectives of Mrs. Harris and Mrs. Gamp. It was, therefore, with feelings akin to pleasure that we saw the Morning Post announcing its discovery of "three great general grounds upon which the protectionist may take his stand." We hastened to master the three propositions, and were not a little gratified, though by no means surprised, to discover that, so far from supporting the principle of protection, they furnish the strongest arguments in favour of Free Trade. Let us examine them seriatim, quoting each in the exact words of our cotemporary:

"First—The healthful employment of the able-bodied labourers of the kingdom, which in manufacturing industry, as at present carried on, is plainly and notoriously impossible."

To decide this question, we must first inquire whether protected agriculture does afford healthful employment to the able-bodied labourers? Sustenance is an important element of health; clothing is another; a comfortable dwelling another. Before such a question can be answered in the affirmative, we must know something of the condition of the agricultural labourers in relation to food, clothing, and habitation. The Parliamentary reports, the letters of the Hon. and Rev. S. G. Osborne, and the speeches of the Wiltshire labourers themselves, at Goatsacre, afford abundant proof that in food the agricultural labourers are reduced to the starvation point; that their clothes are rags, and their dwellings scarce fit for the habitation of cattle. One of the worst results of the Corn Laws has been to discourage the application of capital, and consequently of labour to land. Our soil is not half cultivated; were its sources methodically developed, tillage would employ at least half as many more as are engaged in it at present. Reliance on protection has checked the spirit of farming enterprise and improvement; it has led to a system of cultivation which has entailed positive loss on the country, and which in the long run has not proved lucrative to those engaged in it. Free Trade would not throw any land out of cultivation, but it would enforce a change in the system of cultivation; it would compel the farmer to employ more capital, more cattle, and more labour. This has been so frequently demonstrated, that we need not enter into the examination of the relative capabilities of manufacturing and agricultural industry. Under the present system, agriculture does not afford employment to the labourers; and the remuneration it affords is too scanty to allow of the fulfilment of the conditions of health. Free Trade in agricultural produce is desired that the stimulus of competition may lead to the employment of more labour and a consequent advance to a fair rate of wages. The land of England has undeveloped sources which an artificial system has rendered unavailing. The Post speaks, or rather, it accuses Sir Robert Peel of having spoken of agriculture receding before manufactures. The Premier never uttered any such nonsense; a manufacturing population opens such a market for consumption, that the agricultural production for miles round is stimulated to meet the demand. The dairy farms of Lancashire, North Cheshire, and the West Riding of Yorkshire have assuredly not receded before mills and print-works; on the contrary, they have marvellously increased both in number and in the return of profits.

The Post is alarmed at the prospect of "cheap foreign corn, raised by cheap foreign labour, from cheap foreign land." Our cotemporary may banish such chimerical fears. Large production of any kind requires large outlay of capital; and there can be no accumulation of capital where land and labour are cheap. Dearthness of the instruments of production is quite consistent with cheapness of the article produced. If the English labourer be higher paid than the Polish serf, the value of his day's work to the farmer will be found to exceed that of the serf in nearly the same proportion. Skill is apparently dear when measured by its cost; but it will be found cheap when estimated by the quantity and quality of its results.

The next proposition is thus stated:

"Secondly—The greater security for subsistence which a country must have which grows the whole, or nearly the whole, of the food necessary for its population from its own soil, than a country which considerably depends for food upon foreign commerce, and supplies from foreign kingdoms."

Have the Corn Laws produced this security? Has London received anything like the same regular supplies, at the same steady prices, which used to be poured into Amsterdam, when Holland permitted Free Trade in corn? We seek in vain for evidence of this security. It is not to be found in bounties at one time and restrictions at another; in the ports thrown open in a moment of panic, and closed in a moment of confidence; in a variation of prices extending to the enormous range of 199 per cent.; in a crisis that compelled the Bank of England to become a borrower from the Bank of France; in the recurrence of a commercial, monetary and manufacturing crisis with periodical regularity every five or six years; in the constant shiftings of the balance between exports and imports; or in the alarm which spread over the country when the failure of the potato crop was announced. So far are the Corn Laws from affording security, that they render us dependent on the vicissitudes of the weather, and substitute for certainty the varying chances of the most variable of climates.

The Post dreads the appearance of a hostile navy intercepting our supplies of food. We might, according to the writer, be thus starved into submission, just as we might catch larks if the sky fell. Every reader of history must be aware that, in the heat of the late war with France, when national animosities were at the highest, we imported supplies of provision from that country, thereby affording the most signal proof of the unconquerable tendency of commerce to be regulated by its own natural laws of demand and supply.

The third and last proposition is thus stated:

"Thirdly—The means afforded by agricultural improvement for securing and nationalising capital, which might otherwise be wasted in unprofitable extravagance, or frantic speculation, or be carried away to foreign countries in the hope of profitable investment."

But the system which the Post advocates has prevented the application of capital to land; it has fostered the insecurity of tenure, which prevents the farmer from making any outlay save that which will produce an immediate return. It has led him to adopt exhausting systems of crops,—to make unprofitable outlay in one direction, and to abstain from judicious investment in another. "Protection" has been "the bane of agriculture;" it has induced capitalists to seek profitable investments anywhere and everywhere rather than in the improvement of the British soil and the development of its powers of production. Protection has rendered the growth of corn a gambling speculation, and each successive harvest a lottery, into which no prudent man dares to venture too largely. We seek the repeal of the Corn Laws in order that British land should be emancipated for the exercise of British industry, the investment of British capital, and the sustenance and profit of the British people.

We have now examined the three propositions set forward by the Morning Post; but we must be excused from following the writer in his tirade against political economists. It only furnishes an additional proof of the old maxim, that "men set themselves against reason so soon as they find that reason is set against them."

QUARTER OF A MILLION FUND.

LOCAL TREASURERS.

The Council have now been occupied some time in preparing for the collection of the above fund; and as one of the preliminary arrangements, they have to announce that the following gentlemen have undertaken to receive contributions in their respective neighbourhoods. The list will be continued from week to week until completed, and the Council earnestly hope that such of their correspondents as have not yet replied to their circular, relative to the appointment of the above-named officers, will do so immediately.

Andover—James Baker, Esq., Prospect House.
Ashton-under-Lyne—Thomas Mason, Esq.
Aylesbury—J. P. B. Payne, Esq.
Alnwick—Thos. Duncan, Esq.
Beaminster—Mr. Jos. Tite, Clenham Mill.
Bath—Admiral Gordon, R.N., Nelson-place, Norfolk-crecent.
Barnsley—J. S. Parkinson, Esq., Linen manufacturer.
Belper—Mr. J. W. Hancock.
Bromsgrove—W. A. Greening, Esq.
Bridgewater—William Browne, Esq.
Burton-on-Trent—J. N. Hanson, Esq.
Bristol—George Thomas, Esq., Great George-street, Park-street.
Barnley—Geo. Holgate, Esq., jun.
Bridport—J. P. Stephens, Esq.
Cleckheaton—Geo. Anderton, Esq.
Cambridge—Chas. Newby, Esq., 55, Regent-street.
Crediton, Devon—Edward Davy, Esq.
Crayford, Kent—Henry Gould, Esq.
Devonport—Samuel Raw, Esq., Market-street.
Dundee—Edward Baxter, Esq.
Doncaster—Mr. Thomas Milner.
Dunbar—James Wilson, Esq., Belhaven.
Dartmouth—Noah Clift, Esq.
Edinburgh—Messrs. Arch. Thomson and Co., 255, High-street.
Falkirk—John Smith, Esq., Writer.
Forfar—Mr. Wm. Sturrock.
Gateshead—Geo. Crawshaw, Esq.
Garstang—Dr. Bell, Chapel-street.
Glossop—John Kershawe, Esq.
Horsham—James Agate, Esq., North Parade.
Halifax—Mr. Thomas Denton, Old Market.
Hinckley—Mr. Thos. Payne.
Holywell—Thos. Mather, Esq., Glyn Abbot.
Idle, near Bradford, Yorkshire—Mr. Wm. Russell.
Inverness—Donald Frazer, Esq., jun.
Jedburgh—Geo. Hilson, Esq., Manufacturer.
Kendal—Geo. Charnley, Esq.
Kelso—Mr. Alexander Dodds, Grocer.
Knaresborough—Mr. Thos. Addynan, High-street.
London—A. W. Paulton, Esq., at the offices of the League 67, Fleet street.
Luton—James Waller, Esq., merchant.
Leek—Thos. Birch, Esq.
Lancaster—George Jackson, Esq.
Leicester—J. D. Harris, Esq.
Leighton Buzzard—Thomas Price, Esq., Newtown.
Leominster—Mr. J. V. Chilcott.
Maesteg, near Bridgend, Glamorganshire—Mr. Jos. Crayne.
Manchester—Mr. James Jones, at the offices of the League, 5, Newall's-buildings, Market-street.
Maidenhead—Mr. Thomas Woodcock, draper.
Maidstone—Richard Nelves, Esq., 109, Week street.
Maldon—G. W. Digby, Esq.
Middleton, near Manchester—Mr. Daniel Burton.
Newcastle-upon-Tyne—George Crawshaw, Esq., and Mr. Daniel Liddell, Carlisle-street.
Nantwich—Mr. Philip Barker.
Newcastle-under-Lyne—Mr. Elias Shaw.
New Mills—John Yates, Esq.
Oldham—John Platt, Esq., Hartford Ironworks.
Ossett, near Wakefield—Mr. Frank Fearnside.
Pontefract—Mr. W. Kidd, news-agent.
Potters, The—Francis Wedgwood, Esq.
Poole—G. R. Penney, Esq.
Reigate—Mr. Thomas Dann.
Ramsgate—Mr. Henry Scott, 57, Queen-street.
St. Columb—Mr. W. Brown, 3, Fair-street.
Scarborough—Isaac Stickney, Esq.
Sheffield—William Hargreaves, Esq., Merchant.
Skipton—J. B. Dewhurst, Esq.
Southport—Richard Johnson, Esq.
Stockport—Mr. J. Heginbotham, Millgate.
Sirlow, Monmouthshire—Rev. Richard Jones.
South Shields—Mr. James Bell.
Stourbridge—Mr. E. Baylie.
Swaffham and West Norfolk—Arthur Morse, Esq., Swaffham.
Swansea—Mr. Joseph Rutter.
Stroud—Mr. T. Parsons.
Tadmorden—W. Haworth, Esq., North View.
Tewkesbury—Mr. Benjamin Harris.
Wednesbury—Benjamin Round, Esq.
Wareham—J. Pike, Esq., Merchant.
Westbury—N. Overbury, Esq.
Wigan—Thomas Taylor, Esq., Spinner, and Mr. Thomas Wall, Bookseller.
Wirksworth—Mr. B. Street, White Lion Inn.
Wakefield—Charles Morton, Esq., Whitwood Colliery.
Whitechurch—Mr. Richard Thomas.
Weymouth—Mr. Charles Pope.
Westbromwich—J. Spittle, Esq.
York—Thomas Swales, Esq., Lawrence-street.

"AGRICULTURAL PROTECTION."—IMPORTANT MEETING AT FROME.—On Wednesday last, being the "Monthly Market Day," when a greater number of agriculturists than usual generally attend, a meeting for "agricultural protection" was held at the George Inn, for the purpose of adopting a petition to Parliament. At the appointed time W. F. Knatchbull, Esq., of Babbington House, arrived with a petition and resolutions, ready prepared to propose to the meeting for their adoption; ONE tenant farmer attended, who with the hon. gentleman waited about half an hour, when there being no increase of numbers, the waiter was dispatched to seek the attendance of others, and after some time had elapsed two other tenant farmers were induced to join them. No other farmers or "farmers' friends" attending, and patience being exhausted, this important meeting was soon broken up, but whether the resolutions were proposed or the petition adopted the public are not informed.—Wiltshire Independent.

STANRAE.—On Monday last a meeting of the inhabitants was convened by the Provost, in compliance with a requisition presented to him, numerously subscribed. The meeting was accordingly held in the Town Hall, on the above day, at two o'clock. On the motion of the Rev. Mr. McGregor, which was carried by acclamation, Bailie McDouall was called to the chair. Several resolutions were proposed in favour of the objects of the meeting.

THE GREAT "CENTRAL," No. 17, OLD BOND STREET.

(From the Times.)

The self-constituted champions of the agricultural interest, who are meeting here and there to defy the nation and Sir Robert Peel, are rather touchy gentlemen. Not a day passes but they make some complaint about sneers and abuse. Yet they persist in a course which they see to be ridiculous. They remind us of the half-witted creatures to be found unfortunately in almost every town and village, who never cease to go about with some grotesqueness of costume, or absurdity of gesture, sure to bring about them a swarm of juvenile tormentors; and who yet never learn to behave like other people. As regularly as twelve o'clock comes there is "Daft Charley," with his coat turned inside out, or his hat without crown, meandering and maundering about the town, talking to himself, and every now and then turning round to inflict a Partisan shower of impotent maledictions on the merciless crowd of pursuers, which gathers fresh numbers from every school and every factory he passes. He appeals for protection to the man of authority he meets on the road. "Why do you make yourself so ridiculous?" he replies. The poor simpleton either refuses to see his folly, or disowns his allegiance to the rules of common sense. The next day the same scene is acted over again; and again the humane passengers are pained with the spectacle of obstinate and therefore irremediable absurdity.

In the face of the greatest unanimity, the deepest determination, and the most imperious necessity of circumstances which the country ever saw, two or three noblemen and gentlemen are still holding out for their exploded bobby. This, too, they contrive to do with superfluous singularity. On Monday they held what they call "a special general meeting" at Willis's Rooms. The muster was imposing,—not less than 200 or 300; about as many as may be collected any day in the Strand, in less than fifteen seconds, by the downfall of a cab, or the overthrow of a truckload of groceries. Such was the convocation. The orators were in keeping with it. One duke, one lord, three M.P.'s, and three somebody-elses, all of the feeblest and stalest description, who have said the whole of their say fifty times over within the twelvemonth, and never had anything to say of their own worth listening to. Such is the staff of the army which undertakes to hold England in servile subjection. In vain does one look over their harangues for one solid point, one fragrant thought, one fresh allusion. One might as well look for pine apples in a turnip field, granite in the fens of Lincolnshire, or sugar canes in the parade behind the Horse Guards. Everything is dry, shrivelled, rank, and rotten. It is a bad store, and a worse show,—a bankrupt tradesman without the sense to conceal the barrenness of his resources.

"Meagre were his looks,

Sharp misery had worn him to the bones;
And in his needy shop a tortoise hung,
An alligator stuffed, and other skins
Of ill-staged fishes; and about his shelves
A beggarly account of empty boxes,
Green earthen pots, bladders, and musty seeds,
Remnants of packthread, and old cakes of roses."

They don't even make the most of themselves. The Duke of Richmond is made not only the first fiddle, but the only fiddle of his rank. The Duke of Buckingham is there, and sits very contentedly under his brother duke, hearing him develop himself to the fifteenth power of nothingness. Yet he has not a word to say for himself. We are not even informed that he had a cold. The reporters say nothing of a comforter round his neck. He does not say so much as "good bye." He allows the Duke of Richmond an absolute monopoly of ducal eloquence, and ducal politeness. The latter "was requested," he said, by the Duke of Buckingham, to say, "that he was obliged to leave that meeting at an early hour through important business calling him to the country; but that he cordially acquiesced in every one of the resolutions, and was determined to stand to the last to the flag of 'protection' (cheers); the Duke of Buckingham had desired this to be mentioned; but was there a farmer in England who would not have felt certain that the Duke of Buckingham would not abandon his position? (Loud cheers.)" So there was something that suggested suspicion, else why this magnificent appeal? The "200 or 300 delegates" cheer the second-hand declaration as lustily as their failing hearts will allow; but they must be hard put to for a cheer when they lavish it on a man who dares not speak a word, and who can't even stay out to the end of the meeting. "Important business" had called him away at an early hour. Something else therefore was more important than the salvation of his country at this awful crisis;—perhaps, the fortnightly meeting of magistrates at Buckingham, when a lad was to be brought up for catching a rabbit, or an old man for breaking the workhouse windows;—perhaps, an engagement with his steward, or the transplanting of some evergreens;—perhaps, the erection of his own bust in the Temple of Fame in the gardens at Stowe;—or, perhaps, a dinner party. If the last, we cannot wonder at his grace's taste; but we must say it was leaving the 200 or 300 cheerless and hungry delegates rather in the lurch.

Lord Beaumont was the only speaking peer. Yet we are told the House of Lords and the whole aristocracy are staked on the question. So says the Chairman:—"The gentlemen of the League began by assailing the Corn Laws; their next step would be to assail every species of protection, and to establish Free Trade in the most unlimited sense of the word"—so far not at all improbable, we should think—"the ultimate end being to create a democratic ascendancy in every part of England. They knew very well that the yeomanry and farmers of this country constituted the strongest bulwark of our ancient institutions. They knew that they must destroy the landed interest before they overturned the constitution." The House of Lords, then, is based on the very substantial foundation of a continual legislative dearth. Every child gives a slice of its "daily bread" for the preservation of hereditary wisdom. So also of the other "ancient institutions." The man who wishes to cheapen bread is ipso facto excommunicate, for he seeks to subvert the church. So saith the 17th canon of Goodwood. The throne also rests on scarcity. The artisan who wishes to make a cotton gownpiece for the settler's wife in Arkansas, that he may receive in return three days' bread for his family, is a foul traitor. He knows he must do this before he can "overturn the constitution." So declareth Richmond. The difference between bread at three-halfpence and bread at twopence a pound is serious. It involves the difference between a mixed Government and a pure democracy—between Parliament and a convention. In that brief margin are written the royal and the episcopal palaces, cathedrals and churches, statute, common, and every other kind of law. Once let everybody in England get his mouthful of bread, and there is an end of our glorious constitution, which it now appears was framed with the express purpose of preventing so horrid a consummation. The exclusive guardians of our numerous national blessings are "the yeomanry and farmers," who constitute "the strongest bulwark of our ancient institutions." We suppose everybody remembers, for, as it happens, we don't, how often this patriotic, intelligent, and powerful body has come forward within our time to stand in the gap, and saved us from revolutionary, irreligious, and infidel change. We have felt ourselves under some obligations to "the farmers and yeomanry," but cannot just now call to mind when they have proved a very efficient bulwark to the most important of our ancient institutions. On the contrary, they have latterly shown themselves ready to give up a good deal for an additional 10s. a quarter for their corn.

However, it shall not be said the 200 or 300 did nothing. They did something. Let us see what it was. The Chairman somewhat precipitately ushers in the important proposition:

"By one of the rules of the Agricultural Society, that association was disabled from interfering, in any respect, with the business of the registration courts; looking, then, at the condition of the country and the conduct of the League, he took upon himself fearlessly to ask that meeting whether they were not prepared to rescind a regulation which disabled them from meeting their adversaries upon equal terms? (Loud and continued cheering.) He would ask them if they did not think the time had at length arrived when it became their duty to enter the registration courts with as bold a front as their enemies?"

To Mr. BAKER was assigned the honour of moving the resolution itself:

"The time, however, had now arrived when they must seek to accomplish their objects by the means which the gentlemen of the League adopted, or at least by some portion of the instruments which that redoubtable body were in the habit of using. The time had arrived, and a protection society would be false to itself and to its country if it continued to abstain from facing its enemies in the registration courts. He concluded by moving the following resolution:

"That the following words be expunged from the fourth rule of the society, viz.:—And that the Society shall on no account interfere in any election for a member to serve in Parliament."

"The announcement of this resolution was received with loud cheers."

Now there is a wisdom in doing a thing; and a wisdom in not doing it. If it cannot be done to any effectual purpose, it is better not to do it, and take to oneself as much credit for that forbearance as the circumstance will allow. The greatest possible mess that a bungler can fall into is not to take an objectionable or less dignified course till it is too late, and then just to do enough to deprive himself of the boast, and to stop his mouth as to the less scrupulous proceedings of other parties. That is exactly the stupid mess into which these titled blunderers and faineants are dragging the wretched dregs of their party. Now, of course, they have not a word to say against the League. It is now the avowed principle of both parties to interfere with elections. As to the morality of the proceedings they all row in one boat now. Otherwise they might have worked that topic against the Leaguers with some rhetorical effect. But, after all, it is selling their souls for nothing. They won't raise a fund—hardly as many pennies as their foes raise pounds. They won't turn one election which was not already in their grasp. The chairman makes a silly boast about Sussex. Of course, "every cock on his own dunghill," and if the duke gets the flats he was speaking to pay a portion of his family's next election bills, it will be so much in his pocket. But they will neither raise money nor spend it. Whatever money they do raise they will have to borrow for the purpose, and the most honest use of that money that we can imagine will be some jugglery by which it finds its way back to the lenders. This, then, is all the Grand Central Agricultural Protection Society of the British Empire has done. It has just met to sanction the proceedings of its antagonists, and no more.

THAT CLASS OF PERSONS CALLED "DUKES."

(From the Morning Chronicle.)

The transactions at Newark and Woodstock, to which we referred yesterday, will probably have the effect of directing increased attention to that class of persons called "dukes." Though a small, they are a remarkable class; and their proceedings have of late brought them a good deal before the public. The dukes have been saying and doing a good deal. What they have said and done has certainly had the effect of attracting attention; the talk of the country has been running on dukes. People have been forced to speculate on whether the duke of this or that has or could have done this or that thing. Then they have asked, What could induce the duke to do or say such a thing? and so the public mind has been insensibly led on to speculating on the nature of dukes, and investigating what manner of beings they must be who can say or do such things as they say and do.

Undoubtedly the tendency of all these investigations and discussions has not been to raise this little class of men in public estimation. Their moral and intellectual magnitude has amazingly diminished since it has been seen in clear daylight. An unpleasant change has taken place in the mode of speaking about them. People who do not speak Scotch, like the witness in the Porteous riots, are beginning to class "dukes" with other "fools." Mr. Cobden (we say it with pain) has set the example of speaking of them in a most unchristian fashion; and dislike is beginning to mingle very largely with the contempt with which they are regarded.

This is not right. Great allowances should be made for dukes. The notion that they are naturally worse than their neighbours is as unphilosophical as their own notion that they are born better. Their character results from the mode in which they are brought up; and when we consider what that up-bringing is, the wonder is, not that you have Newcastles, and Marlboroughs, and Buckinghams among them, but that you should find a man of such real good sense and good human feeling as are possessed by the Duke of Bedford.

Before you condemn them too cruelly, think what it is to be a duke. Put aside the outward shows of honour and power that surround them—view the man without his coronet, and garter, and fine house, and vast park, and huge estate—and consider what must be his moral existence. It must be very cold and comfortless to find one's-self an un-reality, a two legged solecism, in a world of real men and things.

These poor dukes never have a fair chance from the outset. In the first infancy of their reason, their perceptions are obscured by a cloud of flattery and falsehood. The evil influence of the low and parasite nurse is succeeded by that of the low and parasite tutor commencing the subserviencies that are to lead him to a bishopric. The very public school, which really does some good to the rest of our aristocracy, does not in general contribute to the future duke his due proportion of wholesome licking and flogging. The institutions of our Universities seem devised for the very purpose of thoroughly corrupting our nobility. Distinctions of dress, which in after life are not tolerated by our manners, mark them out from other gentlemen. They are exempted from religious observances, and attendance on lectures; they obtain a degree without study or examination; and during the period of their nominal education, instead of learning a generous equality of youthful friendships, they are surrounded by different forms and classes of sycophants, of whom the most disgusting are the truly plebeian persons to whose control they are nominally subjected. Then our duke comes into the world, hunts, shoots, and gambles; living with disreputable women and disreputable men, till some intriguing mamma succeeds in booking him for life to her daughter; and then, from the competing toadyism of the world, he is, to a certain degree, hedged up in the snug toadyism of his family and connections.

Such a man as this, without reading, without experience of life, without equal intercourse with sincere friends, what can he know of the world in which he lives? Alas! when he turns the feeble horny eyes of his soul on outward things, he must have a very dim, distorted perception of all that is going on about him. His perplexities of course fill him with alarm. He feels want of money, and a great craving for all manner of obsequiousness and reverence. The working-folks—labourers, farmers, tradesmen, men of business—he learns to suspect of wishing to defraud him of some portion of that work which he imagines them created to do for his benefit. His wealthier neighbours he regards as wishing to encroach upon that pre-eminence which he believes to be his right. His notion of the use of political power is, that it is given him primarily to enable him to maintain his own rights and consideration, and those of his order; and after that to do what can be done for the common people.

In the chaos of such a mind as this, in what light must the nation's demand for cheap bread be regarded? With what feelings must the expressions of the national desires be viewed? The whole appears a great wrong, which vulgar people meditate doing to him. The League, the press, the Ministry, the Opposition, appear to him one great breach of decorum and propriety—a collection of injustices—a monster vulgarity. His strange notions of justice are outraged by the demand for mere justice. He proposes to resent the first of an apprehended series of wrongs. He issues forth, and, unaware of the unseemly indecency of his intellectual nakedness, unfolds what, to his dim reason, appears the simplicity of truth—invests sordid injustice with the garb of indignant morality—and, fancying he has arrayed himself in a very panoply of reason and right, defies Peel, Russell, and Cobden, burns the Times, and raises the cry of "No surrender."

All this is very pitiable, but very natural; and we shall not rectify it by abusing these poor dukes, and wishing, like Mr. Cobden, that the sane dukes would catch the insane dukes, and put them in strait waistcoats. The present arrangements of society do not admit of these things; and it may possibly be long before they will admit of our doing without dukes, or even of putting them on a materially different footing. We must make the best of them. The League are doing the right thing in taking measures to transfer political powers from the dukes to more sensible people. This will prevent their doing much harm. In the long run, it will probably improve them, and make them useful members of society. When they see themselves deprived of the brute influence which their property now gives them in politics, they will find the necessity of getting information, feeling like human beings, and acting rationally. This will be the moral guano by which we shall raise a crop of something useful out of the hopeless field of dukedom.

To improve our kind is always a worthier occupation than to rail at it; and while the evil lasts we are none of us without blame. By our carelessness, our lacquetry spirit, our toleration of injustice, we have brought the dukes to what they are. We owe it to them as well as ourselves to repair this wrong. Their deplorable state cries to Heaven against the country which tolerates its existence.

FREE TRADE.

(From the Star—Guernsey Paper.)

The "Quarterly Review," in its last number, in an article on the recent resignation of the Ministry, puts forth, in an embodied form, the arguments which the protectionists now chiefly rely on in their opposition to the repeal of the duties on corn. It is not our intention to embark in the discussion of this subject, but we think it is in our power to furnish an item of information which, if duly weighed, may tend to set at rest one of the questions in dispute. The writer in the "Quarterly" contends, in the first instance, against the abrogation of the protecting duties, alleging that such abrogation would have a ruinous effect on the landed interests; but he goes on to argue that if the principles of Free Trade be applied to corn, it ought to be extended to all other commodities; and, from this, proceeds to the assumption that all trades would be ruined, if exposed without any protective duty to the competition of foreigners. The writer then asks—"Are we to have not only Polish wheat, but German linens, woollens, and cutlery—Saxon hosiery and muslins—Belgian cottons and cloths, and fire-arms—Dutch spirits—Swiss watches—American reprints—French china, gloves, shoes, silks, and paper, besides an infinite variety of small articles which support a multitude of poor artisans, all of whom would be undersold by the foreigner?" In this interrogative form the writer advances a proposition which, plausible as it may appear, is founded on speculation only. He declares what he thinks might and would be under particular circumstances. We can state what actually is the case under the existence of those very circumstances. We can place fact against conjecture. The perfect freedom of trade which the Quarterly Review contemplates actually exists in the Channel Islands, the population of which is nearly 90,000 persons, possessing great wealth which it expends chiefly on the productions of other countries. Now, although these islands are in constant communication with France, Germany, Holland, Belgium, and other manufacturing nations, as enumerated by the reviewer, and, although they have unrestricted liberty to receive from thence, without a farthing of duty, all the goods referred to by him, scarcely any of them are introduced. Foreign woollens, cottons, linens, hosiery, and cutlery, are nearly unknown in the islands, English articles of this description being almost invariably preferred as being cheaper and better. French silks, gloves, shoes, &c., and Swiss watches, are not more used here than in England. French china has but a limited demand, and that only in ornamental articles; and Belgian fire arms are entirely unknown. The people of these islands having the whole world to choose from, find that British manufactures of every description, although rendered dearer than they otherwise would be by the taxation to which their materials are subject in England, are still cheaper and better than the manufactures of other countries, and hence the shops of the islands contain quite as few foreign goods as those of London itself. A stronger practical proof of the ability of the British manufacturer to compete with the foreigner, if left at liberty to do so, cannot, we think, be given. Here the goods of foreign nations are admitted duty free, and yet those of England supersede them.

QUALIFY! QUALIFY! QUALIFY!
THE Friends of FREE TRADE residing in the Northern or Midland Counties, desirous of purchasing Freeholds in any of the undermentioned Counties, are requested to apply to the Secretary of the League, Newall's Buildings Manchester.

North Lancashire	North Derbyshire
South Lancashire	South Derbyshire
North Cheshire	North Durham
West Riding of York	East Cumberland
South Stafford	West Cumberland
North Stafford	South Northumberland.
South Cheshire

Each applicant is requested to give his name and residence at full length.
By Order of the Council,
JOSEPH HICKIN, Secretary.

QUALIFY! QUALIFY! QUALIFY!
FREE TRADERS desirous of purchasing Freeholds for Middlesex, East Surrey, West Kent, South Essex, East Sussex, and South Hants, are requested to send their applications, with name and address in full, to the League Offices, 67, Fleet-street, London.
By Order of the Council,
JOSEPH HICKIN, Secretary.

NORTH LANCASHIRE.
QUALIFY! QUALIFY! QUALIFY!
AS only three weeks now remain for Qualifying, so as to be on the next Register, the Friends of Free Trade are respectfully urged to Purchase Freeholds without delay.
Freehold Property, giving a Qualification, can be purchased, in North Lancashire, at from 30*l*. to 35*l*., yielding about 7 per cent.
Every information may be had from Mr. Moorhouse, League Rooms, 4, Cheapside, Preston.

FREEHOLD QUALIFICATIONS FOR HERTS.
FREE TRADERS desirous of purchasing Freeholds in Hertfordshire are requested to send their applications to The League Offices, 67, Fleet-street, or to Mr. J. F. Bontems, Herts Registration Office, Hertford.

CORN LAWS.—A PUBLIC MEETING of the Inhabitants of WESTMINSTER will be held at the Crown and Anchor Tavern, Strand, on Tuesday, January the 20th, 1846, to Petition Parliament for the Total and Immediate Repeal of the Corn Laws. The Chair will be taken by Howard Elphinstone, Esq., M.P., at Six or Seven o'clock in the Evening.
GEORGE HUGGETT, Secretary.

CONTRIBUTIONS TO THE QUARTER OF A MILLION FUND.

Subscriptions received during the week ending Wednesday, Jan. 14, 1846.
N.B.—As the Subscription List is made up from Wednesday to Wednesday, contributions received on Thursdays and Fridays are not published in the LEAGUE of the Saturday immediately succeeding, but are included in the list of the week following.

	£	s.	d.
*Dixon, P and Sons, Carlisle and Manchester	200	0	0
*Heywood, James, banker ditto	100	0	0
*Walker, Richard, M.P., Bury, Lancashire	50	0	0
*Simpson, J A and Thos, 5, Piccadilly, Manchester	20	0	0
*McCall, Wm, 69, Spring Gardens ditto	20	0	0
*McCall, John, 76, Upper Brook-street ditto	20	0	0
*McCall, Mrs. and Miss, ditto ditto	20	0	0
Thomson, E., Pied Bull, Chester	30	0	0
Holroyd, R., Mill-street, Ancoats, Manchester	20	0	0
*Green, Richard, Luton	10	0	0
*Green, Joseph, Hanging Ditch, Manchester	10	0	0
*Oliver and Co, Spring Gardens ditto	10	0	0
W S Durham	5	0	0
*Goadby, Thomas, Albert-place, Manchester	5	0	0
*Diggle, T, 141, York-st, Ckeetham ditto	5	0	0
*Oram, R, Broughton ditto	5	0	0
*E G, per Mr. McCall ditto	5	0	0
"A Friend," per Wm McCall ditto	5	0	0
"A Friend," per W Harey, Salford	5	0	0
*Moorhouse, Edwin, Ashton-under-Line	5	0	0
Miller, Henry, at Messrs. Simpsons, 5, Piccadilly, Manchester	4	0	0
*Hilton, Richard, Dole Field, Manchester	3	3	0
*Chapman, W, 9, Green-street, Ardwick ditto	2	0	0
Clark, W and Co, Beith, Ayrshire	1	10	0
*Dwyer, John, Brunel y, near Leeds	1	5	0
Banks, Henry, Wodnesbury	1	1	0
Brookhurst, P P, Macclesfield	1	1	0
*Holland, Wm, Roebuck Inn, Rochdale	1	1	0
*Liebreich, J, Leeds	1	1	0
*Andrew, Stephen, Ashton-under-Line	1	1	0
*Andrew, Aaron, ditto	1	1	0
Lister, John, Darwin, near Blackburn	1	1	0
*Eyre, Samuel, Derby	1	1	0
*Brown, Geo, 30, Canal-street, Ancoats, Manchester	1	1	0
Hesketh, Geo, 30, Bridge-street ditto	1	1	0
McKinnell, J H, Box 371, Post Office	1	1	0
Giles, R, 19, George-street ditto	1	1	0
Ward, J, 22, King-street ditto	1	1	0
A Lady, per Wm McCall ditto	1	1	0
Illahy, Mrs, Market-street ditto	1	1	0
*Hulme, Wm, 25, Market-street ditto	1	1	0
Stanley, Joseph, 11, Cross-street ditto	1	1	0
*Barrow, James, 31, Great Ancoats-street ditto	1	1	0
*Lacey, J, Hemp Bridge, near Bury, Lancashire	1	0	0
*Whitworth, James, Water Mills, near Bury	1	0	0
*Greenwood, James, Keresley, near Bolton	1	0	0

*Mason, John, Drake-street, Rochdale	1	0	0
*Wrigley, John, Wardworth Broom, ditto	1	0	0
*Crump, Thomas, Friargate, Derby	1	0	0
*Lurkin, G J, Warrington	1	0	0
*Blinston, Joseph, The Ackers, near ditto	1	0	0
*Wyth, John, Litchford, near ditto	1	0	0
Whitehouse, Thomas, Wetherby Yorkshire	1	0	0
*Bigwood, T Cook, Queen-street, Portsea	1	0	0
*Newlyn, John, 95, St. Thomas's-street, Portsmouth	1	0	0
*Sutherland, Andrew, Aberdeen	1	0	0
*Heap, J, Tons, Sandy Lane, ditto	1	0	0
*Kear, J, Tons, Sandy Lane, ditto	1	0	0
*Buckroy, Joseph, Bury, Lancashire	1	0	0
*Hobbs, J, Ely Clough Mill, Royton, near Oldham	1	0	0
*Holden, John, Highlands ditto	1	0	0
*Chadwick, Thomas ditto	1	0	0
*Shepherd, Thomas ditto	1	0	0
*Ashworth, James ditto	1	0	0
*Cooper, Richard, Sandbach, Cheshire	1	0	0
*Robinson, James, Yew Tree Place, Prescott	1	0	0
*Moss, W Surgeon, Lancaster	1	0	0
*Knight, John, Ashby de la Zouch	1	0	0
Harwood, John, St. Helens	1	0	0
*Duke and Bennett, Manchester	1	0	0
*Hopkinson, J, 2, Mangle-street ditto	1	0	0
*Nelson, David, Prestwich, near ditto	1	0	0
Turner, Joseph, Victoria Bridge, near ditto	1	0	0
*Marsden, Wm., St. Mary's-street ditto	1	0	0
*Warhurst, S, Globe, Medlock-st, Hulme, ditto	1	0	0
*Rawes, Gerard, Rawtenstall, near ditto	1	0	0
*Andrew, J, 6, Creswell-st, C on M ditto	1	0	0
*Gidney, E, dentist, Piccadilly ditto	1	0	0
Bonsell, W F, 4, Cooper-street ditto	1	0	0
*Duncan, R, 4, St. John's-place, Broughton, ditto	1	0	0
*Wilkinson, Samuel, Eccles, near ditto	1	0	0
*Brindle, T, 7, Brindle-street, C on M ditto	1	0	0
Lang, Benj, Victoria Bridge ditto	1	0	0
Phillips, M, Shakespear Inn, York-st, Holme, ditto	1	0	0
*Booth, Jas, 10, Bradshaw-st, Shudehill, ditto	1	0	0
*Phillips, Wm, Rusholme ditto	1	0	0
*Windsor, John, 65, Piccadilly ditto	1	0	0
*Davy, James, Murray-st, Oldham-road ditto	1	0	0
Phillips, John, 47, Portland-street ditto	1	0	0
*Smith, Jeffery, 2, Manor-street, Ardwick, ditto	1	0	0
*Naylor, James, Bristol-street, Hulme ditto	1	0	0
Lees, I, 1, Higher Temple-st, C on M ditto	1	0	0
*Welch, John, Ancoats Grove ditto	1	0	0
Atkinson, E, 31, Oxford road ditto	1	0	0
*Burke, Wm, 44, Sidney-street, C on M ditto	1	0	0
*Robinson, John, 1, Stanley-st, Red Bank, ditto	1	0	0
*Bentham, Geo, Market-place ditto	1	0	0
*Atkinson J, 23, Exmouth-ter, Stretford-New-rd, ditto	1	0	0
*Naylor, John, 113, Piccadilly ditto	1	0	0
Hampson, D., Stock-street, Cheetham ditto	1	0	0
*Grundy, C S, 16, Devonshire-st, Hulme ditto	1	0	0
*Bury, G, 24, Great George-street ditto	1	0	0
Duncan, D, jun., 4, St. John's-place ditto	1	0	0
Skinner, Wm, ditto ditto	1	0	0
Hall, John, 48, Swan-street ditto	1	0	0
*Howden, S and R, 23, Oxford-road ditto	1	0	0
*Foster and Duncan, 43, ditto ditto	1	0	0
*Watkin, Messrs., and Son, Exchange Arcade, ditto	1	0	0
*Garry, J, and Friends, Hen & Chickens, Deansgate..	1	0	0
*Andrew, James, Gee Cross, near ditto	1	0	0
*Armstrong, J, at Messrs. Simpson's, Piccadilly, ditto	1	0	0
*Holmes, James, ditto ditto	1	0	0
*Holmes, Edward Sykes ditto	1	0	0
*Sanders, Jonathan George ditto	1	0	0
*Ford, Edward ditto	1	0	0
Simpson, Edwin ditto	0	10	0
Booth, John, 52, London Road ditto	0	10	0
A Pinch of Curry Powder, Chichester	0	10	0
Overall, J, 36, Bridge-street, Manchester	0	5	0
Conner, Wm, 32, ditto ditto	0	5	0
Irving, M, 18, Maskell-street, C on M, ditto	0	5	0
J P, 30, Market-street, ditto	0	5	0
Cavanah, Thomas, 33, Spinning Field, ditto	0	5	0
Smith, Richard, 64, Hardman-street, ditto	0	5	0
Stuart Robert, Ramotham, near Bury, Lancashire	0	2	6
Horne, Robert, Adelaide-st, Hulme, Manchester	0	2	0
Liverpool—
*Wilson, C, Elm Farm, West Derby, near	60	0	0
*Crosfield, Henry, 4, Temple-place	50	0	0
*Crosfield, J, jun, Chatham-place, Edge Hill	20	0	0
*Macrae, James H, and partner, 2, Tithebarn-street	20	0	0
*Blackburn, T, 6, Camden-st.	20	0	0
*Ainsworth, John, 29, Pleasant-st.	10	10	0
*Law, G, Exchange Chambers, Tithebarn-st.	10	10	0
*Smith, J P G, 6, Old Hall-st.	10	10	0
*Richardson, John, 2, Temple-lane	10	10	0
*Evans, W, Farmer, Ince, Blundell, near	5	0	0
*Heath, E, Commerce Court, Lord-st.	5	0	0
A Friend per F Pennington	5	0	0
*Lamb, D, 8, Union-st.	5	0	0
Meade, King, and Co, Messrs, 13, Redcross-st.	5	0	0
A Gentleman at Public Meeting per J P G Smith	5	0	0
Ricaby and Harding, 26, South John-st.	3	0	0
*Holden, G, 7, Blackburn-st.	2	0	0
*Welfare, H, 5, Mason-st, Edge Hill	2	0	0
*Higgins, W, 29, Sackville-st.	2	0	0
*A Shipowner, Park Hill Road	2	0	0
*Everest, Dr. G J, St Anne-st.	2	0	0
*Johnson, J, Exchange-st East	2	0	0
*Mullens, G A, 26, Catherine-st	2	0	0
*Miller, J, 13, Hotham-st.	1	1	0
*McGeorge, T, 3, Lord Nelson-st.	1	1	0
Luya, S C, 22, Warwick-st, Toxteth Park	1	1	0
*Barbie John, 83, Lord Nelson-st.	1	1	0
*Taylor, J D, 28, Whitechapel	1	1	0
Ternan, Matthew, 7, Islington	1	1	0
Fernie, W J, 19, Windsor-st	1	1	0
*Danson, H, Myrtle-st South	1	1	0
*Cuff, T, 49, Byrom-st.	1	1	0
*Eccles, E, 101, Islington	1	1	0
*Proctor, J, 8, Cambridge-st.	1	1	0
*Mills, G A, 85, London-road	1	1	0
Ward, S P, Church-st, Birkenhead	1	1	0
A Friend, London Road	1	1	0
*Hutcheson, Alex, Atherton-st, Everton	1	1	0
*Somerville, W, Wellington-st, Chester	1	1	0
Morris, R, 32, Exchange-st East	1	1	0
Ashcroft, M, Bank Hall Farm, Kirkdale, near	1	1	0
*Eastwood, Peter, 2, Moorfields	1	1	0
Richardson, S, 100, Falkner-st	1	1	0
*Owen, J, 10, Boundary-st	1	1	0
*Owen, R, Field View, Bootle Lane	1	1	0
*Burgess, James, Sir Thomas's Buildings	1	1	0
Anderson, T, High-st	1	1	0
A Newly-qualified Elector for South Lancashire	1	1	0
C M	1	1	0
May, J, 144, Mill-st	0	12	6
Thompson, J, 20, Alfred-st	0	10	0
Cavanagh, Pat., 54, Lumber-st	0	5	0
Wabston, Isaac, Trannmere, Cheshire	0	5	0
Sankey, S, 51, South Castle-st	0	5	0
A Friend at Public Meeting	0	5	0
Cash at Public Meeting	0	5	0
Richardson, Mrs S, 100, Falkner-st	0	5	0
Cauntlett, Capt. Geo., of Brig, Dorothy, of Sunderland	0	5	0
Weldon, John, 39, Harrington-st, Castle-st	0	5	0
Bardham, T, 38, Rupert-st	0	5	0
A Friend, 24, Melville-place	0	4	0
Eastwood, Mrs, 2, Moorfields	0	4	0
S S, South Castle-st	0	4	0
May the cause prosper	0	2	6
Trumble, W, 1, Vulcan-st	0	2	6
McFie, W, ditto	0	2	6
An Old Sawyer	0	2	6
Allen, G, 19, Cropper-st	0	1	6
Sewart, James, 2, Crown Vault Yard, Fleet-st	0	1	0
A stranger	0	1	0

Gorman, J, Naylor-st	0	0	6
*Hamilton, John J, Liverpool	100	0	0
*Larking and Son, 13, Whitechapel	12	12	0
*Larking, Mrs., ditto	4	4	0
*Larking, Miss ditto	4	4	0
*Browne, Henry Nibbs, 13, John-street, Minories	20	0	0
*Crowley, A C S and H, Alton	20	0	0
*Crowley, C S, Croydon	20	0	0
*Crowley, H, ditto	20	0	0
*Colvin, James, 71, Old Bailey	10	0	0
*Roscaw, Samuel, Edmonton	5	0	0
*Forlani, James, 27, Upper Bedford-place	5	0	0
*Thackray, Martin, Gloucester-place, Portman-square	5	0	0
*Pocock, T P, Upton Lovell, Heytesbury	5	0	0
*Darwin, Chas, Down, Bromley, Kent	5	0	0
*Wood, John, 17, Cumming-street, Pentonville	5	0	0
*Davies, George, Scarborough	4	0	0
A Big Loaf, and plenty of them—H—O—O—d	3	3	0
*Landells, John S, Honey-lane Market, Cheapside	3	3	0
*Corbett, Alex, 7, Montrose-street, Glasgow	3	0	0
*Wontner, Joseph, Hereford	2	2	0
*Hawkins, Geo, 88, Bishopsgate-street	2	2	0
Sedgeley, Fred, 2, Allen-terrace, Kensington	2	2	0
*Foskett, Henry, Tunbridge Wells	2	0	0
*Maw, J H, West Hill, Hastings	2	0	0
*Verity, John, 46, Salisbury-square	2	0	0
*Cr ik, Chas, 33, Great Winchester-street	2	0	0
Bell, John, London	2	0	0
*Mead, Joseph, Luton	2	0	0
*Pitt, Robert, Newark Foundry, Bath	2	0	0
*Corbett, John, 7, Montrose-st, Glasgow	2	0	0
"Of Free Trade Principles," Essex	1	10	0
*Clarke, W J, 7, Beaufort, West Bath	1	1	0
*Jee, John, Abingdon-street, Northampton	1	1	0
Welford, John, Ware, Herts	1	1	0
*Stephens, Wm H, Eton	1	1	0
Williams, Hugh, Kidwelly, Carmarthenshire	1	1	0
W D, per Henry Sallows	1	1	0
*Palmer, James, Old-street, Ashton-under-Line	1	1	0
*Brown, F, ironmonger, Luton	1	1	0
*Brown, D, ditto ditto	1	1	0
*Ramsd n, D, Bradford, Yorkshire	1	1	0
*Marshall, W, Ladyburn, near Port Glasgow	1	1	0
*Medes, Wm, Chertsey	1	1	0
Dormer, Cottrell, Housham, near Woodstock	1	1	0
*Rawnsley, John, New street, Bradford, Yorkshire	1	1	0
Williams, James, Usk, Monmouth	1	1	0
Postans, W G, Birmingham	1	1	0
Staley, James, 4, Sun-row, Lower-road, Islington	1	1	0
Vincent, Isaac, Little St, Thomas the Apostle, City	1	1	0
*Kimm, A, 274, High-street, Wapping	1	1	0
*Lawrence, Edw, 76, Leadenhall-street	1	1	0
*Miller, J, 8, Darlington-place, Harleyford-rd, Vauxhall	1	1	0
*Chapman, Thomas, 18, Edward-terrace, Pentonville..	1	1	0
*Hume, Walter, Feltham, near Hounslow	1	1	0
*Blackett, John, Brixton Hill	1	1	0
*Cockings, Thomas, 145, Long Acre	1	1	0
*Monk, Wm, Little North-street, Whitechapel	1	1	0
*Skegg, R, 2, St. Martin's-place, Trafalgar-square	1	1	0
*Leech, J, 64, Moorgate-street	1	1	0
*Levinson, V, 46, Bedford-street, Strand	1	1	0
Levinson, M, ditto ditto	1	1	0
*Frewer, S E, 91, Wood-street, City	1	1	0
"A Free Trader," Minories	1	1	0
*Hockin, Wm, 22, St. Paul's Churchyard	1	1	0
*Macfarlan, J and A, 10, Old Bailey	1	1	0
Shirley, John, 46, Windsor-terrace, City Road	1	1	0
Tapsell, Edw, Croydon Common, Surrey	1	0	0
*Williams, James, St. Martin's-court, St. Martin's-lane	1	0	0
Vigers, E, jun, Surrey Saw Mills, Clapham Road	1	0	0
*Downing, G W, 21, Guilford-place, Wilmington-sq.	1	0	0
*Viesseux, Mr., 62, George-street, Euston-square	1	0	0
*Pryce, E, 54, Baker-street, Portman-square	1	0	0
*Chandler, Dennis, 68, Mark-lane	1	0	0
Beurle, L, Royal Oak Hotel, 14, Spencer-st, Clerkenwell	1	0	0
Pike, J, Gloucester Villa, Park-road, New Peckham	1	0	0
*Cockman, Mrs., 74, George-street, Portland-square	1	0	0
Henderson, T, 51, Marsham-street, Westminster	1	0	0
*Cook, Wm, Lisson Grove	1	0	0
Hayward, Thomas, Post Office, Homerton	1	0	0
*Coulson, A H, 4, St. Peter's-terrace, Walworth	1	0	0
*Froggatt, B, 27, Bridge-house Pl, Newington Causeway	1	0	0
*Porter, W A, 10, Clifford's Inn	1	0	0
Duncan, Chas, 4, Liverpool-terrace, Islington	1	0	0
*Hill, James, 254, Blackfriars-road	1	0	0
*Collier, F, 15, New Broad-street, City	1	0	0
*Stokes, Francis, 175, Strand	1	0	0
*Faithful, Fred, 22, St. Paul's Churchyard	1	0	0
*Cook, John, Goodman's Yard, Minories	1	0	0
*Hearder, J, 18, Skinner-street, Snow Hill	1	0	0
*Wilcox, R, 25, Argyle-street, Regent-street	1	0	0
*Chirney, C, 40, Friday-street	1	0	0
*Sherman, J W, Surry Parsonage	1	0	0
*Alexander, Wm, Great Yarmouth	1	0	0
*Brock, Geo, M.D., Wellington, Somerset	1	0	0
"A Friend from Somerset"	1	0	0
*Mackintosh, R J, West Stratton, Hants	1	0	0
Silverlock, E, Newport, Isle of Wight	1	0	0
"A Friend," Suffolk	1	0	0
Monod, Mons, A Vieuxseux, Rue Louis le Grand, Paris	1	0	0
*Fletcher, Caleb, Clementhorp, near York	1	0	0
*Nodings, R H, 6, Mount Parade	1	0	0
*Boarer, R W, Folkstone, Kent	1	0	0
*Clark, S P, Princes Risborough	1	0	0
*Badger, Wm, Cooper-street, Sheffield	1	0	0
*Green, John B, Hayle Mill, near Maidstone	1	0	0
*Hilson, G, manufacturer, Canonage, Jedburgh, N B.	1	0	0
*Hilson, James, ditto ditto	1	0	0
*Oliver, Wm, Langrave, near Havick	1	0	0
Southern, David, Boxley Road, Maidstone	1	0	0
*Tannahill, James, Truro	1	0	0
*Ormston, J, Cumberland Road, Newcastle-on-Tyne	1	0	0
*Davies, T, Nabb, near Oakington, Wellington, Salop.	1	0	0
*Dews, D, manufacturer, Osssett Green, near Wakefield	1	0	0
*Robinson, John, Coalbrookdale	1	0	0
*Allen, Simeon, Coseley, near Bilston	1	0	0
*Hastie, John, Doncaster	1	0	0
*Webb, J H, Dublin	1	0	0
*Wallis, T, Quorndon, near Loughborough	1	0	0
*Kirk, John, 118, Meadow Lane, Leeds	1	0	0
*Murray, J, Kennel Park, St. Asaph, N.W.	1	0	0
Cave, Wm, Stonygate, York	1	0	0
*Thistlethwaite, A, Kestor Cottage, Mill Hill, Bolton	1	0	0
*Selkirk, John, High-st, Jedburgh	1	0	0
*Barnesfather, Mr., Letham, by Forfar	1	0	0
*Crowling, S, Rough House, Headingley, near Leeds	1	0	0
*Grease, J B, Bongate Woolen Mills, Jedburgh	1	0	0
*Bisley, Miss, Airedale	1	0	0
*Miller, James, Newhouse, North Berwick	1	0	0
*Cooper, W M, 1 St. Mary's Gate, Derby	1	0	0
*Wood, R, New-street, Doncaster	1	0	0
*Sharman, Wm, Bitteswell, near Lutterworth	1	0	0
*Ford, C D, Morecombe Lodge, Yealand Conyers, near Lancaster	1	0	0
*Parratt, E H, Broadstones, Bradford, Yorkshire	1	0	0
*Tee, Wm, Barnsley	1	0	0
*Newton, Henry, Ashton-under-Line	1	0	0
Day, Edward, Silver-st., Durham	1	0	0
*Cresswell, Thomas, Pinfold-st., Darlaston	1	0	0
*Whiteley, S, Linthwaite, near Huddersfield	1	0	0
*Brookes, E L, Peck Lane, Nottingham	1	0	0
*Paterson, James, 3, Denburn-terrace, Aberdeen	1	0	0
*Dundersdale, Richard, Deansgate, Bolton	1	0	0
Rawsthorn, Davies, ditto	1	0	0
*Bell, Wm, Ford House, near	1	0	0
*Bell, Wm T, High-street	1	0	0
*Armstrong, Henry, Union Bank	1	0	0
Robson, Thomas, Cumberland-terrace	1	0	0
*Danson, Ralph, High-street	1	0	0
Hardcastle, Geo, Norfolk-street	1	0	0
"A Friend," Monkwearmouth	1	0	0
Sunderland.

Edinburgh.	*Hume, R. 3, East Register-street ..	3	0	0
	*Hill, John, 60, Broughton-street ..	2	0	0
	*Snowden, J. and W. 63, Grassmarket ..	1	0	0
	*Russell, R. Canon Mills ..	1	0	0
	*Marshall, Wm, W. 18, Albany-street ..	1	0	0
	*Dick, Mary, Veterinary College ..	1	0	0
	*Houlden, Thomas, 9, Nicolson-street ..	1	0	0
	*Bladworth, Jonathan, 129, Grassmarket ..	1	0	0
	*Robertson, Jas, at Mr. Henderson's, 3, Castle-street ..	1	0	0
	*Anderson, C. 5, North Charlotte-street ..	1	0	0
Greenock.	*Waddell, Wm, 50, Melville-street ..	1	0	0
	*S. S. Perthhead Ford, by ..	1	0	0
	*A. Z. ..	1	0	0
	*X. Y. ..	1	0	0
	*Jessamine, John, at Messrs. Campbell, Anderson, and Co. ..	1	0	0
Halifax.	*Anderson, Andrew ..	1	0	0
	*Bannatyne, James, Brougham-st ..	1	0	0
	*Whitehead, Thos, 28, Upper Crib Lane ..	1	0	0
	*Sykes, James, Market Place ..	1	0	0
	*Stocks, Joseph, Light Cliffe, near ..	1	0	0
Leicester.	*Ackroyd, John, Saville-row ..	1	0	0
	*Whitehead, Joseph, King's Head ..	1	0	0
	*Beale, C. Regent-street, Welford-road ..	1	0	0
	*Palmer, J. W. Chemist, Market-street ..	1	0	0
	*Roberts, J. grocer, Hotel st ..	1	0	0
Nottingham.	*Scott, T. tailor, Market-street ..	1	0	0
	*Latham, Wm, Gallowtree Gate ..	1	0	0
	*Edlison, Booth, surgeon, High Pavement ..	1	0	0
	*Mosley and Son, 10, Lion Square ..	1	0	0
	*Holbrook, Wm, New Sneinton ..	1	0	0
	*Ward, Frank, Plough and Harrow ..	1	0	0
	*Watts, Wm, jun., Ang-l-row ..	1	0	0
	*Cripps, Wm, Park-terrace ..	1	0	0
	*Hidout, H. G. Houndgate ..	1	0	0
	*Carver, T. Mount-street ..	1	0	0
Butler, Richard, 15, Pickering-place, Paddington ..	0	10	0	0
	Sharlani, Thomas, Bishopgate within ..	0	10	0
	Ashford, R. H. 41, Bethnal Green Road ..	0	5	0
	Bickers, Henry, 8, Paradise-row, Chelsea ..	0	5	0
	Grethen, Thomas, 4, King's-terrace North, Clerkenwell ..	0	4	0
	Grethen, Thomas, J. ditto ..	0	4	0
	Bentley, John, 9, Southampton-street, Pentonville ..	0	4	0
	Mansfield, John, 8, Ardwick-street, Clerkenwell ..	0	4	0
	Craddock, Charles, 52, Barbican ..	0	4	0
	Potter, Robert, 18, Clarendon-square ..	0	4	0
Bannister, Wm, 5, Newcastle-street, Clerkenwell ..	0	2	6	0
	Bennett, R. 22, Shoemaker row ..	0	2	6
	Wilson, Charles, 41, Upper York-street, Marylebone ..	0	2	6
	Swiney, Mr., 4, Bret's Buildings, Hoxton ..	0	2	6
	*Those names marked with an asterisk are renewed subscriptions.

ERRATA.—In LEAGUE, No. 119, for John Fellowes, King's Head, Museum-street, £1, read the Bloomsbury Auxiliary Association, held at the King's Head, Museum-street.

GREAT LEAGUE MEETING AT MANCHESTER.

A meeting was held at the Free Trade Hall, on Thursday night, which, however great the previous assemblages of Free Traders there may have been, was unexampled both in numbers, influence, and enthusiasm—in everything, in fact, which can give interest and moral weight to the great movement in which the League are embarked, and which there is now every reason to believe they will speedily carry, despite opposition in every shape, to a final and glorious issue. It was evident at an early period of the week that the assemblage would be unusually great; for on Tuesday, the first day on which tickets could be had, the application for them was so rapid and pressing, that the extraordinary number of eight thousand tickets was disposed of in three hours and a half; and the demand continued to be unabated. Under these circumstances, it became a question whether the audience should be limited to something like that number, or whether an arrangement could not be made, by economising the space within the hall, to prevent the extent of disappointment amongst the public, which must otherwise be felt. The result was, that a large portion of the seats were removed from the platform and from the body of the hall, so as to increase the extent of the standing room. By these means it was calculated that room for an extra thousand was gained; and on the strength of this, and in anticipation of the number who might not be able to attend, although they had obtained tickets, or who, in the event of being too late for seats would retire, the Council of the League determined upon the issue of three thousand extra tickets. Even this additional issue did not meet the demand: there was not so much as a ticket to be had to the reserved seats and platform after three o'clock on Wednesday; and neither influence nor favour could secure to those who had not made an earlier application the magic password which should confer upon them the honour of becoming a unit in this large and most magnificent assembly. At least 5000 persons who applied after this hour had to take a denial. Even large contributors to the League Fund had to submit to the disappointment. It is almost needless to say that the hall was filled; the rush at the doors was almost overwhelming, and at a considerable time before the hour of business arrived every sitting and standing place in the vast building was occupied.

There was a great number of well-dressed ladies present; and the appearance of the building, filled with such an audience, was magnificent beyond description. Since the last meeting the artist has been busy in the work of renovation. We stated in a former notice that the interior of the building was undergoing a thorough alteration; and that under the superintendence of Mr. T. Grieve, the celebrated scenic artist of the London theatres, it was to be transformed into a kind of Tudor Hall. We may now add, this transformation had so far advanced at the time of the meeting as to have a most imposing and beautiful effect. The following more minute description of those alterations appeared in a contemporary:

"The blue draperies on the platform wall, being found to have a very injurious visual effect, have been replaced by crimson, as contributing to a better general effect. The end wall and gallery walls have a white ground, but the greatest portion of their surface is covered with crimson panels. The ceilings are white, with crimson ornaments; the gallery balconies are in a fanciful trellis work, with central panels having groups of figures in them; and the walls below the galleries are, as it were, tapestried with blue draperies. Over each of the central iron columns is a shield, from behind which springs the Caryatides. The front of the platform has been repainted. The walls of the platform and the galleries are covered by a series of large crimson panels, each flanked by narrow lateral panels, on a white ground. The panels have in their centres circular shields bearing devices, and beneath each a white scroll, having usually a single word, or legend, or motto, in Old English letters, of a crimson colour. In those panels of the platform wall, to the right of the chair, are the following devices and mottoes: The mariner's compass, motto Navigation; the Bible, Faith; three stalks of wheat in ear, Perseverance. In those to the left of the chair:—A pelican feeding her young by opening her breast, Affection; an anchor, Hope; three stalks of wheat in ear, Perseverance. The panels of the gallery will doubtless contain other devices and mottoes, but, as we have said, they are incomplete. All three compartments of the ceiling are panelled with crimson octagonal shields, bordered with gold. In the centre of each octagon is a circle of bright green, in the centre of which again is a rose of gold. To fill up the white spaces between these octagonal panels, are gilded garter and tongue ornaments. A sort of chain border, of various colours, is carried round each compartment of the ceiling. The effect of this style of ornament, while it adds to the richness of the hall, gives semblance of greater loftiness to the roof, and thus in appearance lessens the great defect in the edifice. The gallery balconies have a very pleasing appearance, being composed of a sort of trellis-work of white scrolls, with gold borders, on a crimson ground. In the centre of each compartment of the balcony—that is, between every two pillars—is a panel with some classic group of figures, on a blue ground. These groups are chiefly composed of female figures and children, or, to speak classically, of nymphs and cupids, engaged in various pursuits of science, the fine arts, or the useful arts. In one group, cupids are reaping, and in a second, gleaming; in others, a nymph is seen with palette in hand, or bending over a lyre, or pondering over a sphere; or with The Book, raising her eyes of faith to heaven. The pillars that support the gallery have been cased, so as to take a symmetrical form, as square pillars. They terminate at the top in open-work scroll ornaments, with pendants or drops in the style of the Tudor period of English art. The walls under the galleries are, as we have said, painted so as to appear covered with blue curtains or draperies; these are divided into compartments by painted pillars, parallel to and corresponding with those supporting the galleries. On the centre of each compartment is a crimson shield bordered with gold, containing a device, and beneath each shield is a scroll and legend. Of these there are seven on each side the hall. The general effect of the decorations we have endeavoured to describe, and which leave no part of it, ceiling, walls, or balconies, unornamented, is greatly to enrich its tout ensemble, as an apartment; to give it tone of greater warmth, an air of more comfort and splendour; and at the same time to add to its apparent loftiness."

Taking the spirit and enthusiasm of the assemblage into account, together with its magnitude—and the splendour of the decorations and scenic effect brought to bear upon it by the artist—the meeting was certainly like no ordinary gathering. The spectator might have imagined rather that it was some extraordinary pageant in imitation of those with which imperial greatness was wont to be honoured; and that the great leaders of the League movement, fresh from new and yet more successful campaigns than any which they have heretofore achieved, had been met by their grateful fellow-citizens to be honoured with a "triumph." Undoubtedly such a meeting, look upon it in whatever light we may, is a triumph, and a great moral triumph too. The speakers announced for the evening were Richard Cobden, Esq., M.P.; John Bright, Esq., M.P., and W. J. Fox, Esq.; and these gentlemen, accompanied by George Wilson, Esq., the chairman (who had just returned from London, where, on the previous evening, he had presided over a meeting in Covent Garden Theatre), and several influential members of the Council of the Anti-Corn-Law League, entered the hall at half-past seven o'clock precisely. Their appearance on the platform was the signal for a spontaneous burst of enthusiasm, which was renewed and prolonged, again and again. Out of a body of nearly seven hundred gentlemen assembled on the platform, it is hardly possible to give a list of all whose names are deserving of record, as evincing, by the respectability of such an enumeration of names, the estimation in which the Free Trade movement is held. We must, therefore, necessarily confine our notice to the mention of gentlemen who, from the prominent situation in which they were placed, came more immediately under our eye. We observed—

Col. Thompson, J. Brotherton, Esq., M.P., the Mayor of Manchester, Alderman Walker, Alderman Potter, Alderman Kay, (the ex-mayor), Alderman Shuttleworth, Alderman Mayson, Alderman Armitage, Alderman Harvey, W. Rawson, Esq., W. Bickham, Esq., J. Whittaker, Esq., Ashton; J. Cheetham, Esq., Ashton; C. Mann, Esq., Leamington; James Brotherton, Esq., barrister; H. Rawson, Esq., T. Barnes, Esq., Halshaw Moor; J. B. Scott, Esq., Samuel Fletcher, jun. Esq., H. Ashworth, Esq., Turton; S. Lees, Esq., T. Bazley, jun. Esq., J. B. Smith Esq., J. Simpson, Esq., J. G. M'Ninness, Esq., Warrington; I. Wild, Esq., Oldham; J. Fletcher, J. Howard, and J. Earnshaw, Esqrs., Oldham; J. Baxter, Esq., Hollinwood; G. Crossfield, Esq., Warrington; J. T. Crook, Esq., Liverpool; J. Crook, Esq., Bolton; W. Morris, Esq., J. Harding, Esq., T. Bright, Esq., T. H. Williams, Esq., Rev. Mr. Fox, Leeds; J. D. Fernley, Esq., Stockport; T. Woolley, Esq., W. M'Call, Esq., W. Shuttleworth, Esq., J. Rawson, Esq., C. Cobden, Esq., S. P. Robinson, Esq., J. E. Royle, Esq., and W. Evans, Esq.

The Chairman, on rising to open the proceedings, was loudly cheered. He said—Ladies and Gentlemen, there have been meetings held in this room which have filled the spectators, [on previous occasions, with considerable astonishment, but I confess I never in my life saw a meeting where the people were "potted"—more completely.—[Here the Chairman was interrupted by a slight disturbance arising from the over crowded state of the meeting. He continued:] I must beg of the meeting to make every allowance for the inconvenience to which it will be subjected to night (hear, hear); and I also must call on the gentlemen who are placed in inconvenient situations, to preserve as much order as they can under the circumstances (hear, hear.) Since we last met, perhaps the meetings in support of the abolition of the Corn-Laws have not been quite so many as those called in support of protection, but I will venture to say that they have been of a character that has done more to riddle the old bulk of monopoly than any that have previously taken place (loud cheers.) I find, on looking over the minutes this evening, that immediately after the last meeting held in this room, a month ago, Mr. Bright and Mr. Villiers attended a meeting at Wolverhampton, and also a meeting in the Potteries. At the same time, Mr. Cobden was addressing the citizens of London—his fellow-citizens—in the Guildhall, at the largest meeting ever known to have been held in that place. We next find them assembled at Covent Gard-

Theatre; and it is said, and I believe with truth, that upwards of 30,000 tickets were applied for to that meeting. Now I am here to-night to apologise on behalf of the Committee for that which they believe must be, to some extent, regarded as an offence committed by them in refusing tickets to thousands who have applied at the League during to-day and yesterday. I myself was offered, immediately on my return from London, a donation of 5*l.* to the League Fund on condition of securing a gentleman a ticket to this meeting. Of course I declined it, and I merely mention the circumstance to show, if any friends have been disappointed, the difficulty we have had to contend with, and they may judge for themselves how far the Committee are answerable for that disappointment. Well, after the meeting at Covent Garden, another meeting was held in Manchester—that meeting was to originate the Quarter of a Million,—the Great League Fund (loud cheers). And I believe that nothing the League has ever done has so completely silenced, destroyed, the hopes of the monopolists of being able to keep up the game of protection at that step and the success which has attended it (loud cheers). For what has been the result? We find that with the few meetings that have been called for the purpose—only three—a considerable portion of the amount has been raised. At one held in the Town-hall, Manchester, and presided over by Mr. Gregg, 60,000*l.* was put down in the room—(loud cheers)—which has since been increased by other amounts—deducting the sums given by gentlemen at Liverpool to that meeting—to 75,601*l.* 10*s.* 6*d.* (loud cheers). Then, our friends proceeded to Liverpool, and there, last Friday, a meeting was called in the Amphitheatre, at which 12,000*l.* was subscribed in the room, to which may be added the subscriptions announced at the Manchester meeting from Liverpool, and those since received in Liverpool, amounting altogether to 16,000*l.* (renewed cheers.) Well, there has been another meeting—a meeting at Leeds, last night, when there was a dinner. Three hundred delegates, from the principal towns in the West Riding, met together in the Music Hall. They were presided over by the Mayor. One of the members for Leeds, Mr. Cobden, and Mr. Bright, addressed the meeting; also our gallant friend Col. Thompson (cheers); and there was subscribed in the room 34,000*l.* (great cheering). There also has been a meeting at Dundee, for the purpose of raising subscriptions; and our friends the Baxters, five of them, put down their names for 150*l.* each (cheers), making a commencement of 750*l.* from one family; and the subscription at Dundee, which is still going on, amounts to 2000*l.* (cheers.) I will not name the Glasgow and Edinburgh subscriptions in progress, because their meetings have to be held this week, and the result is not known. I only know from the correspondence which has taken place that they intend to do justice to this Fund, as they did to the last (hear, hear, and cheers). The only other meeting which has been held on behalf of the Fund, was one at Stroud, in Gloucestershire; and at Stroud, where no deputation from the League could attend, 1300*l.* has been raised (great cheering). Now then, putting the whole of these subscriptions together—including those of many large towns which are only in progress—we find the total amount to be 128,801*l.* 10*s.* 6*d.* (immense cheering.) The other meetings which have been held, and which I have omitted mentioning, have been in furtherance of the qualification movement. One of these has been held at Newcastle, where, as here, after erecting a temporary building for the purpose of immense size, as many people had to be excluded, or pretty nearly so, as those who were able to obtain admission (hear, hear). The only remedy for this state of things that I have heard suggested, is one from our gallant friend the Colonel, on our way to this meeting, that we should pull down our barns and build greater (cheers and laughter). From Newcastle, our friends journeyed to Carlisle, and thence again to Kendal, at which towns they held qualification meetings; and here they are to-night (cheers)! I shall begin the real business of the meeting by calling on Mr. Cobden (cheers).

Mr. Cobden rose amidst the most rapturous applause from all parts of the vast hall. He said—I shall begin the few remarks which I have to offer to this meeting by proposing, contrary to my usual custom, a resolution; and it is, "That the merchants, manufacturers, and other members of the National Anti-Corn-Law League claim no protection whatever for the manufactured products of this country, and desire to see obliterated for ever the few nominally protective duties against foreign manufactures, which still remain upon our statute books" (Cheers). Gentlemen, if any of you have taken the pains to wade through the reports of the protectionist meetings, as they are called, which have been held lately, you would see that our opponents, at the end of seven years of our agitation, have found out their mistake, and are abandoning the Corn Laws; and now, like unskilful blunderers as they are, they want to take up a new position, just as we are going to achieve the victory. (Cheers). Then they have been telling something very like fibs, when they claimed the corn laws as compensation for peculiar burdens. They say now that they want merely protection in common with all other interests, and they now call themselves the advocates of protection to native industry in all its branches; and by way of making the appeal to the less informed portion of the community, they say that the Anti-Corn-Law League are merely the advocates of free trade in corn, but that we want to preserve a monopoly in manufactures. Now, gentlemen, the resolution which I have to submit to you, and which we will put to this meeting to-night—the largest by far that I ever saw in this room, and comprising men of every class and of every calling in this district—let that resolution decide, once and for ever, whether our opponents can with truth lay that to our charge henceforth. There is nothing new in this proposition, for at the very beginning of this agitation—at the meeting of the Chamber of Commerce—when that faint voice was raised in that small room in King-street, in December, 1838, for the total and immediate repeal of the corn laws—when that ball was set in motion which has been accumulating in strength and velocity ever since, why, the petition stated fairly that this community wanted no protection for its own industry. (Hear, hear.) I will read the conclusion of that admirable petition; it is as follows:—"Holding one of the principles of eternal justice to be the inalienable right of every man freely to exchange the result of his labour for the productions of other people, and maintaining the practice of protecting one part of the community at the expense of all other classes to be unsound and unjustifiable, your petitioners earnestly implore your honourable house to repeal all laws relating to the importation of foreign corn and other foreign articles of subsistence, and to carry out to the fullest extent, both as affects agriculture and manufactures, the true and peaceful principles of free trade, by removing all existing obstacles to the unrestricted employment of industry and capital." (Cheers.) Now, we have passed similar resolutions at all our great aggregate meetings of delegates in London ever since that was issued. Gentlemen, I don't put this resolution as an argument or as an appeal to meet the appeals made in the protection societies meetings. I believe that the men who now, in this seventh year of our discussion, can come forth before their country, and talk as those men have done—I believe that you might as well preach to the deaf adder. (Hear, hear.) You cannot convince them. I doubt whether they have not been living in their shells, like oysters; I doubt whether they know that such a thing is in existence as a railroad, or a penny postage, or even as a heir to the throne. (Great laughter and cheering.) They are in profound ignorance of every thing, and incapable of being taught. We don't appeal to them, but to a very large portion of this community, who don't take a very prominent part in this discussion—who may be considered as important lookers-on. Many have been misled by the reiterated assertions of our opponents; and it is at this eleventh hour to convince these men, and to give them an opportunity of joining our ranks, as they will do, that I offer this proof of disinterestedness and the fairness of our proposals. I don't intend to go into an argument to convince any man here that protection to all must be protection to none. If it takes from one man's pocket, and allows him to compensate himself by taking an equivalent from another man's pocket, and if that goes on in a circle through the whole community, it is only a clumsy process of robbing all to enrich none; and simply has this effect, that it ties up the hands of industry in all directions. I need not offer one word to convince you of that. The only motive that I have to say a word is, that what I say here may convince others elsewhere—the men who meet in protection societies. But the arguments I should adduce to an intelligent audience like this, would be spoken in vain to the members of parliament who are now the advocates of protection. I shall meet them in less than a week, in London, and there I will teach them the A, B, C of this protection. (Immense cheering.) It is of no use trying to teach children words of five syllables, when they have not got out of the alphabet. (Applause.) Well, gentlemen, what exhibitions these protectionists have been making of themselves! Judging from the length of their speeches, as you see them reported, you might fancy the whole community was in motion. Unfortunately for us, and for the reputation of our countrymen, the men who can utter the drivelling nonsense which we have had exhibited to the world lately, and the men who can listen to it, are very few in number. I doubt exceedingly whether all the men who have attended all the protection meetings, during the last month, might not very comfortably be put into this hall. (Cheers.) But, gentlemen, these protection societies have not only changed their principles, but it seems they have resolved to change their tactics. They have now, at the eleventh hour, again resolved that they will make their body political, and look after the registration. (Laughter.) Why, what simpletons they must have been to have thought that they could do any good without that. So they have resolved that their societies shall spend their money in precisely the same way that the League have been expending theirs. Why, they have hitherto been telling us, in all their meetings, and in all their newspapers, that the League is an unconstitutional body; that it is an infernal club which aims at corrupting, at vitiating, and at swamping the registrations; and now, forsooth, when no good can possibly come of it—when they most certainly have wisely abstained from imitating it, since they cannot do any good, and have kept up the strain they formerly had, of calling the League an unconstitutional body; they resolve to rescind their resolution, and to follow his Grace the Duke of Portland's advice, and fight us with our own weapons. Now, I presume, we are a constitutional body. (Much cheering.) Eh, it is a fortunate thing that we have not great dukes to lead us (laughter). But, now, of what force is this resolution? Like everything they do, it is farcical—it is unreal. The protection societies, from the beginning, have been nothing but phantoms. They are not realities; and what is their resolution—what does it amount to? They resolve that they will look after the registration. Why, we all know that they have done their worst in that way already. We all know that these landlords may really make their acres a kind of electioneering property. We know right well that their land agents are their electioneering agents. We know that their rent-rolls have been made their muster-rolls for fighting the battle of protection. These poor drivelling people say that we buy qualifications and present them to our friends; that we bind them down to vote as we please. We have never bought a vote, and we never intend to buy a vote or to give one (cheers). Should we not be blockheads to buy votes and give them, when we have ten thousand persons ready to buy them at our request (applause). But I suspect that our protectionist friends have a notion that there is some plan—some secret, sinister plan,—by which they can put fictitious votes on the register (Hear, hear). Now I beg to tell them that the League is not more powerful to create votes than it is to detect the flaws in the bad votes of our opponents; and they may depend on it, if they attempt to put fictitious votes on the register, that we have our ferrets in every county—(laughter and cheers)—and that they will find out the flaws; and when the registration time comes, we'll have an objection registered against every one of their fictitious qualifications, and make them produce their title-deeds, and show that they have paid for them.—

(Cheers.) Well, gentlemen, we have our protectionist opponents; but how we may congratulate ourselves on the position which they have given to this question by the discussion that has been raised everywhere during the last few months! We cannot enter a steamboat or a railway carriage—nay, we cannot even go into an omnibus, but the first thing that any man does, almost before he has deposited his umbrella, is to ask, "Well, what is the last news about the Corn-Laws?" (Cheers.) Now, we, who remember how difficult it was, at the beginning of our agitation, to bring men's minds to the discussion of this question, when we think that every newspaper is now full of it—the same broad sheet containing, perhaps, a report of this meeting, and of the miserable drivelling of some hole-and-corner agricultural gathering—and when we think that the whole community is engaged in reading the discussion, and pondering on the several arguments, we can desire no more. The League might close its doors to-morrow, and its work might be considered as done, the moment it compels or induces people to discuss the question. But the feeling I have alluded to is spreading beyond our own country. I am glad to hear that in Ireland the question is attracting attention. You have probably heard that my friend Mr. Bright and I have received a requisition, signed by merchants and manufacturers of every grade and party in Belfast, soliciting us to go there and address them, and I deeply regret that we cannot put our feet on Irish ground, to advocate this question. (Applause.) To-day I have received a copy of a requisition to the mayor of Drogheda, calling a meeting for next Monday, to petition for the total and immediate repeal of the Corn-Laws, (cheers)—and I am glad to notice at the head of that requisition the name of the Catholic Primate, Dr. Crolly, a man eminent for learning, piety, and moderation, and that it is also headed by the rest of the Catholic clergy of that borough. (Loud applause.) I hope that these examples will not be without their due effect in another quarter. We have, I believe, the majority of every religious denomination with us—I mean the dissenting denominations; we have them almost en masse, both ministers and laymen, and I believe the only body, the only religious body, which we may not say we have with us as a body, are the members of the Church of England. (Cries of "Hear, hear!" and "Shame on them!") On this point I will just offer this remark: the clergy of the Church of England have been placed in a most invidious, and, I think, an unfortunate position, by the mode in which their tithe commutation charge was fixed some years ago. My friend Col. Thompson will recollect it, for he was in Parliament at the time, and protested against the way in which the tithe commutation rent-charge was fixed. He said, with the great foresight he had always shown in the struggle for the repeal of the Corn-Laws, that it would make the clergy of the Church of England parties to the present Corn-Law by fixing their tithe at a fixed quantity of wheat, fluctuating according to the price of the last seven years. Let it be borne in mind that every other class of the community may be directly compensated for the repeal of the Corn-Laws—I mean every class connected with agriculture—except the clergy. The landlords may be compensated, if prices fall, by an increased quantity of produce, so also may the farmer and the labourer; but the clergy of the Church of England receive a given number of quarters of wheat for their tithe, whatever the price may be. I think however we may draw a favourable conclusion, under all the circumstances, from the fact that I believe there has not been one clergyman of the Church of England at all eminent for rank, piety, or learning, who has come out, notwithstanding the strong temptation of personal interest, to advocate the existing Corn-Law (hear, hear). I think that we may take this as a proof of the very strong appeal to justice which this question makes, and perhaps augur also that there is a very strong feeling amongst the great body of the members of the Church of England in favour of free trade in corn (hear, hear, and cheers). Well, gentlemen, there is one other quarter in which we have seen the progress of sound principles—I allude to America. We have received the American President's Message; we have had also the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, and both President Polk and Mr. Secretary Walker have been taking my friend Col. Thompson's task out of his hands, and lecturing the people of America on the subject of free trade (cheers). I have never read a better digest of the arguments in favour of free trade than that put forth by Mr. Secretary Walker, and addressed to the Congress of that country. I augur from all these things that our question is making rapid progress throughout the world, and that we are coming to the consummation of our labours (cheers). We are verging now towards the session of Parliament, and I predict that the question will either receive its quietus, or that it will lead to the dissolution of this parliament; and then the next will certainly relieve us from our burden. (Cheers.) Now gentlemen, many people are found who speculate on what Sir Robert Peel may do in the approaching session of parliament. It is a very hazardous thing, considering that in one week only you will be as wise as I shall, to venture to make a prediction on this subject. (A cry of "We are very anxious.") You are very anxious, no doubt. Well, let us see if we can speculate a little on futurity, and relieve our anxiety. (Cheers.) There are three courses open to Sir Robert Peel. He may keep the law as it is; he may totally repeal it; or he may do something between the two, by tinkering his scale again, or giving us a fixed duty. Now, I predict that Sir Robert Peel will either keep the law as it is, or he will propose totally to abolish it. And I ground my prediction on this, because these are the only two things that anybody in the country wants him to do. There are some who want to keep protection as it is; others want to get rid of it; but nobody wants anything between the two. He has his choice to make, and I have this opinion of his sagacity, that, if he changes at all, he will change for total repeal. (Cheers.) But, gentlemen, the question is, "Will he propose total and immediate repeal?" (Loud cries of Hear, hear.) Now, there, if you please, I will forbear to offer a prediction. But I will venture to give you a reason or two why I think he ought to take total and immediate repeal. I don't think that any class is so much interested in having the Corn-Laws totally and immediately repealed as the farming class. I believe that it is of more importance to the farmers to have the repeal instantaneous, instead of gradual, than to any other class of the community. In fact, I observe, in the report of a recent Oxfordshire protection meeting, given in to-day's paper, that when Lord Norreys was alluding to the probability of Sir Robert Peel abolishing the Corn-Laws gradually, a farmer of the name of Gillatt cried out, "We had better be drowned outright than ducked to death." (Great laughter and cheering.) Gentlemen, I used to employ another simile—a very humble one, I admit. I used to say that an old farmer had told me that if he was going to cut off his sheep-dog's tail, it would be far more humane to cut it off all at once than a piece every day in the week. But now I think that the farmer's simile in Oxford is the newest and the best that we can use. Nothing could be more easy than to demonstrate that it is the true interest of the farmers, if the Corn-Law is to be abolished, to have it abolished instantly. If the Corn-Law were abolished to-morrow, my firm belief is, that instead of wheat falling, it would have a tendency to rise. That is my firm belief, because speculation has already anticipated Sir Robert Peel, and wheat has fallen in consequence of that apprehension. I believe that, owing to the scarcity everywhere—I mean in all parts of Europe—you could not, if you prayed for it, if you had your own wishing cap on, and could make your own time and circumstances—I believe, I say, that you could never find such an opportunity for abolishing the Corn-Laws totally and immediately as if it were done next week (loud cheers); for it so happens that the very countries from which, in ordinary times, we have been supplied, have been afflicted, like ourselves, with scarcity—that the countries of Europe are competing with us for the very small surplus existing in America. They have, in fact, anticipated us in that market, and they have left the world's markets so bare of corn, that whatever your necessities may be, I defy you to have other than high prices of corn during the next twelve months, though the Corn-Law was abolished to-morrow (hear, hear). European countries are suffering as we are from the same evil. They are suffering from scarcity now, owing to their absurd legislation respecting the article of corn. Europe altogether has been corrupted by the vicious example of England in her commercial legislation. There they are, throughout the continent of Europe, with a population increasing at the rate of four or five millions a year, yet they make it their business, like ourselves, to put barriers in the way of a sufficiency of food to meet the demand of an increasing population. I believe that if you abolish the Corn-Law honestly, and adopt free-trade in its simplicity, there will not be a tariff in Europe that will not be changed in less than five years, to follow your example (cheers). Well, gentlemen, suppose the Corn-Law be not abolished immediately, but that Sir Robert Peel brings in a measure giving you a duty of 5s. 6s. or 7s., and going down 1s. a year, for four or five years, till the whole duty is abolished, what would be the effect of that on foreign countries? They will then exaggerate the importance of this market when the duty is wholly off. They will go on raising supplies, calculating that, when the duty is wholly off, they will have a market for their produce, and high prices to remunerate them; and if, as is very likely and consistent with our experience, we should have a return to abundant seasons, these vast importations would be poured upon our markets, probably just at the time when our prices are low; and they would come here, because they would have no other market, to swamp our markets and deprive the farmer of the sale of his produce at a remunerating price. But, on the contrary, let the Corn Law be abolished instantly; let foreigners see what the English market is in its natural state, and then they will be able to judge from year to year and from season to season what will be the future demand from this country for foreign corn. There will be no extravagant estimate of what we want—no contingency of bad harvests to speculate upon. The supply will be regulated by the demand, and will reach that state which will be the best security against both gluts and famine (cheers). Therefore, for the farmers' sakes, I plead for the immediate abolition of this law. A farmer never can have a fair and equitable understanding or adjustment with his landlord, whether as respects rent, tenure, or game, until this law is wholly removed out of his way. Let the repeal be gradual, and the landlord will say to the farmer, through the land agent, "Oh, the duty will be 7s. next year; you have not had more than twelve months' experience of the working of the system yet;" and the farmer goes away without any settlement having been come to. Another year passes over, and when the farmer presents himself, he is told, "Oh, the duty will be 5s. this year; I cannot yet tell what the effect will be; you must stop awhile." The next year the same thing is repeated, and the end is, that there is no adjustment of any kind between the landlord and tenant. But put it at once on a natural footing, abolish all restrictions, and the landlord and tenant will be brought to a prompt settlement; they will be placed precisely on the same footing as you are in your manufactures (cheers). Well, gentlemen, I have now spoken on what may be done. I have told you, too, what I should advocate; but I must say, that whatever is proposed by Sir Robert Peel, we, as free traders, have but one course to pursue. If he proposes a total and immediate and unconditional repeal, we shall throw up four caps for Sir Robert Peel (tremendous cheering). If he proposes anything else, then Mr. Villiers will be ready, as he has been on former occasions—(renewed applause)—to move his amendment for a total and immediate repeal of the Corn-Laws (applause). We are not responsible for what ministers may do; we are but responsible for the performance of our duty. We don't offer to do impossibilities; but we will do our utmost to carry out our principles (cheers). But, gentlemen, I tell you honestly, I think less of what this Parliament may do, I care less for their opinions, less for the intentions of the prime minister and the cabinet, than what may be the opinion of a meeting like this and of the people out of doors. This question will not be carried by ministers or by the present Parliament; it will be carried, when it is carried, by the will of the nation (much applause). We will do nothing that can remove us a hair's breadth from that rock which we have stood upon with so much safety for the last seven years. All other parties have been on a quicksand, and floated about by every wave, by every tide, and by every wind—some floating to us, others, like fragments scattered over the ocean, without rudder or compass; whilst we are upon solid ground, and no temptation, whether of parties or of ministers, shall ever make us swerve a hair's breadth (vehement and protracted cheering). I am anxious to hear now, at the last meeting before we go to Parliament—before we enter that arena to which all men's minds will be turned during the next week; I am anxious, not merely that we should all of us understand each other on this question, but that we should be considered as occupying an independent and isolated position as we did at the first moment of the formation of this League (cheers). We have nothing to do with Whigs or Tories; we are stronger than either of them; and if we stick to our principles, we can, if necessary, beat both (applause). And I hope we perfectly understand now, that we have not, in the advocacy of this great question, a single object in view but that which we have honestly avowed from the beginning. Our opponents may charge us with designs to do other things. No, gentlemen, I have never encouraged that. Some of my friends have said, "When this work is done, you will have some influence in the country; you must do so and so." I said then, as I say now, "Every new political principle must have its special advocates, just as every new faith has its martyrs" (hear, hear and cheers). It is a mistake to suppose that this organization can be turned to other purposes. It is a mistake to suppose that men, prominent in the advocacy of the principle of free trade, can with the same force and effect identify themselves with any other principle hereafter. It will be enough if the League accomplishes the triumph of the principle we have before us. I have never taken a limited view of the object or scope of this great principle. I have advocated this question probably very much as a trader. But I have been accused of looking too much to material interests. Nevertheless I can say that I have taken as large and great a view of the effects of this mighty principle as ever did any man who dreamt over it in his own study. (Hear, hear.) I believe that the physical gain will be the smallest gain to humanity from the success of this principle. I look further; I see in the free trade principle that which shall act on the moral world as the principle of gravitation in the universe,—drawing men together, thrusting aside the antagonism of race, and creed, and language, and uniting us in the bonds of eternal peace (loud applause). I have looked even farther. I have speculated, and probably dreamt, in the dim future—ay, a thousand years hence—I have speculated on what the effect of the triumph of this principle may be. I believe that the effect will be to change the face of the world, so as to introduce—a system of government entirely distinct from that which now prevails. I believe that the desire and the motive for large and mighty empires; for gigantic armies and great navies—for those materials which are used for the destruction of life and the desolation of the rewards of labour—will die away; I believe that such things will cease to be necessary or to be used when man becomes one family, and freely exchanges the fruits of his labour with his brother man. I believe that, if we could be allowed to reappear on this sublimary scene, we should see, at a far distant period, the governing system of this world revert to something like the municipal system; and I believe that the speculative philosopher of a thousand years hence will date the greatest revolution that ever happened in the world's history from the triumph of the principle which we have met here to advocate. I believe these things; but, whatever may have been my dreams and speculations, I have never obtruded them upon others; I have never acted upon personal or interested motives in this question; I seek no alliance with parties or favour from parties, and I will take none—(bursts of enthusiastic applause)—but, having the feeling I have of the sacredness of the principle, I say that I can never agree to tamper with it. I, at least, will never be suspected of doing otherwise than pursuing it disinterestedly, honestly, and resolutely. (Tremendous and long-continued applause.)

Mr. BRIGGS, M.P., was next called upon, and came forward to second the motion. He was received with the most enthusiastic applause. He said—There is an old adage which says that "practice makes perfect," and after the many occasions on which we have had to address public meetings on this question, it might be thought that it was a very easy matter to speak to-night. But I confess that it appears to me that the more nearly this great question approaches to its final settlement, the more onerous is the responsibility which attaches to those engaged in it, and especially of those connected with it who have been prominent in carrying out its proceedings (hear, hear). Looking back to the long years of arduous labour we have devoted to this cause, I am, however, cheered by the belief that the great success which has attended us heretofore, will not now forsake us until the end (cheers). A distinguished writer has said that "empire would be eternal, if the energy and the wisdom displayed in building it up were employed for its conservation," and I believe that if the single-mindedness, the resolution, the determination, with which we have carried on this movement until now, be continued for a little time longer, we shall see a complete and a glorious reward for all the labours which any of us may have bestowed upon this cause (hear, hear, and cheers). Everything indicates that the controversy is waxing hotter and hotter; but there is one peculiar feature to be observed in the newspaper press at this time, which is deserving of attention,—that although the Times, the Morning Chronicle, and other papers which advocate the total abolition of the Corn-Law, give fairly, openly, and at full length, the reports of all the "protection" meetings that are of the slightest importance, yet the Morning Herald, and the Standard, and the Post, leave altogether out of their columns any report of such unparalleled assemblages as we have been holding for the last few days (hear, hear). I take it that this proves that our cause is felt to be the stronger (hear, hear), and that our arguments would not do to lay alongside the arguments of the protectionists (cheers and laughter). But these newspapers have always taken this course. The protectionist newspapers have for years past offered support and security to the farmer as the result of this law. When this present Corn-Law was passed, the Standard declared, with the most positive asseveration, that there was no power on earth could change the Corn-Law for at least ten years to come (a laugh). Now, if their readers had believed them in this assurance, does any man believe that the aristocracy and squirearchy would be found coming out of their halls to make such ridiculous spectacles of themselves as we have seen during the last few days, and that we should have heard them charging Sir Robert Peel with treason of the blackest character? Why, every man who has carefully watched his proceedings and heard what he has said—every man who has heard the disquisitions upon his speeches at our meetings—must have known and been assured that Sir Robert Peel was on the direct high road to the not distant abrogation of the Corn-Law (hear, hear). But what have these newspapers been saying? They have fed their deluded readers—if readers they have (a laugh)—with the belief that the people of Lancashire have been more than doubling their capital within the last twelve months; and the Standard has been labouring hard to persuade the monopolists that the League was nothing after all, and that if people would not make a noise about it, it would never be heard of (laughter). Now, there have been many speculations as to the late disruption and overthrow of Sir Robert Peel's Cabinet; and if we did not know that it has been brought about and has been the result of that discussion of the Corn-Law, to which the League has been instrumental, I should say that that Cabinet was destroyed by the patronage of those newspapers which have professed to be its organs (laughter). For there is no newspaper published in this kingdom which is so notorious for execrable writing, and still worse argument, than is that morning paper which has tried hard to become the organ of Sir Robert Peel's government (cheers). And if no other cause had been assigned for the decease of that administration—if a coroner's inquest had been held upon Sir Robert Peel's late government, to find out the cause of its death, I am certain that the verdict of the jury must have been that it died of the advocacy of the Morning Herald and Standard (loud cheers and laughter). Allusion has already been made to the meetings of the lords and squires. Why, this is the time of year, I believe, when Merry-Andrew exhibitions are numerous at the various Christmas fairs throughout the country (laughter); but these Merry-Andrew exhibitions are of this peculiar character, that there is nothing merry about them. If there is anything justifiable in this system of protection, which the agriculturists claim a right to, then I think those who get up the Christmas pantomimes have a clear ground for protection against these agricultural societies. (Hear and laughter.) The great Central Agricultural Association has met, and the extraordinary number of from 200 to 300 persons assembled. (Laughter.) The Duke of Richmond was, as usual, prime mover and chairman, the Duke of Buckingham not coming prominently forward. The sayings of this Duke are worthy of remark; not for their wisdom, but I believe it is possible often to learn something from a fool. (Cheers and much laughter.) He says that we have attacked the agricultural interest, because we know that that great and powerful interest stands between us and the carrying out of our dangerous and democratic views. Now where did he learn that we had any democratic views? It is not in our writings or in our speeches. (Hear, hear.) We have done nothing that is likely to prove half so dangerous and disastrous for the aristocracy of England as the aristocracy is doing for itself. (Cheers.) Why, all the harsh words and all the arguments you could bring against the reasonableness or unreasonableness of maintaining an aristocracy—could not be half so damning as the fact that the aristocracy are at issue with twenty-seven millions of people on the vital and important question as to whether these people should be allowed to feed themselves. (Great cheering.) There are people who have ulterior objects. It would be a pitiable condition the people would be reduced to if they were all at one mark—if some were not moving on faster than others; but I may tell the Duke of Richmond and his co-labourers in the cause of monopoly, that they themselves are holding out the most pressing invitations man can hold out to the great mass of the people, to go on with that which we have begun, and to wrest from them the power they have exercised to the great injury, and I would say to the ruin of many thousands of the people of Great Britain. But this Duke of Richmond declares—and the force of impudence could not farther go—that they have never sought protection for themselves, but for the good of all their countrymen. (Laughter.) Now I ask for whose interest except his own, he sought protection for the salmon fishery in the river Spey? (Cheers.) I believe that in the days of our grandfathers, when salmon was more plentiful, it was common to put a clause in articles of apprenticeship, that boys should not be compelled to eat salmon more than four days a week, (laughter); but I cannot conceive how people were to be benefited by laws which shut out all salmon from the north of Europe, and compelled us to go to the drag-nets of the Duke of Richmond for this delicious fish. (Hear, hear.) Yet this Duke comes before a meeting and says—and allows the reporters to send it all through the country, that he has no interest in this question beyond what the whole of the people have in it! (Laughter.) There was, besides the illustrious duke, a Lord Beaumont at the meeting, who made a long speech, and who made, perhaps, as much of these protection laws as it was in the power of any lord to do. One of the passages in his speech was, that—"If he thought that the effect of the operation of the Corn Laws was to enhance the value of corn by diminishing the supply of the food of the people, he would avail himself of that occasion to say to the meeting, that it was an unhallowed cause in which they were engaged, and that the sooner they abandoned it the better. (Cheers.)" And this was received with cheers. Now there is besides this passage another immediately after, which is worth while reading along with it—"The principle which had been adopted in the Corn Law was to encourage the importation of corn when the prices were such as do indicate a scarcity—(hear, hear); and be it remembered that prices were the only indication of scarcity which could be adopted —an indication which must be correct if the averages of the country were struck correctly, and managed honestly—(hear, hear). Those were the true indications of a want of abundance of food." Now this is precisely what we say. We say, if he believed the corn law was intended to raise the price of corn by making corn scarce, that he would say it was an unhallowed work in which they were engaged. And then he admits that we are to find out whether there is an indication of scarcity by the variations in the price of corn. Well, now, how is it that corn is at a high price now? Is it because there is more corn in the country than is wanted, or less? Why is it that in abundant harvests prices are low and in scarce ones high? Why because deficient harvests necessarily lead in some degree to scarcity, and that scarcity rises in some degree the price. This corn law is intended to raise the price. The only fear the protectionists have of its abolition is lest the price of corn should as a consequence go down. Then if this be the fact, if this law be intended to create an advance in the price of corn, I do not see how Lord Beaumont can escape from the conclusion that this corn law is calculated to have the effect of making the supply of corn smaller than it would be, and that in accordance with his own statement at Willis's Room he, and those with him engaged in an "unhallowed work" (cheers). But Lord Beaumont says, and says truly, that every one must be aware that if the Corn-Law goes, every other protection must go with it. And I ask him why? We in the manufacturing district are not protected, but yet I should say that his argument may not be good. It may be that the sugar protection is very necessary, although the Corn-Law may be found not to be so; and assuredly if the abolition of the corn monopoly would hurt the landowners and farmers, it may be fairly presumed that the abolition of all other monopolies would only add to the evil and calamity with which the country has been visited (hear, hear). Mr. Christopher spoke at this meeting—(the man who was called the "pilot balloon in 1842, though no man on earth could look more unlike a pilot balloon)—he made a remark, which men of the West India interest will take to heart. He said:—"It had been truly said by his noble friend that if they removed from agriculture that protection to which it was undoubtedly entitled, they must also remove protection from all the manufacturing and colonial industry of the country. With respect to colonial industry, no one would regret more than he (Mr. Christopher) the removal of protection from it. (Hear, hear). But a large and ample protection was given to the colonies at a considerable expense to the agricultural interest." Well, then, I want him to tell us at whose expense protection is given to the agricultural interest! (Hear, hear.) Lord Beaumont followed it up by saying that the Northampton shoemakers would be in a terrible plight, and that the watchmakers of Coventry would be in the same condition if protection were removed. Now we have had meetings at both places, and resolutions carried in favour of free-trade by large majorities! As to the watchmakers of Coventry, why does not every one know that not a man goes abroad now-a-days, but he comes back with a Geneva watch in his pocket; and I dare say a large portion of the gold watches in this room are of that manufacture; therefore, the law affords no protection to the watchmakers. But Lord Beaumont warns them with the intimation that the shoemakers and watchmakers will have to suffer the same fate if the landowners' monopoly goes. The witty editor of the Examiner tells us of a cock which, when strutting about the stable, reminded the horses that they should tread very softly for fear of injuring each other. (Great laughter, and cheers.) But Lord Beaumont went farther than this. He adverted to labour simply, and he said protection and labour must not be withdrawn or it could not be said where the evil would end. He said:—"But carry out the principle of free trade, as applied to labour—take away the protection afforded to labour by the operation of the Poor-Law, and what would become of that class? (Hear, hear.) God forbid that should ever come to pass. God forbid anything should be done to aggravate the sufferings of that class: but if this race of free trade were once begun it could not stop at landlord and tenant—(hear, hear)—but it must run through all the various ranks of society until it reached these poor deluded men" (laughter). I presume all the men who met at Goatcote, in the parish of Lyncham, the other day, are included in this warning. He talks of the protection of the Poor-Law. The Poor-Law is no more a protection to the weaver and labourer than it is to the House of Peers (applause). The one has as much right to its protection as the other, and Lord Beaumont has as much protection from it as any labourer has; and he has no right to base upon it this additional one, that he will have the privilege of selling his produce at an additional price. (Cheers.) But what does this law which he says gives protection to the labourer say? Does it not say that it shall be made harsh? Its object is to drive men from parochial assistance and to make them fall back upon "their own resources." We ask Lord Beaumont and his peers to do that which they say the poor man should do, that they may not live upon the industry of others (cheers)—that they shall not feed us and shut us out from the world's market, and take the high places of the land, and by their authority pass laws which trample upon the poor for the sake of adding to the riches of the already most powerful and richest class in the kingdom (cheers). What dreadful things are to happen if bread is made plentiful enough for all the people! Why such calamities have never befallen any country as we are threatened with if the people take to eating beef and wheaten bread instead of potatoes (much laughter)! We shall begin by-and-bye to associate the idea of potatoes with peers, and of coronets with curry-powder (cheers and laughter)—and I was going to say, but for what we have heard in some degree as an excuse for the church, of mitres with mangel-wurzel (renewed cheers and laughter). Now, what are these terrible evils? That land will be thrown out of cultivation; that people will, many of them, be thrown out of employment; that the aristocracy will not be able to keep their position in society; that the church will be overthrown and Christianity along with it; and that the monarch, now so beloved and respected through the kingdom, will no longer be thought worthy to wear a crown (cheers and derilive laughter). Now, the consequences will be very different—they will be very simple. I admit that they will not be such as Lord Beaumont or the Duke of Richmond would like. I recollect a statement made by a man who was brought up before a magistrate charged by a lady with asking for relief, and when she declined to give, the ruffian came very near her and looked very fiercely, and said: "You had better give me some money, or else——" Well, the magistrate thought it a very serious case, and shook his head, and looked very like a magistrate (laughter), and after hearing the charge fully made, he put it to this ruffian what he meant, "Why," he said, "all I meant was, she must give me some money, or else——I should have to work for it" (cheers and laughter). Why, this is precisely what will happen to the aristocracy and squirearchy when the great mass of the people have enough bread to eat (cheers). It's not a very awful calamity if it should happen (laughter). I do not pretend to understand exactly what our constitution is made of; whether it stands upon a point or pivot so nicely balanced that it may be easily overturned; but I have no idea that it is of a construction so fragile that it will be overturned because we have plenty to eat (applause and laughter). Now the plain meaning of all this is, that these Dukes must turn to honest courses. They must come to understand their own position in the country—and a great and glorious position it is, if they did but understand it. Look to their broad acres! Some of them—I was going to say you might travel an hour by railway through some of their estates—and what they might but accomplish if they were men (cheers). See the manner in which they might stimulate the industry and provide for the moral comforts of the people around them! See how they might be leaders of counties and towns, instead of being, as now, mere contemptible tyrants, and jealous of every man who asks his countrymen to look them in the face (cheers)! But what a delusion it is about this protection. I think it was the late Professor Porson who had a great objection to sea-bathing, and who said he supposed the only reason why it was in any repute at all, was because some few persons had been known to survive it! That is the only reason given for continuing protections. Some few trades have lived—they have not gone stark out, although they have had this protection; and it would seem on that account these ignorant men cling to this protection, as if there was something good and really salutary about it (applause and laughter). There's a new—not exactly a new dodge, but one that is brought up again and made a little more prominent, of protecting industry generally throughout the country, seems to me the most officious thing in the world. We don't want any protection here; and yet I think considerable portion of the industry of the country will be seen within the borders of these two counties of York and Lancaster. I can conceive it like nothing but taking some one on a very hot sultry day, and offering him protection, and loading him with coat upon coat till you almost sweat him to death. And you find that wherever they have been the mourning-fathers of trades it has not answered; the child of protection has always been a starved child and decrepid, and has never attained to maturity and manhood (applause). And why then should they thus cling to it? Why, they cling to it for reasons stated by a clergyman who is the relation of a dignitary of the church; for he bears the name of the family of the Archbishop of York. I speak of a speech of the Rev. Vernon Harcourt, delivered at the Chichester meeting. I like to see these men come out, because they, like innocent children, in their simplicity, if there is a secret, let out the truth; and then we find what protection is for. He says:—"It was well known that landed proprietors were not, generally speaking, accumulators of wealth; that, for the most part, they live nearly, if not quite, up to their incomes. They could scarcely maintain their station in society on their present incomes. How were they to maintain them when one-fifth part was taken away? He would appeal to professional men, and those who were familiar with the management of landed estates, whether they were not buttressed with numerous incumbrances, with mortgages, annuities, life insurances, jointures, and he knew not what, which made it extremely difficult for the owners to maintain their station in society? What then, were they to do? Some people would say, 'Let them retrench their superfluities, abandon their luxuries, adopt a more frugal and economical mode of life.' Suppose they were all such conscientious, self-denying men as to agree at once to make this great sacrifice, what would be the consequence to all the tradesmen whom they had been accustomed to employ—for instance, the silversmith, the watchmaker, the haberdasher, the draper, the coachmaker, the painter, the music-seller, to all who had been accustomed to administer to the luxuries which they enjoyed, or to the arts which they protected? The whole would suffer from the privations of the landowner" (laughter). Now we will suppose what he here states to be the case; but suppose I take out the agriculturist here and put in "manufacturer" or "labourer" instead. I could point out manufacturers who are not "accumulators of wealth," and who live nearly or quite up to their incomes, or up to what their business makes them (hear, and laughter); and I could tell of them that had not quite sufficient to keep up their station in society as they could wish (laughter). And then I could come to the weavers, who have a portion of their property at the pawnshop (loud laughter), and who had perhaps no property even there that was nominally theirs (hear, hear); why, I could point to men in every class of the community who might be maintained at the expense of other men, and on whose behalf we might quite as reasonably stand up and defend a law which should devote some of the landed estates to make up a manufacturer's income or support the distressed family of a weaver (hear, hear). I dare say this man is a man of kind heart, and generous, but in all probability he has read no newspaper but the Standard, and is quite ignorant of what has been going on for the last seven years. (Laughter). You have heard how the clergy are interested in this question. I think they have another fear, and a greater fear than any they have to apprehend from a fall in the price of corn. I never yet met a monopolist farmer or landowner who did not, when driven to admit that the Corn-Laws could not be maintained, cast sheep's eye at the Church or at the funds. (Laughter.) One of them is for equitable adjustment or a diminution of the interest of the fund-holders to a large extent; and the other is for getting hold of the title. (Laughter.) Now my opinion is that for Ed many generations the landowners of this country, from sire to son, have cultivated the instinct whereby the men look to live upon the profits of other people's labour, rather than upon their own property; that if this Corn-Law be abolished, and it speedily will be abolished, these landed proprietors, such is their tendency to lay hold of that which belongs to others, that even of the sacredness of the church, which they have intimated upon the people, will not be sufficient to retain its property in the hands of that institution; but these landowners will try by every means to transfer a portion of the whole of the title to the rent-roll of their landed property, instead of its now going, as it does, to the clerical incumbent of the parish. (Applause.) Now about this time last year, just before the meeting of parliament, I had the pleasure to address a meeting in this hall; and I recollect on that occasion taking up your time for a few moments by a slight recapitulation of what this League had done. I stated then, and it will not be without its use to state it again,—that there was a beginning, and that the great sum (for it was then thought great) of 5000*l.* was subscribed to testify the strength of feeling in this town of Manchester; that in succeeding years seven or eight thousand were gathered; that in the year after that, the Manchester Bazaar made a return of 10,000*l.*; that in the year 1843 the fund of 50,000*l.* was proposed, amidst the derision of the monopolists; that twelve months after that the Council of the League asked their supporters throughout the country to double that sum and to give them 100,000*l.* The laugh was not quite so general then, for they had had the experience of the 50,000*l.* (Hear, hear.) In 1845, in the spring, came out the very extraordinary exhibition—the Bazaar that was held in London, producing a sum somewhere between 29,000*l.* and 30,000*l.* (Loud cheers). In 1845 or 1846, within about a month, the project has been opened of raising 250,000*l.* for the service of the Anti-Corn-Law League. There has not been the least disposition to laugh at all at this announcement; the merriment seems to have subsided; the expression is now one of amazement (applause); and they are afraid of opening the morning papers for fear there should be some 10,000*l.*, or 20,000*l.*, or 30,000*l.* added to this gathering fund (applause and laughter). But this is not all, nor near all. Since the project of restoring the county registers has been propounded, and it is not yet two years ago—from a calculation which I am sure is below the mark, a sum of from 500,000*l.* to 600,000*l.* has been expended by the supporters of the League, principally in the northern counties and in Middlesex, for the purpose of wresting the power of legislation from the hands of the class who have so long wielded it (cheers). Now there are men who won't learn anything. We have it from very old authority, "that if you bray a fool in a mortar, he is a fool still" (cheers and laughter). Is it possible that the government and the governing class in this country can shut their eyes to facts like these? Why there is not a country on the face of the earth that can show an agitation of this character carried on for so many years that did not succeed. (Cheers.) The lesson you ought to learn from this movement is this, that we, the thousands, the millions of free-traders in Great Britain and Ireland, believe this principle for which we contend to be as sacred as any principle ever promulgated to man; and more than that, having come to this conviction, we have discovered another thing, that this principle may be carried out; and now we have the firmest faith that this League is destined to carry it out to its fullest extent in the legislation of the British empire. Sir Robert Peel sees this as plainly as any of us see it. He was not born in Lancashire for nothing. His father, that most sagacious of men, did not bring him up in his youth to be the fool in his riper age, not to see to what this great movement is tending; and I confess that notwithstanding the past, and that we have had occasion now and then to spur Sir Robert Peel, sometimes to speak harshly of him, yet I have a lingering wish—a wish, I think, that every day becomes stronger—that, as he sprang from cotton, was born in Lancashire, traces his origin to the mighty industry for which this district is distinguished, he should be the statesman that should confer on industry that freedom and that entire emancipation which we now so unanimously ask at his hands (much applause). Let him do right by the people, and the people will do honestly by him (hear, hear). Let him come out with a measure in accordance with his often avowed sentiments, and this League, with all its influence, wherever it may be, shall be up as one man to second the effort he is making (applause). But, whilst we hope, whilst we look to him for something worthy of his origin, let us bear in mind that we must rely on that power which until now has worked out our success—that is, the power of our own firm resolve (cheers)—and of our own compact and ever-growing organisation (enthusiastic applause). It is not mountain barriers, it is not ocean boundaries, which protect the liberties of a country. It is something amongst the people, something in the heart of a people; it is a self-respect and self-reliant feeling; it is to that you must trust to preserve your liberties from foreign foe or from internal enemies. These monopolists are the enemies of England; they are the enemies of man everywhere. They are in your own border, in your own camp, sapping the foundations of your national strength, and dooming your population to a more humiliating condition than the worst of foreign conquerors would ever have thought of imposing on the people of this nation (applause). We ask for what is very simple. We say that surely as much food as a man can buy, with as much wages as a man can get, for as much work as a man can do, is not more than the natural, inalienable birth-right of every man whom God has created with strength to labour and with hands to work. Now, that is the question; that is the petition; that is the simple demand which now arises from this great meeting, and from the millions who are represented here. We ask of the houses of parliament; we ask of the prime minister; we ask of all who can say a word in favour of that demand; that it shall be granted in all its entirety—that it shall be granted unconditionally; and as we are committed to this work, and have laboured for years, and have had your confidence, and now have the promise of your continued support, and are here this night, cheered by the presence of some ten thousand of the population of this town, we are prepared to say that come what may come—this League shall last as long as there shall be one shroet of duty on the importation of foreign corn. (The honourable gentleman concluded amidst a rapturous burst of general applause.)

Mr. W. J. Fox, of London, was the next speaker, and was received with much cheering. He spoke as follows:—The little month which has elapsed since I last stood upon this platform, has been rendered memorable by a proceeding which will long influence the course of events in this country, and eventually in other countries; I mean that bold challenge which you, the men of Manchester, have thrown down to monopoly for a five years' conflict, if they dare that conflict, and after that is done, with a spirit that shows your readiness for five years' more, should still think it necessary, for the accomplishment of your purpose. (Applause.) Oh, you have not been idle; you have not only been making cotton, but you have been making history. (Applause.) You have been providing material, and not raw material, for the future annals of our country. (Applause.) Elsewhere there has been change; here there has been progress. Elsewhere there has been shifting and turning out, and turning in again (laughter), showing that modern history, like old houses, may have long passages that lead to nothing (laughter). But you have shown here a short passage that leads to something, presenting a great and tangible object at once attained, and that attainment a prelude and security for a yet greater and more magnificent and enduring result to be realised through its agency. It indicates a spirit before which all opposition must quail. It shows that you have taken up this cause as those who remonstrate against slavery, for white slavery it is, as much as ever the treatment of the negroes was black slavery; the lords of food are the lords of persons all the world over (hear, hear); and these who control what you eat have their fetters and their brand upon you as much as if you were their serfs and vassals (loud applause). They know this; their own statements show a perception of such a truth. There has been already so masterly a handling of the late Protection Society meeting, that I am almost ashamed to draw back your attention to it; but although the harvest has been reaped, a few gleanings are left, of which I may avail myself, and one is, the illustration of the assertion I have just made by an hypothesis of my Lord Beaumont. He says, that "such a state of things may happen as that there shall be scarcity in Europe, and a misunderstanding with America; what then would be our condition? There might be in America abundance of corn; but there might be, at the same time, a disputed territory. At the moment when we were praying for a morsel of food, a military man in the American Congress might be moving a resolution hostile to England. What, then, would be the instruction of our Cabinet to the British Minister at Washington? A stern necessity would compel them to instruct the Queen's Ambassador to say nothing about the disputed territory; or, if the subject were forced upon him by a hostile President, to say that England was prepared to make any concessions. The British Ambassador, instead of contending for the rights of this great nation would be obliged to bend in lowly guise at the feet of the President, and beg of him to spare the English a bit of bread. Well, now, this supposition of scarcity all over Europe, and of hostility with America, is about as likely as that some comet should run foul of the earth, and should dash into chaos all the fertile fields of Europe, and cause the Atlantic and Pacific to meet over what once was American land. An approach of it is conceivable; but there is a much closer approximation in the present condition of the landowners of the country. They, so far as our interests are concerned, blight the fields of Europe with artificial scarcity; they stimulate America into unnatural hostility; and they want to see us, where Lord Beaumont says the British nation would be as to America—they want to see us at their feet, forgetting all disputed territories, having no "Oregon" to quarrel about with them, and only begging humbly that all rights may be compromised, and that we may be allowed a morsel of bread on such terms as our pockets can afford. (Applause.) We are not going to be so submissive as he supposes the British Ambassador would be at Washington. No; we will tell them that we will have the food and the right together; we will compromise nothing in respect to the position which they occupy; we stand on the universal claim of humanity—honest, toiling humanity—to the subsistence which it earns; and if we cannot have it any other way, we will work it out by the extension of those political rights which ancient statutes and usage confirm to the people of this country; thus at once beating back their insolence, gaining the supply of our own necessities, and teaching them that they should not keep people too hungry, nor trifle too long with their wants. Let the recoil should be so strong as to sweep their own ill-obtained and long-abused political predominance away. You have given the world a gauge of your perseverance in this cause. It is one which, once begun, can never be abandoned; one which, once begun, has no termination but its victorious termination, in the abolition of monopoly; one which you have already sustained through prosperous times and disastrous times; through evil report and good report; and let them hold out yet a while, let them drag us through more change, let them again expose the country to yet more vicissitude, let them again multiply bankruptcies and disasters, let them stimulate the howl of want through our villages and our towns,—let them get up any political diversity or bluster of war, to turn attention,—still it will be all unavailing. Through every device, through all change, you will hold on in the course you have begun, and that course can only result in absolute and unconditional success. (Applause.) And they see the symptoms of your success. They let out many facts illustrative of the condition into which they themselves have got. A Mr. Ball, a speaker at this meeting, said "the time had now arrived when concession must cease, when every member of Parliament who was elected by a county population, or by a borough dependent on rural support, must feel that his duty was to support the agricultural interest." And again he tells them, "if the county members were only true to the peasantry, the tenantry, and the farmers, the latter class would be faithful to them." The county members, and the little boroughs dependent on rural support! There all their hopes centre; they give up the towns; they have lost the towns; and how much is implied in that abandonment? (Hear, hear, hear.) To lose the towns in a question of this sort, is to lose the very centres of intelligence and light. (Applause.) It is to lose those bodies who have made the House of Commons what it is; it is to lose the power which has stimulated agriculture, for you have no such thing as skilled agriculture but where there are large towns; it is to lose the power which has made their land worth what they are; it is to lose the riches that their gain would use; it is to lose the power which has worked out every great question that the political history of this country knows; it is to lose the asylums for the hunter and starved serfs, who fly thither from the country. (Loud applause.) It is to lose whatever most plainly speaks the opinions of a great nation; and a confession of the loss is a confession of their own hostility to the common sense of mankind,—aye, of the right, the truth, the justice, of the cause which they hold in contest. (Applause.) Well, they have done with the towns; we've begun with the counties. (Applause.) We are following them up in their own regions. Their concession leaves only this field on which to fight out the remainder of this great battle, and there the struggle is about to be made. It is only a beginning yet, but it is a beginning; which, woe to them, if they abide the termination. (Cheers.) The commencement indeed is a splendid one; but which speaks first of the counties? The West Riding of Yorkshire. (Loud applause.) The foreman of the county jury of Great Britain in the county comes forward to pronounce a verdict of condemnation on this most iniquitous system. (Applause.) The example will be followed; it will go from one to another, and not exactly as the Duke of Richmond says, by fabricated votes. Fabricated, in one sense, indeed they are, as the savings of honest industry in gaining a freehold—a fabric which is an honourable memorial of the industry and patriotism of the individual, as well as a direct service to the country. (Applause.) But the votes are not fabricated in the sense of their faggot votes—are not fabricated in the sense of those mere nominal holdings by which their stewards and servants have been sent up to the poll. The votes are not fabricated in the sense in which many of their arguments are fabricated (laughter)—are not fabricated in the same sense as their quotations from Adam Smith. (Hear, hear.) And if we come to that, what is the Duke of Richmond himself, his title and his lineage? What are the Richmonds but a fabrication of Stewart lasciviousness, and of Stewart lavishness, at the expense of the nation's purse? (Applause.) Well, but they tell us now they are going to fight this out in good earnest; and should they revoke a portion of their own constitution; and their constitution won't work; they demolish it after only two years' experience. They rescind the declaration that their sovereignty shall on no account interfere with the election of members to serve in Parliament; that is, by that rescinding, they adopt the positive, and declare that that sovereignty shall interfere in the election of Members of Parliament. That sovereignty of ducal and other titled members now declares, not that they shall go to the registration courts merely, not that they will pay a lawyer, not that they will sanction votes; but they, with the Dukes of Richmond and Buckingham at their head, solemnly declare to the country that they have changed their minds, and will interfere with election of Members of Parliament. This is in the very teeth of all that has been called constitutional. (Hear.) Their determination not to interfere was either right or wrong: if right, why do they alter it? if wrong, why have they been abusing the League all this time for taking a different course? They have had their whole run of accusations; there has not been a meeting at which they have not talked of the unconstitutional proceedings of the League. There has not been an electoral contest in which they have not endeavoured to bring this notion to bear upon the minds of the electors; they have made the country ring with the cry of "Strangers from Lancashire—aliens interfering with the process of election for members of Parliament. They have taken to themselves the credit of constitutional purity and abstinence; their hands, forsooth, were clean; and they were perfectly horror-struck at the sight of these enormities. They deliberated whether they should not be put down by fresh enactments more stringent on behalf of the right of free and independent election; and now they come forward when there is a prospect of an election at hand; they came forward on the first occasion, when they could do anything, by altering all this, and throwing overboard their own resolution of abstinence; they now will interfere, and that with all their might, in order to emulate the League in the use of its own weapons. Why, who does not know they have been interfering all their lives? (Hear.) Where is there a county throughout the whole length and breadth of the land in which they have not sold off their voters according to their estates, and in which the issue of elections have not been coloured with the maps of the property of that county? They have reckoned this as a part and parcel of their inheritance. They have grown voters by a more rapid process, and with greater care for their culture, than they have grown any kind of corn; and now, in the face of all this, with one of the most daring acts of hypocrisy, at the present time (they confess their hypocrisy in the past time) they assure us that they are indeed right whichever course they pursue—the League being equally wrong whatever may be the measure which it shall adopt. In the discussions that took place on his rescinding of their original constitution, Sir Robert Peel, as usual, was roughly handled; but their moral code is a remarkable one, for I believe few people would pick out as the most intolerable vices those which they have selected for their distinguished reprobation. This same Mr. Ball says of him, that he was alarmed at the prospect of famine. "Sir Robert Peel became alarmed about famine; he quailed before the public press." Sir Robert Peel cannot return the compliment. (Applause.) They are not alarmed about famine: they can face it, so that it but put cash into their pockets. (Applause.) They are not quailing before the public press; they bear a heavier load of exposure, odium, and scorn, than any class of men has ever hitherto been found able to make head against. (Applause and laughter.) His vices, such as they esteem them, are not found in themselves; they are free from both. They have the hardihood to bear a country's anathema, so that they can but continue to reap that country's plunder. (Applause, and hear, hear.) But they are determined to be active; they will be up and doing; and it is astonishing what they are going to do. One cannot quite pierce through the whole cloud of metaphor in which it is enveloped; but something very portentous is obviously signified. They are going to rouse the British lion; they will make him roar and shake his mane (laughter); in fact they seem disposed to deal with him like a showman who stirs up the beast with a long pole that he may exhibit his fierceness. (Great laughter.) Moreover, they have hoisted their banner—they will stick to their colours—they have raised their flag to the mast; the Duke of Buckingham helped to nail the flag to the mast, and then left the meeting without speaking, to go home to dinner—the flag remaining, flying I suppose till he came back. (Laughter.) They will have "no surrender;" they will raise the cry of "no compromise." They will make Lord William Lennox poet laureate; they will distribute over the country the worst verses anybody ever saw; they will burn the Times. (Great laughter.) Don Quixote only rode a tilt against wind-mills; the Duke of Richmond will ride a tilt against cotton mills. (Cheers.) He apologises for his speaking, on the excuse of a bullet in his lungs: there must have been a mistake, I imagine, in the locality. (Laughter.) The absorbing process of the system must by this time have changed its place; instead of lead in the lungs, it is a bullet in the brain, and very ill does it perform the functions of a brain. (Cheers and laughter.) It serves him, however, to threaten with; he accumulates horror upon horror; although no conjuror he seems to adopt the imprecations of the witch in Macbeth—

"Like a rat without a tail,
I'll do—I'll do—I'll do."

(Great laughter.) Well, and let them do. (Laughter.) The men of monopoly have already, even now, an organization that can feel no disinclination, if a struggle must come, to fight it out with his class. It is for them to consider, and to measure their forces; they are but the few against the many. Three hundred of them though there might be, they were not Spartans,—no, not with all their love of Greece. (Laughter.) Willis's Rooms in St. James's is no Thermopylae, that they can long defend it against the myriads arrayed against them, who are not barbarian myriads, but champions of the nation's civilisation. (Loud cheers.) But they claim to be the majority. "The agricultural interest (says one speaker) is the majority of the nation." How do they make that out? I should like to know. Why, to do that, they take some statistical tables, in which they find put down, perhaps exclusively the number of those engaged in some one sort of mills; and they say, "There are only so many in the country; why, then, all the rest are agriculturists, and there's a majority." (Cheers and laughter.) Well, then, there are millions who have been, with an unhappy facetiousness, said "to rejoice in potatoes;" they put all these down, and reckon them in their majority. (Applause.) There are thousands and tens of thousands that are continually obliged to seek a refuge from their forlorn condition under these lords of protection, that have to fly into the manufacturing districts for something wherewithal to get a bit of bread; or have to take that forlorn asylum, the union workhouse; or, worse than that, perhaps are driven to crime and the gaol; and they reckon them, too, in their majority. (Applause.) There are those pale-faced men that met by the light of the moon at Goutacre, to tell their affecting tales, their simple record of their griefs and grievances,—a record enough to make the nerves thrill, and the tears flow from every one who is formed of penetrable stuff; and they reckon them, too, as agricultural labourers, into their majority. (Applause.) There are some of a different class, that do not meet by moon light to tell their grievances, who prefer the dark night to the light of the moon, and who then steal forth to kindle up an unhalloved glare of their own creating; the men who light up their ricks and their barns; and these go into the majority; they reckon them, too. And last of all, there is Sir R. Peel himself, (laughter,) with all his faults, and shortcomings, and uncertainties; he is not a manufacturer; put him down as in the majority; and thus they make up their majority. Curious mode this of balancing accounts—precious statistics these! Why, there were 200 delegates. They will not allow delegates on all occasions from their fellow countrymen; but there were delegates from local societies to a central society: the very thing for which these men or their predecessors sought to hang Horne Tooke, Thomas Hardy, Thelwall, and their followers; and the very thing for which they did consign to a lingering existence, that was in fact a barbarian murder, in a penal settlement, Muir, Palmer, Skirving, and Margerot from Scotland. (Applause.) Now they can meet by delegation, to resolve that they will interfere with the election of members of Parliament; and then they talk of their majority. Why, if those who are already heart and soul in this cause, if those throughout our populous towns, and over all the rural districts too, were but to show themselves in their multitude and strength, they could sweep the whole clique of them from the face of the earth, and they would never be missed; the world would know nothing of their loss. (Hear, hear.) England, as a nation, would be England still, as wise and great, as free and glorious, as ever England was while Richmonds as yet had no existence on the face of the earth. (Loud applause.) Not only are they the few against the many, but their cause is that of assumption against experience, and the lessons of experience embodied in economical philosophy. They go on with the same account from time to time, of independence of foreign countries, as if it was not also independence of foreign countries upon us. They go on with that often-repeated story of low prices and low wages, and heed not the events that are passing before their eyes from year to year. When has the test of experience been appealed to,—when or where, if not on this topic? Why, Mr. Cobden has stood up in Covent Garden Theatre from year to year, and told how the system would work,—told how, if harvests were abundant, it would affect this question,—how, if harvests were deficient, the country would feel it; shown the connection of the price of food with the prosperity of trade; and no prediction has been so punctually verified, as the circling seasons have gone their round; and they witnessing all this, yet cannot learn from year to year and from month to month. (Hear, hear, hear.) Every man of philosophical mind that has written—every statistician that has accumulated his facts and arranged them in tables—all come to the same conclusion. There is no exception amongst them all. The light of knowledge, the testimony of experience—these are with us. It is against these that they wage a warfare that must be as unsuccessful in its results as it is preposterous in its characteristics. (Cheers.) To take another view of the struggle, their cause is that of ignorance against intelligence, and I say this advisedly. (Cheers.) Wherever they may have been taught—whatsoever school, college, or university may have reared them—nay, though some of them may have gone to two Universities (like the calf that sucked two cows, and became the greater calf)—whatever their training, they have shown the most deplorable ignorance—they confess it—and want of talent in the matter. (Cheers.) They say of this meeting that the debating talent of the House of Commons is altogether against them. (Hear, hear.) They were complaining a little while ago the talent of the press was against them. (Hear.) They wonder how they should be; and they talk of going into the market for talent. (Laughter.) The Morning Post was advising them to send some clever young men to the House of Commons, to plead the cause of poor, dumb agriculture. (Great laughter.) They don't see this truth, that intelligence has a natural alliance with, and a tendency towards, sound views of a nation's economy and interests—(applause)—that you cannot bribe mind to be wholly false to itself. They may purchase a word-grinding; they may set up a rhetorical manufactory; they cannot give that which gold can never buy,—that earnestness of conviction, that lucidness of view, that forcibleness of appeal, which belong alone to the consciousness of truth, and the desire of promoting the nation's advance. (Applause.) Survey the literature of our country; look at it in all its phases. There are some indulging in the remotest speculations of philosophy, and yet blending them with the vivid realisation of the scenes of past history,—like Thomas Carlyle. (Hear.) There are some crowning her melodious songs in solitude, pouring forth the poet's soliloquy, like Tennyson. (Hear.) There are some illustrations known principally working out in the details of imaginary facts, the operation of real causes,—like Harriet Martineau. (Applause.) There are hards of various kinds,—our Leigh Hunts, and Hoares, and Brownings, and Landons,—each in their way rendering song the eloquence of truth. There are some, like Foster, writing lives of statesmen of the commonwealth, and by the history of ancient patriotism, keeping alive the flame of modern patriotism. There are some that show what truth and beauty may be in humble life, what passions may agitate the bosom of the labourer, of the "carrier," of any toil-worn man; and, while dealing with homely things perhaps lending them the likeness of a fairy tale, penetrating to the profoundest truths of human nature, like Charles Dickens. (Applause.) There are some, the light and feathery quality of whose wit attracts the world's gaze, but which, however light and feathery, serves as the wind to the arrow, and sends it home to the heart of corruption,—like Douglas Jerrold. (Loud applause.) And I say, go the whole round of literature, they are ours—all ours. (Loud applause.) Ours, from the graceful fancies of Thomas Moore (hear, hear) to the stern denunciations of Ebenezer Elliott. (Applause.) They are ours, not by undetected tendency in their own writings; they are ours by explicit declarations. They are ours, all of them, more or less, by what they have written to further this great and good cause. (Applause.) They are ours by a common pledge, common pledge of a mutual bond, in which we read the worth of intellect, of talent, of genius to a country; and render to that genius grateful homage, a nobler homage than patriotism of peers ever rendered to hireling songs and strains of luxury. (Applause.) They are ours, I say, and would be ours, did contest assume a darker and more fearful character. The bard of old was warrior as well as bard,—knew how to work deeds of heroism which he knew to sing; and such is ever the tendency of genius. When it comes to the last resort, to the direct appeal, where is the poet? (Hear, hear.) Where?

"The minstrel boy to battle is gone,
In the ranks of death you'll find him;
My father's harp he has girded on,
And his wild harp is slung behind him."

(Cheers.) Oh, they are at war with the intelligence of the country, now marking a most propitious era, but every day more and more identifying itself with the wants, the rights, and the exertions of the country at large. It is a new phase in literature,—a new and glorious one,—and the herald of better times than the world has yet seen. Why, even their own sycophants, those of them who have any mind, and who may for a while have been bribed to prostitute that intellect, will say, as Thersites says of those Homeric herds drawn by Shakespeare,—the hordes who carried their brains in their bellies, and their bowels in their head—(laughter)—they will say, as Thersites says of Ajax and Achilles,—"I will go away; I will go where some wit is stirring, and leave this faction of fools." (Laughter.) They war not only against the intellect of their own land, but against the common sympathies of our nature, against the intellect of all other countries, and against the great, the mighty stream of tendency in human affairs, which, as Dr. Channing said prophetically, and, I believe, the last address he ever delivered, "sets on toward free trade whenever intellect is cultivated, as well as wherever trade is pursued, throughout the world." What is the world's petition on this question? Why, amongst those petitions which the king of Prussia disposed of so cavalierly the other day from the representations laid before him,—amongst those even we find a plea, a prayer, to be delivered from some of the nuisances of their custom houses. They want to be less imprisoned than they are by the restrictions that bind them. In France, your proceedings are reported; histories exist there already of the League, recording its past exertions, and prepared for the supplement that is to record its final triumph. (Applause.) In America, some of the best works on political economy, some of the amplest and noblest illustrations of free trade, have been produced by trans-Atlantic writers. It was predicted, 16 years ago, by Judge Cooper, in his lectures on political economy, that the corn laws of England would be abolished whenever the different classes, trading, professional, and those of limited income, should see their common interest, and unite against the corn on oppression. (Applause.) The time has come, and the prophecy is about to be fulfilled. (Applause.) The last presidential election in America, shows the way in which things are tending there. It shows us that we are at one with the world, and that they are aliens from, and in hostility with the world. What, would these dukes, and their little clique of retainers isolate Great Britain from the nations of the earth. Would they shut out the resources of other countries ready to be exchanged with ours? Would they reduce us to live, first, on the corn which they grow, and that consumed, I suppose to feed upon one another? (Laughter.) Would they bring us back to a savage state, and reduce her Majesty Queen Victoria, from being the empress of the greatest state in the world, to be—only, Queen of the Cannibal Islands? (Great laughter.)—They are struggling with interest and ineradicable sympathies. Man must feel for sorrow; it is wrought into his frame; it is a portion, one might say, of his physical constitution. The nerves will thrill at the exhibition of pain and agony. It is sad to see nobles shorn of their dignities, bereft of their estates, sent abroad, exiles over the world, to pick up a scanty subsistence as the old nobility of France was sent. It is sad to see a nobility thus reduced, although perhaps there are some of whom a jury might be disposed to say, as was once said in a case of manslaughter—"We find, saved 'em right." (Laughter.) It is sad to behold talent and industry buffetted their way through the storms of life, hardly able to make head amongst the trials and oppositions that beset them. It is sad to witness the bereavements and afflictions that come to the homes of all in their kind and their produce weeping and wailing. But the saddest of all sights is that of a multitude of people without a sufficiency of food. (Hear, hear.) That is what wrings the soul; and the sympathy reacts, strengthening the indignation with which we see that this is not the disposition of Providence, but the abuse of property, with its influence over legislative enactment. They make head against this. The common feelings of our nature cry out against them, and it is our right for which we stand (applause)—an inherent, natural, universal right. Burke, the eloquent and philosophical, calls it a natural right, even when his own feelings were excited to the highest degree of antagonism, in his endeavour to put down what were then called "the rights of man," when he sometimes went the length of denying altogether that there were such things as natural rights; but food wrought the admission from him, and he said it was most unwise and unjust to tamper with a nation's food. (Applause.) It is for this right you stand; for this you throw down the gauntlet in the face of the proud aristocracy. You dare them to the conflict which they provoke, in the registration courts, at the hustings, in the future House of Parliament; you will fight it out; and if God defend the right,—the old prayer in duels,—we know what will become of those who are only champions for the wrong,—for their own sordid gains. (Applause.) They have yet to learn the power of principle. That is something out of their calculation; their politics, for a long time, have gone on without it; and they have done much towards eradicating it from the people's minds and hearts. It has been one of the greatest blessings of the League to have revived the sense of this power of principle, to have taught us again the omnipotence of truth, to assure us that a good cause cannot be finally baffled; and in this strength we feel that we are banded together as by a holy League; the tie is as solemn as if confirmed by the oath of an angel, raising his arm to Him who liveth for ever and ever. It is a tie which every soul acknowledges. It is a principle not only of politics, but of morality, of religion, to which lives are devoted in the support of missionaries and of martyrs; and who or what are dukes and earls, that they should think it is for them to stay this tide, and to roll back these irresistible billows which are moving on to the fulfilment of the purposes to which they were ordained of God and nature? (Loud cheers.) It is coming—the end of this struggle—its auspicious end. It is coming; and come when it will, the heartfelt testimony will be borne, not here only, but all over the country, that you, men of Manchester, you have done it. (Applause.) All else has been subsidiary. Philosophers have laid down the principles; statesmen have collected the facts and arranged the results. Politicians are but the machinery by which these results are to be reduced to legislative practice. Voters, constituencies are only the intermediate powers to connect public opinion with a representative legislature. Queen, Lords, and Commons, will be but formal agents to give solemn record and authenticity to that which, wherever and however accomplished, originated with you, the men of Manchester. (Applause.) It will not be unremembered. The old man, as his daily strength reminds him of the termination of his course; as the bending body shows its inclination to the grave, and the world begins to fade away from his sight,—the old man will go to his rest, the more contented that his children will not have his hardships to struggle with,—that an easier and a blissful course is before them; and he will die with blessings on the men of Manchester. (Applause.) The future child will learn to lisp its history. It will be early taught the events that have brought the world into the condition in which its own eyes were first opened; and as it traces those pages, its sight cannot but rest on one, the brightest amongst them all, which tells of the good that in this great struggle was wrought out by you, the men of Manchester. (Applause.) You will all of you face your own last great change with stouter hearts, in the consciousness, that whatever else may have been your short comings, in this great matter you leave the world better than you found it. (Applause.) And in future times, when there is more of enjoyment on the face of the earth, and the people, leading their glad some lives, compare them with the past, to stimulate their thankfulness; or when the struggles of those times come on—for struggles in this imperfect condition of humanity there ever will and must be—those who enjoy, and those who struggle, will, for gratitude the one, and for encouragement the other; look back to the history of this agitation, and to its triumph; and in their thankfulness, and in their invigorated strength, they, too, will accumulate their blessings on the heads of you, men of Manchester. (Prolonged cheers.)

Col. THOMPSON and Mr. BROTHERTON, M.P., were loudly called for. Their speeches are in type; but we are compelled to omit them.

Mr. HENRY ASHWORTH moved (seconded by Mr. THOMAS BAZLEY) that the best thanks of the meeting should be given to the gentlemen who had addressed them. This was carried with three cheers, and the proceedings terminated at twenty minutes before eleven.

NORTH WILTS.

An enthusiastic demonstration, in favour of the repeal of the Corn Laws, took place at Malmesbury, on the 29th ult., when a numerous meeting, called on the requisition of many of the most respectable inhabitants, was held in the large room, at the King's Arms Inn, in that town.

S. U. SALTER, Esq., deputy high steward, presided; (Joseph Neeld, Esq., M.P., being the high steward of the borough.)

HENRY GALE, Esq., of Milborne House, proposed the first resolution, "That the laws interfering with the free importation of corn and other provisions, are alike injurious to agriculture and commerce, by diminishing the application of capital to industry, and are the source of poverty and crime." After alluding to the remarkable circumstances under which they were met, Mr. Gale proceeded, in a long and masterly address, to show the origin of the Corn Laws, the injustice which characterized their imposition, and the opposition which was then raised against them. He described the injury they had inflicted on the farming interest among others; and pointed, as a proof of their unjust and evil operation, to the fact that no less than four commissions had been appointed to inquire into their effect on various classes. That the question would not bear investigation was evident from the circumstance of the refusal of Committees of Inquiry moved for by Mr. Cobden, &c. He spoke of the Duke of Wellington as, probably, the chief hindrance at the present time to the repeal of the Corn Laws, and pointed to his conduct with regard to the Test and Corporation Acts, Catholic Emancipation, and the Reform Bill, as reasons why he, of all other men, should not now be allowed to stand between the people and their rights. He then showed the fallacy of the "peculiar burden" argument, and gave many instances of "peculiar exemptions" which the land enjoyed. The wages question was next entered into, and it was proved that wages never had risen with the price of food; the value of labour depending, like that of all other things, on the demand for it. It was also shown that with a low price of wheat the farmer might, and did, obtain a better profit from his farm than when it was at a high price; because, when corn was at, say 41s. a quarter, the labourer and mechanic had more money to spend in meat, butter, cheese, and other articles of farm produce, which consequently brought higher prices. Mr. Gale then made some able remarks on Lord John Russell's Letter to the Electors of London, and he asked the supporters of the Corn Laws, whether they were prepared to take on themselves the responsibility of causing the evils which Lord J. Russell said flowed from their operation, namely, penury, poverty, crime, fever, and mortality. He concluded by calling on his fellow-townsmen to come forward, and with one voice petition for the repeal of these odious laws.

The resolution was seconded by Mr. R. KAYNS, a tenant farmer, and carried unanimously.

Mr. E. PRITCHARD, of Easton Grey, also a tenant farmer and a landowner, moved the second resolution:—"That these laws are taxes imposed on the consumers of food by the owners of the soil for their own intended benefit, and not for public revenue; and one therefore unjust, and ought to be repealed."

Mr. REYNOLDS, of Malmesbury, seconded the resolution in a speech replete with convincing facts and arguments in favour of the repeal of the Corn Laws. He showed the uncertainty of price and of tenure which they gave rise to, and the check to the employment of capital, and consequent slovenly cultivation which followed. To make up for this, the farmer took another farm, and thus a monopoly of land was created, and a large amount of labour displaced. One large farmer often displaced several small ones and their labourers, and the shopkeeper was thus involved in the common distress by the loss of his customers. The political bondage in which the farmer is placed by the present system was next alluded to, and proof adduced from the monopolist organ—the Morning Post. The folly of the unchristian cry—"Don't be dependent on foreigners," was exposed; and it was shown that in no way would the blessings of peace be so universally diffused as by the extension of commerce among all the nations of the world. After touching on some other points, Mr. REYNOLDS concluded by seconding the resolution, which was carried unanimously.

3rd.—That a petition to the House of Commons, founded on the foregoing resolutions, be submitted to the Hon. J. K. Howard, M.P., for presentation," was moved by Mr. W. PANTING,—seconded by Mr. LLOYD, and carried unanimously. After which thanks were voted to the chairman, and several hearty rounds of cheering were given for Mr. Cobden and the League.

Throughout the proceedings the greatest interest was manifested, and much determination shown to get rid of the impolitic and unjust Corn Laws.

The meeting was a spontaneous movement on the part of the people of Malmesbury, no agent from the League having in any way taken part in the proceedings. The petition which was adopted at the meeting is, we hear, receiving numerous signatures.

BRIGHTON.

Aristocratic and agricultural Brighton, by its inhabitants in public meeting assembled, has pronounced emphatically its condemnation of monopoly. Brighton is the capital of Sussex. The Duke of Richmond is Lord Lieutenant of the county; and at a public meeting convened and presided over by the High Constable, the protectionists were signally defeated. The speakers on the side of monopoly were Mr. Bridgen and Mr. Cobb, while commercial freedom was ably supported by Mr. Hilton, Mr. Abraham, Mr. Wallis, Mr. Bass, the Rev. J. N. Goulty, Captain Pechell, M.P., and Mr. Shelley, late candidate for East Sussex, and a convert from a fixed duty to total repeal, Lord A. Harvey, M.P., Sheffield. The following resolutions and petition were carried by acclamation. And in a room crowded to excess, and capable of holding 2000 persons, there were not more than a dozen dissentients. Honour to Brighton for having thus nobly done its duty.

"That in the opinion of this meeting, all laws tending to prevent the free interchange between nations of the necessities of life, are unjust in principle, oppressive in their operation, and injurious to the best interests of the community, and ought to be forthwith repealed."

"That this meeting deeply sympathizes with that large portion of the labouring population who are mainly dependent on potatoes for subsistence; views with alarm the deficiency of the wheat harvest, and the blight in the potato crop—a deficiency which the laws restricting the importation of food prevent the people from supplying. This meeting, therefore, pledges itself to use its utmost exertions to procure the total, immediate, and unconditional repeal of the Corn and Provision Laws."

TO THE HONOURABLE THE COMMONS OF GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND IN PARLIAMENT ASSEMBLED.

The humble Petition of the undersigned Inhabitants of the Borough of Brighton, agreed to at a Public Meeting, held in the Town Hall, Brighton, on the 13th day of January, 1846.

Sheweth, That your petitioners are deeply impressed with the oppressive and injurious tendency of all laws preventing the free importation of corn and other articles of food. And that they view with feelings of alarm the results inevitable upon the deficiency of the wheat harvest, and the disease which has so rapidly and extensively spread throughout the potatoes, an esculent on which your petitioners regret to say, a large portion of the labouring population are compelled to subsist, owing to restrictive commercial enactments. Your petitioners are further of opinion that the removal of all such restrictions would mainly tend to alleviate the sufferings of the labourer, give confidence and energy to the farmer, extend trade, manufactures and commerce, and whilst thus increasing the happiness and prosperity of our own countrymen, would secure the continuance of a friendly alliance with foreign powers, so conducive to the best interests of nations.

Your petitioners would therefore respectfully, but earnestly intreat your Honourable House at once to adopt such measures as shall have for their object the immediate, total, and unconditional repeal of the Corn and Provision Laws.

And your petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray, &c.

GREAT MEETING AT LEEDS.

THE WEST RIDING DINNER.

This great event, which has for some days been looked forward to with intense interest throughout this county, and with some degree of interest throughout the entire country, took place in the Music-Hall, Leeds, on Wednesday evening last.

About 400 sat down to dinner in the saloon of the building. The tickets for dinner, exclusive of wine, were sold at the very high rate of 10s. 6d. each. Many of them were reserved for delegates from different localities. They were not, therefore, advertised for sale in the usual manner; but, nevertheless, there was a demand for them, quite equal to the limits of that part of the Hall in which the dinner took place. The only parts of the Hall unreservedly thrown open to the public, were the orchestra and the gallery, which were both filled, though for admission to the former (both being exclusive of dinner,) 5s. was charged, and to the latter 2s. 6d.

Its greatness as an event did not consist so much in its numerical strength, as in the powerful display of attachment to the great objects of that mighty body, the sinews of whose warfare it was its chief end to supply. In the aggregate amount of its subscriptions, the growth of Free Trade principles in this district was so marked and decisive that it must indicate to all unprejudiced minds that the West Riding has taken leave of monopoly. The increased confirmation of the truth and justice of those principles on individual minds was also exhibited in a substantial manner; for while in some instances we observed individuals subscribing double and treble the amount of their former contributions, and others not having previously subscribed occupying prominent positions on the list, it is but reasonable to infer that such liberality was dictated by a corresponding conviction of the importance of the great object of Corn Law repeal—an object which we believe the League is not only designed but destined to accomplish.

One fact, it is said, is worth a thousand arguments. The progress of the League has been a gradual series of facts. It has now gone on through all the degrees of comparison. Its 50,000*l.* subscription was a great fact; its 100,000*l.* a greater fact; and its Quarter of a Million fund (more than half realised in the course of one month) is its greatest fact. This is, indeed, a superlative argument, which it would be idle to place in comparison with the position of the monopolist cause. In the West Riding it is certain Free Trade is now the grand actuating principle of a large majority of the constituency. The revision courts have proved this; a West Riding out-door meeting has recently added its confirmation by its unanimous testimony; and now the Riding nobly backs up its former resolve—adding the "oak to the acorn"—by a subscription of 33,440*l.*, with a prospect of a probable increase to 40,000*l.*, or upwards.

Amongst the gentlemen present were—John Darnton Ancock, Esq. (Mayor); Richard Cobden, Esq., M.P., John Bright, Esq., M.P., William Aldam, Esq., M.P., Colonel Thompson, Hamer Stansfield, Esq., Edward Baines, jun., Esq., Peter Fairbairn, Esq., J. G. Marshall, Esq., John Wilkinson, Esq., J. S. Birchall, Esq., John Marshall, Esq., (Horsforth Hall), Wm. Kelsall, Esq., Councillor Banett; Mr. Benjamin Marshall and W. Harvey, Esq., of Barnsley; George Anderton, Cleckheaton; Wm. Rand, Esq., of Bradford; Wm. Chadwick, of Arksey; Edw. Akroyd, Esq., and Wm. Morris, Esq., of Halifax; John Hallowell, Esq., of Hebden Bridge; F. Schwann, Esq., Wm. Willans, Esq., Thos. Mallinson, and R. Welsh, Esq., of Huddersfield; Jos. Craven, of Keighley; Wm. Akroyd, Esq., of Otley; Robert Bentley, of Rotherham; — Wilkinson, Esq., and — Solly, Esq., of Sheffield; John Nettleton, Esq., of Wakefield.

The dinner (which was of a very excellent kind) took place at five o'clock; and the speaking commenced at about half-past six o'clock. The Mayor presided. After the more substantial edibles had been removed, and the tables laden with a rich dessert,

The CHAIRMAN rose and said, that as the health of her Majesty had been desired, there was never greater reason to desire it than at present, for recent events had shown her Majesty to be a true friend to the oppressed manufacturers, and to the starving poor of every clime. He proposed, the health of her Majesty the Queen.

"God save the Queen," and three times three.

The CHAIRMAN said, though himself a bachelor, he highly approved and honoured the matrimonial state. (Loud cheers.) He, therefore, would not longer delay to propose the Royal Consort.

"Prince Albert, and the rest of the Royal family," with three times three.

The CHAIRMAN said, he had now the honour to propose the members of the House of Commons who had supported Mr. Villiers's motion. (Cheers.) He knew not in what words to express himself on this toast. The chief of those members were seated on his right hand and his left. (Loud cheers.) Men who had been rendered only more formidable by defeat, and passing through the length and breadth of the land not as vanquished foes, but as conquering heroes. (Cheers.) Associated with them was a gentleman, who sat on his left; whom it had rejoiced them in Leeds and the West Riding to see associated with this chosen band. (Cheers.) Long might he thus be associated with them, to fight their battles, and to reap with them the reward. He gave, "The Members of the House of Commons who have supported Mr. Villiers's motion. (Loud cheers.)"

Mr. ALDAM (loud cheers): He must be allowed, in the first place, to express his extreme regret, that of the many able men who had supported Mr. Villiers in his motions for the repeal of the Corn Law, it devolved upon one so little able as himself to return thanks.

There were present men who had borne the brunt and heat of the battle (cheers) throughout the movement for the abolition of the laws so hostile to their interests, and who were well able to supply any deficiency of his. They might congratulate themselves that they had now present both those distinguished members, whose unwearied efforts had principally brought the question to its now triumphant position; so that now, at last, we were prepared for a great step in advance, and, he trusted, to a final settlement. (Cheers.) If the ministry of Sir Robert Peel were true to the principles he had professed; if Sir Robert Peel would act on the principles to which he gave in his adhesion in the House of Commons; of buying in the cheapest, and selling in the dearest market; if Sir J. Graham would act on his declaration that the principles of Free Trade were the maxims of common sense; if Mr. Gladstone would act in consistency with the able and humorous speeches which he made as President of the Board of Trade; if these three most able members of the Government would act out their principles, then the measure of the Government would be a complete settlement of the question. (Cheers.) He could not believe that the Cabinet, after the very severe lessons they had had, would bring forward any measure that would not be final. He could not believe that after the distress the country suffered previous to the last two or three years, in the frightful era of 1842, after the truth of those narratives which were then repeatedly made in the House of Commons had been completely established, the reports of manufacturing establishments out of employment, of workmen without work, and wives and families destitute, foot-roads crowded and increasing, and of the working classes sinking lower and lower in misery—he could not think that the Government would run the risk of the recurrence of scenes, owing to a similar depression. And what guarantee had they that such a state of things might not come, from a similar recurrence of disastrous seasons. They had already had a warning. One of our great staples, forming the chief subsistence of too large a portion of the people, had failed to a great extent, and potatoes were now at a price which, as compared with ordinary seasons, was exorbitant. The history of the last quarter of a century showed that good trade followed abundant harvests, and that scantiness of food always produced distress; and often the extreme of misery. Was our prosperity for ever to rest on so fragile a basis? (Hear, hear.) Was the activity of the trade of the country to depend on the mere accident of good or bad harvests within the narrow limits of this island? Are we not now to be allowed to supply our wants upon the best terms, and without shackles, from any part of the world where the supply can be had most advantageously? Let us no longer be subject to the contingency of a bad harvest in a particular country, but be free to supply ourselves from any country. The aggregate produce of the world was always sufficient, and Free Trade would allow the country, where there was abundance, to furnish those where there was a deficiency. The countries around us were making great progress in manufactures. France, according to the report of her minister of commerce, was making a progress far beyond that of former years. The advance of the United States was still more rapid, and it was to be remembered that in a quarter of a century the United States would have a population equal to ours, and in half a century would nearly double it. Our country was one of contracted limits, with a soil not the most fertile; and if they allowed their industry to be restricted by limiting the subsistence of the people to what was produced at home, how was it possible for England to maintain her place among the nations. Let the corn trade be thrown open, and our corn fleets cover the sea, as they would do in a few years, and we need not fear that anything could interfere with the regularity of the supply. We were now dependent on foreign commerce, and its interruption for a single month would produce the most fatal results. (Cheers.) We were already so far dependent that it was necessary to become more so, until it should be so obvious that the least threat of interference might at once rouse the country to the most strenuous effort to resist it. The example of this country in regard to Free Trade was beginning to be followed in other countries. We have not yet gone far enough to induce a very decided imitation, but it was obvious that more decided measures on our part would be readily followed. In France there were symptoms that the protective system was giving way. In Spain, which had hitherto been bound up by the protective system, there was a large and increasing party endeavouring to throw aside the shackles of the protective system. In America, the party opposed to the protective tariff, was making every effort, and he believed they would succeed. We must advance in our onward course, and when the greatest commercial nation thus decides the example, it would be unhesitatingly followed by others. (Cheers.) He must be allowed to say one word as to his attendance here. When first invited, as he had an important engagement, his intention was to decline, but believing that some might think that if the member for Leeds did not attend, it might indicate a lack of earnestness in the cause, and therefore, though at great personal inconvenience, he resolved to be present. (Cheers.) They were assembled to follow up a great fact by a still greater fact, and one that would have considerable influence in deciding the result. (Cheers.) The purpose to which these funds were to be applied, tended more directly than ever to the great object, and that by means unobjectionable in themselves. Their first object had been the diffusion of information on Free Trade by public meetings, by discussions, and by pamphlets, explaining the case in all its bearings. They had now a right to say that the subject required no further enlightenment. Now a new course had been struck out. Whatever might be their opinions on the suffrage, whether they were for complete suffrage, or for finality, or for any intermediate step, whatever their opinions, they must rejoice in the extension of the franchise by the means which had been devised by the League. This was a movement that must effect its object. He would no longer detain them from the business of the meeting, but in the name of himself and the other members who had supported Mr. Villier's motion, he returned thanks. (Cheers.)

Mr. J. G. MARSHALL then rose and said:—The toast he had to propose was the mighty League, of which they were all members, but which was more particularly represented on this occasion by the distinguished persons whom he had the pleasure of seeing on each side of the chairman. (Loud cheers.) He hoped they were prepared to greet them, as their guests, with a welcome such as they would value most, and with substantial proof that the men of the West Riding had given hearty response to the practical appeal made to them by the noble example of the men of Manchester. (Applause.) If, indeed, they needed confirmation of the conviction—and he was convinced it was one which they all must value—that their great cause was identified with truth and justice, and deeply fixed in the hearts of the people, it would be found in the wonderful way in which, in any great emergency, when existing means appeared to be deficient, the League, as if by an electric shock, by an inspiration of power, instantly became possessed of new faculties, new powers, and redoubled strength. (Cheers.) And I hope I may honestly say that which is still higher praise, still higher evidence of the elevation and purity of that principle,—that power which the public had confided to them, and for which he trusted they felt deeply responsible, had, without any, not the slightest, abatement incident to human failings; been conscientiously and constitutionally wielded. (Applause.) They were now approaching the last, he might say, the final struggle. (Hear, hear.) Though their opponents were now divided and dismayed, by their progress, they must yet expect to meet with much resistance. Still more they had to fear some attempt at a fatal evasion of the great principle; an attempt at some compromise which would leave everything unsettled, and the discord which dwells among the various classes of this great community unallayed. (Hear, hear.) It was, therefore, more especially their duty now to declare distinctly their resolve not to accept anything short of an entire and final repeal of the Corn Laws. (Applause.) Indeed, the firmest adhesion to their great principle was admitted by their opponents to be the only consistent and manly course they could take. They even now heard the intelligent protectionist farmers saying, "By all means let this question be settled; if the principle of protection be right, maintain the present Corn Laws; if not, let them be boldly and manfully done away with." (Cheers.) Whilst they rejected all compromise of their principles, they would greatly err, they would injure their cause, if they did not, now in the time of their increasing strength, take additional care that in the manner in which they urged their claims, they acted in any other than a temperate and conciliatory spirit towards their opponents. Many among them they might hope are unconsciously biased by self-interest, and might by such a course on the part of the League be brought to support their cause, and thereby greatly add to their many triumphs. (Cheers.) But he (Mr. Marshall) would not content himself with speaking of their cause simply as one in a state of progression. They were now entitled to look to an approaching final, and he hoped triumphant result. It was upon some of the results of such an event that he wished to say a few words. By some of the honest, but perhaps timid, supporters of their cause, there was an objection that the moment of their triumph might be followed by some disappointment and failure of their highly-excited hopes. "You have promised too much," they say, "from this measure. The labouring man has been led to expect that immediately on the repeal of the Corn Laws he will find cheap and abundant food for the supply of his family; an expectation which, under the present circumstances of disappointed harvests, or harvests deficient throughout Europe, could not be realised." This impression might no doubt, to a considerable extent, be entertained. They could well afford to admit a drawback on the immediate benefits of their measure, but any such disappointment would be but small, and they knew it would be but temporary. Let them take care that the permanent hopes the people entertained of the results of this measure be well founded; and such hopes they were prepared to hold out to no narrow or poor extent. They did not put forth the repeal of the Corn Laws as an isolated measure, which by itself alone would advance the condition of the people to the highest state in the social condition that they could hope for. What they said was, that this was the first great indispensable step. It was the root from which thousands of other social benefits must spring. Having secured to the population of this country in the supply of the main necessary of life, the command of the markets of the world, though the variations of the seasons and of trade would occur, they would not be attended with those fearful convulsions so recently witnessed. Stability, as great as human means could secure, would then have been given to the progress of human industry; and could it be supposed that those who had given their hundreds and thousands for the carrying out of this great measure, which would secure the physical and moral comforts of the people, would not open their hearts and their hands to contribute as much, or even more, if necessary, to carry out those other great measures to which they should, as soon as this was settled, turn and direct their energies? (Loud applause.) Having secured freedom to the commercial and industrial classes—freedom as their necessary basis—they might then hope to see it prove, what it would be if well directed,—a great measure of peace and reconciliation among all classes of the community. The cause of all our discords would then be removed. An inestimable opportunity would be given for the development of the great spirit of improvement among the more intelligent part of the working classes; and there would arise an increase of union among the people of every nation, and an enlightened benevolence on the part of the wealthy classes, urging them to the improvement of the condition of their humbler brethren, which would be hailed as the brightest omen of happiness for the future. (Applause.) Then they might hope to see the landowner and the manufacturer, the employer and the employed, ceasing to regard each other with jealous selfishness, and emulous only to see which shall be foremost in the race of improvement. (Cheers.) Having offered these remarks, he would no longer detain them, anxious as they all must be to hear his hon. friend near him (Mr. Cobden). He was sure, too, they must be anxious to offer to him and his colleagues, by the hearty welcome with which they would be received, and which it would be difficult to express in words, their light and grateful sense of the indomitable perseverance, the high moral character, talent, and energy, which had characterised their conduct. He proposed, "The League, and may its entire object be immediately and unconditionally attained." (Loud and continued applause.)

Mr. COBDEN was received with deafening shouts of welcome, which continued for some time, when he rose to address the meeting. As soon as he could make himself heard he said: Mr. Mayor and gentlemen, the League this night has been well received, and well spoken of, which is somewhat rare in these times, for we are certainly the best abused body in England. (Laughter.) Probably it may as well devolve upon me, as upon any one person, to speak to the subject of the League, having been in at the birth, as I hope I shall be in at the death of it. (Cheers.) And, certainly, if any excuse be required on behalf of the League, I am as proper a person to offer those excuses as any member of it, inasmuch as, if the League, as a body, has suffered from the indiscretions of its members, I have certainly been placed in a position to fear the risk of committing those indiscretions as much as any man in it. I am not so egotistical as to stand here and claim immunity from the frailties of our human nature (hear), and it would be egotism indeed in me to pretend that during our seven years' apprenticeship to this agitation—for we are only just beginning to be journey-men (laughter)—pursuing, as we did, an altogether untrod course, without precedent to guide us, to pretend that we have not, and that I myself have not, committed many mistakes. Why, gentlemen, I have no hesitation in saying, that if we had to run our career over again, we would beat the monopolists in half the time it has now taken us. (Loud cheers and laughter.) One half of our time has been employed in learning how to do our work; and not a little of it has been employed in undoing that part of it which we had done badly. But here we are, gentlemen, after a seven years' agitation, and I may safely say, at all events, that whatever mistakes we may have made in our mode of operation, we have never changed our principles one hair's breadth, from the moment we commenced our agitation. And I would ask any man, with intelligence enough to fill the position of a statesman in this country, whether it would not have averted great evils, and removed dangers at this moment pending over us, if, seven years ago, our principles had been adopted, as they will now ultimately be compelled to adopt them. Well, gentlemen, if ours be the only remedy for the national dangers, and if the measure we propose was as just seven years ago as it is now, then, I ask, if our opponents and the Government of the country have resisted this measure for seven years, are we the only parties to be charged with indiscretion and error? (Applause.) Is there not something to be laid at the door of those who have resisted this righteous measure, and have put us to the toil and labour of compelling them to do justice to the country? (Loud cheering.) And I not only charge upon the monopolists the necessity for all this labour and expense, which we have incurred, but I charge upon them also all the indiscretions and errors we have fallen into; for had they done justice to the country, there would have been no necessity at all for our Anti-Corn Law League. (Hear, hear, and cheers.) Then we have been tried beyond the patience of any human being that ever set up school before. (Laughter.) Why, what a set have we had to teach! (Laughter.) Here we have been seven years lecturing the community; we have brought round the whole of the working classes, for you do not find a man in the labouring classes who is now opposed to us; and yet these educated men—your peers, your clergymen, your members of Parliament, your squires, your men of college education—these men come out at the end of the seventh year of our agitation, and you hear them in all corners of the kingdom, in their little cliques and coteries, actually uttering the self-same nonsense which they were dealing in seven years ago. (Laughter.) Why, is it not enough to tire the patience of the most patient pedagogue that ever set up school? I would forgive these men for never learning anything, but they never forget anything. (Renewed laughter.) Here they are dealing in precisely the same ridiculous fallacies they were seven years ago. (Hear.) Nor do they seem to know that other people have learned something in the meantime. They seem literally to know nothing of the present state of society. They might have been buried, or frozen up in ice, or bottled up in some museum, with their ears closed and their eyes sealed, so as to have neither seen nor heard any thing for the last seven years; for they had neither progressed in knowledge themselves, nor were they conscious that they were being laughed at by the whole community. (Laughter.) Now is not this enough to tire the patience of any man? Have we not been the most prudent and forbearing of human beings? for while these blockheads have been abusing us in all directions, yet, I declare, we have hardly ever turned again upon them. Sometimes, indeed, we tap them on the knuckles—(laughter)—but, comparatively, we are the meekest and most long-suffering body on the face of the earth. (Laughter.) Now the most serious part of the matter is, that these very men have been the government of the country; that these very men and their class, have been astride the shoulders of the Prime Minister, and of the eminent statesmen who have governed this country for the last fifty years. (Hear, hear.) You laugh when you read the speeches of a Lord Southampton, and a Sir Charles Knightley; but they are the type of the men who have been governing you and your forefathers; and it is fearful to contemplate what this country has had to endure under the guidance of such men. Guidance! nay, the country has not been exactly guided by them. We have always had Prime ministers in this country who have contrived in some degree to evade them. We have had men who—like Sir Robert Peel, for instance, in his Canadian Corn Bill—have concocted some measure to relieve the country a little from the misgovernment of these boobies. (Great laughter and cheers.) They speculate on their ignorance of geography for instance. (Immense laughter.) They see that these men are resolved to starve us; they see that it is no use arguing with them on political economy, so they open a back door through Canada, knowing that these men do not know the St. Lawrence from the Mississippi. (Loud laughter.) I am not merely joking. I am acquainted with the fact, that that idea originated in the Board of Trade, and with a man who chuckled to the day of his death, that he had been the party who first suggested the means of evading these squires. Well, but these are the classes who, in their blind ignorance, have ruled the destinies of this country; and how it is that the country has ever managed to survive that rule, that the Anglo-Saxon people have put forth such mighty energies, in spite of this incubus on their industry, is one of the most marvellous things that the historian will have to deal with. (Cheers.) But, gentlemen, when they tell you that England has grown great, and prosperous, and happy, under this rule, I deny it. Looking at the advantages of this country, the great masses of the people are in the most degraded state that ever characterised a nation; in a condition scarcely superior to so many savages. (Hear, hear.) Look at the state of the population of Ireland, of the agricultural labourers of England, and of a vast number of the unskilled manufacturing operatives. A vast mass of the rural population have been sinking, deplorably sinking, as a class, for the last thirty years. I was born on a farm myself, in the South of England, and I know, of mine own knowledge, that the great bulk of the labouring population in the rural districts have been declining and deteriorating for the last thirty years. (Hear, hear.) I believe the same rule applies for the last 60 or 80 years. We are taught to understand that the condition of the agricultural peasant is not an unhappy one. Whence is the origin of all our beautiful poems, teaching us that the peasantry were a dancing merry set, meeting on the village green, and enjoying their rustic games? Whence is the origin of our performances on the stage, which always represent the labourer on the farm, as a man ever happy, cheerful, and enjoying himself in the sunshine, with a rough hilarity? Why such a state of things exists now only in the imagination, or in romance. (Cheers.) Well, these are the people who have been placed especially under the charge of the landowners of this country. (Hear, hear.) Look at their condition—hopeless, depressed, and without the chance of rising from their condition; for, though in the manufacturing districts you may have a prize sometimes amongst the multitude of blanks, they are all blanks in the agricultural districts. (Hear, hear.) Well, then, I say that the multitude are not in a proud position for the country; and I charge again and again, upon the monopolist landowners, who have had the destinies of this empire under their control, the social condition of the mass of the labourers of this country. (Loud applause.) Now, gentlemen, without wishing to say harsher things than needful of them we will content ourselves with declaring that we will take the government of this country out of the hands of these people. (Tremendous and prolonged cheering.) If there be anybody who considers this principle seditious or revolutionary, I say I will not submit to be governed by this class of landlordism; I say I owe no allegiance to the squires of this country; I do not know that they have any right divine to govern us, whatever they may think themselves; and I say that if there is a means by which the power of the state can be transferred from so ignorant a class, into the hands of a more intelligent body, better capable of wielding it,—then, I say, I should be a benefactor to my country if I could aid in making such a transfer. (Loud applause.) And I believe, gentlemen, the process is going on—going on rapidly. (Cheers.) I believe our opponents have done more to advance our cause by their own conduct during the last twelve months especially, than we could have done in twenty years, by attacking them, even if they had been silent. (Loud applause.) We are going to assert the right of the great mass of the middle and industrious population to the influence which they are entitled to in the government of the country; and I say, no government, henceforth, can be carried on in this country, unless it recognises for its basis the wishes, and the will, and the decision of the population—in Lancashire and Yorkshire—(immense cheering)—because Lancashire and Yorkshire are the basis of the commercial and manufacturing energies of the country. You are, in fact, the shoulders of the empire, and upon your shoulders are laid the country—upon your shoulders rests the destiny of the empire. (Applause.) Now, I think Sir Robert Peel understands this as well as I do, for I am told, upon better authority than the newspapers, that Sir Robert Peel intends, at the meeting of Parliament, that the address shall be moved by Lord Francis Egerton, and seconded by Mr. Becket Denison. Now that is rather clever. (Laughter.) It at once indicates to the squires that Sir Robert Peel will govern through Lancashire and Yorkshire, or he will not govern at all. (Hear, hear.) And it is ingenious, because he can bring two men to his aid, both, I believe, well disposed to aid him, and both able to say that they cannot be returned again for Lancashire and Yorkshire. (Shouts of applause.) Well, now, next to being able to bring two members from Lancashire and Yorkshire to say they have been sent to advocate Free Trade, is to be able to bring two members from Lancashire and Yorkshire, who can say that their constituents have altered their minds since they sent them to oppose it. (Renewed laughter.) 35,000, I believe, is the number of your constituency of West Yorkshire; 24,000, I believe, is the number they raise in South Lancashire. Now I call the members for these two counties trump cards in any man's hands. (Laughter and cheers.) And it is quite clear that Sir Robert Peel knows when and how to play them. (Laughter.) I can imagine Lord Francis Egerton, our noble member, making his speech, in which he can say, that owing to ill health, or other causes, he has no intention of again offering himself; and I can imagine him offering his disinterested and impartial testimony to the fact that nobody can succeed him in the representation of South Lancashire unless he advocate the total, and the immediate, and the unconditional repeal of the Corn Laws. (Great cheers.) And I can imagine Mr. Becket Denison—(laughter)—rising in his place in the House of Commons, and pointing to the fact, that in the course of a fortnight from that time, a fresh message would be sent up from the West-Riding of Yorkshire (cheers)—and that the message would be brought by a messenger whose proud distinction it is to be sent on a mission to claim for this country the final, and the total, and the immediate repeal of the Corn Laws. (Cheers.) After this Mr. Denison may spare any explanation of the present state of the constituency of West Yorkshire. But, gentlemen, all this argues that we are in a new era, that we are not henceforth to be governed by the ignorance of the country, but that the intelligence and the numbers and the wealth of this country will have their due weight in the legislature and the state. (Hear, hear.) I can imagine that Sir Robert Peel, if he takes the course that we are taught to expect he will, can offer a very good excuse to his agricultural hearers for the measures which he is likely to propose. He can remind them of past times, when he has told them that he was a Free Trader in the abstract. (Hear.) He can remind them that he has often boasted that he was of manufacturing origin; and that he has often told them that he considers the prosperity of manufacturers of more importance to land than any law that can be passed for its protection. (Hear.) He has much of this general profession of faith to fall back upon. But I can imagine that he would be prepared to say, "Gentlemen, I did expect to be allowed a little longer time in—letting you down. (Laughter.) I expected this year to have sat as I did the last, and enjoyed the pummelling which the protectionists got from the Free Traders on the back benches (laughter), but circumstances have occurred that have compelled me to do otherwise. We have had a failure of the potato crop; Lord John Russell and the great party of the Opposition have joined the League; these things have forced me to a decision earlier than usual (laughter), and I am obliged to declare for the immediate and final repeal of the Corn Laws a little sooner than I expected." (Loud laughter and cheers.) Gentlemen, he will have a very good plea for this, and if he does not use it in public, he will in private. He may say also: "My advice to the landowners of this country is, to yield on this question of the Corn Laws, and yield as promptly as possible; for the seven years' resistance to the demand for their repeal has done so much to elevate the middle classes of the towns, has done so much to raise the superior portion of the operative classes, has taught them so much self-respect, by having the opportunity of seeing how little respect many of you deserve at their hands,—that it has taught them a power by which they can possess the absolute control of the Government of the country. The power lies embedded in the Reform Act, our constitutional franchise, the 40s. freehold; and if you force the middle class by a prolonged conflict, to resort to that weapon, ambitious men will spring up—not mere political economists, like Cobden, Bright, and the rest of them—(laughter)—ambitious men will rise up, who will use this weapon of the 40s. freehold, and marshal the middle and working-classes against you, the landed aristocracy, as a class. (Hear, hear.) And if they do this, and if you keep on this grievance to spur them that way, they may in 10 years effect as complete a Parliamentary revolution against you the landlords, as in 1688 you, the landlords, did against an imbecile king." Now these arguments I am giving to Sir Robert Peel, and charging him nothing for them. (Laughter.) Gentlemen, I beg to thank you for the toast of the League, on behalf of myself and my friends who are engaged in it. But I arrogate to myself, as an individual, nothing in connection with the movement of the League; it is the work primarily of the manufacturers of Lancashire and Yorkshire, co-operatives with, and most ably backed, by the manufacturers in Scotland, and different parts of England, and by the middle classes generally, and now by the working classes as a mass. It is your work, gentlemen. You have begun it nobly. We are but the humble instruments—but the sharp point of the coultter that is turning up the soil; you are the power, the butt-end, and it is you who must do the work. Now you have met to day, I am sure, to acquit yourselves nobly, in this cause, by putting down the names of your towns, with the sums they will each contribute; and making up a total amount, which to-morrow, in London, will amazingly help Sir Robert Peel in framing the Queen's speech. (Laughter and applause.) I will not delay, so far as I am concerned, the most important part of the business of the evening—the handing in of subscriptions—but thank you for the way in which you have noticed us. I thank you for the kindness with which we have always been received here in the West Riding. I am glad to be a bond of union between Lancashire and Yorkshire, coming through the tunnel of the hills that separate them; and so long as the white and the red rose remain entwined in the same chaplet, depend upon it monopoly cannot stand. (Enthusiastic and protracted cheering.)

The CHAIRMAN then called upon the delegates, in alphabetical order, to announce the subscriptions of their respective districts.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Barnsley, showed the total of the subscriptions received in the Barnsley district amounted to 625*l*. The amount contributed to the last League Fund was only 262*l*.

Mr. GEORGE ANDERTON, of Birstall, showed there were thirteen townships in his district, but returns had only been received from five. The total amount received, of which he had an account, was 1041*l*. 10*s*. He expected it would come up to 1500*l*. The last contribution, after very great exertion, had only been 360*l*. He had received donations from three gentlemen who, two years ago, had thought it madness to ask for a repeal of the Corn-Laws, but now they were convinced of its absolute necessity (applause).

Mr. WM. RAND, of Bradford, appeared with the return of subscriptions from that town; but, before reading it, addressed some observations to the assembly on the progress which their principles had made. He complimented Messrs. Cobden and Bright on the consummate skill, unexampled perseverance, and extraordinary success which had attended their labours; and said that, whenever this question should be settled, be the minister who he might, a grateful country would award to those illustrious men the honour of the achievement (applause). He took the opportunity of stating that, if he believed this great movement would not be as beneficial to the agricultural interest as it would be to the manufacturing interest, he would not have lent himself for one moment to the advancement of the question (hear, hear). He also took occasion to answer some communications which had been forwarded to him, by stating that concurrently with the repeal of the Corn-Laws, he would advocate the remission of all duties for the protection of manufactures (hear, hear). He denied emphatically that it was the object of the Anti-Corn-Law League to ruin the agricultural interest, and reduce labourers' wages to the lowest point of existence. Alluding to the operations of the two parties contending this question, he said he had read nearly all the speeches delivered at protectionist meetings, but he had been unable to discover one solid argument in defence of their system. While they were in this condition, he thought they could not adopt a more foolish policy than publishing their proceedings (laughter). The only arguments which had the least pretension to any worth, were those on protection to native industry, and the dependency of the nation upon foreigners. As for the first, the fact that the protectionists asserted it in the privacy of their closed meetings, without venturing to bring the question under the consideration of the working-classes themselves, showed that it was a mere pretext. Then the second involved the most absurd idea that ever entered into the imagination of man. He ridiculed the notion that free trade would detract from the strength and security of the nation, and urged that intercourse with all the countries of the earth was essential to the continued prosperity of this. He reviewed the present position of the free trade question with high satisfaction. The time was come when its adherents must speak out plainly. The public of Bradford had almost to a man lifted up their voices against the continuation of a restrictive policy. It was not the working classes alone who insisted on this. It was the appeal of the great majority of the electors of that borough, and they were as resolute a body as any in the empire. He expected a considerable addition would be made to the funds already received in Bradford. The efforts already made there were nothing to what the inhabitants were prepared to make if the settlement of this was postponed. He trusted the West Riding would nobly respond to the call made upon it, and it was satisfactory to know that in a few days they were intending to pay to the League the highest and best subscription which they could avail themselves of—the gift of Lord MORPETH, as their representative, to the League ranks in the House of Commons. (Loud applause.) He hoped the fall of the corn laws would not be long delayed. Though bodies like the Anti-Corn-Law League were necessary, yet they were not desirable. He trusted the League would live to achieve the great work for which it had been called into existence—that it would lay hold of the pillars which sustain the temple of monopoly, and hurl the buildings to the ground, and like Sampson of old bury itself in the ruins. (Loud applause.) In conclusion he maintained that Sir R. PEEL would act with perfect consistency in proposing the repeal of the corn laws, and he expressed an ardent hope that the serious evils which must follow from a much longer continuance of monopoly might be averted by just and timely legislation. (Applause.) Mr. RAND then announced that the total amount of subscriptions in the Bradford district was 4426*l*. The amount last year was only 2,300*l*. (Loud applause.)

Mr. WILLIAM CHADWICK then rose to announce the subscription for Doncaster. He said that he was sorry to say they had so much of "free trade in the abstract" in this district, that he brought them the miserable pittance of 250*l*. (laughter and cheers). Last year they canvassed the neighbourhood, and their secretary, who was a Scotchman, and held like a bull dog (laughter), wrote again and again to parties for subscriptions, and last year they had one answer, and that was from Mr. WRIGHTSON, Member of Parliament,—but there was no money (laughter). This year they had answers. He kept some of them in his pocket as a sort of curiosity (laughter), and some of them where "How do you do; have you got your hay in?" (great laughter). We have an ulterior object in view. We are looking all these members of Parliament to take care that not a man of them should be smuggled in for any part of the West Riding, without their opposition (laughter and cheers). He advised that they should send none to the House of Commons but those who had subscribed to the League Fund, and hand-somely too (cheers). They must have no compromise. They must not be deluded by men who asked them once in seven years: "How they got their hay in" (laughter). They might depend upon it that if a man was afraid of his caste—if he had daughters to take to Parliament with him (laughter) who talked about "Pa's vulgarity" (laughter), and who said "that this Bishop's lady, and that Bishop's lady would be very polite to Pa, if it were not for the vulgarity of Pa's connection with Cobden, and Bright, and those fellows" (loud laughter)—They might depend upon it that such a man, though he might talk about Free Trade, would contrive to be troubled with a sore throat, when the division came on (laughter and cheers).

MR. EDWARD ACKROYD, of Halifax, came forward to announce the subscriptions from that district. He said that Halifax had really done its duty on this occasion. He believed the importance of this demonstration could not be exaggerated. There was, perhaps, this peculiarity in the West Riding of Yorkshire; it contained an epitome of all classes of the community (hear, hear). They had gentlemen on this occasion, more particularly, perhaps, of the manufacturing and commercial classes of the district; but they had also a worthy representative of another important class, in the person of Mr. Chadwick (cheers and laughter). They had also, he was happy to say, the name of a nobleman who graced the aristocracy, and who was one redeeming point to save his order, he (Mr. Ackroyd) believed, from destruction (hear, hear). It was fortunate for some portion of the aristocracy, that they were brought into communication with the manufacturing classes of this district. It was fortunate or the aristocracy of Yorkshire, that they were mixed up with this class; that they learnt from observation the sentiments which prevail among the manufacturing classes, and that by mixing amongst them they were carried along with the tide of information of the day (hear, hear). He did not say that they were to take as a specimen of the aristocracy, the opinions which they saw in the south of England from the noble dukes (hear, hear and laughter). He did not mean to say, that there is now displayed ignorance as great as that of the French noblesse before the French revolution (hear, hear). He referred to the different stages of the League movement, and defended the character of the class of persons who are seeking to be on the county registers. The character of the movement must not be disguised: it was neither more nor less than a moral revolution. The operatives were now having the dust removed from their eyes, and becoming fully alive to the deceptive fallacies of monopolist advocates. As a manufacturing community, they disclaimed all protection for themselves, and, therefore, they might fairly demand that protection should not be given to the agriculturist (hear, hear). He, in conclusion, announced the subscriptions of the Halifax district to amount to 4,500*l.* (loud applause).

MR. JOHN HELLERWELL produced the Hebden Bridge list. The total was 1428*l.*, with an expectation of receiving 200*l.* more. Last year 410*l.* was the contribution.

MR. FREDERICK SCHWAM, of Huddersfield, was next called on. He said his friends had trusted more to the eloquence of their figures than the talent of their delegate. (Applause.) There was power of argument in those figures far more convincing than anything he could say—powerful and convincing both to free traders and monopolists. (Loud applause.) There must be a deep conviction to induce those large and liberal sacrifices. The Huddersfield list amounted to 6338*l.*, and they had strong hopes of increasing that amount to 7000*l.*, which was seven times more than had been before described. (Applause.) Now, they knew the value of money well in Huddersfield; they did not throw it away; but they knew they were laying it out in this cause for the best purpose. (Applause.) He would not then argue the question of free trade at any length. The time had gone by when it was necessary to do so. Let them look to the future, and to what they had yet to do. He believed their duty was clear and well defined. Only persevere in their demands. Persevere with the registration, persevere in securing counties, unceasingly, unweariedly, unhesitatingly, and they would ensure success. (Loud applause.) Since Luther's reformation, since the great struggle which ensured to Englishmen the proud privileges of freedom of speech, freedom of conscience, and personal freedom, no reformation had been conceived involving higher and nobler interests of mankind, than the one in which they were then engaged. (Applause.) Personal liberty, freedom of conscience, freedom of speech were blessings, perhaps more highly appreciated by one not born in England than any native of this country. (Applause.) But there is one thing still needed to constitute man a free agent, and give him power to fulfil his highest destiny, and that one thing is freedom of industry. (Applause.) Their forefathers struggled thirty years for religious liberty, sacrificing, in many cases, their fortunes, homes, and lives, for the cause of truth and justice; and should they, in the present day, shrink from making new sacrifices of time and money for a cause scarcely less noble. (Applause.) No, never. The means for another agitation of five years would soon be completed, if they did their duty; and if there were to be an agitation for ten years longer, the means would be granted to their leaders. (Hear, hear.) And the humbler workmen would renew their exertions and double their efforts, and never rest satisfied until the cause was gained. He (Mr. Schwam) knew this was the feeling of that noble knot of friends with whom he was prepared to co-operate, and whom he then had the honour to represent. After some other remarks, recommendatory of union and decision, he concluded by reading his subscription list.

MR. JONATHAN CRAVEN communicated that the amount of the Keighley subscription was 500*l.*; last year 210*l.*

MR. HAMER STANSFELD next rose, to state the amount of the Leeds subscriptions, and was received with loud cheers. He said that the time for argument on this question, in the West Riding, was gone by; and he looked to the visit of their friends, the leaders of the League, as that of generals coming to inspect their Yorkshire forces. They were on the eve of a great fight, and they wished to know if they could rely upon them; to know if they were ready for carrying on this most righteous of all actions. On the part of Leeds he said they were. They had been on permanent duty for the last six weeks, since their friends were there, and pretty well drilled they had been. (Laughter.) They attended in the first place to the registration movement. They did some service there, and they were intended to do more before the 30th of January. (Applause.) Leeds then held its town's meeting to memorialise the prime minister for the opening of the ports and a repeal of the Corn-Laws, and sent a deputation up to London. They then took their part in calling the West Riding meeting; and more recently they had been engaged in promoting the present object of the League, by furnishing their quota to the fund; and as soon as that was done, they should renew their efforts to promote the qualification movement, the most important political duty of the present time. (Loud applause.) Where were their antagonists now? At their meeting there was not even the shadow of a protectionist. At the West Riding meeting of 25,000 there was not the ghost of one to be seen. (Laughter.) The vacancy in the West Riding occurred as if by a decree of heaven, but not a monopolist candidate was to be found in the West Riding. (Hear, hear.) "My kingdom for a horse," cried Richard on Bosworth Field; and a kingdom would Buckingham give if he had one, for a monopolist candidate for Yorkshire.—(Laughter.) What a glorious triumph was this as contrasted with the last election for the West Riding! (Applause.) The battle of truth seemed then to be lost—but it never was lost. (Applause.) Truth gained in every conflict, and if the friends of truth persevered, the battle would be theirs ultimately, as the West Riding was now. (Applause.) No protectionist would ever offer himself again for the West Riding, or for any borough in it, unless some man without his senses should offer for Knaresborough. (Laughter.) He begged to express on the part of Leeds, their perfect confidence in the guidance of their leaders, and a request that they would persevere and exact to the utmost the principle they had laid down—of total, immediate, and unconditional repeal of the Corn-Laws. (Loud applause.) It was marvellous with what readiness the money had been given. (Hear, hear.) People seemed to think it a debt due to the League, and so it was, and a just one. He expressed a hope that the protectionists would see the error of their ways. In the words of Channing, "The principle of free trade is the plain interest and the plain duty of the human race. To level all barriers to free exchange; to cut up root and branch the system of restriction; to open every Port of the earth to every product—this is the office of enlightened humanity." (Applause.) It was their interest to do this: Religion and Morality, their duty to God and man demanded it of them. He concluded by announcing the Leeds subscriptions to amount to 3607*l.* (Loud applause). The last subscription amounted only to 3156*l.* (Loud applause).

MR. GEORGE METCALFE, of Pateley Bridge, announced 100*l.* as subscribed in his district.

From Otley, 125*l.* was returned by Mr. W. Ackroyd. From Rotherham, 188*l.*; last year 23*l.* Mr. R. BENTLEY said he had used a great deal of exertion to obtain more, but the shopkeepers were principally dependent on farmers, and they were blind to their own interests.

At Skipton, a letter written by Mr. DEWHURST, stated that 250*l.* had been contributed there.

The Sheffield delegate was Mr. H. WILKINSON, and he returned the subscription from that place at 3769*l.* Last year it was only about 1300*l.*

The Wakefield subscription Mr. PLINT stated was expected to be 500*l.*, but it was not completed. Including Dewsbury and Ossett in that district, it would likely amount to 1053*l.*

MR. E. BAINES, JUNR., proposed the next toast. He said if it were not for the advanced hour of the evening, he could not have resisted the temptation to trespass for a very few minutes on the meeting in introducing this toast. But when he knew that one of the distinguished gentlemen, who would have to reply to the toast, one of their distinguished visitors had not yet spoken, and must be impatiently expected, and that another very distinguished gentleman and veteran—(loud applause)—a veteran among all the pedagogues who had been teaching the country for the last thirty years—that he too had yet to address the meeting, he was sure the meeting's sense of propriety would go with his, when he only added one or two words to the toast which he was about to give to them. That toast, indeed, less than almost any other toast which it was possible in this country needed even a single word to be said in recommendation of it. It was—"Thanks to Richard Cobden, Esq., M.P., and John Bright, Esq., M.P., and he would add Colonel Perronet Thompson—(loud cheers)—for their unwearied exertions in the cause of Free Trade" (cheers. He (Mr. Baines) had witnessed the labours of these gentlemen during the whole course of that apprenticeship of which Mr. Cobden had spoken, and he took upon him to say, that he never, in any cause or in any men, witnessed a greater singleness of object, and greater firmness and perseverance, and more entire devotedness to the object which they had taken up, more distinguished talent in the pursuit, and he would say more glorious success in the result of their labours, than in that of those gentlemen whose names he had mentioned. [The toast was given with three times three cheers.]

The CHAIRMAN then announced that the total amount of the subscriptions handed in was 33,440*l.* (loud cheers).

The following Subscriptions were announced from the under-mentioned districts:—

	1844.	1845.
£ s. d.	£ s. d.	£ s. d.
Barnsley	262 0 6	625 3 3
Birstal	224 5 0	1041 10 0
Bradford	2266 8 4	4426 0 0
Bromcaster	102 11 0	250 0 0
Halifax	1927 5 10	4308 16 0
Hebden Bridge	431 2 4	1428 0 0
Huddersfield	2167 0 6	6337 5 0
Keighley	210 13 8	500 0 0
Leeds	3156 13 6	8612 11 0
Otley	265 3 4	450 0 0

Pateley	20 13 0	100 0 0
Rotherham	14 0 0	188 0 0
Sheffield	1314 19 11	3769 12 0
Skipton	126 10 0	350 0 0
Wakefield	550 13 3	1053 5 0

£13,040 0 2 £33,440 2 3

Marshall and Co., Leeds ..	1000
J. Akroyd and Sons, Halifax ..	1000
Milligan, Forbes, and Co., Bradford ..	500
Titus Salt, ditto ..	500
Edward Smith, Firsale, Sheffield ..	500
Starkey, Brothers, Huddersfield ..	500
Fred. Schwam, ditto ..	500
George Marrison and Sons, ditto ..	500
Geo. Crossland and Sons, ditto ..	500
Geo. Senior and Son, Dalton, near ditto ..	500
Hammer Stansfield, Leeds ..	500
Edwin Birchall and Sons, ditto ..	300
Wilkinson and Co., flax spinners, ditto ..	300
Peter Fairbairn, ditto ..	300
Wm. Hand, Bradford ..	300
C.H. Dawson, Royds Hall, ditto ..	300
John Crossley and Son, Halifax ..	300
Henry Ambler, Ovenden ..	300
Arthur Lupton, Leeds ..	250
Firth and Howarth, Hebden Bridge ..	250
Rennie, Tetley, and Co., Bradford ..	250
Henry Leah, ditto ..	250
Edward Ripley and Son, ditto ..	250
Naylor, Vickers, and Co., Sheffield ..	250
Samuel Butcher, ditto ..	250
Thomas Fenton and Sons, ditto ..	250
Wm Jessop and Sons, ditto ..	250
Butterworth and Son, Huddersfield ..	250
J.T. Clay, Rastrick, near ditto ..	250
Maclea and March, Leeds ..	200
John and Wm Whitworth, Halifax ..	200
Joseph Stocks and Co., ditto ..	200
Thomas Taylor and Son, Ovenden ..	200
Henry Wilkinson, Sheffield ..	200
John Wilson and Son, £175 } ditto ..	200
J.H. Hawksworth 25 } ..	200
Beverley and Simpson, Leeds ..	150
Robert Walker, ditto ..	150
E. Baines and Son ..	150
John Riley and Sons, Hebden Bridge ..	150
John Crossley and Son, ditto ..	150
D. Salt and Son, Bradford ..	150
Swaine and Webb, Huddersfield ..	150
J.W. and H. Shaw, ditto ..	150
John Dewhurst and Sons, Skipton ..	150
J. Marshall, Horsforth Hall, near Leeds ..	100
Stansfield and Wise, ditto ..	100
Wm. Brown, Roundhay, near Leeds ..	100
Geo. Hammond and Son, ditto ..	100
Joseph and Wm Walker, ditto ..	100
Benjamin Walker, ditto ..	100
Bateson and Co., ditto ..	100
S.J. Birchall and Co., ditto ..	100
Robert Jowitt and Sons, ditto ..	100
Lucecock, Lupton, and Co., ditto ..	100
George Goodman, ditto ..	100
Thomas George and Sons, ditto ..	100
John Haigh, ditto ..	100
Taylor and Wordsworth, ditto ..	100
W.B. Holdsworth and Co., ditto ..	100
Whitehead and Botterill, ditto ..	100
Emmanuel Briggs and Co., ditto ..	100
John Sykes, ditto ..	100
Ripley and Ogle, ditto ..	100
Robert Bentley, Rotherham ..	100
J. and A. Stansfield, Hebden Bridge ..	100
John and Wm Barker, ditto ..	100
Wm Russell, Bradford ..	100
Wm Holdsworth, ditto ..	100
George Oxley, ditto ..	100
John Wade and Sons, ditto ..	100
George Rogers, ditto ..	100
James Garrett, ditto ..	100
Craven and Harrop, Thornton, near ditto ..	100
Samuel Smith, ditto ..	100
T.G. Clayton, Bierly Hall, near ditto ..	100
Daniel Bateman and Son, ditto ..	100
Harvey and Co., Barnsley ..	100
R. Travis Clay, Rastrick, near Halifax ..	100
Lister and Morris, ditto ..	100
John Baldwin, ditto ..	100
R. Kershaw Lamb, ditto ..	100
A. Friend, per J. Crossley ..	100
J. Foster and Son, Northowram, near ditto ..	100
W. Aldam, jun., M.P., Leeds ..	100
W. Fisher and Sons, Sheffield ..	100
Marshes and Shepherd, ditto ..	100
A. Friend to the League, per J. Smith, do. ..	100
Joseph Kaye, Huddersfield ..	100
C.H. Jones, ditto ..	100
W. Willans, ditto ..	100
Wm Livingstone, ditto ..	100
Sir C. Tempest, Broughton Hall, nr Skipton ..	100
Ripley and Ogle, Leeds ..	100
John Holmes and Brothers, Hebden Bridge ..	90
Kitson, Thompson, and Hewitson, Leeds ..	75
— Hinchcliffe, Hebden ..	75
Alex. Dixon and Son, Cleckheaton ..	60
W. Atkinson and Son, ditto ..	60
Geo. Anderton and Sons, ditto ..	60
R. and C. Goldthorpe, ditto ..	60
Walter Stead, Leeds ..	50
Thomas Hemmant, ditto ..	50
Joseph Cliff, ditto ..	50
F. Lupton, ditto ..	50
Joshua Bower, ditto ..	50
David Crowther, Churwell, near ditto ..	50
Wm Kellsall, ditto ..	50
Francis Carbutt, ditto ..	50
James Lobley and Co., ditto ..	50
Gill and Bishop, ditto ..	50
John Wilson, Hunslet-lane, ditto ..	50
Joseph Austin, ditto ..	50
T. Walker, Springfield Mount, ditto ..	50
T. and S. Witham, ditto ..	50
John Broadhead, ditto ..	50
Wm Firth, ditto ..	50
Croysdale, Brothers, ditto ..	50
Newman Cash, ditto ..	50
Abraham Webster, ditto ..	50
Joseph Rowling, ditto ..	50
Sand J. Holland, Stead House, nr Halifax ..	50
J. Ormerod and Sons, Brighouse, nr ditto ..	50
T. Sugden and Son, ditto ..	50
J.S. Broadbent, Cleckheaton ..	50
J. Akeed and Sons, Hebden Bridge ..	50
J. and J. Vickers, ditto ..	50
W. Hargreaves, Sheffield ..	50
Dr. Thompson, ditto ..	50
Thomas Dunn, ditto ..	50
Thomas Birks, ditto ..	50
R. and J. Solly, ditto ..	50
Anti-Curry, ditto ..	50
Cowley and Pierson, ditto ..	50
Drabble and Sanderson, ditto ..	50
Francis Noble ..	50
Samuel Penker and Son, ditto ..	50
Robert Welsh, Huddersfield ..	50
Foster Shaw, ditto ..	50
T. A. Heaps, ditto ..	50
S. C. Kell, ditto ..	50
Jackson and Beckitt, ditto ..	50

J and T C Wrigley, ditto	50
J and A Bennett, ditto	50
Bentley Shaw, ditto	50
Wm Leadbeater and Co., ditto ..	50
Schofield, Cookson, and Co., ditto	50
J and G Mallinson, ditto	50
John Wrigley and Sons, ditto ..	50
D Haigh and Brothers, Lindley, near ditto	50
Charlotte Sykes and Sons, ditto ..	50
Joseph Walker and Sons, ditto ..	50
John Robinson, Hensley	50
Wm Douglas, Bradford	50
James Laws, ditto	50
James Ellis, ditto (paid)	50
John Priestman, ditto (paid) ..	50
Benjamin Harrison, ditto	50
Henry Brown, ditto	50
Free Trader, ditto	50
John Rawson, ditto	50
D Illingworth, ditto	50
Geo Armitage and Co., ditto	50
G Norton, Clayton West, near Barnsley	50
Robert Eastburn, Halifax	50
Barney Walton, ditto	50
A Friend, per J Crossley, ditto ..	50
J W Gregory and Co., ditto	50
E D Protheroe, M.P., ditto	50
J and J Farrar, ditto	50
Royston, Son, and Co., ditto	50
Geo Naylor, ditto	50
S Wood, Sowerby Bridge, near ditto	50
Moses Morley, ditto	50
James Fielding	50
Eli Bates, ditto	50
A Friend, per W. Morris, ditto ..	50
A Friend, per J Crossley, ditto ..	50
J Smith, ditto	50

Mr. BRIGHT, on rising to acknowledge the toast, was loudly cheered. He said,—Mr. Mayor and gentlemen, I need not say how great is the delight which my colleagues and myself have felt in attending this highly-respectable meeting. For myself, I always feel somewhat exhilarated when I get into Yorkshire. For several years back, it has been my fortune, as one of a deputation from the League, to visit this district of the kingdom; and every year I become more enamoured of the spirit which actuates the population of this district, and more convinced than ever that the time has come when you here, and we in Lancashire, united together, shall exercise a far more powerful influence upon the Government and destinies of this country than we have done, or than our forefathers have done hitherto. (Applause.) You have thanked us for the arduous labours in which we have been engaged in in this cause. We are repaid, if it were only that we have made the acquaintance of, and formed friendship with, hundreds, I might almost say thousands, of the choice spirits of this day, and of this country—of the men who are, I am sure, destined to keep the vessel of the State in less tempestuous waters than it has for some time past been sailing in, and of men with whom I trust, long after this battle shall have terminated, we shall be able to keep up a friendship and a sympathy which will only terminate with existence. (Loud cheering.) We have had hard labours true enough, but we have been cheered by your approbation, and not less by the glorious prospect which ever increasing success offers to our view; for now more than ever are we convinced that we have not been following a shadow, but that in the pursuit of industrial freedom we have had before us, perhaps, the greatest, the best, the most important of all kinds of freedom to which any lover of his kind or country could possibly aspire. We have believed that we were working not at any petty, unimportant question, for the exaltation of any man or class of men, but for an object important to our own country, and to our own age, and momentous to the world at large, and to the population of all succeeding ages. (Cheers.) And now we are entitled, I think, to speak with some authority upon this great question, and with some authority too, with respect to the opinions which our countrymen have formed upon it. (Cheers.) The great titled men who are now meeting day after day, say, they will have no surrender; and we are not about to retract the declaration that we have emphatically made for years past, that so far as our share in this great battle is concerned, we have also rallied under a flag upon which the term No Surrender is inscribed. (Cheers.) We have learnt much since we began this contest. We have learnt that it is a great and more sacred contest than we thought it at first. And we have learnt also, that although the battle may be hard—the hill may be steep to climb—yet, that there is power enough, and intelligence, and that we now have organisation enough, by which we can carry this great contest to a successful, to a most triumphant issue. (Loud continued cheering.) The people of this country are to be hoodwinked no longer. It was madness to maintain the Corn Law, when its character was once found out. (Hear, hear.) One of the most philosophical writers of this age has said that he could not write a chapter about the Corn Law, for it made the very air hot. (Hear, hear.) Dr. Chalmers has said, “There has been no one thing which our Government could do, which would so sweeten the breath of English society, as the abolition of this Corn Law. (Loud cheers.) When an intelligent population like that of which you form so important a part have once found out the features of this Corn Law, which are so hideous; when, in opposition to public opinion, the landed proprietors, who are the governors of the country, stake their power, as it were, upon the maintenance of this law, what is our position? Does not an opposition to the Corn Law, in fact, become a direct opposition to the governing power; and, if we are to be successful in overthrowing this law, so long as they say they are for no surrender, what does it involve but this: the overthrow of those parties who have hitherto governed this country, and who now pledge themselves to the maintenance of this system? (Cheers.) Why, look at what has taken place lately. Cast your eye at the meeting at Manchester, with its subscription of upwards of 60,000*l*. (Cheers.) Follow us then to another town, within an hour’s travel of it, and you find there subscriptions put down to the amount of 15,000*l*., in a town where monopoly has more power, and where the old West India and the old slaveholding vices and prejudices have probably more hold than in almost any other town in the kingdom; and then we come here, about two hours ride eastward from Manchester, and we find a gathering like this, with subscriptions already put down for upwards of 33,000*l*. (Loud cheers.) Why, we ask for a quarter of a million—and they would have laughed at us had they not recollected the previous 100,000*l*. and the 50,000*l*. before it,—and now within a short month more than one half of the Quarter of a Million is already subscribed and ready to be forthcoming. (Cheers.) Here we are to-vast night, not a vast number, but a number representing vast masses beyond these walls, and influence, and intelligence, and votes. (Loud cheers.) This night, at this moment, whilst I am addressing you, the great theatre at Covent Garden, is filled to overflowing, and the streets around it have been crowded by thousands who have not been able to obtain admittance there. To-morrow night at this time, the Free Trade Hall, at Manchester, will have its 7000 or 8000 within its walls at least. Yesterday was the first day of issuing tickets, and 10,000 persons applied for them. (Cheers.) Well, these are demonstrations such as have never taken place in this country before on any political question whatever. (Hear, hear.) That man is mad, or at least knows nothing of the constitution of this country, knows nothing of the people of England—knows nothing of the power of a great and holy principle to win men’s hearts and stir them to action, who thinks that the monopolists can for one short session retain their hold of the life of the people by the maintenance of the Corn laws. (Cheers.) True, your election, your unanimous election, your election at which even the squeak of a monopolist is not heard—(cheers)—your election is, I hope, to realise again what has before times so frequently been shown, that at a time of any great and momentous change in the policy of the English Government, Yorkshire speaks, and its behest is obeyed. (Loud cheers.) I have had put into my hand a card, which refers to a subject which I would wish to make one observation upon. It says: “I think much has been lost to the League fund, because subscriptions to it are not promoted amongst the operatives. We only named it yesterday among our men, and 10 guineas were subscribed at once.” (Cheers.) This is from Messrs. Brook and Co., of the Albion Foundry. I do believe that if the idea were once started among the workshops, there would be collections of larger or smaller amounts in scores, perhaps from hundreds of mills and workshops for the purpose of contributing to this great final movement, by which the industry of these operatives shall be enabled to obtain its just reward. (Loud cheering.) I am delighted with this meeting beyond expression. I believe there is one more meeting, for which my name is set down, before this, what people facetiously call the Parliamentary recess, is over. (Hear.) I shall be at Manchester to-morrow, and at Oldham on Monday. My colleague, Mr. Cobden, goes to Norwich on Tuesday; and then, on Thursday, I suppose we shall have a chance of learning something of the great secret. The political atmosphere has been foggy for a long time. We find it clearing away a little now. I met a Conservative member yesterday by accident, and really it seemed as if we had been fellow-labourers in the Free Trade cause all our lives. There is no shyness now. In fact, I am not certain we shall know which side of the House to sit on when we get there on Thursday next. (Cheers and laughter.) Of this you may rest assured, that as for seven years we have kept this great principle before us, and as for seven years you have given us your continuous and increasing confidence, let the proposition of the Minister be what it may, or the conduct of other men what it may, we will never deviate one hair’s breadth from the principle upon which we have so long acted, and for our firm maintenance of which we have received so much of the confidence and the co-operation of the intelligent population of this country. I have now only to tender the acknowledgements of myself and colleagues for the vote of thanks you have given us; and as we have before-time been borne up by your cheering co-operation, we shall go from this meeting to night conscious that we have a cause worthy of all the energies that we can bring to bear upon it, and that we have supporters in this district who are worthy of all the labour which we can possibly bestow upon this cause. (Loud cheers.)

The CHAIRMAN now called upon Col. Thompson to address the meeting, and propose a toast. The announcement was received with reiterated cheers, and the cry of three cheers for the veteran was heartily responded to. Col. THOMPSON. (Loud cheers.) I am to demonstrate the sense of the obligations you have conferred upon us, by giving a toast. And what toast should I give that could so directly bear upon this subject, as to ask you to drink Success to the trade of Leeds, and of the West Riding? (Hear, hear.) If your enemies are satisfied with any of the movements of this meeting, and it is very hard, in general, to satisfy our enemies entirely. I am sure they could not find fault with the discretion which has fixed upon me to make the present motion, so far as regards the good will implied in it. I will not speak now of the private reasons for the interest I feel in it; but I will speak of the commercial power which has obtained the success of our great effort on the part of our country, and of all countries. When our friend (Mr. Schwann) addressed you with enough of the foreigner in his accent to remind you that you have friends in other countries than our own, (cheers,) it struck me that we might hail him not merely as the representative of Huddersfield, but of all mankind, urging us for their sakes also, to leave no stone unturned for the speedy and effectual removal of this great stumbling-block to all men’s happiness, for it affects men in every clime, whom God intended to be happy, and whom we design to render happy, by making them free. (Cheers.) I, too, have visited the country of our friend, and have read there the lesson which I am sure was implanted on his youth. I saw there the remnants offered at castles towering

